about town while he tried to decide what to do with himself. He realized that his position was untenable; he could not go on living as he had.

As he was about to leap into the river and commit suicide, Mattia had a brilliant idea. Deciding to die as Adriano Meis and return to his identity as Mattia Pascal, he left his hat and other evidence to make it seem as if Adriano Meis had jumped into the river. Within a day or two the newspapers carried accounts of the suicide of Adriano Meis. Quite happy to regain his original identity, Mattia went to visit his brother Roberto. At his brother's home Mattia learned that Romilda had married a childhood sweetheart and had had a child. Mattia was even more disconcerted to learn that he would have to take his wife and her mother back again. According to the law, his return from the dead voided the second marriage.

Disturbed by that news, Mattia returned to his native village. There he found his wife and her new husband quite happy and his hateful mother-in-law alive. In spite of the law they all decided that it was best for the current arrangements to continue, and so Mattia relinquished unofficially his marital rights and responsibilities. He found himself some rooms in the village and lived there quietly, spending his days reading and preparing an account of his strange adventures, a story which was to be published after what he termed his third and final death.

THE DWARF, an evil magician
THE GHOST OF MICHAEL SCOTT, a wizard

Critique:

As Scott himself tells us in his introduction to The Lay of the Last Minstrel, his purpose was to describe the manners and the scenery of the Scottish Border country during the middle of the sixteenth century. He was concerned more with these than he was with the story itself and often left the narrative for several stanzas in order to portray customs of the Scottish clans. As in his other metrical romances, Scott had here the touch of the artist; the scenes he painted are as real to us as if we were seeing them for ourselves. Scott's ability to tell a picturesque, rousing story in verse is almost as great as his achievement in the novel.

The Story:

As an old minstrel, the last of his kind, wandered through the country, he was treated kindly by a duchess at whose mansion he asked food and shelter. Later he rewarded her by singing a song of days gone by. This is the tale he sang:

Bold Lord Buccleuch had been killed in battle with the English, but his widow and children were well protected in their castle at Branksome by a group of brave knights who had followed their dead leader. Although a truce had been declared, there were skirmishes between the English and the Scots throughout the Border country.

The widow, Lady Buccleuch, was the daughter of a magician; before he died he had taught her to talk with the spirits. One night she heard the spirits predicting that the stars would show no favor to Branksome castle until pride should die and make love free. Lady Buccleuch knew this omen was meant for her, for her daughter Margaret loved the young Lord Cranstoun, who had fought against Lord Buccleuch. But Lady Buccleuch swore that Margaret should never wed a foeman, no matter what the spirits might say. She sent William of Deloraine to Melrose Abbey, there to secure the mystic book of Michael Scott, a wizard long dead and buried in the abbey crypt. She ordered William of Deloraine not to look into the book on peril of his life.

The monk at the abbey, although he quavered at the request made by Deloraine, obeyed without question Lady Buccleuch's command. Leading him deep into the vaults, he took the knight to the wizard's tomb. Deloraine, bravest of knights in battle, shivered with dread as he looked at the body of the magician. The man lay as if he had not been dead a day, and when the knight took the book from his hand, he seemed to frown. As Deloraine left the vault, he heard noises like the laughter and sobbing of fiends.

On the same day, while Deloraine went to the abbey, Margaret slipped out of the castle to meet her lover, Lord Cranstoun. Cranstoun was accompanied by a Dwarf, who had some time before attached himself to Cranstoun and now would not leave his side. Since the Dwarf served him well, Cranstoun had ceased his efforts to rid himself of the little page. The Dwarf warned the lovers of the approach of a horseman. The traveler was Deloraine, returning from his mission, and while Margaret fled, the two knights battled. Deloraine was seriously wounded. Cranstoun ordered the Dwarf to take Deloraine to Branksome Hall so that his wounds could be properly tended. The Dwarf found the book but could not open it until after he had smeared the cover with the blood of Deloraine, who was almost an infidel. While he was reading one of the spells described in the book, an unseen hand struck him on the cheek and knocked him to the ground. The book snapped shut and could not be opened again. The Dwarf, hiding it under his cloak, proceeded to Branksome

Hall with the wounded Deloraine.

At the castle the Dwarf spied the young Master of Buccleuch. Changing himself and the boy into dogs, he led the child into the woods. There, after they had resumed their real shapes, the child was captured by the English soldiers patrolling the Border. At the castle his absence was not known, for the Dwarf returned there and, taking the child's shape, made mischief for everyone. Lady Buccleuch, busy tending the wounds of her faithful Deloraine, failed to notice the child's strange behavior.

Suddenly watchers in the castle sighted signal fires. Their meaning was clear; the English were gathering to attack the Scots. From the castle messengers were sent hurriedly to summon friendly clans of the Border to the defense of Branksome Hall. In the confusion the Dwarf, still in the form of the Master of Buccleuch, escaped from the knight assigned to watch him.

The English, arriving before the castle, made their demands. They wanted Deloraine turned over to them, for they accused him of murdering the brother of one of their group. They also demanded that two hundred English knights be quartered in Branksome, to prevent the Scotsmen from making raids on the English side of the Border. If these demands were not met, they declared, the castle would be stormed and the young heir of Buccleuch, who was held by the English, would be sent to the English court to serve as a page.

Lady Buccleuch would not meet the demands. She could not send her faithful knight to his doom, though her deed might cost her her son, her castle, and perhaps her life. She proposed that Deloraine meet the brother of the slain man in combat and settle the dispute in that knightly fashion. The English leaders, refusing to accept these terms, were preparing to attack the castle when one of their number brought word that strong Scottish clans were approaching the castle. Fearful of a trap, the English agreed to accept the proposal for a settlement by mortal combat between the two knights concerned, or by the wronged man and a substitute for Deloraine should his wounds not be healed by the next day. Then English and Scots joined together in feasting and revelry until the time appointed for the combat.

As the time approached, other knights argued over the right to represent Deloraine, who was still weak from his wounds. But at the last minute Deloraine appeared in full armor, ready to defend himself. The fighting was long and fierce, and both knights lost much blood before the Englishman fell wounded. Deloraine, standing triumphantly over his victim, did not remove his visor. Then the spectators saw with amazement that Deloraine was approaching from the castle. Quickly the supposed Deloraine was uncovered. In his place stood young Lord Cranstoun. He had stolen Deloraine's armor so that he might defend the home and save the brother of Margaret. At first Lady Buccleuch would not greet him, but at last she thought of the prophecy of the spirits and knew that she must forget pride and allow love to prevail. Yielding, she gave her daughter to the knight who had been her husband's enemy. She also swore to herself that she would return the book to Michael Scott's tomb.

At the wedding feast the Dwarf continued to make trouble. In order to undo the mischief he caused, all the minstrels sang songs of days gone past. As the last song died away, the banquet hall grew suddenly dark. A great flash of lightning streaked through the room and struck the Dwarf. The evil page was seen no more. Deloraine was terrified, for in the unearthly light he had seen the shape of the dead wizard. Lady Buccleuch renounced forever the magic of her father, and all the knights made pilgrimages to pray for peace and rest for Michael Scott's soul.

Thus ended the song of the ancient minstrel.

LAZARILLO DE TORMES

Type of work: Novel

Author: Unknown

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Spain

First published: 1553

Principal character:

LAZARILLO DE TORMES, an adventurer

Critique:

This early work is the first of many picaresque tales. The Life of Lazarillo de Tormes antedates Cervantes, and LeSage in Gil Blas drew heavily on this entertaining story of a rogue. The narrator, in a series of brief sketches, gives a vivid picture of the stratagems used by the poor merely to stay alive. Without a trace of self-pity he shows us the humorous side of continual penury and want. The tales are scarcely developed into a unified whole. This novel was once credited to the sixteenth-century writer, Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, but his authorship is now regarded as extremely doubtful.

The Story:

Lazarillo's surname came from the peculiar circumstance of his birth. His mother happened to stay the night at the mill where his father was employed. Lazarillo was born on the mill floor just over the river Tormes, after which he was named.

He had reached his ninth year when his father was caught taking flour from customers' sacks. After being soundly punished, the father joined an army getting ready to move against the Moors. He became a mule driver for a gentleman soldier and was killed in action.

Lazarillo's mother opened an eating house near a nobleman's estate. The widow soon made the acquaintance of Zayde, a colored groom who frequently visited them. At first Lazarillo was afraid of the black man, but he quickly learned that Zayde's visits meant food and firewood. One consequence was a bit displeasing: Lazarillo acquired a small, dark brother to look after.

The nobleman's steward began to miss horseshoes and brushes as well as other supplies. When he was asked directly about the thefts, Lazarillo told all he knew of Zayde's peccadillos. Zayde was soundly flogged and boiling fat was poured on his ribs. Lazarillo's mother, to avoid further scandal, set up a new eating house in a different neighborhood.

When Lazarillo was fairly well grown, his mother apprenticed him to a blind man who wanted a boy to lead him about. Though old, the blind man was shrewd and tough. As they were leaving the city, they passed by a stone bull. When the blind man told the boy to put his ear to the statue and listen for a peculiar noise, Lazarillo obeyed. Then the old man knocked the boy's head sharply against the stone, hard enough so his ears rang for three days. Lazarillo was forced to learn a few tricks for himself in order to survive.

The blind man, when they squatted over a fire to cook a meal, kept his hand over the mouth of his wine jug. Lazarillo bored a tiny hole in the jug, and, lying down, let the liquid trickle into his mouth. Then he stopped up the hole with beeswax. But when the suspicious old man felt the jug, the wax had melted and he found the hole. Giving no sign, the next night he again put the jug in front of him and Lazarillo again lay down expecting to guzzle wine once more. Suddenly the blind man raised the jug and brought it down with great force in Lazarillo's face. All the boy's teeth were loosened.

On another occasion Lazarillo seized a roasting sausage from the spit and substituted a rotten turnip. When the blind man bit into his supposed sausage he roared with rage and scratched the boy severely with his long nails. Resolved to leave his master, Lazarillo guided him to the shores of a brook. Telling the blind man he must run and leap, he placed his master behind a stone pillar. The old man gave a mighty jump, cracked his head on the stone, and fell down senseless. Lazarillo left town quickly.

His next master was a penurious priest who engaged him to assist at mass. Unfortunately, the priest watched the collection box like a hawk, and Lazarillo had no chance to filch a single coin. For food, the priest allowed him an onion every fourth day. If it had not been for an occasional funeral feast, the boy would have starved to death.

The priest kept his fine bread securely locked in a chest. Luckily, Lazarillo met a strolling tinker who made him a key. Then to avoid suspicion, he gnawed each loaf to make it look as if rats had got into the chest. The alarmed priest nailed up the holes securely, but Lazarillo made new holes. Then the priest set numerous traps from which Lazarillo ate the cheese. The puzzled priest was forced to conclude that a snake was stealing his bread.

Fearing a search while he was asleep, Lazarillo kept his key in his mouth while he was in bed. One night the key shifted so that he was blowing through the key-hole. The resulting whistle awoke the priest. Seizing a club, he broke it over Lazarillo's head. After his head had been bandaged by a kind neighbor, Lazarillo was dismissed. Thinking to find employment in a larger city, he sought further fortune in Toledo.

One night while his pockets were full of crusts he had begged on the city streets, a careless young dandy, a real esquire, engaged Lazarillo as a servant. Thinking himself lucky to have a wealthy master, Lazarillo followed him to a bare, mean house with scarcely a stick of furniture.

After waiting a long time for a meal, the boy began to eat his crusts. To his surprise his master joined him. So the days went by, both of them living on what Lazarillo could beg.

At last the esquire procured a little money and sent Lazarillo out for bread and wine. On the way he met a funeral procession. The weeping widow loudly lamented her husband and cried out that the dead man was going to an inhospitable house where there was no food or furniture. Thinking they were going to bring the corpse to his esquire's house, Lazarillo ran home in fear. His master disabused him of his fear and sent him back on his errand.

At last the master left town and Lazarillo was forced to meet the bailiffs and the wrathful landlord. After some difficulty he persuaded the bailiffs of his innocence and was allowed to go free.

His next master was a bulero, a dealer in papal indulgences, who was a most accomplished rogue. Rumors began to spread that his indulgences were forged, and even the alguazil accused him publicly of fraud. The wily bulero prayed openly for his accuser to be confounded, and forthwith the alguazil, falling down in a fit, foamed at the mouth and grew rigid. The prayers and forgiveness of the bulero were effective, however, and little by little the alguazil recovered. From that time on the bulero earned a rich harvest selling his papal indulgences. Lazarillo, now wise in roguery, wondered how the bulero worked the trick; but he never found out.

Four years of service with a chaplain who sold water enabled Lazarillo to save a little money and buy respectable clothes. At last he was on his way to some standing in the community. On the strength of his new clothes he was appointed to a government post which would furnish him an income for life. All business matters of the town passed through his hands.

The archpriest of Salvador, seeing how affluent Lazarillo had become, gave him a wife from his own household. The woman made a useful wife, for the archpriest frequently gave them substantial presents. Lazarillo's wife repaid the holy man by taking care of his wardrobe. But evil tongues wagged, and the archpriest asked Lazarillo if he had heard stories about his wife. Lazarillo disclosed that he had been told that his wife had borne three of the archpriest's children. The archpriest advised him sagely to think of his profit more and his honor less. So Lazarillo was content, for surely the archpriest was an honorable man.

Lazarillo was now so influential that it was said that he could commit any crime with impunity. His happiness increased when his wife presented him with a baby daughter. The good lady swore that it was truly Lazarillo's child.

THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW

Type of work: Tale

Author: Washington Irving (1783-1859)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: New York State

First published: 1819-1820

Principal characters:

ICHABOD CRANE, a schoolteacher

KATRINA VAN TASSEL, a rustic heiress

ABRAHAM VAN BRUNT, known as Brom Bones

Critique:

Washington Irving, the first professional writer in America, was by inclination an amused observer of people and customs. By birth he was in a position to be that observer. Son of a New York merchant in good financial standing, he was the youngest of eleven children, several of whom helped him to take prolonged trips to Europe for his health and fancy. He was responsible for two trends in American literature: one, toward the local color, legendary tale; the other, toward the historical novel. "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow" belongs to the first trend. It was first published in Irving's The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., the book which established his reputation at home and abroad.

The Story:

Near Tarry Town on the Hudson is a little valley which, years ago, was the quietest place in the world. A drowsy influence hung over the place and people so that the region was known as Sleepy Hollow, and the lads were called Sleepy Hollow boys. Some said that the valley was bewitched. True it was that marvelous stories were told there.

The main figure to haunt the valley was one on horseback, without a head. Some said the specter was the apparition of a Hessian horseman who had lost his head to a cannon ball, but, whatever it was, it was often seen in the valley and adjacent countryside in the gloom of winter nights. The specter was known to all as the Headless Horseman of Sleepy Hollow.

In the valley, years ago, there lived a schoolteacher called Ichabod Crane. He looked like a scarecrow because of his long, skinny frame and his snipe-like nose.

As was the custom in that fertile Dutch countryside, he boarded with the parents of his pupils a week at a time. Fortunately for him the Dutch larders were full and the tables groaning with food, for the schoolmaster had a wonderful appetite. He was always welcome in the country homes because in small ways he made himself useful to the farmers. He was patient with the children, and he loved to spend the long winter nights with the families of his pupils, exchanging tales of ghosts and haunted places while ruddy apples roasted on the hearths.

Ichabod believed heartily in ghosts, and his walks home after an evening of tale-telling were often filled with fear. His only source of courage at those times was his voice, loud and nasal as it made the night resound with many a psalm tune.

The schoolteacher picked up a little odd change by holding singing classes. In one of his classes he first became aware of a plump and rosy-cheeked girl named Katrina Van Tassel. She was the only child of a very substantial farmer, and that fact added to her charms for the ever-hungry Ichabod. Since she was not only beautiful but also lively, she was a great favorite among the lads in the neighborhood.

Abraham Van Brunt was Katrina's favorite squire. The Dutch first shortened his name to Brom, and then called him Brom Bones when he became known for the tall and powerful frame of his body. He was a lively lad with a fine sense of humor and a tremendous amount of energy. When other suitors saw his horse hitched outside Katrina's house on a Sunday night, they went on their way. Brom Bones was a formidable rival for the gaunt and shaggy Ichabod. Brom would have liked to carry the battle into the open, but the schoolteacher knew better than to tangle with him physically. Brom Bones could do little but play practical jokes on lanky Ichabod.

The whole countryside was invited one fall evening to a quilting-frolic at Mynheer Van Tassel's. For the occasion Ichabod borrowed a horse from the farmer with whom he was then living. The horse, called Gunpowder, was as gaunt as Ichabod himself, but the steed still had a fair amount of spirit. The two of them were a sight as they jogged happily along to the party.

Ichabod was well pleased by every prospect he saw on the Van Tassel farm, the most prosperous holding for miles around. Perhaps Ichabod might be able to sell it and, with the proceeds, go farther west. It was a pretty picture he saw as he passed fields full of shocks of corn and pumpkins, granaries stuffed with grain, and meadows and barnlots filled with sleek cattle and plump fowls.

The party was a merry one with many lively dances. Ichabod was at his best when he danced with Katrina. After a time he went out on the dark porch with the men and exchanged more Sleepy Hollow ghost stories. But the food was best of all. Ichabod did credit to all the cakes and pies, meats and tea.

After the others left, he tried to pay court to Katrina, but it was not long before he started home crestfallen on the gaunt Gunpowder. All the stories he had heard came back to him, and as he rode along in the darkness he became more dismal. He heard groans as the branches of the famed Major André tree rubbed against each other. He even thought he saw something moving beneath it.

When he came to the bridge over Wiley's Swamp, Gunpowder balked. The harder Ichabod urged him on, the more the horse bucked. Then, on the other side of the marsh, Ichabod saw something huge and misshapen.

The figure refused to answer him when he called. Ichabod's hair stood straight on end. Because it was too late to turn back, however, the schoolmaster kept to the road. The stranger—it looked like a headless horseman, but it seemed to hold its head on the pommel—kept pace with him, fast or slow. Ichabod could not stand going slowly and he whipped Gunpowder to a gallop. As his saddle loosened, he nearly lost his grip, but he hugged the horse around the neck. He could not even sing a psalm tune.

When he reached the church bridge, where by tradition the headless specter would disappear in a flash of fire and brimstone, Ichabod heard the horseman close in on him. As he turned to look, the spirit threw his head at him. Ichabod tried to dodge, but the head tumbled him into the dust.

In the morning a shattered pumpkin was found near the bridge. Gunpowder was grazing at the farmer's gate nearby. But Ichabod was never seen in Sleepy Hollow again. In the valley they say that Brom Bones, long after he had married the buxom Katrina, laughed heartily whenever the story was told of the horseman who had thrown his head at the schoolteacher during that ghostly midnight pursuit.

LEGEND OF THE MOOR'S LEGACY

A CONSTABLE

Critique:

In 1829, during his first visit to Spain, Washington Irving lived for three months in the Alhambra, the historic fortress from which the Moors had been expelled by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492. Irving's interest in Spanish history and legend appears in many of his writings, but his Spanish material received its most finished form in The Alhambra, published in 1832. The book, a collection of stories drawn from actual history and from folk imagination, includes the well-known "Legend of the Moor's Legacy." Like the more familiar "Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow," this tale shows Irving's love of the picturesque and his interest in the fantastic and legendary stories of many lands. The combined qualities of reverie, genial humor, and romantic imagination made him a perfect writer of traveler's tales. This legend undoubtedly goes back beyond its Spanish origins to the unknown storytellers of The Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

The Story:

In the Square of the Cisterns, fronting the royal palace in the fortress of the Alhambra, was a deep Moorish well of clear, cold water. So famous was the well throughout all Granada that to it repaired water carriers from every quarter of the city, some bearing great earthen jars on their own sturdy shoulders, others, more prosperous, driving donkeys similarly burdened. The well was also a great place for meeting and gossip. Each day housewives, lazy servants, beggars—idlers of every age and condition—gathered on the stone benches to talk over the doings of their neighbors and to exchange rumors which were afloat in the city.

Among the carriers who drew water from the ancient well of the Alhambra there was once a strong-backed, bandy-legged little fellow named Pedro Gil, called Peregil for short. He had begun his trade with only a single water jar, but since no one in all Granada was more industrious than he, it was not long before he was able to purchase a donkey to do his carrying for him. All day long he trudged the streets calling his wares, and for every woman, old or young, he had a merry smile and a pleasing compliment. It was not surprising that everyone thought him the happiest of men. But Peregil's heart was often heavy and sad. He had a brood of ragged children who were ravenous as young birds, so that it was all he could do to fill their mouths with food. His wife, grown slatternly and fat, nagged poor Peregil even while she spent his hard-earned money for fripperies they could not afford. Subdued to patience by his matrimonial yoke, Peregil made the best of things and concealed his frequent dejection with merry quips and songs.

Late one summer night he made one last trip to the well in hopes of adding to his small store of coppers for meat to put in the Sunday pot. He found the square empty except for a stranger in Moorish dress. When the man said that he was a traveler taken suddenly ill, Peregil, touched with compassion, gave the stranger a ride back to the city on his donkey. On the way the man confessed that he had no lodgings in the town, and he asked that he be allowed to rest under Peregil's roof. He promised that the carrier would be well repaid.

Peregil had little desire to deal in this manner with an infidel, but in the kindness of his heart he could not refuse aid to the stranger. Ignoring his wife's protests, the carrier spread a mat in the coolest part of his hovel for the sick man. Before long the Moor was seized with convulsions. Knowing that his end was near, he gave Peregil a small sandalwood box and told him that it contained the secret to a great treasure. He died before he could reveal the nature of the secret.

Peregil's wife, afraid that the body would be found in their house and that they would be charged with murder, railed at her husband for his folly. Equally disturbed, the carrier tried to mend matters by taking the dead Moor, under cover of darkness, to the bank of the river and there burying it.

Now it happened that Peregil lived opposite to a barber named Pedrillo Pedrugo, whose greatest pleasure was to spy on his neighbors and tattle their affairs. Having seen Peregil arriving with the Moor, he was still on watch when the carrier took away the body of the dead man. Following stealthily, he spied on the secret burial. Early the next morning he hurried off to the alcalde, who was one of his daily customers, and told what he had seen.

The alcalde, who put so high a value on justice that he sold it only for gold, sent a constable to bring Peregil before him. Frightened, the water carrier called upon the saints to witness his innocence and frankly related the whole story. When he produced the sandalwood box, the alcalde expected to find it filled with gold or jewels. Instead, it contained only a parchment scroll and the end of a wax taper. Disappointed, he returned the box to Peregil, but kept the carrier's donkey to pay for the trouble the poor wretch had caused.

At home, Peregil became so disgusted with his wife's taunts over the loss of his donkey that he threw the sandalwood box to the floor. When the parchment rolled out, he picked it up and found on it some writing in Arabic. Curious to know what the meaning might be, he took it to a Moorish shopkeeper of his acquaintance. The Moor said that the scroll contained an incantation for the recovery of a treasure hidden under the Alhambra.

At first Peregil was skeptical. Several days later, however, he heard loiterers by the well talking about a treasure supposed to be buried under the Tower of the Seven Floors in the old fortress. Once more he went to the Moor and proposed that they search for the treasure together. The Moor replied that the incantation was powerless without a magic candle to burn while the charm was being read.

Peregil said that the taper was also in his possession.

Later that night he and the Moor went secretly to the Tower of the Seven Floors and descended into the damp, musty vault beneath. There they lit the taper and the Moor began to read the words on the parchment. As he finished, the floor opened with a noise like thunder. Descending the steps thus revealed, they found themselves in another vault, where stood a chest and several great jars filled with gold coins and precious stones, over which two enchanted Moorish warriors stood guard. Amazed and fearful, they filled their pockets with valuables. Then they climbed the stairs and blew out the taper. The floor closed again with a ponderous crash.

Peregil and the Moor hoped to keep their secret safe, but the carrier could conceal nothing from his wife. She bought herself expensive clothing and put on so many fine airs that her neighbors became curious. One day the barber saw her after she had decked herself with some of the jewels Peregil had found. Once more Pedrillo hurried to the alcalde to tell his story. The alcalde, convinced that Peregil had tricked him, ordered the trembling water carrier dragged into his presence.

After Peregil's story had been confirmed by the Moor, the alcalde's greed for gold became almost more than he could bear. That night, taking Peregil and the Moor with them as prisoners, the alcalde, the constable, and the prying barber went to the tower. With them they took the donkey Peregil had once owned. There in the vault the taper was lighted and the Moor read the incantation. Again the floor rolled aside, revealing the treasure vault beneath. The alcalde and his friends were too frightened to descend, but they ordered Peregil to bring up two immense jars filled with gold and gems and to strap them on the donkey which they had brought to carry away the spoils. When they learned that the vault also contained a chest filled with treasure, the alcalde, the constable, and the barber overcame their fears sufficiently to go down the stairs to secure the riches for themselves. After they had entered the lower vault, the Moor blew out the taper, and the floor closed over the men below, leaving them entombed in darkness. The Moor, assuring Peregil that such was the will of Allah, threw away the magic taper.

Peregil and the Moor divided the treasure equally between them. A short time later the Moor returned to his native city of Tangier. Peregil, with his wife, his brood of children, and his sturdy donkey, went to Portugal, where his wife used his riches to make him a man of consequence, known to all as Don Pedro Gil. As for the greedy alcalde, the constable, and the prying barber, they remain under the Tower of the Seven Floors to this day.

THE LEGEND OF TYL ULENSPIEGEL

Author: Charles Théodore Henri de Coster (1827-1879)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: The Low Countries

First published: 1867

Principal characters:

TYL ULENSPIEGEL, the wanderer

CLAES, his father

SOETKIN, his mother

NELE, his wife

LAMME GOEDZAK, his companion

KATHELINE, a midwife
HANS DUDZEELE, Katheline's betrayer
PHILIP, King of Spain

Critique:

The glorious adventures of Tyl Ulenspiegel and Lamme Goedzak are well-known to readers of most countries of the world. De Coster's book is a heroic epic based on folk legend and history, a story complete with visions, high adventures, traitors, and heroes. Ulenspiegel was the spirit of his native land, and he had been born to deliver her from her oppressors. Always the parallel between him and King Philip is carefully drawn: Philip a destroyer and Ulenspiegel a savior. De Coster preserved the old legends of Flanders, and his account of the Flemish hero maintains its great popularity even today.

The Story:

Tyl Ulenspiegel was born with two marks, one the sign of a lucky star, the other the print of the devil's finger. Katheline, the midwife, had a vision in which she saw Ulenspiegel as the incarnated spirit of his native Flanders. At the same time Philip of Spain was born. In her vision Katheline saw Philip as the butcher of Flanders. She was afraid.

As a boy Ulenspiegel roamed the fields of Flanders. His playmate was Nele, illegitimate daughter of Katheline the midwife. But as the children played, gloom gathered over the lowlands. The father of Philip fished in the pockets of the people, and each day new edicts announced torture and death for heretics. The Inquisition was beginning, and neighbor turned against neighbor in order to inherit half his possessions. Katheline was tortured as a witch on the complaint of a neighbor. As a result of this experience the poor woman went mad.

Ulenspiegel, as a young man living by his wits, traveled into many lands. Sometimes he was hard pressed to escape with his life, but his high spirit and great strength served him well. When he returned at last to his homeland he had to put his youthful follies behind him, for trouble had come to his family. Claes had been convicted of heresy on the testimony of a fishmonger who wanted to inherit part of his wealth. The good man was tortured and burned to slow death. Soetkin and Ulenspiegel wept, helpless to save him. Ulenspiegel took ashes from Claes' heart and wore them in a bag around his neck after swearing eternal vengeance upon the murderers. Because Soetkin and Nele had hidden Claes' money, the searchers looked for it in vain. Then Soetkin and Ulenspiegel were put to torture, but although they were broken on the wheel and burned they would not reveal their secret. Meanwhile Claes' ashes beat against Ulenspiegel's heart.

In spite of their courage the money was lost. Mad Katheline told Hans, her evil lover, and Nele's father, where the money was hidden. Hans and a friend robbed the widow and son of their inheritance. Then Hans, not knowing that mad Katheline watched him, killed his accomplice. Ulenspiegel, meeting the lying fishmonger, threw his enemy into the water. Philip, now King of Spain, robbed and murdered his people and the people of Flanders.

After Soetkin died of her grief and her torture, Ulenspiegel vowed to avenge her and Claes and all of his loved homeland. Mad Katheline conjured up a vision from which Ulenspiegel learned that he could be avenged if he sought and found the Seven. Not knowing who the Seven were, he left Nele to seek them. With him went Lamme Goedzak, a fat buffoon seeking his wife, who had left him because she had been told by a monk to give up lusts of the flesh and enter a nunnery. Lamme drowned his grief in food and wine, but the ashes of Claes burned against Ulenspiegel's heart. Knowing no peace, he looked only for the Seven.

He and Lamme joined the army of William of Orange, leader of the forces against

Philip and the Inquisition. They traveled over many lands, sometimes alone and sometimes with Prince William's troops. Often they were in danger of death by torture, but God protected them and kept them safe. Several times Lamme or Ulenspiegel caught glimpses of Lamme's wife, but Lamme could not catch up with her. The two friends saw much blood spilled, until they were weary of war and torture. Still Ulenspiegel looked for the Seven.

Ulenspiegel served Orange well. In spite of all resistance, however, Philip conquered all of the Low Countries and the people suffered and starved. When Hans returned to Katheline for more money, the mad woman, not knowing what she did, accused him of witchery. He was tortured and condemned to slow death by fire. Katheline, too, was given a witch's trial by water. Although she sank to the bottom, proving her innocence, the poor madwoman died three days later from the chill and the shock.

Nele, now an orphan, left Flanders and traveled to Holland. There she saved the life of Ulenspiegel, who was on the gallows for accusing his commander of false promises. The two lovers were married. Together they traveled with Lamme, who continued to seek his wife. Still the robbery and killings went on, and still Ulenspiegel searched for the Seven who could tell him how to avenge his family and save Flanders. William of Orange began to gain victories. Philip, enraged, demanded more and more bloodshed.

Ulenspiegel was placed in command of a ship, with Lamme for his cook. After a battle in which Lamme was injured, they brought on board a captive monk who was fat and lustful. His torture was that he must eat all that Lamme prepared for him, seven times a day, and he must live in a cage just big enough to enclose his great bulk. Before Lamme could get the monk fat enough to burst, Lamme's wound reopened and in his delirious condition he had to be tied to the ship so that he would not fall into the sea.

One night Lamme's wife came aboard the ship, treated his wound, and cured it. He pursued her as she fled in her boat, caught her, and heard her story. A monk, the one whom Lamme had imprisoned in a cage, had preached to her and ordered her to give up lusts of the flesh and follow him. In her innocence she had deserted her husband and gone away with the monk. Lamme feared that she had given herself to the monk, but when he learned that she had not, he took her again as his wife. The two happy lovers left Ulenspiegel and Nele and went to restore their lost home.

After William of Orange lost his life, his son carried on the battle for liberty and the lowlands were soon freed. In a vision Nele and Ulenspiegel saw at last the Seven that were and the Seven that should be, if their native land was to be free. The Seven that were now were Pride, Gluttony, Idleness, Avarice, Anger, Envy, and Lust. In the vision Ulenspiegel was told to burn the Seven. When he burned them, they were reduced to ashes and blood ran. Then from Pride came forth Noble Spirit; from Gluttony, Appetite; from Idleness, Reverie; from Avarice, Economy; from Anger, Vivacity; from Envy, Emulation, and lastly from Lust sprang forth Love. Then a mighty hand hurled Nele into space and came again and hurled Ulenspiegel into space after her. Nele awoke from the vision, but Ulenspiegel lay as one dead for two days and two nights. When a priest passed by on the way to a burial, he ordered a grave dug that Ulenspiegel might be buried by the church. But Ulenspiegel rose up from the grave and threw off the dirt, for he knew that his motherland was free at last. The new Seven would be her salvation. He knew, too, that Nele was the heart and he was the spirit of the new Flanders, and that they could never die.

LETTERS FROM THE UNDERWORLD

Author: Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevski (1821-1881)

Type of plot: Impressionistic realism

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: St. Petersburg, Russia

First published: 1864

Principal characters:

THE NARRATOR

SIMONOV, his acquaintance from school days

ZVERKOV, a young Russian officer

LIZA, a prostitute

Critique:

Letters from the Underworld, sometimes called also Notes from Underground, is actually more than an extended and bitter prose fiction. The first part constitutes a philosophical statement; the second part is the morbid illustration from life of this statement. The "underworld" of the title apparently is the depths of degradation and humiliation to which the too acutely conscious human being can descend because of a perverse human quality, a factor which, according to Dostoevski, scientists will never neatly label. This quality resists fruition, completion, and whatever we tend to call the normal state of happiness. Dostoevski's arrestingly paradoxical affirmation, in the first part of this work, of the stupendous force of individuality in human nature may provide consolation for the present-day man who feels that modern social forces are molding him more and more into an uncomfortable sameness with his neighbors. The book was written after Dostoevski's return from exile in Siberia. It serves as an arrow to point the direction of his later novels.

The Story:

The Narrator, addressing an imaginary group of acquaintances, declared that after many years of life as a rude and spiteful government official, and after many years as a recluse, he was not really bitter in his heart. Something perverse in him, his acute consciousness, had led him to find pleasure in the pain of humiliating experiences.

From experience, he advised against intellectual acuteness. The intellectual, when faced with revenge, surrounded himself with a legion of doubts; then he would crawl into his self-imposed rat's nest and torture himself with petty spite. The direct man, in wreaking revenge, might with dispatch hit his head against a wall, but he would accept the wall. But the intellectual would not accept the wall. Indeed, he would feel responsibility for the presence of the wall.

The Narrator declared that he had always had to feign taking offense and that he had had, in the face of life's transiency, to pretend to love. Life to him was a colossal bore. He could never avenge wrongs done him because the culprit, the culprit's motives, and the very misdeed itself were all phantoms in his doubting intellect.

Given another chance at life, he would have chosen a career of complete laziness, one in which he might have reveled among good and beautiful things. He declared that even if man knew absolutely what things in life were to his best advantage, he would perversely avoid these things.

The Narrator advanced the idea that man may be destined for creativeness, and for this reason, conscious of his fate, he perversely practiced destruction to individuate himself. Perhaps man was fearful of completion, of perfection; perhaps he found final attainment distasteful: life consisted in the attaining, not in the attainment. He concluded his philosophical soliloquy by pointing out that conscious inertia was the ideal state. He provocatively insisted that he did not believe a word he had written, that he had written only because the written word seemed imposing and dignified. He was oppressed by memories which were evoked by the fall of snow outside.

At the age of twenty-four the Narrator had an inchoate character. He talked to no one. His intense self-consciousness caused him to be vain at one moment and self-loathing the next. He tried to look intelligent and feared any eccentricity in himself. This acute awareness of self made him lonely, yet he felt superior to others. He became a recluse. He read voraciously and began to walk the streets at night.

One night he saw a man thrown out of the window of a billiard parlor. In envy, he went into the parlor in the hope that he, too, might be thrown out. He was humiliated when an officer shoved him aside without noticing him. He returned the next night, but, morally fearful that all the fools in the parlor would jeer at his being thrown out, he did not enter. Dedicated to revenge, he followed the officer about for months. He learned the officer's name and wrote a satirical novel in which the officer was the principal character. The novel was rejected; its style was out of date.

Two years passed. He wrote a letter challenging the officer to a duel, but he did not mail the letter. Instead, he began to take regular walks along the river promenade, where he reveled in his resentment. One Sunday he was rudely pushed aside by the officer. Maddened at his weakness, he conceived the idea of not giving way next time. He gloated over his idea. He practiced pushing aside an imaginary officer. His courage had failed him once, but he finally stood his ground when the officer tried again to push him aside.

Actually, the officer did not notice him at all, but he was delirious with happiness in having gained back his self-respect.

The Narrator now began to daydream. In his fantasies, he brought beauty and good to the world. During the fever pitch of his dream life, feeling the need of companionship, he visited his immediate superior, Anton, and sat in silence with Anton's family for hours.

He called on an old schoolmate, Simonov, and found Simonov planning, with two other old schoolmates, a farewell dinner for Zverkov, a fellow student of the direct, not too acutely-conscious type, whom he hated. Zverkov, a wealthy man, was successful in the army. The Narrator, greeted coldly by his boyhood acquaintances, invited himself to the dinner party. The other young men agreed reluctantly; he was obviously not a favorite with them. Later he detested himself for consciously having opened himself up to humiliation, but secretly he rather enjoyed having discomfited his companions.

The next day he dressed for the dinner with doubt and misgiving. He wanted to make a great impression; he wanted to eclipse the popular Zverkov. Yet he knew that he really did not want to do this either. He arrived too early and was humiliated by his wait. During the dinner he antagonized everyone and drank incontinently. Having thoroughly degraded himself, he offered conciliation and sought the love of his companions. When he apologized to Zverkov for insulting him, Zverkov humiliated him by saying that such as he could not possibly insult him. Filled with a wild, unreasonable intention of slapping Zverkov and fighting a duel with him, he followed the others to a brothel.

Here, a young girl was brought into the parlor to him; he was pleased with the prospect of being repulsive to her. He slept off his drunkenness, awoke, and delivered a bookish, insincere sermon to Liza, the prostitute, on the hazards of her profession. He was attitudinizing and he knew it to his shame. He told her of the importance of human love, something about which he actually knew nothing. Liza, to prove to him that she was not entirely lost, showed him a love letter that she had received from a young gentleman. He gave her his address and left her.

The next day he regretted having given Liza his address. He hated himself for his insincerity with her; he feared her coming. But she did not come. He imagined an idyllic relationship between himself and Liza. He would be her tutor and would mold her into a perfect creature.

When Liza finally came, she was confused by the wretched conditions in the poor Narrator's rooms. She said that she had left the brothel. Alarmed, he confessed his insincerity and declared that he had sought power over someone because he himself had been humiliated. Liza understood his inner turmoil and took him in her arms.

Liza's intuition soon told her, however, that he was despicable and that he was incapable of love. After she left his rooms, he ran after her to seek her forgiveness, but he never saw her again. He derived some consolation from the thought that her resentment of him would give her pleasure for the rest of her life.

LIFE IN LONDON

Author: Pierce Egan (1772-1849)

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: London

First published: 1821

Principal characters:

CORINTHIAN TOM, a man of fashion

JERRY HAWTHORN, his cousin

BOB LOGIC, their friend

Critique:

Tom and Jerry is a title commonly given to Pierce Egan's Life in London; or the Day and Night Scenes of Jerry Hawthorn, Esq., and his Elegant Friend, Corinthian Tom, accompanied by Bob Logic, the Oxonian, in their Rambles and Sprees Through the Metropolis. The book is a minor masterpiece. Any student of history who wishes to know of life in Regency London must read it, for it is the best single source of its kind. Pierce Egan, a sporting gentleman who observed keenly the life around him, put into his picaresque narrative a detailed account of boxing, cock fighting, masquerades, and taverns. In this work can be found much of the slang of the day—some of it still seems new—carefully explained in footnotes. At the time of publication the innumerable puns added to the liveliness of the novel, but to most modern readers the plays on words are often obscure and they can be disregarded. Egan's comic spirit made him a forerunner of Surtees and Dickens.

The Story:

Corinthian Tom, as he was later known, had been born into a rich family with loving parents, who watched after his welfare and provided for his every want. As he grew older he was a little uneasy at their solicitude, for the gay life in the capital appealed to him; and he would have liked to savor life without restrictions of any kind. Gradually instances of the many different facets of London life came under his observation: the hungry man who counted the trees in St. James's Park to while away the dinner hour; the rake who crossed the street to avoid his tailor; the pawnshop customers. As Tom's knowledge increased, his impatience to savor the whole of life became keener.

He became very friendly with Bob Logic, a one-time student at Oxford. That merry fellow, with a comical face and an aptitude for puns, was rich, and he had already been orphaned. With no strictures of purse or parents, Bob's life was one long prank. For a time Tom envied him.

Tom's mother died first, and when his father also passed away, Tom's grief was genuine. With rare tact, Bob left him to face his sorrow alone, but after a decent wait he turned up again with his usual jests and puns. Tom then embarked on the life he most desired under Bob's shrewd tutelage. In short order Corinthian Tom was known at boxing matches, the society parades, the opera, and in slum dens. His career was crowned by the acquisition of the most desirable mistress in town, lovely and talented Catherine. As their connection became known, inevitably she was called Corinthian Kate.

His gay life was halted, temporarily, when Tom fell ill. He called in Doctor Pleas'em, a knowing doctor with the perfect approach for gay young blades. Doctor Pleas'em prescribed a country rest for his weary patient. Searching through his invitations, Tom found one from an uncle who lived at Hawthorn Hall, and immediately he set out to visit him.

At the hall Tom met his young cousin Jerry, a strong and quick lad who was dazzled by his city relative. Soon country life worked its wonders, and on the last day of his stay Tom accompanied Jerry on a twenty-six mile fox hunt. Both young men were in at the kill. That afternoon, when an agreeable party met to say their farewells to Tom, it was decided that Jerry should return to London with his cousin to acquire a city polish.

Jerry, much impressed by the appointments of Corinthian House, was a willing pupil in learning social graces. The first step was to call in a good tailor.

Tom's man was Mr. Primefit, who was the most accomplished tailor in town. Mr. Primefit had built up his vast custom by never pressing for a bill; in return, the young blades never questioned the amount of a bill when they finally paid it. In his new clothes Jerry saw his first panorama of society when Tom took him riding in Rotten Row and Hyde Park.

With Tom and Bob as guides, Jerry saw the gambler, the tradesman, the sharper—all decked in finery well beyond their purses. The lively Lady Wanton and her sister, Miss Satire, were attracted by Jerry's fresh face and manly bearing. When Miss Satire made an unkind remark about Jerry's lack of polish, Lady Wanton warmly defended Jerry. The most beautiful woman they saw was the dazzling Duchess of Hearts. With his happy felicity for knowing everyone, Tom introduced Jerry to her. Jerry was struck dumb: her lovely face, her intelligent eyes, her warm heart were too much for him to comprehend.

Another person they met was Trifle, the thinnest and slightest dandy in London. To Jerry he seemed an absolute oddity. Then a calm older woman, warm of smile and respectable of appearance, drove by with three bewitching girls. Jerry hoped for an introduction to the charming family, for they spoke to Bob. But he learned that introductions were not in order; the woman, madam of a select bawdy house, was advertising three of her most recent acquisitions.

Jerry's rusticity wore off quickly. Every afternoon and evening Bob and Tom took him out. They attended gatherings of all sorts. One afternoon Tom proposed an evening visit to the theater. Jerry assented eagerly, but Bob begged off; the theater was a bit high-toned for him. That evening Tom and Jerry went to Drury Lane. There Tom took a quick look at the stage and a longer one at the audience. Seeing few friends, the two cousins went on to Covent Garden, where the company seemed more congenial. After a glance at the play, they pushed into the Saloon. Jerry was struck by the crowds of laughing girls who were so very friendly. Tom had to tell him that the girls were on the lookout for customers.

Although Jerry was reluctant to leave the Saloon, Tom induced him to visit a coffee house. There the raffish hangers-on decided to have a bit of fun with the two swells. In the fight that followed Tom and Jerry were acquitting themselves well when the watch broke up the riot. Unfortunately, the cousins continued to battle the watch. They were finally subdued and hauled off to jail. Released on bail, they had to appear before a magistrate the next day. Their fine was supposed to pay the watch for the damage they had done.

In turn Tom, Jerry, and Bob went to a boxing establishment, a fencing salon, the dog fights, the condemned yard at Newgate. A highlight was a masquerade supper at the opera. Jerry, attracted by a coquettish woman dressed as a nun, was importunate in trying to learn her name. Finally the nun wrote an acrostic to supply the information. With Bob's help, Jerry finally learned that his companion had been Lady Wanton.

Tom was reluctant for some time to introduce Corinthian Kate, but he finally arranged a meeting with her for Bob and Jerry. Kate, glad to see them, presented her very good friend Sue. Jerry was interested in analyzing the two women, both beautiful. Kate was self-possessed and inclined to dramatic settings; an accomplished belle. Sue seemed much warmer and more genuinely sympathetic. While Bob played the piano for them, Jerry and Sue had a pleasant tête-à-tête. Jerry was reluctant to leave.

Tom arranged a special trip for the two ladies about which he was quite mysterious. He warned them to be dressed by eleven sharp, for the success of the trip depended on punctuality, and so the ladies were ready when Tom and Jerry called. They were whisked away in a cab to Carleton Palace. There the friends went through the succession of fine rooms and examined the appointments at their leisure.

One of their memorable jaunts was an evening spent among cadgers. Disguising themselves as beggars, they visited a tavern frequented by professional alms takers, where they saw the crippled woman descend a ladder in a lively manner without her crutches. All manner of frauds came to light in that dismal gathering.

But all pleasant excursions were drawing to an end; Bob was put in debtors' prison. Although he was as merry as ever when Tom and Jerry went to see him, he did promise to put his affairs in better order, for he was confident he would soon be released. When Jerry caught a cold which he could not seem to get rid of, Doctor Pleas'em told him that he could not expect to lead such a life indefinitely, and he must return to Hawthorn Hall for a rest. Then he could come back and plunge into London life once more. Vowing to be back soon, and asking Tom to give his best wishes to Sue, Jerry returned to the country.

LIFE IS A DREAM

Author: Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600-1681)

Type of plot: Romantic melodrama

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Poland

First presented: 1635

Principal characters:

BASILIO, King of Poland

SEGISMUNDO, his son

ASTOLFO, Basilio's nephew and a duke of Muscovy
ESTRELLA, the infanta, Basilio's niece
CLOTALDO, a Polish general
ROSAURA, a Russian noblewoman disguised as a man
FIFE, her servant

Critique:

Before Calderón's La vida es sueño was freely adapted by Edward Fitzgerald in 1853, it had been known to most English and European readers through the medium of French translations from the original Spanish. In spite of their richness of imagination, however, Calderón's plays are still little known outside the Spanish-speaking world. All of this playwright's work has vigor and brilliance; in Life Is a Dream, for example, he used his Polish setting and period as freely as Shakespeare used the seacoast of Bohemia or the forest of Arden. There is also a Gothic quality in the mountain scenes which suggests the popular atmosphere of much eighteenth-century fiction, and there is considerable psychological insight into character as well. This play reveals admirably the personality of its writer, who was a soldier, an ardent patriot, an artist, and a devout son of the Church. It has also been translated as Such Stuff as Dreams Are Made Of.

The Story:

One night, in the wild, mountainous country between Poland and Russia, a Russian noblewoman, Rosaura, and her servant, Fife, found themselves in distress. Their horses had bolted, and they feared that they would have to make on foot the remainder of their journey to the royal court of Poland. Rosaura, for protection through that barbarous frontier country, was disguised as a man.

Their weary way brought them at last to a forbidding fortress. There they overheard a young man, chained to the doorway of the castle, deliver a heart-rending soliloquy in which he lamented the harshness of his life. Rosaura approached the youth, who greeted her eagerly, with the excitement of one who had known little of sympathy or kindness during his brief span of years. At the same time he warned her to beware of violence. No sooner had he spoken these words than a shrill trumpet blast filled the night. Rosaura tossed her sword to the captive before she and Fife hid themselves among the rocks.

Clotaldo, a Polish general and the keeper of the youth, galloped up to the young man. Seeing the sword in his prisoner's hand, he ordered his men to seek the stranger who must be lurking nearby. Apprehended, Rosaura explained that she and Fife were Russian travelers on their way to the Polish court and that they were in distress because of the loss of their horses. Fife inadvertently hinted that Rosaura was really a woman. But the sword interested Clotaldo most of all, for he recognized the weapon as one which he had owned years before and which he had left in the keeping of a young noblewoman with whom he had been deeply in love. He decided that Rosaura must be his own son, but, torn between his sworn duty to his king and his paternal obligation toward his supposed son, he decided at last to say nothing for the time being. The fact that Rosaura possessed the sword obligated him to protect the travelers and to escort them safely through the mountains.

Meanwhile, in King Basilio's royal castle, the problem of succession to the Polish throne was to be decided. To this purpose, the king welcomed his nephew Astolfo and his niece Estrella, cousins. The problem of the succession existed because it was generally believed that the true heir, King Basilio's son, had died with his mother in childbirth many years before. The need for a decision was pressing; both Astolfo and Estrella were supported by strong rival factions which in their impatience were threatening the peace of the realm.

nephew with regal ceremony and then startled them with the news that his son Segismundo was not really dead. The readings of learned astrologers and horrible portents which had accompanied Segismundo's birth had led the superstitious king to imprison the child in a mountain fortress for fear that otherwise the boy might grow up to be a monster who would destroy Poland. Now, years later, King Basilio was not sure that he had done right. He proposed that Segismundo be brought to the court in a drug-induced sleep, awakened after being dressed in attire befitting a prince, and observed carefully for evidence of his worthiness to wear his father's crown. Astolfo and Estrella agreed to that proposal.

In accordance with the plan, Segismundo, who dressed in rough wolfskins in his captivity, was drugged, taken to the royal castle, and dressed in rich attire. Awakening, he was disturbed to find himself suddenly the center of attention among obsequious strangers. Force of habit caused him to recall sentimentally his chains, the wild mountains, and his former isolation. Convinced that he was dreaming, he sat on the throne while his father's officers and the noble courtiers treated him with the respect due his rank. When they told him that he was the heir to the throne, he was mystified and somewhat apprehensive, but before long he began to enjoy his new feeling of power.

Clotaldo, his former guard and tutor, appeared to confirm the fact that Segismundo was really the prince. The young man then demanded an explanation of his lifelong imprisonment. Clotaldo patiently explained King Basilio's actions in terms that Segismundo might understand, but the youth, blinded by the sudden change in his fortunes, could see only that he had been grievously mistreated by his father. Declaring that he would have revenge for his unwarranted imprisonment, he seized Clotaldo's sword, but before he could strike the old general Rosaura appeared out of the crowd, took the weapon from him, and reproved him for his rashness.

Segismundo, in a calmer mood, was introduced to Astolfo, whose courtly bearing and formal speech the prince could not bear. Sick of the whole aspect of the court, he ordered the guards to clear the audience hall. But again he was mollified, this time by the appearance of Estrella and her ladies in waiting. Unaccustomed to feminine society, he behaved in a boorish manner, even attempting to embrace Estrella. The courtiers advised him to behave in a manner befitting a prince, and Astolfo, who hoped to marry his beautiful cousin, cautioned Segismundo about his behavior toward the princess. Unfamiliar with the formalities of court life, Segismundo lost all patience. Holding all present responsible for his long exile, he reminded them of his exalted position and defied anyone to touch Estrella. When Astolfo did not hesitate to take her by the hand, Segismundo seized Astolfo by the throat.

At this crucial moment in Segismundo's test, King Basilio entered the throne room and saw his son behaving like a wild beast. Crushed, he feared that the forecast had been true after all. Segismundo faced his father with shocking disrespect. Pressed for an explanation of his son's imprisonment, the king tried to prove that it had been written in the stars. Segismundo scoffed at the folly of man in putting responsibility for his actions on the disinterested heavens. Then he cursed his father and called the guards to seize the king and Clotaldo. But at a trumpet blast the soldiers quickly surrounded Segismundo himself and took him prisoner.

Having failed the test of princehood, Segismundo was drugged and returned in chains to the mountain fortress. In his familiar surroundings once more, he had full opportunity to reflect on his late experiences. When he spoke to Clotaldo about them, the old general assured him that all had been a dream. Since the prince had been drugged before he left the fortress and before he returned, he was quite convinced that he had suffered an unpleasant dream. Clotaldo assured him that dreams reveal the true character of the dreamer. Because Segismundo had conducted himself with violence in his dream, there was great need for the young man to bridle his fierce passions.

Meanwhile Rosaura, aware of Segismundo's plight and anxious to thwart the ambitions of Astolfo, who had once promised to marry her, stirred up a faction to demand the prince's release. The rebels invaded the mountains and seized the fortress: they failed, however, to seize Clotaldo, who had already returned to the royal castle to report to King Basilio. When the rebel army carried the sleeping Segismundo out of the fortress and awakened him with trumpet blasts, the unhappy prince would not be persuaded that his new experience was real, and he doubted the assurance that he had been rescued from his imprisonment. The rebel leader finally convinced him that it would be well for him to join the dream soldiers and fight with them against King Basilio's very real army, which was approaching.

Clotaldo was taken prisoner by Segismundo's forces, but the young prince, remembering the advice to curb his passions, ordered the old general's release. A great battle then took place, in which Segismundo proved his princely valor and chivalric bearing. King Basilio, defeated but refusing Clotaldo's and Astolfo's pleas to flee to safety, in admiration surrendered his crown to his son.

King of Poland in his own right, Segismundo ordered the marriage of Astolfo to Rosaura, who had, in the meantime, been revealed as Clotaldo's daughter. Estrella became Segismundo's queen. The young king made Clotaldo his trusted adviser.

LIGEIA

Type of work: Short story

Author: Edgar Allan Poe (1809-1849)

Type of plot: Gothic romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Germany and England

First published: 1838

Principal characters:

THE NARRATOR

LIGEIA, his first wife

LADY ROWENA TREVANION, his second wife

Critique:

Poe himself called "Ligeia" his best story. It is a tale of terror combined with pure fantasy. As always in the prose tales of this genius of American literature, plot, character, and setting are fused into one. It was Poe's literary creed that all elements should be subordinated to the total effect desired. Nowhere does he better demonstrate this belief than in the fantastic story of Ligeia. Many critics have read deeper moral significance into this Gothic work.

The Story:

He could not remember when he had first met Ligeia, and he knew nothing of her family except that it was old. Ligeia herself, once his wife, he could remember in every detail. She was tall and slender. Ethereal as a shadow, her face was faultless in its beauty, her skin like ivory, her features classic. Crowning the perfect face and body was raven-black, luxuriant hair. But her eyes, above all else, held the key to Ligeia's mystery. Larger than ordinary, those black eyes held an expression unfathomable even to her husband. It became his all-consuming passion to unravel the secret of that expression.

In character, Ligeia possessed a stern will that never failed to astound him.

Outwardly she was placid and calm, but she habitually uttered words of such wildness that he was stunned by their intensity. Her learning was immense. She spoke many tongues, and in metaphysical investigations she was never wrong. Her husband was engrossed in a study of metaphysics, but it was she who guided him, she who unraveled the secrets of his research. With Ligeia he knew that he would one day reach a goal of wisdom undreamed of by others.

Then Ligeia fell ill. Her skin became transparent and waxen, her eyes wild. Knowing that she must die, he watched her struggles against the grisly reaper, a conflict frightening in its passion. Words could not express the intense resistance with which she fought death. He had always known she loved him, but in those last days she abandoned herself completely to love. From her heart she poured fourth phrases of idolatry. And on the last day of her life she bade him repeat to her a poem she had composed not long before. It was a morbid thing about death, about the conquering of Man by the Worm. As he finished repeating the melancholy lines, Ligeia leaped to her feet with a shriek, then subsided on her deathbed. In a scarcely audible whisper she repeated a proverb that had haunted her before: that man did not yield to death save through the weakness of his own will. So Ligeia died.

Crushed with sorrow, her husband left his desolate home by the Rhine and retired to an old and decayed abbey in a deserted region in England. The exterior of the building he left in its sagging state, but inside he furnished the rooms lavishly and weirdly. He had become the slave of opium, and the furnishings took on the shapes and colors of his fantastic dreams. One bedchamber received the most bizarre treatment of all, and to this chamber he led his new bride, the blue-eyed Lady Rowena Trevanion of Tremaine.

The room was in a high turret of the abbey. It was of immense proportions, lighted by a single huge window. The pane had a leaden hue, giving a ghastly luster to all objects within the room. The walls, the floors, the furniture were all covered with a heavy, arabesque tapestry, black figures on pure gold. The figures changed as one looked at them from different angles, their appearance being changed by an artificial current of air that stirred the draperies constantly.

In rooms such as this he spent a bridal month with Lady Rowena. It was easy to perceive that she loved him but little, and he hated her with a passion more demonic than human. In his opium dreams he called aloud for Ligeia, as if he could restore her to the earthly life she had abandoned. He reveled in memories of her purity and her love.

In the second month of her marriage Rowena grew ill, and in her fever she spoke of sounds and movements in the chamber, fantasies unheard and unseen by her husband. Although she recovered, she had recurring attacks of the fever and it became evident that she would soon succumb. Her imaginings became stronger, and she grew more insistent about the sounds and movements in the tapestries.

One night in September she became visibly weaker and unusually agitated. Seeking to calm her, her husband stepped across the room to get some wine. But he was arrested midway by the sense of something passing lightly by him. Then he was startled to see on the gold carpet a shadow of angelic aspect. Saying nothing to Rowena, he poured the wine into a goblet. As she took the vessel, he distinctly heard a light footstep upon the carpet and saw, or thought he saw, three or four drops of a ruby-colored liquid fall into the goblet from an invisible source.

Immediately Rowena grew worse, and on the third night she died. As he sat by her shrouded body in that bridal chamber, he thought of his lost Ligeia. Suddenly he heard a sound from the bed upon which the corpse of his wife lay.

Going closer, he perceived that Rowena had a faint color. It was unmistakable; Rowena lived. Unable to summon aid, he watched her with mounting terror. Then a relapse came, and she subsided into a death pallor more rigid than before. All night this phenomenon recurred. Rowena returned briefly from the dead, only to sink once more into oblivion. Each time he saw again a vision of Ligeia.

Toward morning of that fearful night the enshrouded figure rose from the bed and tottered to the center of the chamber. Terrified, he fell at her feet. She unwound the burial cerements from her head and there streamed down raven-black hair unknown to the living Rowena. Then the spectral figure slowly opened her eyes. He screamed in one last mad shout. He could not be mistaken. Staring at him were the full black eyes of his lost love, the Lady Ligeia.

LITTLE DORRIT

Author: Charles Dickens (1812-1870)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1855-1857

Principal characters:

LITTLE DORRIT, a child born and reared in debtors' prison

WILLIAM DORRIT, her father

FANNY, her older sister

ARTHUR CLENNAM, Little Dorrit's friend

MRS. CLENNAM, Arthur's mother and Little Dorrit's employer

MONSIEUR BLANDOIS, a blackmailer

MR. MERDLE, a banker and Fanny Dorrit's father-in-law

Critique:

This book, which has never had the popularity of most of Dickens' other novels, was the product of the author's "middle period," which came prior to his great successes with A Tale of Two Cities and Great Expectations. To a modern reader the book is dreary because of the scenes in the Marshalsea debtors' prison. In addition, the very concept of a debtors' prison is so far removed from modern experience that we have difficulty in picturing the setting. To Dickens' contemporaries, however, there was probably a great deal of interest in the sections dealing with the red tape and inefficiency of the Circumlocution Office, by which Dickens satirized the inefficiency of the British government during the Crimean War.

The Story:

Amey Dorrit, or, as she was better known, Little Dorrit, was born while her mother stayed with her father, a bankrupt, in Marshalsea debtors' prison. Although her mother died soon after, the little girl, along with her older brother and sister, continued to live in the prison. As she became older, Little Dorrit went outside the prison to do sewing, for only the debtor himself was not permitted to leave the place.

One of the women for whom Little Dorrit sewed was Mrs. Clennam, a widow carrying on a place of business, even though she had been confined to her room by illness for fifteen years. Mrs. Clennam's son, who was forty, had gone to the Orient twenty years before and had joined his father, who looked after the company's business in the East. After his father's death Arthur Clennam returned. He told his mother that he would take his part of the inheritance and fend for himself; he did not want to remain in the business with his miserly, grasping, and rather inhuman mother. Mrs. Clennam, confronted by her son's decision, took her old clerk into partnership with her.

While he was staying at his mother's house, Arthur noticed Little Dorrit and made inquiry about her. Having been struck by the girl's sweet disposition and appearance, he went to Marshalsea debtors' prison and tried to help the Dorrit family. He even said that he would try to get Mr. Dorrit out of the place. Everyone thought such a course impossible, for some of Mr. Dorrit's debts were owed through the Circumlocution Office, a place of endless red tape, to the crown.

Arthur found that he had a confederate, though an unusual one, in a clerk named Pancks, a queer creature who collected rents for Arthur's former fiancée's father. Pancks was aided in turn by John Chivery, the son of a turnkey, who was also in love with Little Dorrit, and by Mr. Rugg, an elderly lawyer.

In addition to helping Little Dorrit by putting in motion action to have her father released from prison, Arthur aided her by getting her more sewing clients, by getting her brother out of trouble, and by sending small amounts of money to defray the expenses of the Dorrit household in the prison.

At last Pancks brought unusual advice. He had discovered that Mr. Dorrit, who had been in prison over twenty years, was the only surviving heir to a large fortune which had gone unclaimed for years. Within a short time Mr. Dorrit was released, his debts having been paid, and he immediately set himself up as a man of fortune. Mr. Dorrit and his two oldest children, determined to live up to the new social position that their fortune had given them, tried to forget everything in the past. They even convinced themselves that Arthur Clennam had insulted them and refused to have anything more to do with the man. Only Little Dorrit remained unspoiled, merely surprised at the good fortune which had been thrust upon them.

As quickly as possible the Dorrit family went to the continent, where they could successfully carry out the fiction that they had never seen a debtor's prison. Because of their money they were admitted to the society of Britons who were living away from England. Fanny Dorrit, the older of the two daughters, was pursued by Mr. Sparkle, stepson of Mr. Merdle, who was supposed to be the richest and most influential banker in England. Fanny, although not in love with Sparkle, considered with pleasure the prospect of marrying into a wealthy family. The Merdles, who saw only that the Dorrits had a fortune, agreed to the match, even though Mrs. Merdle was well aware of the fact that her son had fallen in love with Fanny when the latter was a dancer on the stage in London.

After the marriage Fanny and her husband went to live in London. Mr. Dorrit visited them there and became a close friend of Mr. Merdle. The banker even proposed to help Mr. Dorrit increase his already large fortune through shrewd and well-paying investments. Mr. Dorrit, the former debtor, was in seventh heaven because of his new prospects.

Little Dorrit wondered at the change in her family but remained her own self. She wrote to Arthur at intervals, for she, at least, was still grateful for all he had done to help her. Besides, she was in love with him.

Arthur, still in London, was trying to fathom certain mysterious people who had been seen about his mother's house and also attempting to keep his own business on solid financial ground. Neither task was easy. Mrs. Clennam was visited on two occasions by a Monsieur Blandois, whom Arthur knew to be a knave and probably a murderer. He wondered what business his mother could have with such a person. He also distrusted Flintwinch, the clerk who had become his mother's partner. Flintwinch, a grubbing miserly fellow who mistreated his wife, had taken a great dislike to Arthur.

While trying to unravel the mystery,

Arthur became financially insolvent. Like many others, he had become convinced that the business ventures of Mr. Merdle were the safest and quickest way to make a fortune. As a result, he had put his money and his company's money into Merdle's ventures. When Merdle and his bank failed, Arthur became a bankrupt and was sent to the Marshalsea debtors' prison, where he was housed in Mr. Dorrit's old quarters.

Mr. Rugg and Pancks did their best to make Arthur's imprisonment a short one, but he seemed to have lost all desire to live, much less to leave the prison. Only after Little Dorrit returned to England and took up quarters within the prison, to comfort him as she had comforted her father, did Arthur take any interest in life.

Learning that Monsieur Blandois had disappeared from Mrs. Clennam's house, Pancks tracked down the man and brought him back to London. Then the reason for his attempt to blackmail Mrs. Clennam was revealed. Mrs. Clennam, realizing that she had to make known the mystery to her son unless she intended to pay blackmail, rose from her wheelchair and left her house for the first time in almost twenty years. She went to the prison to tell Arthur that he was not her child and that she had for many years been keeping money from him and from Little Dorrit.

When that mystery had been solved, and the money was forthcoming, Arthur was soon released from prison. Shortly afterward he and Little Dorrit were married. Little Dorrit, after a quarter century of misfortune, was at last about to embark upon a quiet and comfortable life.

LIZA OF LAMBETH

Author: W. Somerset Maugham (1874- )

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Late nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1897

Principal characters:

LIZA KEMP, a street girl

TOM, who loved her

JIM BLAKESTON, Liza's lover

SALLY, her friend

Critique:

Liza of Lambeth is the first novel of W. Somerset Maugham. One of the least known to readers of his more popular novels, it belongs to the school of naturalism which flourished in English fiction about the turn of the century. There is virtually no development of character, and the plot is no more remarkable than the commonplace lives of the people in the novel. Here, more than in any other of his novels, Maugham drew directly upon his own observations and experiences as a young doctor serving his internship among the poor of the London slums. The novel is as blunt and unsparing as a clinical report.

The Story:

Liza Kemp spent most of her free time on the streets of Lambeth. She was not exactly a loose girl, but her dress and actions provoked whistles and jeers whenever she appeared. Liza's father was dead, and her mother, living on a small pension, earned enough as a charwoman to keep herself in beer. She never spoke a kind word to her daughter, although she expected Liza to hand over all her money and spend all her time with her mother. Like most girls of her class, Liza worked in a factory and made only enough money to live and to buy a few items of cheap finery.

After a gay dance in the streets of Lambeth, Liza was chased by several young men trying to kiss her. As she fled, only half in earnest, she ran straight into the arms of a stranger and was soundly kissed. Flouncing off, she found herself strangely moved by the unexpected experience. That night Tom, her earnest and persistent suitor, called on her as usual. Liza liked Tom but she did not love him, and so she tried to send him away without hurting his feelings. But Tom was stubborn. He begged her to take time to consider his proposal. When he asked her to go on an outing the next day, she refused. She did not want him to spend his money or his hopes on her.

Later her friend Sally also begged her to go on the outing. When she learned that the stranger who had kissed her would be one of the party, Liza relented, but against her better judgment. She had learned that the stranger was Jim Blakeston, a married man and the father of five children. Jim's wife went on the outing too, but Jim paid little attention to her. Instead, he spent most of his time following Liza and Tom around. Jim's actions angered Tom, but that poor young man was too much in love to blame Liza for encouraging the older man.

After the excursion Jim followed Liza home and kissed her passionately. She knew that she should be angry, but she was also flattered and pleased. From that night on Liza was lost. When Jim asked her to walk with him or to meet him at a show, she refused; then she kept the appointment anyway. Although she knew they were both wrong, she seemed powerless to withdraw from his influence. They tried to avoid people they knew, but Liza was afraid that they would be seen sooner or later. At last, grown reckless, she allowed Jim to seduce her.

The next few weeks were heaven for Liza. She loved Jim deeply, and he returned her love. But Liza knew that people were beginning to talk about her. Young men and girls yelled insults after her. Even Tom cut her once, and that fact hurt her because she knew that Tom was good and kind and she hated to lose his former opinion of her. Her love was too strong, however, to be permanently affected by the insults she received. Jim even offered to leave his wife and take her away to another part of the city, but Liza knew that they would always be in danger of being caught. She also realized that Jim loved his children and would be unhappy away from them. Furthermore, Liza felt that she could not leave her mother. Although the old woman had never been much of a mother, Liza thought it her duty to stay with her. There seemed nothing for Liza and Jim to do but to continue as they were or to part entirely. Neither could think of parting.

After Liza's friend Sally was married, her happiness made Liza even more miserable in her own shame. Later she learned that Sally's happiness was only superficial. Her husband beat her regularly, but the girl was too proud to let anyone but Liza know. Liza also had a shock. Once she was late for an appointment with Jim and he drank too much while he waited for her. When she tried to keep him from going back into the pub for more beer, he struck her in the eye. He was instantly contrite, but the damage to Liza's heart never quite mended.

Sally warned Liza one day that Jim's wife was looking for her. To avoid a public scene, Liza tried to keep clear of Mrs. Blakeston, who was much the larger and stronger of the two. In a fight, Liza realized, she would be bested. But at last they met and Mrs. Blakeston gave Liza a horrible beating. Outclassed from the beginning, the girl fought gamely. Tom and Jim appeared almost simultaneously and stopped the fight, Tom carrying Liza home tenderly and Jim threatening to kill his wife for hurting Liza.

Tom loved Liza so much that he wanted to marry her, although he knew all the gossip about her; he had cut her in the past because of his hurt. Even when she told him that she was going to have Jim's baby, Tom still wanted to have her for his wife. Liza refused him again, however; Tom was too good to be tied to a woman of her reputation.

Jim himself almost killed his wife. He was prevented from doing so only by the intervention of a neighbor woman.

Later that night Liza awoke with a burning fever and intense pain. For the next day or two she suffered terribly, and at last her mother became worried enough to send for a midwife. The woman knew at once that Liza had miscarried and was gravely ill. Although they sent for a doctor, the midwife knew that there was little hope for the girl. Tom called regularly, out of his mind with worry. Liza, when she was conscious, looked only for Jim. He came as soon as he heard about her condition, but he was too late to give any comfort to the dying girl. She lay unconscious for several hours, then quietly died. As the doctor covered her face, Jim turned away, weary and defeated.

WOLF, typical of the horse-riding and horse-breeding man

NORNA GEST, typical of the man who entered the Iron Age and lingered to the fall of the Roman Empire

Critique:

In 1944 the Nobel Prize in Literature was awarded to Johannes V. Jensen "because of the exceptional vigor and fertility of his poetic imagination, combined with an all-embracing intellectuality and bold creative expression." All those qualities are certainly manifest in The Long Journey, a prose epic published in translation as Fire and Ice (1923), The Cimbrians (1923), and Christopher Columbus (1924). Yet to call The Long Journey a novel is to understate its value; rather, it is a great work of cultural mythology, a new integration and an ultra-sensitive reinterpretation of the progress Man has made in the world since that remote age when he first began to walk upon the earth. At least one writer has termed it a "bible of evolution." Perhaps no less comprehensive category can hold a work which ranges from before the Ice Age to the twentieth century. This work was published in Denmark as six novels over the period 1909 to 1922.

came from the North, Man lived in fear and trembling—in fear of the elements, the beasts of the jungles, and his own primitive leaders. Into one of those herd-like groups was born a boy who was named Fyr. As the child grew older he was seized with a desire to climb to the top of Gunung Api, a vast volcano quiet but not extinct. There on the slopes of the volcano, wandering by himself, Fyr learned to make use of the flames and their heat to keep himself warm, to cook his meat, to provide himself with a deity, and to enhance his own importance.

Attracted first by his songs and then by his person, women joined Fyr, until he, like other leaders, was the head of a primitive family group. After the women came children and, finally, other men who made themselves subservient to Fyr. Under his leadership the tribe became a band of hunters, using the pits, spears, and bows which Fyr devised for them. Wherever they went, they took with them burning wood to re-create their god and household symbol: the fire. Soon all the forest folk bowed to the authority of Fyr, bound to him by his fire and by the tools of wood and stone which he created to make their lives more bearable. One day, however, the god seemed to demand a sacrifice, and the people, making Fyr their scapegoat, placed him in the fire he had brought them. Although he was roasted and eaten, he lived on, a representative of human ingenuity which they could not understand.

As ages passed, Gunung Api became extinct. Still later, the northern ice cap, beginning to move over the land, brought cold to the tropic jungles. After other ages had passed, a small band of hunters lay crouched in the same forest. The seasons were much colder, and the tribe and most of the animals had moved to the South, until a hunting expedition had brought them back to the old territory. One of their number, Carl, was the fire-tender. He was thrown out of the band, an outcast, when he let the fire die.

Carl fled to the North, somehow keeping himself alive in the winter by wrapping himself in skins and burrowing into the ground or building rude huts of stone. High on the extinct volcanic cone he traveled. Everywhere he saw only desolation and ice. He sought for the enemy of his tribe, the cold, but did not find him. He was joined in his wanderings by a dog; the animal slowly joined into a comradeship with the man, although not without some trembling and hesitancy on the part of each. As the winters passed, Carl learned to prepare for them by laying in a supply of food and building a shelter. He even learned to foretell when the great cold was coming and where he would find food and shelter as its ice and snows moved gradually to the South. When he did find an occasional human being, the encounter served only as an opportunity for Carl to eat a different kind of meat. One day he gave chase to a human being who turned out to be a woman. He captured her by the sea, and the lure of the sea was to call him again.

Carl's wife was Mam. She brought new habits of gathering and storing, as well as children. She added vegetables to Carl's diet, and their home became a permanent one. Carl was still aware of fire, a possession which he had lost and not regained. Gathering many stones, he chipped them against one another in his efforts to strike fire from them. At last, successful, he bequeathed fire to his children.

The children of Carl and their wives added pottery work to their skills; with ceramics came boiling, a new way of cooking. Among the descendants of Carl there arose a group of priests, against whom rebels were sometimes pitted. Such a rebel was White Bear. Denied a certain woman for his wife, he killed the leader of the priestly clan. Like Carl before him, White Bear became an outcast, taking May, his woman, with him. White Bear became a seaman, building small boats and sailing them, in company with his sons, while May and the daughters remained at home to farm and care for the cattle.

White Bear began to use horses. He built a chariot, with horses to draw it. His sons, more adventurous, learned to ride. One of the sons, Wolf, became so enamored of the horses that he rode them away to become a nomad, forerunner of the Golden Horde of Genghis Khan.

Ages later a new man appeared. He was Norna Gest, son of the matriarch Gro. While he was still a young boy dwelling at the edge of the sea on an island, he built himself a dugout canoe and sailed away, carrying with him a young girl who was, after a time, to become his mate. They and their child explored a new land to the north, now Sweden, but returned to the home island in after years. Gest himself was not an ordinary mortal; he was to live as long as he kept a partially burned candle. After his return to his original home, he and his companions went on many voyages and made use of sails as well as paddles.

As years passed, Gest found he had outlived his companions. He awoke one day to find himself in a changed Sealand, a place where men were either thralls or earls. Disturbed at the changes and despised because he had taken a new wife in the person of a milkmaid, one of the thralls, he wandered sadly about the land.

Unhappy in the changed Sealand, Gest and his bondwoman-wife sailed to Sweden to found a new colony in which they were to be the leaders. With them they took new techniques of smelting and forging metals. In their new home they gradually acquired domestic animals—horses, sheep, and cattle. Their sons and daughters married, and thus the colony grew. The mother died, and one day Gest disappeared, to wander again over the globe. Unnoticed but noticing, he traveled through central Europe and floated down the Danube. He traversed the Mediterranean lands, where his life began in the early Stone Age. Finding something wanting in the lands of the South, Gest turned his face once again toward his homeland, where he became a wandering skald.

Arriving in Jutland, he was welcomed by Tole, a leader who was guardian of the ancient god of the Jutlanders. This was a wooden idol which Tole wished to enclose in a great bronze bull. Tole welcomed Gest as the bringer of skills with metals and as a man of great wisdom. The two men made plans to cast the bronze bull at the time of the great spring festivals, before the flocks and herds were taken up to the summer pastures. The bull was successfully cast, and the festivities ended with human sacrifices of slaves and thralls. Gest wandered off afoot after the festival.

In later years floods rose up in the seas about Jutland, and the younger men wished to leave the country to search for a homeland safe from the ever-encroaching sea. The entire tribe left, except for elderly Tole. With the tribe went the bronze bull, destined now to long journeying across the face of central and southern Europe.

Back and forth across the lands went the Cimbrians, enlisting other tribes in their search for better lands. At last they traveled far enough to come to the notice of the Romans.

Failing to obey the warning of the Romans to remain out of their dominions, the Cimbrians and their allies of the North became enemies of the Empire. As enemies they decided to strike at Rome itself. Victorious at first, they became proud and reckoned not at all on the strategy of the Roman generals, strategy which defeated them. In their defeat the Cimbrians and their allies were ruined. Those who were not killed or who did not commit suicide were sold into bondage to the Romans, to live miserably as captives in the South, where eventually their blood blended with the blood of their conquerors.

Norna Gest saw these things happening. Finally, knowing that his time was at an end, he once again left Rome in his boat and glided slowly toward the sea, there to burn his candle to its end.

After the fall of the Roman Empire, barbarians from the North were gradually assimilated into the Christian religion. The ancient ship of the North, inverted on land, became the Gothic cathedral, a compound of the mariner's vessel and the stately forests through which earlier man had roamed. Among the descendants of the barbaric tribes of the North were the Langobards. One of the descendants of the latter group was a man named Christopher Columbus, who was to lead mankind farther on its journey of discovery across the seas and into a whole new hemisphere then undreamed of, or at least forgotten by the descendants of the early Northmen who had once visited it.

Columbus saw himself as a veritable Christopher, one who carried the Christ into the world. While others caroused before setting out across the ocean with him, he prepared himself by attending masses in the cathedral. He had faith in divine help and a divine purpose. When the qualities which his faith gave him proved insufficient to meet the demands of leadership, he could also call upon an amazing strength of body which his northern forebears had bequeathed him.

Although he reached the islands of the West Indies, other men carried man's long journey into the New World; Columbus was doomed to be only a leader pointing the way. To later conquistadors, men like Cortés and Pizarro, went the credit for gaining the mainland for European culture. Those men faced the odds of sheer numbers when they met the strength of the late Stone Age men, the followers of Montezuma and the Incas, who still existed in America, savages caught in the lag where European culture had left them many ages before. In Mexico, for example, Cortés was to find human sacrifices and worship of volcanic spirits, examples of culture-progress which had long since ceased to exist in the Old World. The light which Columbus saw from his ship at night was a symbol of the fire worship met throughout the New World.

The Indians believed that the coming of the white men marked the return of their great sun god, Quetzalcoatl. Perhaps the god might have been Norna Gest, visiting the New World during his travels. But the savages soon lost their superstitious awe of men with fair skins and hair, and many Europeans were sacrificed on the altars of Mexico and other southern countries.

The great battle of the New World was fought in Mexico. There the journey of the European culture was most seriously threatened. In the north the Indians seemed to fade away before the white culture; in the West Indies disease had killed them like summer flies at the first autumn frost. But in Mexico there was warfare between the eagle and the serpent, symbols of Man's migrations and his conflicting cultures. Cortés and his soldiers were like eagles swooping down on the snake, insignia of the Aztecs.

Even though Cortés was temporarily successful, with the help of a woman who turned against her own people, and even though he was able to send the idol of Huitzilopochtli toppling down the long flights of stairs which led to its temple, the Spaniards were doomed to temporary defeat. Cortés had to hack his way out of Tenochtitlán while the screams of Spaniards sacrificed alive echoed in his ears.

Years later a young man named Darwin, a naturalist on H. M. S. Beagle, was to become a new symbol in man's journey from the past, through the present, into the future. Those on the Beagle thought they saw the Flying Dutchman. Perhaps that dread captain, doomed to sail forever, will become the symbol of Man's long journey as it continues. Or perhaps the long journey is now almost ended. No one knows.

Critique:

A remarkable first novel based in part on actual characters and events, The Long Night is a work of originality and true historical imagination. After the murder of his father by a gang of desperadoes modeled more or less upon the notorious Murrell gang of actual history, a young Alabaman embarks upon a grim career of revenge, but with the outbreak of the Civil War his desire for private vengeance becomes submerged in the greater and bloodier issues of that conflict. At last, facing a tragic dilemma, he makes his own desperate and separate peace and goes into hiding. In spite of minor structural defects the novel achieves its purpose with considerable stylistic vigor and imaginative power, and the account of the battle of Shiloh is a vivid piece of war reporting. In addition, the writer presents a realistic and convincing regional picture of ante-bellum life on the southern frontier. These qualities combine to give The Long Night its definite distinction among more conventional novels dealing with the Civil War theme.

The Story:

Lawrence McIvor was twenty-two when he heard his family's story for the first time. Just out of college, he had been summoned to his Uncle Pleasant's house deep in the coves of Winston County, Alabama. There through all of one dark winter night he listened to his kinsmen's tale of hatred and grim vengeance.

The McIvor troubles began in Georgia, at a militia muster where powerful old Cameron McIvor refused to wrestle one of the reckless Caruthers twins. Several days later Job Caruthers attacked McIvor and the planter broke the young man's arm. After his recovery Job and his brother Mebane returned a borrowed team of horses in a wind-broken condition. Furious, McIvor shot Job. The brother then started a lawsuit which left the planter almost ruined. McIvor decided to move to Texas. Pleasant, his favored son, was sixteen at the time.

The McIvors traveled by wagon, with their cattle and remaining slaves. Near Wetumpka, Alabama, they met Tyson Lovell, a wealthy landowner who offered McIvor five hundred acres of good land to crop on shares. Not long after they had settled in their new home William, the oldest son, married a storekeeper's daughter and went to live in town. Pleasant and his younger brother Levi helped their father and the hands in the fields.

There was something mysterious and sinister about Lovell. After McIvor and Pleasant, tracking a lost mule, found a shack in which two neighbors named Wilton were guarding several strange slaves, the father became convinced that Lovell was a speculator, head of a gang of slave stealers and horse thieves, an organization to which most of their neighbors belonged. Lovell, becoming alarmed, tried to frighten the McIvors into leaving the country, first by having the sheriff discover two stolen slaves in the planter's smokehouse, later, after McIvor and Lovell quarreled, by swearing out a bench warrant which named McIvor an outlaw.

Defying Lovell, the planter waited for his enemy to act. William came to stay at the farm, but he was called away suddenly by false news of his wife's illness. That night Pleasant was waylaid and locked in an old church. Before daylight armed men broke into the McIvor house. While the Wilton brothers held the old planter in his bed, a man named Fox shot him.

The McIvor kin gathered in secret. A few, William among them, argued that the murderers should be punished by the law. Others clamored for an open feud. Grief-crazed over his father's death, Pleasant revealed that he had tracked the gang to its meeting place and learned the names of its forty members. After the court dismissed charges brought by McIvor's widow, she and her family quietly left the country. Pleasant, a young uncle named Eli, and Bob Pritchard, a cousin, swore to answer violent death with violence.

Pleasant and his kinsmen began to terrorize the region. A dishonest district attorney, Lovell's tool, was killed in a fall from an inn balcony. One Wilton was dragged to death by his horse. Another was found shot. Lovell's house burned, his overseer's charred body in the ruins. Fox ran away. After Sheriff Botterall's posse trapped and killed Pritchard, Pleasant resolved to kill secretly and alone. Forcing Botterall into a wild stallion's stall, he lashed the animal until it trampled Lovell's henchman to death. Several of the gang fled to Texas, but Pleasant followed and killed them. He and Eli built a cabin in the wilds of Winston County. From there he planned to carry on his stealthy, deadly raids around Wetumpka.

Two years after his father's death he went one night to a house Lovell owned near Buyckville. In hiding, he had not known that Fort Sumter had been fired on until he found Lovell in his study and learned from his mocking enemy that the Civil War had begun. Lovell declared that the army would soon swallow the survivors of his gang; besides, Pleasant had walked into a trap. Hearing bloodhounds baying in the distance, Pleasant boasted that he still intended to make Lovell the last of his victims. After knocking the man unconscious with a pistol, he ran from the house before his trackers could surround it.

Pleasant and Eli joined the Confederate Army, and as a result Pleasant continued his work of revenge. At Corinth, while on outpost duty, he killed a sergeant and four men from Lovell's gang and arranged the bodies to make them appear as if shot by Federal scouts. Summoned to General Albert Sidney Johnston's headquarters to give his version of the attack, he met Lieutenant Roswell Ellis, on the staff of Colonel Armistead McIvor, Pleasant's cousin from Kentucky. In an army in which there were few binding distinctions of rank Pleasant and Ellis became friends. Pleasant learned that Fox, his father's murderer, had offered to have Andrew Johnson assassinated and that General Johnston had scornfully rejected the offer. Knowing that Fox was in the neighborhood, he bided his time.

The march toward Shiloh Church began through pouring rain. Two nights before the battle Pleasant and Ellis were detailed to scout duty along the Federal lines. After Ellis returned to report, Pleasant spent the night in the woods. All the next day he watched the Federal encampment and waited for the battle to begin. But there were delays in bringing up Confederate troops and equipment and the battle of Shiloh was not joined until Sunday morning, April 6, 1862. Pleasant, wandering through the acrid battle haze, found his own company in time to join in a wild charge in which Eli was killed. The Federal troops retreated. Pleasant, shot in the hand, spent the night with a wounded major from Ohio. The next day the reinforced Federal lines advanced and the Confederates, with General Beauregard in command after General Johnston's death, began their retreat to Corinth.

Pleasant was with the army at Murfreesboro when he heard that his brother William had been killed. Levi, after nursing his wounded brother, died three days later. Pleasant went to meet his mother at Chattanooga when she drove through the Federal lines to claim her sons' bodies. On his way back to Murfreesboro, Pleasant was glad to have Roswell Ellis' friendship. Ellis was of the living, and Pleasant had seen too many deaths. After Shiloh woods he was beginning, despairingly, to doubt his vows of hatred and revenge.

Scouting near La Vergne, Pleasant did not return to camp immediately because he was on the track of a Lovell man named Awsumb, but when he looked at his enemy through his gunsights he was unable to pull the trigger. On his arrival at headquarters he learned that after his failure to report at once a brigade had been sent to test the enemy strength at La Vergne. Ellis had been killed in the engagement. Pleasant felt that his delay had caused his friend's death. Ellis had given him back his humanity and he had destroyed his friend. Following dark and bloody trails of reprisal, he had loved the dead too much and the living too little, and he himself was doomed. He thought of the hills and hidden coves of Winston County. There a deserter from whatever cause he fled could hide forever.

LOST ILLUSIONS

Author: Honoré de Balzac (1799-1850)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Angoulême, France

First published in three parts: 1837, 1839, 1843

Principal characters:

DAVID SÉCHARD, a printer

EVE, his wife

LUCIEN CHARDON, his brother-in-law

MADAME DE BARGETON, loved by Lucien

Critique:

This longest of all Balzac's novels is a study of a hero who is too innocent even to understand all the machinations of his enemies. The tone is somber and cynical. Virtue is rewarded in a way, but chicanery is always triumphant. Although the plot is marred by the lavish details with which the past histories of the characters are presented, Balzac has achieved in this novel considerably more suspense than usual. Lost Illusions is perhaps the high point of the author's "Scenes of Country Life."

The Story:

Angoulême was divided into two social classes: the aristocrats of fashionable society and the bourgeois. David Séchard and Lucien Chardon were scarcely aware that they belonged to the less privileged class. Lucien was the brilliant, handsome, unstable son of a chemist. David was the sober, kind son of a printer.

David's father had sent him to Paris to learn all the latest innovations in the printing trade. The illiterate father, avaricious and mean, hoped that David would learn how to make more money from the old-fashioned printery shop of 'Secnard and Son. When David returned from Paris, his father quickly sold him the business at a high price and retired to his vineyard.

Partly because of his friendship for poetic Lucien and partly because of his temperament, David did not prosper. He was always discussing a grand project with Lucien or dreaming of Eve, Lucien's beautiful sister.

Lucien wrote some verses which attracted attention. Even the aristocrats of the town heard of him, and Madame de Bargeton, a woman of thirty-six married to an old husband, invited him to one of her famous evening gatherings. Eve scrimped to buy Lucien the proper clothes for the occasion. The evening was not an entire success. Few except Madame de Bargeton listened to Lucien's poetry, but he made a real conquest of his hostess.

While Lucien did his best to break into society and win the heart of Madame de Bargeton, David and Eve were quietly falling in love. David strained his resources to the utmost to furnish rooms over the print shop for his wife-to-be, a room at the rear for his mother-in-law, and a comfortable room on the street for Lucien. David had determined to promote Lucien's literary talent by supporting him.

Two days before the wedding, Lucien was surprised in Madame de Bargeton's boudoir. Her husband, old as he was, fought a duel with a man who had gossiped about Madame de Bargeton. Not wishing to face the scandal, Madame de Bargeton decided to go to Paris, and Lucien was to follow her. With a heavy heart, for he knew Lucien's weaknesses, David drove his friend at night along the Paris road. Safely away from Angoulême, Lucien joined his mistress.

David and Eve, married, settled into their new rooms. Eve was a devoted wife, though foolishly fond of her scapegrace brother. Before her child was born she began to grow uneasy. Lucien wrote very seldom and David paid little attention to his business. He was too busy working on an experiment to find a new way to make paper without rags. If he could invent a new process they would all be rich. Meanwhile the family was desperately in need, for Lucien's demands for money kept them poor. At last Eve herself took charge of the print shop.

She had her first small success when she hit on the idea of printing a Shepherd's Calendar, a cheap almanac to peddle to farmers. But the firm of Cointet Brothers, rivals in the printing trade, gave her so much unfair competition that she made only a small profit from her printing venture. After her baby came she had to give up her efforts for a while. David was more than ever wrapped up in his attempts to find a new process for making paper.

Meanwhile Lucien had failed completely to make his way in Paris. He had quarreled with his rich mistress, and they had parted. He could find only odd jobs as a journalist. He borrowed continually from David to lead the dissolute life of a man-about-town. Finally, when he went to live openly with Coralie, an actress, he lost all chances for any real success.

Pressed for money, Lucien forged David's name to notes for three thousand francs. When the firm of Cointet Brothers, acting as bankers, presented the notes to David for payment, he was unable to raise the money. The law suit that followed disturbed Eve so much that she had to hire a wet nurse for her baby; in that small French town she was disgraced.

Cointet Brothers promised a rich marriage to Petit-Claud, David's lawyer, if he would prolong the suit, increase the costs to David, and eventually force him into debtor's prison. During the delays Eve and David both appealed to his father for help, but the old miser refused aid to his son. He was mainly interested in collecting rent for the building where David had his shop. With all help denied, David went into hiding and worked feverishly on his paper process.

In Paris, Coralie died, leaving Lucien

without a place to live. Having no money, he began the long walk home. One night he caught a ride among the trunks of a carriage and went to sleep on his precarious perch. When he awoke the carriage had stopped. As he got off he saw that he had been riding with his former mistress, Madame de Bargeton, now Madame la Comtesse Châtelet, wife of the new prefect of the district. She and her husband laughed openly as the disheveled Lucien stalked away.

A few miles from Angoulême Lucien became ill and sought refuge with a miller. Thinking him about to die, the miller sent for a priest. When Lucien begged for news of his family, the priest told him of David's troubles. Lucien hurried to town to see what he could do for the brother-in-law he had helped to ruin.

In Angoulême, Lucien was sorrowfully received by his sister. To add to the distress of David and his family, Cointet Brothers published in the paper a glowing account of Lucien's successes in Paris. There was a parade in Lucien's honor, and the du Châtelet's even invited him to dinner.

Realizing that he still had a hold over Madame du Châtelet, Lucien tried to get David released from his debts through her influence. Meanwhile, after seeing some samples of David's work, the Cointets offered to pay off his debts, buy his print shop, and develop his invention for him. The offer was intended, however, to bring David out of hiding. Then a letter from Lucien to his friend was intercepted and a forged note substituted, appointing a place of meeting. David, on the way to the meeting, was arrested and thrown into prison.

Lucien, after a despairing farewell to his sister, left Angoulême. He intended to kill himself, but on the road he was picked up by a Spanish priest, an emissary traveling between Madrid and Paris. The envoy saw promise in Lucien and offered him fifteen thousand francs in return for Lucien's promise to do as the priest wished. The Spaniard meant to acquire power through Lucien's attraction for women and his poetic fervor. The bargain sealed, Lucien sent the fifteen thousand francs to David.

The money arrived just after David had signed away his shop and his paper-making process to the Cointets. David and Eve retired to the country and in due time inherited money and a vineyard from his father. Petit-Claud, the double-crossing lawyer, became a famous prosecutor. The Cointets made a great fortune from David's process, and one of them became a deputy and a peer.

FORESIGHT, an old man given to astrology

ANGELICA, his niece

PRUE, his daughter

MRS. FORESIGHT, his young second wife

MISTRESS FRAIL, her sister

Critique:

Love for Love, generally considered one of Congreve's finest plays, is marked by a relatively simple but not particularly original plot. For the most part, the Restoration writers of comedy seemed to be content to follow their Elizabethan and Jacobean predecessors in matters of plot and of stock characters. Whatever grossness—and it is comparatively trifling—is present in this play is far overbalanced by clever and amusing dialogue and by several pairs of well-conceived and variously-contrasted characters. Surely Ben Jonson's theory of humors is quite alive in Sir Sampson Legend's penchant for tall tales of travel and in old Foresight's obsession for prognostication.

The Story:

Young Valentine Legend, having squandered all of his money in riotous living, was destitute and deeply in debt. With no property left but his books, he declared his intention of becoming a playwright, for his love for Angelica had indeed compelled him to take desperate measures. On hearing of his intention, Jeremy, his knavish manservant, showed alarm and said that Valentine's family would surely disown him.

Among Valentine's creditors was Trapland, a lecherous old scrivener who persisted in dunning him. When Valentine, who had been joined by his friend Scandal, subtly threatened Trapland with blackmail concerning a wealthy city widow, the old man suddenly forgot the money owed him.

Sir Sampson Legend's steward told Valentine that he could be released from all debts by signing over his rights as Sir Sampson's heir to Ben, his younger brother. If he signed, he would receive four thousand pounds in cash.

In the meantime Foresight, an old fool given to the science of prognostication, recalled Prue, his bumpkin daughter, from the country. Foresight planned to marry her to Ben Legend.

Angelica, wealthy, young, and clever, reproved her uncle for his belief in astrology.irate, Foresight threatened to end her friendship with Valentine. Angelica, piqued, insinuated that Mrs. Foresight, the old man's young second wife, was not true to him.

Sir Sampson Legend, a great teller of tall tales of world travel, arranged with Foresight for the marriage of Ben and Prue. When Sir Sampson playfully hinted to Foresight that Mrs. Foresight might not be a faithful wife, Foresight threatened to break off the marriage agreement. Sir Sampson quickly made amends.

Valentine, seeking Angelica, encountered his father at Foresight's house. He was indignant when his father disowned him as a son and he begged his father to change his mind about the conditions under which he could be freed of debt.

When Mrs. Foresight rebuked her sister for her indiscretion in frequenting the haunts of gamblers and gallants, Mistress Frail revealed her knowledge of Mrs. Foresight's own indiscretions. Mistress Frail then declared her intention of marrying Ben and enlisted her sister's aid in the project. Prue, meanwhile, found herself charmed by Tattle, a voluble young dandy. When Mrs. Foresight and Mistress Frail encouraged Tattle to court Prue, he was mystified because he knew of the marriage arranged between Prue and Ben. Even so, he gave Prue a lesson in the art of love, a lesson which progressed as far as her bedchamber. Tattle, having grown tired of dalliance with the rude country girl, was relieved when Prue's nurse found them.

Ben, returning from a sea voyage, declared that marriage did not interest him at the moment, but he visibly changed his mind when Mistress Frail flattered him. Left alone, he and Prue expressed dislike for each other. Ben declared that he talked to Prue only to obey his father.

Scandal, in Valentine's behalf, ingratiated himself with Foresight by pretending a knowledge of astrology. His scheme succeeding, he convinced Foresight that it was not in the stars for Valentine to sign over his inheritance or for Ben and Prue to marry. Attracted to Mrs. Foresight, Scandal hoodwinked old Foresight in order to pay gallant attentions to his young wife. Meanwhile Ben and Mistress Frail confessed their love and decided to marry.

Because Scandal had reported that Valentine was ill, Angelica went to his lodgings. In spite of Scandal's insistence that her acknowledgment of love for Valentine would cure the young man, she quickly detected a trick and departed. Sir Sampson and a lawyer named Buckram arrived to get Valentine's signature to the documents they had prepared. Jeremy insisted that Valentine was out of his mind. Buckram said that the signature would be invalid under the circumstances, but Sir Sampson forced his way into his son's presence. Valentine, pretending complete lunacy, called himself Truth and declared that he would give the world the lie. After the frightened Buckram left, Valentine showed clarity of mind, but, when the lawyer was called back, Valentine again seemed to lapse into lunacy.

Mistress Frail, having learned that there was little chance of Ben's getting the whole estate, broke off their engagement. Sir Sampson, frustrated by Valentine, decided to marry and beget a new heir. Mrs. Foresight plotted with Jeremy to marry Mistress Frail, disguised as Angelica, to Valentine during one of his fits of madness. When Jeremy revealed the scheme to Valentine and Scandal, the friends, in their turn, planned to marry Mistress Frail to Tattle by means of another disguise.

After Valentine had confessed his feigned madness to Angelica, she expressed disappointment; she had thought him really mad for love of her. She then went to Sir Sampson, learned his new state of mind, and suggested that he and she go through with a mock marriage ceremony in order to bring Valentine to his senses. When foolish Sir Sampson suggested that they actually get married so that she could inherit his estate, Angelica said that his plan would not be advisable since the papers leaving the estate to Ben were already drawn up.

Jeremy tricked foolish Tattle into believing that he, disguised as a friar, might marry Angelica, who would be disguised as a nun. Prue, forsaken by Tattle, asserted that she would marry Robin, the butler, who had professed his love for her.

Mistress Frail, thinking that she was marrying Valentine, and Tattle, thinking that he was marrying Angelica, were thus tricked into wedlock. Told by Angelica that she intended to marry his father, Valentine in despair declared that he was ready to sign over his inheritance. Impressed by this indication of his love for her, Angelica tore up the bond, which Sir Sampson had given her, and she brought the doting old man to his senses by revealing that she had always intended to marry Valentine. Sir Sampson and old Foresight consoled each other; they admitted that they had acted like fools.

Critique:

There is little wonder that Love's Labour's Lost is not among the popular favorites of most readers of Shakespeare. The play is slow-moving, in places dull, and it shows neither the perfection of plot nor the fineness of characterization which distinguish most of the later plays. At the same time it is filled with clever talk and it exhorts, in the romantic manner of the sonneteers, the theme of love. The note of seriousness apparent beneath the surface cleverness of the dialogue makes this play an early comedy of manners, in which the ladies try to teach the young noblemen the value of sincerity and faithfulness to vows. The foolish Armado and the stupid clown enliven many of the scenes with their wit. All in all, this drama is not a poor play; an early work, it is not so good as most readers expect from the master dramatist.

The Story:

The King of Navarre had taken a solemn vow and forced three of his attending lords to take it also. This vow was that for three years they would fast and study, enjoy no pleasures, and see no ladies. None of the three noblemen wanted to take the vow; Berowne, in particular, felt that it would be impossible to keep his promise. He pointed out this fact to the king by reminding him that even at that very time the Princess of France was approaching the court of Navarre to present a petition from her father, who was ill. The king agreed that he would be compelled to see her, but he added that in such cases the vow must be broken by necessity. Berowne foresaw that "necessity" would often cause the breaking of their vows.

The only amusement the king and his lords would have was provided by Costard, a clown, and by Don Adriano De Armado, a foolish Spaniard attached to the court. Armado wrote the king to inform him that Costard had been caught in the company of Jaquenetta, a country wench of dull mind. Since all attached to the court had been under the same laws of abstinence from earthly pleasures, Costard was remanded to Armado's custody and ordered to fast on bran and water for one week. The truth was that Armado also loved Jaquenetta. He feared the king would learn of his love and punish him in the same manner.

The Princess of France arrived with her three attendants. All were fair and lovely, and they expected to be received at the palace in the manner due their rank. But the king sent word that they would be housed at his lodge, since under the terms of his vow no lady could enter the palace. The princess, furious at being treated in this fashion, scorned the king for his bad manners. When she presented the petition from her father, she and the king could not agree, for he vowed he had not received certain monies she claimed had been delivered to him.

At that first meeting, although each would have denied the fact, eight hearts were set to beating faster. The king viewed the princess with more than courteous interest. Berowne, Longaville, and Dumaine, his attendants, looked with love on the princess' ladies in waiting, Rosaline, Maria, and Katherine. A short time later Berowne sent a letter to Rosaline, with Costard as his messenger. But Costard had also been given a letter by Armado, to be delivered to Jaquenetta. The obvious happened. Costard, mixing up the letters, gave Jaquenetta's to Rosaline and Rosaline's to the country wench.

Berowne had been correct in thinking the vow to leave the world behind would soon be broken. Hiding in a tree, he heard the king read aloud a sonnet which proclaimed his love for the princess. Later the king, in hiding, overheard Longaville reading some verses he had composed to Maria. Longaville, in turn, concealed himself and listened while Dumaine read a love poem inscribed to Katherine. Then each one in turn stepped out from hiding to accuse the others of breaking their vows. Berowne all that time had remained hidden in the tree. Thinking to chide them for their broken vows, he revealed himself at last and ridiculed them for their weakness, at the same time proclaiming himself the only one able to keep his vow. But at that instant Costard and Jaquenetta brought to the king the letter Berowne had written Rosaline, the letter Costard had mistakenly delivered to the country girl.

Then all confessed that they had broken their vows. Berowne provided an excuse for all when he declared that one could learn much by studying women and the nature of love. Their honor saved, the four determined to woo the ladies in earnest, and they made plans to entertain their loves with revels and dances.

Each lover sent his lady a token to wear in his honor. But when the ladies learned from a servant that the lovers were, for a joke, coming in disguise to woo the princess and her companions, the girls in turn planned to discomfit the king and the three lords by masking themselves and exchanging tokens. The men arrived, also masked and disguised as Russians. Each man tried to make love to the lady wearing his token, but each was spurned and ridiculed. The ladies would not dance or sing, but would only mock the bewildered gentlemen.

Finally the suitors departed, hurt and indignant at the treatment they had received. Before long they returned in their own dress. The ladies then unmasked and told of the lunatic Russians who had called on them. Although the men confessed their plot and forswore all such jokes forever, the ladies still did not stop teasing them. Since each man had made love to the wrong girl because of the exchange of tokens, the ladies pretended to be hurt that each man had broken his vows of love and constancy by protesting love for another. The poor suitors suffered greatly for their merriment before they learned that the ladies had anticipated their coming in disguise and thus had planned a joke of their own.

The king ordered a play presented for the entertainment of all. But in the midst of the gaiety word came that the princess' father, the King of France, had died. She must sail for home immediately, accompanied by her attendants. When the king and his lords pleaded with the ladies to stay in Navarre and marry them, the ladies refused to accept their serious protestations of love; they had jested too much to be believed. Each man vowed that he would remain faithful, only to be reminded of the former vows he had broken. Then each lady made a condition which, if met, would reward her lover a year hence. The king must retire for twelve months to a hermitage and there forsake all worldly pleasures. If at the end of that time he still loved the princess, she would be his. In the same fashion the other three lords must spend a year in carrying out the wishes of their sweethearts. Even the foolish Armado was included in the plan. He joined the others, announcing that Jaquenetta would not have him until he spent three years in honest work.

Thus all the swains tried with jests and fair speech to win their ladies, but without success. Now as the price of their folly they must prove in earnest that they deserved the hearts of their beloveds.

Type of work: Novel

CHARLEY RAUNCE, an English butler

MRS. TENNANT, Raunce's employer

MRS. JACK TENNANT, Mrs. Tennant's daughter-in-law

EDITH, a maid in love with Raunce

ALBERT, Raunce's assistant

Critique:

The novels of Henry Green have not found favor with American readers as readily as they have in Great Britain. Green combines modern techniques with Dickensian humor and sly social criticism. In this novel he conducts his readers to the little known world below stairs, the world of the servants which few masters or mistresses ever see. The qualities of depth and perception revealed in this and other of Green's books have made him a novelist better known to other writers than he is to the public at large.

The Story:

The great mansion owned by Mrs. Tennant had been thrown into turmoil by the death of old Eldon, the butler. In the servants' quarters no one knew quite what arrangements would be made after his death, for the mansion and its inhabitants formed an isolated bit of England in Eire. None of the servants could guess what Mrs. Tennant, who was a widow and very vague, might do in rearranging their duties. Only the footman, Charley Raunce, kept any purpose in his behavior.

Immediately after Eldon's death, Raunce went into the butler's room and took two small notebooks, one filled with the butler's monthly accounts and the other containing a set of special memoranda about visitors to the mansion, information which had helped the old man to solicit generous tips from Mrs. Tennant's guests. That same day Raunce went to his mistress and asked for the post of butler. She agreed to give him the post, but without any extra pay. Raunce knew, however, that by juggling the accounts he could make up whatever pay rise he deemed sufficient. That evening he solidified his position by successfully taking over the old butler's place at the head of the table in the servants' dining-room.

There were two upstairs maids in the Tennant mansion, Edith and Kate. Raunce insisted that Edith, with whom he was in love, continue her practice of bringing the butler his morning tea. The housekeeper, Mrs. Burch, was scandalized, but was forced to give in.

Raunce's usurpation of the old butler's position immediately upon the latter's death soon appeared a minor matter, for a scandal rocked the mansion within a few days. Mrs. Tennant's daughter-in-law, Mrs. Jack, was found in bed with a neighbor, Captain Davenport. The discovery was made by Edith, who went to open the curtains and lay out Mrs. Jack's clothes in the morning. Even though Mrs. Tennant was unaware of her daughter-in-law's indiscretion, the episode created consternation and nervousness in the servants' quarters.

To add to the uneasiness among the servants, a blue sapphire ring belonging to Mrs. Tennant disappeared. Mrs. Tennant, who was always losing valuables, did not blame the servants, but the loss made them feel ill at ease.

A few days afterward Mrs. Tennant and her daughter-in-law went to England to visit Jack Tennant, who had been given a few days' leave from military duty. The English servants almost gave their notice when they learned that they were being left in sole charge of the mansion, for they were well aware of the unfriendly attitudes of the Irish about the countryside and were also in fear of an invasion of the district by German troops. Raunce, who had a great sense of duty, as well as a realization of what a good place he had, prevailed upon them to remain, despite the general dissatisfaction.

In Mrs. Tennant's absence Raunce paid court to Edith and discovered that she was in love with him. They spent many pleasant hours together, for Raunce was kept from his duties by a sore throat and Edith spent much of her time nursing him. They, like the other servants, were worried by the absence of their mistress and by their failure to find Mrs. Tennant's missing ring. Edith finally found it, but she and Raunce were at a loss to know where to keep it until Mrs. Tennant's return. They decided to hide it in the upholstering of a chair.

Much to their dismay, the ring was taken from the chair. Shortly after they discovered its loss a second time, an investigator from an insurance company called at the mansion. All the servants refused to answer his questions, for his presence during their mistress' absence bothered them and they did not know what to say in order to protect her and her interests. The investigator left in a suspicious mood, saying that his company would not pay for the loss. After his departure the servants discovered that the initials of the insurance company were like those of the militant, revolutionary Irish Republican Army. The discovery almost panicked them completely. Only the thought of military service and short rations in England kept them from giving up their jobs immediately.

In the remaining days before Mrs. Tennant's return, Edith learned that Mrs. Tennant's grandchildren and the cook's nephew had found the sapphire ring while playing. Not realizing the value of the piece of jewelry, the youngsters had taken it out and hidden it on the lawn. By pretending to want it as a wedding present from one of the little girls, Edith persuaded the child to bring it to her.

When Mrs. Tennant returned, the ring was restored to her, and the matter of its loss and the ugliness of the insurance investigator soon became matters of the past, almost forgotten after Raunce's helper, a young lad named Albert, gave his notice and left the mansion because Mrs. Tennant had implied that he had taken the ring in the first place. He went back to England to enter the military service and become an aerial gunner.

Raunce was made restless by the realization, brought home to him by Albert's departure, that he had no part in the war effort. He also felt remorseful because his mother, who was exposed to the bombings by the Germans, refused to come to Ireland to live with her son and Edith after their marriage. These influences, plus the many dissensions among the servants and the domestic crises that were occurring at the mansion, assumed larger and larger proportions as he thought about them. At last he admitted to Edith that he was dissatisfied and wanted to leave. His announcement made Edith unhappy, for she thought at first that he was trying to get out of marrying her.

When he convinced her that he wanted her to go with him, they decided that unlike good servants, they would leave without giving notice to Mrs. Tennant. One night they eloped and went back to England to be married and to live.

THE LOWER DEPTHS

Critique:

The Lower Depths, also translated as A Night's Lodging and At the Bottom, is generally accounted the best of Gorky's plays and one of the most vital of Russia's dramatic pieces. The play was pure naturalism in its day, but to modern taste it may appear more romantic. Gorky presents little of positive affirmation, but he observes shrewdly an unfortunate people. Perhaps more than any other document, the play explains the Russian revolution of 1917.

The Story:

The cellar resembled a cave, with only one small window to illuminate its dank recesses. In a corner thin boards partitioned off the room of Vaska, the young thief. In the kitchen lived Kvashnya, a vendor of meat pies, the decrepit Baron, and the streetwalker Nastya. All around the room were bunks occupied by a succession of lodgers.

Nastya was reading a story called Fatal Love. She was absorbed in the novel with her head bent down. The Baron, who lived largely on her earnings, seized the book and read its title aloud. Then he banged Nastya over the head with it and called her a lovesick fool. Satine raised himself painfully from his bunk at the noise. His memory was vague, but he knew he had been beaten up the night before. Bubnoff cruelly told him he had been caught cheating at cards. The Actor stirred in his bed on top of the stove. He predicted that some day Satine would be beaten to death.

The Actor awakened enough to remind the Baron to sweep the floor. The landlady was strict and made them clean every day. The Baron loudly announced that he had to go shopping. He and Kvashnya left to make the day's purchases.

The Actor climbed down from his bunk and declared that the doctor had told him he had an organism poisoned by alcohol. Sweeping the floor would be bad for his health.

Anna coughed loudly in her bunk. She was dying of consumption and there was no hope for her. Kleshtch, her husband, was busy at his bench, where he fitted old keys and locks. Anna sat up to call her husband. Kvashnya had left her some dumplings in the pot, and she offered them to her husband. Kleshtch agreed there was no use to feed a dying woman, and so with a clear conscience he ate the dumplings.

The Actor helped Anna down from her high bed and out to the draughty hall. The sick woman was wrapped in rags. As they went through the door, the landlord, Kostilyoff, nearly knocked them over.

Kostilyoff looked around the dirty cellar and glanced several times at Kleshtch, working at his bench. The landlord asserted loudly that the locksmith occupied too much room for two roubles a month and henceforth the rent would be two roubles and a half. Then Kostilyoff edged toward Vaska's room and inquired furtively if his wife had been in. He had good reason to suspect that Vassilisa was sleeping with Vaska.

At last Kostilyoff got up enough courage to call Vaska. The thief came out and denounced the landlord for not paying his debts, saying that Kostilyoff still owed seven roubles for a watch he had bought. Ordering Kostilyoff to produce the money immediately, Vaska sent him roughly out of the room.

The others admired Vaska for his courage and urged him to kill Kostilyoff and marry Vassilisa; then he could be landlord. Vaska thought over the idea for a time, but decided that he was too soft-hearted to be a landlord. Besides, he was thinking of discarding Vassilisa for her sister Natasha. Satine asked Vaska for twenty kopecks, which the thief was glad to give immediately; he was afraid Satine would want a rouble next.

Natasha came in with Luka. She put him in the kitchen to sleep with the three already there. Luka was a merry fellow who began to sing, but he stopped when all the others objected. The whole group sat silent when Vassilisa came in, saw the dirty floor, and gave orders for an immediate sweeping. She looked over the new arrival, Luka, and asked to see his passport. Because he had none, he was more readily accepted by the dissolute company.

Miedviedeff, who was a policeman and Vassilisa's uncle, entered the cellar to check up on the lodging. He began to question Luka, but when the tramp called him sergeant, Miedviedeff left him alone.

That night Anna lay in her bunk while a noisy, quarrelsome card game went on. Luka talked gently to the consumptive woman as Kleshtch came from time to time to look at her. Luka remarked that her death would be hard on her husband, but Anna without emotion accused Kleshtch of causing her death. She hoped for the rest and peace she had never known. Luka assured her there would be peace after her death.

The card players became louder and Satine was accused of cheating. Luka quieted the rioters; they all respected him even if they thought him a liar. He told Vaska he could reform in Siberia, and he assured the Actor that at a sanatorium he could be cured of alcoholism.

Vassilisa came in. When the others left, she told Vaska that if he would kill Kostilyoff and set her free she would give him three hundred roubles. Then Vaska would be free to marry Natasha, who at the moment was recovering from a beating given by her jealous sister. Vaska was about to refuse when Kostilyoff entered in search of his wife. He was violently suspicious, but Vaska pushed him out of the cellar.

There was a noise on top of the stove. Luka had overheard the whole thing. He was not disturbed greatly, and he even warned Vaska not to have anything to do with the vicious Vassilisa. Walking over to Anna's bunk, Luka saw that she was dead. When they got Kleshtch out of the saloon, he came to look at the body of his dead wife. The others notified him that he would have to remove the body, because in time dead people smell. Kleshtch agreed to take her outside.

The Actor began to cavort in joy, and he talked excitedly. He had made up his mind to go to the sanatorium for his health. Luka had told him he would even be cured at state expense.

In the back yard that night, as Natasha was telling romantic stories to the crowd, Kostilyoff came out and gruffly ordered Natasha in to work. When she went in, Vassilisa poured boiling water on her feet. Vaska went to the rescue of Natasha and knocked Kostilyoff down. Somehow in the brawl Kostilyoff was killed. At once Vassilisa blamed Vaska for the murder as the crowd slunk away. Natasha thought that Vaska had murdered Kostilyoff for the sake of Vassilisa. Natasha was almost in delirium as she wandered about accusing Vaska of murder and calling for revenge.

In the excitement Luka wandered off; he was never seen again. Vaska escaped a police search. Natasha went to the hospital. In the lodging things went on much as they had before. Satine cheated at cards, and the Baron tried to convince the others of his former affluence. They all agreed that Luka was a kind old man, but a great liar.

During a bitter quarrel with Nastya, the Baron stepped out in the yard. Satine and the others struck up a bawdy song. They broke off when the Baron hurried back to announce that the Actor had hanged himself. Satine thought the suicide was too bad—it broke up the song.

LUCIEN LEUWEN

Author: Stendhal (Marie-Henri Beyle, 1783-1842)

Type of plot: Psychological romance

Time of plot: The 1830's

Locale: France

First published: 1894

Principal characters:

LUCIEN LEUWEN, a serious young man

MONSIEUR LEUWEN, his father

MADAME DE CHASTELLER, a beautiful widow

MADAME GRANDET, an ambitious woman

DR. DU POIRIER, a physician

Critique:

Published posthumously, Lucien Leuwen is a long unfinished work divided into two novels: The Green Huntsman and The Telegraph. In it Stendhal gives a subtle, penetrating analysis, Freudian in tone, of a young commoner in the difficult days after the revolution of 1830. Lucien is considered an idealized portrait of Stendhal. The novel, though rewarding, is frustrating, for Stendhal never revised the manuscript; indeed, parts of the narrative were not completed. The grand passion of Lucien for Bathilde, for example, is not concluded; from his notes we know that the author intended them to marry. Despite these imperfec-tions the novel is regarded in France as Stendhal's third masterpiece.

The Story:

The revolution of 1830 was not a success; the armed rabble were victorious in the fighting, but afterward the rich bourgeoisie came to power. Although the king had lost much of his authority, France was not yet a true republic. The absolute monarchists remained loyal to the vanished power of the Bourbons, the people still hoped for a democratic rule, and the middle class steered a cautious, unsatisfactory path between the two extremes.

LUCIEN LEUWEN by Stendhal. Translated by Louise Varèse. By permission of the publishers, New Directions. Book I, THE GREEN HUNTSMAN, copyright, 1950, by Louise Varèse. Book II, THE TELEGRAPH, copyright, 1950, by Louise Varèse.

Lucien, son of a rich banker, had mild republican leanings. For daring to air his views, he was expelled from the Ecole Polytechnique, and for a time he remained idle at home. His indulgent, wealthy father tried to induce him to work in the family bank, and his mother presented him to the polite, gay society of her Parisian salon. But Lucien was dull and preoccupied. In despair his father filled his pockets with money and bade him entertain the light ladies at the Opera.

As a way out, Lucien took a commission as second lieutenant in a regiment of lancers going to maintain order in Nancy. Lucien liked his uniform with the magenta stripes, but he found his fellow officers insufferable. His lieutenant-colonel, especially, was a man of honorable reputation, but a bore. Only the soldiers in the ranks seemed genuine and unaffected.

The regiment was depressed on entering the town of Nancy. The land was flat; sewage ditches ran down the narrow, crooked streets, and the houses were mean. Lucien felt that he made an unsoldierly appearance because his mount, furnished by the regiment, was a mean-looking nag. As they passed a more pretentious house, a woman standing at an upstairs window seemed interested in Lucien, but as luck would have it, he was thrown from his horse just as he was trying to see her more clearly.

Lucien soon bought a good horse and rented a comfortable apartment, once occupied by a lieutenant-colonel who had left the regiment. In spite of his servants, his wine, and his stable, he was quite unhappy. His commanding officer, resenting his wealth, made his life miserable; the other officers had little to do with him. The townspeople held aloof from the military. One faction consisted of the aristocrats who were opposed to the moderate monarchy, and the other faction was the republican majority who smarted under any kingly rule. None of the officers was received in society; few of the enlisted men made friends with people of the suspicious working class.

Backed by his father's money and his own Parisian graces, Lucien set out determinedly to be accepted by the nobility. He cultivated the wily Dr. du Poirier, the leader of the monarchist set. Little by little Lucien was welcomed to the various salons. Only his military life irked him now. Government spies even reported that he had gone into a republican reading room; to quiet rumors of political unreliability Lucien fought and won two duels.

Several of the salons were presided over by beautiful, high-born women who accepted Lucien on friendly terms. The most beautiful of all, however, was Madame de Chasteller; and for long Lucien did not meet her. He heard of her in some detail, however, a rich widow dominated by a miserly father. She had had only one lover, so the gossips said, the lieutenant-colonel whose apartment Lucien had rented. When he finally met her, Lucien was smitten. Bathilde de Chasteller was lonely, proud, and shy.

Bathilde was an aristocrat, Lucien a commoner. As their love grew, they were both troubled. Bathilde felt that a marriage was impossible, and Lucien hesitated to try to make her his mistress. Unhappy much of the time, they were together so much that gossip soon spread. At a dinner at a country tavern, The Green Huntsman, they came to an open confession of their love.

The aristocratic young men were much displeased. They were afraid that Lucien, a commoner, would marry the rich Bathilde and take her away. Some of the more hot-headed ones proposed to challenge Lucien to a duel. Scheming Dr. du Poirier guaranteed to rid them of the hated Lucien.

Bathilde, ill for days, was under the treatment of Dr. du Poirier, and Lucien had been given permission to visit her. As he waited in the hall, the doctor brought a baby in swaddling clothes from Bathilde's chamber. From a conversation Lucien understood that Bathilde's illness had been a confinement. Sure that the lieutenant-colonel was the father, Lucien obtained leave and left Nancy.

In Paris, through his father, he secured his release from the army. Then, through his father's influence, he obtained a post as Master of Petitions in the Ministry of the Interior. Although he could not forget lovely Bathilde, Lucien threw himself into politics and soon was a valuable aid to the minister. At first he had little idea of the trickery so common in high office, but his knowledge grew rapidly. The minister had speculated successfully with money borrowed from M. Leuwen. When there was some danger the transaction would come to light, Lucien managed to hide all traces of the affair.

Another incident added to his standing. The government hired agents provocateurs to harass the military. One agent made the mistake of trying to intimidate a sentry, who shot him in the abdomen. Gravely wounded, the agent was taken to a hospital. Afraid that he would make a deathbed statement as to who had employed him, a government spy tried to induce a doctor to poison the wounded man. When the doctor objected, the minister gave Lucien the job of hushing up the scandal. Lucien succeeded in bribing the dying man and his wife so that they both maintained silence.

Lucien was sent to Caen to try to influence an election. On the way he was set upon by a mob and spattered with mud. Heartsick at the way people reacted to the corrupt government, he nevertheless did his best. By paying a hundred thousand francs to bribe the legitimist party, he almost prevented the election of a favored candidate.

The minister showed his displeasure by passing over Lucien on the honors list. Not willing to have his son slighted, M. Leuwen went into politics himself and became a deputy. With his wealth and charm, he soon was powerful enough to dictate who should be in the cabinet. He arranged to have the fatuous Grandet made a minister if his beautiful and ambitious wife would become Lucien's mistress. Madame Grandet accepted the proposition and soon fell really in love with Lucien.

M. Leuwen made the mistake of revealing the bargain to Lucien, who thought he had won by his own merit the most beautiful woman in Paris. He was greatly upset and even thought himself unfaithful to his lost Bathilde. Taking leave from the ministry, he left for a stay in the country.

M. Leuwen died suddenly, leaving his affairs in bad state. Lucien, insisting on paying all creditors in full, saved only a modest income for his mother and himself. He got an appointment to the embassy at Capel. He was happy in his new post, and felt only a faint melancholy for Bathilde.

THE LUSIAD

Author: Luis Vaz de Camoëns (1524?-1580)

Type of plot: Epic

Time of plot: Fifteenth century

Locale: Europe, Africa, and Asia

First published: 1572

Principal characters:

VASCO DA GAMA, Portuguese sea captain and explorer

VENUS, goddess of love, patroness of the Portuguese

BACCHUS, god of revelry, patron of Asia

Critique:

Descended from an ancient Galician family, Camoëns was distantly related to the hero of his epic narrative. In addition, the author had covered part of Vasco da Gama's route when he went to the Orient as an agent of the crown. On his return trip from Macao Camoëns was shipwrecked, saving nothing but a faithful Javanese slave and the manuscripts of The Lusiad. The poem was, like all great epics, the product of a man of action during a period of great national activity, at a time when the national spirit of Portugal had reached a high point. In the epic tradition, the poem finds the gods of Olympus siding for and against the Portuguese heroes; there is a descent into the underworld of Neptune. The "famous weapon" in this poem is the Portuguese ships' cannon. All of the other hallmarks of the epic are present, too, for those who would seek them.

The Story:

The gods and goddesses, called together by Jove, assembled on Olympus. When they had taken their places, Jove announced to them that the Fates had decreed that the men of Lusitania, or Portugal, should outdo all the great conquerors of ancient times by sailing around Africa to Asia, there to become the rulers of a new continent. Of all the assembled pantheon only Bacchus, who looked upon Asia as his own, dissented. Venus, friendly toward the Portuguese, however, took their side, aided by Mars.

Vasco da Gama was the captain chosen to head the voyage of exploration. Having sailed southward to the Cape of Good Hope, the Portuguese ships made their way around it and then sailed northward along the African coast, until they arrived at the island of Mozambique. The natives of that island pretended friendliness but tried to ambush the sailors when they put ashore for water; fortunately, the Portuguese escaped. Leaving the island behind, da Gama sailed northward along the African coast in search of India. He tried to land on another coast but there, too, the natives were unfriendly. When they tried to lay an ambush, Venus interceded on behalf of da Gama and his men.

Guided by Mercury, da Gama set sail for a point still farther north. Arriving off Mombassa, the Portuguese ships dropped sails and anchors. The Moorish King of Mombassa made the Portuguese welcome to his domain, as Jove had told Venus he would, and gave the men of Portugal needed supplies. While paying a visit to da Gama's ship, he asked the Portuguese leader to tell him about Portugal's history and the history of the voyage thus far. Da Gama was only too glad to give an account of his long and troublesome voyage and to tell of his nation's history.

Da Gama told the king where Portugal lay on the map of Europe and related how the Moors had at one time overrun the land. He described the great battles of Portuguese kings against the Moors: how the first Alphonso had first pushed the Moors back toward the shores of the Mediterranean and how his grandson, also named Alphonso, had continued the wars against the Moors and defeated with a small army five hosts of Moors under five Moorish kings. The second Alphonso was succeeded by Sancho, who, continuing the wars against the Moors, drove them from Europe and then fought against them in the Holy Land. Da Gama also told of the wars between the Spanish kings and the descendants of the great Alphonso.

After ending his narrative of the martial history of Portugal, da Gama described his own adventures since leaving the mouth of the Tagus River. He told how his ships had sailed past the Canary Islands, past the Hesperides, and past the mouth of the mighty Congo. He told the king of the strange waterspouts they had seen, the terrible storms they had endured, and the awesome sea creatures they had met. He related how they had tried to make friends of the black people of the African coast by giving them odd knickknacks and how the blacks in return had tried to kill them after pretending friendship. Da Gama told of the experiences of one of his men, Veloso, who had wandered too far inland and had almost been killed by blacks, and how Veloso had claimed that he returned quickly only because he thought the ships in danger.

Da Gama also narrated his adventure with the spirit of the Cape of Good Hope. The spirit appeared to the Portuguese as his ships sighted the cape and told them that they were the first men to sail in those waters. In return for their daring, the spirit prophesied, some of them would have to die, and that many of these men who followed them would also die for venturing so far into strange lands. The spirit told da Gama that he was one of the Titans who had fought against Jove and that his name had been Adamastor. The Titan had pursued a nymph, a chase which ended when divine wrath changed him into a range of mountains forming the cape at Africa's foot.

Da Gama next told of the plague which had struck his crew, of the shortage of drinking water, of the loss of necessary food through spoilage. He also told of battles and ambushes in which the Portuguese fought with unfriendly natives of the east African coast.

After hearing his account of Portuguese history and da Gama's fabulous voyage, the king thought he could not do enough to show his friendliness toward the great men who represented Portugal. The Mombassans sent a pilot to da Gama and also the provisions and water necessary for a voyage across the Indian Ocean to the city of Calcutta.

Bacchus, meanwhile, was furious at the success of da Gama and his ships. Determined to prevent Asia from falling into the hands of the Portuguese, Bacchus went into the depths of the sea to the court of Neptune, there to seek the aid of the sea god. He told Neptune that the men of Portugal were despoiling his kingdom and that the Portuguese spoke of the ruler of the sea only in terms of insolence. Neptune, angered at the report, sent storms to destroy their ships, but Venus interceded once more on behalf of the Portuguese and saved them from the storms unleashed by Neptune.

The Portuguese, arriving on the Indian coast, landed on the shore near Calcutta. One of the first to meet the men of Portugal was a Mohammedan who was glad to see them because he himself was from the northwestern part of Africa. He sent word to the Emperor of Malabar, informing him of the white strangers and of the distance they had traveled. The emperor quickly gave audience to da Gama, who told the ruler that he wished to trade for products of the eastern lands. Arrangements went forward to exchange Portuguese goods for spices and other products of India. The Mohammedan peoples in India became aroused and tried to bribe the king's council to halt the trading. Failing in that plan, they tried to delay da Gama's departure, for they hoped to destroy the Portuguese ships in battle with a fleet sailing from Arabia. Da Gama outwitted his enemies, however, and set out on the return voyage before the Arabian fleet had arrived.

As the Portuguese ships sailed westward toward home, Venus moved an island into their path. Needing a rest from their travels, da Gama and his men anchored off the island and went ashore. There, under the guidance of Venus, nymphs charmed away the hours for the sailors, and the goddess herself took da Gama to a castle high on a hill and showed him a vision of the future in which he saw later Portuguese—Albuquerque, Sampaio, Noronia, and others—completing the conquest of Asia for their king and nation.

LYSISTRATA

Author: Aristophanes (c. 448-385 B.C.)

Type of plot: Utopian comedy

Time of plot: Fifth century B.C.

Locale: Athens

First presented: 411 B.C.

Principal characters:

LYSISTRATA, an Athenian woman
CLEONICE, her friend
LAMPITO, a Spartan woman
MYRRHINÉ, a Greek woman
A MAGISTRATE
CINESIAS, a Greek husband
OLD MEN OF ATHENS, the Chorus

Critique:

The basic assumption on which the Lysistrata is based is highly comic; indeed, Aristophanes reveals, in the very weakness of the average woman in the play, his knowledge that the supposition was not only comic but also impossible. Yet the assumption that women, by concerted determination not to lie with their men, could effect peace and government reform is not entirely comic. This idea was probably an ancient one even in the time of Aristophanes, but he was able to blend the alarming logic and the delightful illogic of it to produce an amusing if somewhat bawdily skeptical work of art. Lysistrata herself is the archetype of the militant feminist, the woman who has managed through the ages to keep alive the war of the sexes.

The Story:

The Second Peloponnesian War was in progress when Lysistrata, an Athenian woman, summoned women from Athens, Sparta, and all other Greek cities involved in the war. She wished to have them consider her carefully thought out plan for ending hostilities between Athens and Sparta. The women arrived one by one, curious about the purpose of the meeting. Since their husbands were all away at war, they looked with enthusiasm for any scheme which would bring their men back to them.

Lysistrata declared that the war would end immediately if all the Greek women refrained, from that time on, until the fighting stopped, from lying with their husbands. This suggestion took the women by complete surprise, and they objected strenuously. But Lampito, a Spartan woman, liked the idea. Although the others finally agreed to try the plan, they did so without enthusiasm.

Over a bowl of Thracian wine, Lysistrata led her companions in an oath binding them to charm their husbands and their lovers, but not to lie with them unless forced. Some of the women returned to their native lands to begin their continent lives. Lysistrata went to the Acropolis, citadel of Athens.

While the younger women had been meeting with Lysistrata, the older women had marched upon the Acropolis and seized it. The old men of the city laid wood around the base of the Acropolis and set fire to it with the intention of smoking out the women, who, in turn, threatened the old men with pots of water. During an exchange of scurrilous vituperation the women threw water on their opponents.

When a magistrate and his men attempted to break open a gate of the citadel, Lysistrata, now in command, emerged and suggested that the magistrate use common sense. When the indignant magistrate ordered his Scythians to seize Lysistrata and bind her hands, the Scythians advanced reluctantly and were soundly trounced by the fierce defenders.

Asked why they had seized the Acropolis, the women replied that they had done so in order to possess the treasury. Since they now controlled the money, and since it took money to wage war, they believed that the war must soon end.

The male pride of the old men was deeply wounded when Lysistrata declared that the women had assumed all civil authority and would henceforth provide for the safety and welfare of Athens. The magistrate could not believe his ears when he heard Lysistrata say that the women, tired of being home-bodies, were impatient with the incompetence of their husbands in matters which concerned the commonweal. For rebuking the women, the magistrate received pofuls of water poured on his head. The ineffectual old men declared that they would never submit to the tyranny of women. The women answered that the old men were worthless, that all they could do was to legislate the city into trouble.

Despite their brave talk and their bold plan, however, the women proved to be weak in the flesh, and disaffection thinned their ranks. Some, caught as they deserted, offered various excuses in the hope of getting away from the strictures imposed by Lysistrata's oath. One woman simulated pregnancy by placing the sacred helmet of Athena under her robe. Some of the women claimed to be frightened by the holy snakes and by the owls of the Acropolis. As a last desperate measure, Lysistrata resorted to a prophecy, which was favorable to their project, and the women returned reluctantly to their posts.

When Cinesias, the husband of Myrrhiné, one of Lysistrata's companions, returned from the war and sought his wife, Lysistrata directed Myrrhiné to be true to her oath. Begging Myrrhiné to come home, Cinesias used various appeals, without success. Although Myrrhiné consented to his request for a moment of dalliance with her, she put him off with trifling excuses. At last, in spite of his pleas, she retired into the citadel.

A messenger arrived from Sparta, where Lampito and her cohorts had been successful, and declared that the men of Sparta were prepared to sue for peace. As the magistrate arranged for a peace conference, the women looked once more upon the old men of Athens with a kindness that cooled the ire of the indignant old fellows.

On their arrival in Athens, the Spartan envoys were obviously in need of the favors of their wives. Indeed, so desperate were they that they were ready to agree to any terms. Lysistrata rebuked the Spartans and the Athenians for warring upon each other; they had, she declared, a common enemy in the barbarians, and they shared many traditions. While she spoke, a nude maiden, representing the goddess of peace, was brought before the frustrated men. Lysistrata reminded the men of the two countries that they had previously been friends and allies and again insisted that war between the two was illogical. The men, their eyes devouring the nude maiden, agreed absently with everything Lysistrata said, but when she asked for an agreement contention immediately arose because one side asked for conditions unsatisfactory to the other.

The women, seeing that any appeal to reason was futile, feasted the envoys and filled them with intoxicating liquors. Sated, and eager for further physical satisfaction, the men signed a peace agreement and dispersed hastily, with their wives, to their homes.

THE KING OF RHODES

MELANTIUS, a soldier

EVADNE, his sister

AMINTOR, his noble young friend
CALIANAX, a lord of Rhodes
ASPATIA, his daughter, betrothed to Amintor

Critique:

Although The Maid's Tragedy is marred by sentimentality and by improbabilities, it is a tightly constructed play that never falters in its development from beginning to end. The plot was original with Beaumont and Fletcher; it is not surprising, however, since both men were educated playwrights, that scholars have found scenes which echo Shakespeare and Valerius Maximus. Evadne bids fair to become an unforgettable female Machiavellian, but her repentance and her suicide make her, in the end, little more than a shadowy counterpart of Lady Macbeth.

The Story:

Melantius, a military hero, returned to Rhodes from the wars. There he found himself involved in a difficult situation. The King, ostensibly to show his gratitude, had given the hand of Evadne, Melantius' sister, to Amintor, a young courtier and a dear friend of Melantius. The difficulty lay in the fact that Amintor had already promised himself to Aspatia, daughter of Calianax, an old lord.

Preparations were being made for elaborate nuptial festivities. Aspatia grieved. In the royal banqueting hall, just before the presentation of the marriage masque, Melantius encountered Calianax, who insulted him. The King's entrance checked animosities. A masque followed, after which the King, wishing the wedded couple goodnight, asked Amintor to father a boy who would grow up to defend the kingdom.

As Evadne prepared to retire, Aspatia, who was present, could not share the general enthusiastic anticipation of the marriage night, and she expressed her belief that she would soon be dead of a broken heart. Amintor, coming into the apartment received a kiss from Aspatia before she departed. He suffered momentary misgivings for having forsaken her, but he forgot her when he saw Evadne. His bride, as he soon discovered, did not appear to be interested in the consummation of their marriage. In fact, she told Amintor that she hated him and would never share his bed. Threatened by Amintor, she finally confessed that she had already given herself to the King. Amintor was deeply injured when she revealed to him that the marriage was merely a means to make legitimate any children born of that affair. Determined to make the marriage seem to be normal, however, he slept in her bedchamber, on the floor.

Aspatia, meanwhile, returned to her home, where she warned her maids never to trust their hearts to men and recounted classical stories of women who, much to their distress, gave their hearts away. Old Calianax, always a coward at heart, vowed to be valiant in avenging the slight to his daughter.

The next morning Amintor, emerging from the bedchamber, encountered Melantius, whom he puzzled with ambiguous remarks about the virtues of the soldier's family. Later Amintor's assumed manner aroused the King's suspicions; in private he accused Evadne of faithlessness. To prove her steadfastness to the King, she provoked Amintor into revealing that the marriage had not been consummated. Amintor was overcome by the enormity of the way he had been treated, but he refused to draw his sword on the King. Still, he vowed to avenge the insult somehow.

Melantius, meanwhile, pondered on Amintor's peculiar behavior. Dismissing a foolish challenge from Calianax, he encountered Amintor, whom he persuaded to unburden his heart of its troubles. When Amintor revealed that Evadne was the King's mistress, Melantius, incapable of believing Amintor's story, drew his sword and threatened to kill his friend. When Amintor seemed to welcome death, Melantius, convinced, sheathed his sword and swore to avenge his sister's disgrace. But Amintor, who felt that it was he who should do the avenging, challenged Melantius to fight. Melantius refused, calmed the youth, and promised that the two could effect a scheme to right the wrongs done them.

Melantius directed his brother Diphilus to prepare his armor for battle. He also asked Calianax, the castellan of Rhodes, to deliver the garrison to him. The old man, promising permission within the hour, hastened to report the rebellion to the King.

Melantius went to Evadne and confronted her with his knowledge of her transgression. Upon asking her to name her seducer, she pretended to be insulted and suggested that he tend to his military affairs. When Melantius threatened to kill her, she confessed the truth. Then, realizing the extent of her disgrace, she promised Melantius that she would kill the King. She also expressed her remorse to Amintor and begged him for forgiveness. Amintor kissed her and cautioned her never to sin again.

Meanwhile, at a dinner in the palace, Calianax told the King of Melantius' scheme to kill him and to escape to the fortress of Rhodes. The King, doubting, called Amintor into the dining chamber, where with leading questions he tested Amintor and Evadne, as well as Melantius, who accompanied them. Melantius maintained his poise. When the King disclosed his knowledge of the plot, Melantius continued to dissemble and stated that Calianax was an irresponsible, foolish old man. The King was convinced that Melantius was innocent. When Melantius, in asides, importuned Calianax about the fortress, the old man tried to convince the King that Melantius was making overtures under his very eyes, but the ruler suggested that someone put the weak-minded old man to bed. The thoroughly confounded lord submitted reluctantly to Melantius' demands for the fortress.

The night for revenge having come, Diphilus took command of the fortress. Amintor, encountering Melantius, asked his assistance in killing the King. Melantius, fearful lest his plans fail, reminded Amintor that the King's person was sacred.

Evadne, going to the King's bedchamber, tied the sleeping monarch to the bed. Awaking, the King thought at first that his bondage was a pretty joke of Evadne's, but he was filled with apprehension when he saw her draw a knife. Reciting his villainy toward her, she stabbed him to death; then she forgave him.

Soon afterward, the death of the King having been discovered, the King's brother Lysippus and his followers went to the citadel, where Melantius and his people were in control. Melantius affirmed his loyalty to Rhodes, but declared that if he were not given amnesty he could very easily destroy the city. Lysippus and Melantius agreed to a general amnesty.

Meanwhile Aspatia, disguised as a man, entered Amintor's apartment, where she told Amintor that she was Aspatia's long-lost brother, returned to avenge his sister. In her disguise, Aspatia challenged Amintor to a duel. When he refused, she struck him. Goaded to action, Amintor drew and wounded Aspatia.

Evadne, bloody dagger in hand, entered and told Amintor that she had killed the King. When she asked Amintor to recognize her as his wife, he, appalled, refused and left her. Evadne stabbed herself to death. Aspatia, meanwhile, had revived long enough to reveal her true identity to Amintor, who declared his unworthiness and his shame for the way that he had treated her. When Aspatia died, Amintor, having nothing more to live for and wishing to be with his true love, stabbed himself.

Melantius, entering, was so overcome by the sight of his dead sister and his dying friend that he attempted to take his own life. Calianax, upon recognizing his daughter, the dead Aspatia, was reconciled to Melantius. Lysippus, the new ruler, looked upon the scene as an object lesson to kings to be chaste.

THE MAN OF FEELING

Author: Henry Mackenzie (1745-1831)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Mid-eighteenth century

Principal characters:

MR. HARLEY, a very sensitive young Englishman

MISS WALTON, a rich heiress

EDWARDS, a farmer befriended by Harley

MISS ATKINS, a prostitute befriended by Harley

HARLEY'S AUNT

Critique:

In the last half of the eighteenth century the function of the English novel was the study of man and his manners, particularly the emotions and sentiments of a man of great sensibility. Such is the subject matter of Henry Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling. In addition, this novel is a splendid example of the studied formlessness of many late-eighteenth-century novels. In it the reader finds such peculiarities as editorial notes which state that the first fourteen chapters are missing, as well as the addition of so-called "Fragments" at the end of the story. The pretended incompleteness is actually not present, and the entire story is actually told, although in a somewhat disjointed fashion. Like so many of his contemporaries in the field of fiction, Mackenzie filled his novel with the loneliness of the delicate mind, the unhappiness of love beyond one's station, the vainglory of riches, the hardships of the poor, and the glorification of benevolence.

The Story:

One day, in early September, a rural clergyman took hunting with him a friend from town. When they stopped to rest, the friend found some indecipherable initials carved on the bark of a tree. The curate said they were probably the work of a young man named Harley, a former resident of the parish. The clergyman added that he had in his possession a manuscript telling the greater part of Harley's story, a work he thought of no great value, and so he used the papers for wadding in his gun. The manuscript had been found among the possessions of a former parishioner, a friend of Harley's. Upon request, the clergyman gave the bundle of disconnected papers to his friend, who after his return to town pieced together the melancholy story which the rambling narrative unfolded.

Mr. Harley, an orphan reared by a maiden aunt, was descended from a good family among the country gentry in England. Passing years had taken toll of the family's fortunes, however, until he had only a very modest income derived from his small estate by the time he reached manhood. The young man, who was extremely virtuous, did not feel that he needed any more money, but his friends insisted that he could, with very little trouble, secure the use of some adjoining lands belonging to the crown. At his friends' insistence, and because he was very much in love with Miss Walton, an heiress, Harley set out for London to attempt to get a lease to the lands, which would give him a handsome increase to his fortunes in return for a cheap rental.

Once in London, Harley had some amazing adventures, partly because he was willing to believe all people good until he found them bad and partly because he wished to help anyone who needed aid from another human being. These adventures took place over several weeks, for Harley found that the baronet who was to help him in his suit for the lease was not an easy man to see. On the occasion of one visit to see the baronet, Harley met a young man who pretended to be quite a man about town. Harley, who wished to know more about London, spent the evening with the young man, only to learn that the fellow was a former footman who served as a pander for several wealthy men.

A short time later an unnamed friend of Harley's invited him to go with a party to the asylum at Bedlam. There Harley was much affected by the insane, particularly by a young woman who had gone mad after her lover's death; she touched Harley's heart when she cried out that he resembled her dead lover. As the party left the young lady, a gentleman offered to tell Harley about some of the inmates. Harley assented, only to find within a few minutes that his guide was himself a madman who imagined himself to be an Oriental potentate.

A few evenings later Harley went for a walk through the park. While there, he met an elderly gentleman who invited him to partake of a glass of cider at a nearby public house. Harley, impressed by the gentleman's attitude of benevolence to a beggar, agreed. Once in the house, Harley was invited to take a hand in a friendly game of cards, during which the old gentleman and an accomplice swindled the good-hearted Harley out of a substantial sum of money. Leaving the place and still unaware of the swindle, Harley was accosted by a prostitute who begged him for something to eat and drink. Harley, hating to see another human in distress, let himself open to severe criticism by taking the girl, a Miss Atkins, to a brothel where she might get some nourishment. When she poured out a tale of seduction to him, he agreed to help her if he could, and promised to see her the following day.

The next morning he went to see Miss Atkins. She told him she wanted only to return to her father, a retired army officer. Just as she had finished telling her story, her father appeared. He misjudged the scene and almost did violence to Harley and his daughter. A fainting spell on the part of Miss Atkins gave Harley a chance to explain everything to the father, who then forgave his daughter and took her back into his good graces.

Harley's London adventures were cut short by a notice from the baronet that someone else had been granted the crown lands Harley sought. The successful petitioner turned out to be the pander Harley had met at the baronet's house. Discouraged, Harley took a coach to return home.

The coach took Harley to within a day's walk of his home. From there, rather than wait for a public conveyance, the young man set out for his house on foot. On the way he met an elderly soldier, who turned out to be a farmer named Edwards, whom Harley had known as a child. Edwards told Harley how it was he happened to be in the garb he wore. The enclosure acts by Parliament had given Edwards' landlord an excuse to move the farmer and his family from a good farm to a poor one. Bad crops had climaxed the poor man's ill luck, and he and his married son had been forced to become tenants on a tiny, depleted bit of ground. As if that were not enough, a press gang had seized Edwards' son. The only way to secure the younger man's release had been for Edwards himself, an old man, to enter the service in his son's place, after buying off the officials with the little money he had left.

While a soldier in the East Indies,

Edwards had befriended an aged Hindu, who made him a present of some gold. Upon his release from the service, Edwards had returned to England and was now on his way to visit his son. When he and Harley arrived in Edwards' old neighborhood, they found that disaster was still striking at the old fellow, for his son and daughter-in-law had died, leaving two small children. Harley promised the old man a farm on his own estates, and, with the two orphans, Harley and Edwards continued their journey.

Home once more, Harley saw the old gentleman comfortably established on a small farm. But unhappiness soon overtook Harley himself. Miss Walton, with whom he was very much in love, was affianced by her father to a rich man. Harley, although he had never declared his love to Miss Walton or anyone else, was heartbroken. He took to his bed with a severe illness. After many weeks of illness, the doctors and his friends despaired of his life. Miss Walton herself, hearing of his illness, came to visit him, hoping to cheer up the young man, for whom she had a great deal of esteem, more, indeed, than anyone had ever guessed.

A very tearful and touching scene occurred when Miss Walton appeared at Harley's sickbed. Harley, knowing he was near death, told Miss Walton of his love for her. Even though she was promised to another, she told of her love for him, whereupon she fainted and he died. He was buried near his mother, as he had once told his aunt he wished to be. For her part, Miss Walton remained single, preferring not to marry after Harley's death. For many years she was often seen walking or reading near the place where Harley's house had stood.

OLD BELLAIR, Young Bellair's father

EMILIA, in love with Young Bellair

HARRIET WOODVILL, a young countrywoman of fortune who loves Dorimant

SIR FOPLING FLUTTER, a dandy

Critique:

Most critics give Sir George Etherege credit for trying to do for the manners of fashionable London what Molière had done for the manners of fashionable Paris; that is, to portray the follies of the time in such a way as to give some hope of improving them. So true was the picture of the times in The Man of Mode, Or, Sir Fopling Flutter, that the London wits tried to attach the names of real people to the characterizations: Dorimant for Rochester and Sir Fopling Flutter for Mr. Hewitt. That such an attempt was made is assuredly a tribute to the author's capture of the very spirit of the age. Those who would carp at the play for immorality, particularly with respect to the love affairs of Dorimant, must keep in mind the fact that the author portrayed only what he saw in the world about him. One should search the play, not for virtue, but for realism and wit.

The Story:

One morning Dorimant was lounging in his room when an orange-woman made her appearance. In the course of buying some fruit, Dorimant, who had a remarkable reputation as a lover, discovered that a young woman of quality and fortune from the country had fallen in love with him at sight, despite her mother's attempts to keep her daughter away from thoughts of loving any heartless man of the fashionable world. Dorimant, although he was in the process of dropping one mistress, Lady Loveit, and taking on a new one named Bellinda, was interested. Shortly afterward he received his friend Bellair, a fop who was very much in love with a young woman named Emilia and wished to marry her instead of the wealthy bride his father had picked out for him. The father's choice was Harriet, the girl who had been so taken with Dorimant.

To complicate matters for young Bellair, his father had arrived in town to hasten the marriage. Lodging in the same house with Emilia, and not knowing his son's affection for the girl, the old gentleman had fallen in love with her and wished to make her his own bride. Young Bellair, with the help of his aunt, Lady Townley, hoped to win his father's consent to marriage to Emilia.

Meanwhile Lady Loveit, Dorimant's mistress, was beside herself at the neglect she suffered at the hands of her lover. She complained bitterly to Bellinda, not knowing that it was Bellinda who had won the recent attentions of Dorimant and was about to become his mistress. True to his promise to Bellinda, Dorimant came that afternoon and notified Lady Loveit that he was finished with her. His actions frightened Bellinda, although the deed was done at her request.

At Lady Woodvill's lodgings that day, the lady herself was preparing Harriet to meet young Bellair, for Harriet's mother was as anxious for her daughter to marry him as his father was for the match. That Harriet did not wish to marry him made little difference to the mother. When the two young people met, they quickly made their dislike of the match known to one another. Then they proceeded to make a mock love scene for the benefit of the parents, to throw the oldsters off the track.

That same afternoon Bellinda and Dorimant met at the home of Lady Townley. Dorimant made Bellinda promise to have Lady Loveit walk on the Mall that evening so that Dorimant could confront her with Sir Fopling Flutter, a fool of a fop, and accuse her of being unfaithful. As they spoke, Sir Fopling Flutter entered the company and proceeded to demonstrate what a fool he was by the oddities and fooleries of his dress, deportment, and speech.

That evening young Bellair and Harriet went walking on the Mall. There they met Dorimant, who was forced to leave upon the appearance of Harriet's mother. Lady Loveit appeared, tried to make Dorimant jealous by flirting, but only succeeded in bringing Dorimant's reproaches on her head.

Later that same night there was a party at Lady Townley's house. Dorimant was one of the group, under the alias of Courtage, so that Harriet's mother would not realize that he was the gallant who was trying to woo her daughter. Under his false name Dorimant succeeded in ingratiating himself with the mother. Harriet, trying to hide her love and admiration from him, showed that her wit was as sharp as Dorimant's. Sir Fopling Flutter joined the party late and made himself more of a fool in everyone's eyes than he had been before.

By the time the party broke up, it was five o'clock in the morning. Dorimant had to hurry home in order to keep a rendezvous he had made with Bellinda, for she had promised to spend part of the night with him in his rooms. In the morning she was almost caught there, as she was ready to leave, when several of Dorimant's friends appeared. Bellinda escaped by going down the back stairs and stepping into a sedan chair. Her danger was not past, however, for the carriers, accustomed to taking Lady Loveit from Dorimant's house, took Bellinda to the former's lodging. Lady Loveit, still awake, saw Bellinda step from the chair. Only quick wit on the part of Bellinda, who told the men to say they had picked her up elsewhere, prevented her assignation with Dorimant from being known to Lady Loveit. The woman did not suspect that Bellinda was her rival.

A few minutes afterward Dorimant arrived and berated Lady Loveit in high-handed fashion, only to be embarrassed when Bellinda appeared from an adjoining room. He was so discomfited that he could only mutter excuses and leave the house.

Early that morning, at Lady Townley's house, young Bellair and Emilia were married, the bridegroom taking that drastic step before his father could force him into marriage with Harriet. As the ceremony was ending, Lady Woodvill, Harriet, old Bellair, and an attorney arrived. They had come to meet with young Bellair and to sign the marriage contract between the two families. Not knowing what to do, Lady Townley temporarily hid the clergyman in a closet. In the confusion of the moment, Emilia asked Harriet if she were in love with Dorimant. Harriet refused still to admit that she was, saying that she only hated to think of leaving the pleasures of the town to be made a prisoner in the country. At that point, while the others were off in another room to go over the terms of the marriage contract, Dorimant himself arrived. When he confessed his love to Harriet, she admitted also that she was in love with him.

The others then returned. Old Bellair, anxious to have the marriage celebrated, called for a parson. The clergyman, released from the closet, declared that he had already performed one ceremony when he married young Bellair to Emilia. Old Bellair was thunderstruck.

Just then Lady Loveit and Bellinda arrived in pursuit of Dorimant. He made his excuses to Lady Loveit by telling her that he intended to marry Harriet and thus improve his fortunes. Lady Loveit, who knew the value of money, admitted that under the circumstances she could only wish him well. Bellinda was grateful because his excuse concealed her affair with him and kept her honor intact. Lady Woodvill, overhearing the conversation, was furious with Dorimant for capturing Harriet's heart, but when she learned that his intentions were honorable and that he was the same Courtage whom she had admired the evening before, she was mollified to the extent of inviting him to visit the Woodvill estate in Hampshire.

Old Bellair, not to be outdone in graciousness, gave his grudging blessing to his son, who had gone against his will in marrying Emilia. The only person completely dismayed was Lady Loveit, who vowed that she would never again trust a man or go out in society.

MARQUIS DE ST. EUSTACHE, Wednesday
PROFESSOR DE WORMS, Friday

SUNDAY

Critique:

At first the reader takes The Man Who Was Thursday for a pleasant adventure tale, but the allegory soon becomes more evident. The story, a fable in keeping with Catholic thought and idiom, is concerned to point out the place of Sunday as the true Sabbath. Chesterton himself does not try to make the meaning of the allegory explicit and clear; the reader is expected to supply his own interpretation. For those not interested in religious morality, the chief interest of the story lies in the rapid-moving, adventurous plot. Chestertonian puns and epigrams add to the humor of the book.

The Story:

Gregory was in the habit of declaiming his anarchistic views at his pleasant garden parties where his sister acted as hostess. Among the ladies particularly he seemed a thrilling poet, but his anarchism was surely only a pose. By chance Syme visited one of the parties and disagreed thoroughly with Gregory. In Syme's view the real wonder lay in order; anarchists hoped only to shock others—and deceive themselves—by their nihilistic views.

The dispute grew so warm that Gregory invited Syme to see for himself that there were real anarchists who were intent on destroying the world. Syme swore never to tell the authorities in return for Gregory's revelations.

The two took a cab to a slum restaurant. There Syme was surprised to eat an excellent dinner. Then Gregory took him down a subterranean passage lined with firearms to a council room filled with bombs. This room was the meeting place of the group of anarchists to which Gregory belonged. There was to be an election that night, and Gregory was sure that he would be elected to the post of Thursday on the Central Anarchist Council, the inner ring presided over by the redoubtable Sunday.

Before the meeting convened, however, Syme confided that he was really a detective. Gregory was filled with confusion and made a poor speech to the assembly. The members grew suspicious of Gregory's private convictions and elected Syme to act as Thursday on the Council.

Syme had become a detective in an unusual way. One day he met a policeman who had gone to school at Harrow. The policeman said he was one of the new force recruited to combat intellectuals who were out to destroy law and order. Syme, interested, wished to join the new force. He was taken to a pitch-dark room in Scotland Yard, where a man he could not see gave him a job.

Now, as an elected member of the inner council, he was taken down the Thames River on a tug. Landing, he was met at the top of the stairs by the Secretary, who took him to the meeting being held on a balcony in open view. There huge, menacing Sunday was presiding at the banquet table. As Syme surveyed the crowd, he was struck by the crooked grins of the members.

The business at hand was the assassination of the Tsar of Russia and the President of France. The bombing was to be done by the dapper Marquis de St.

THE MAN WHO WAS THURSDAY by Gilbert Keith Chesterton. By permission of the publishers, Dodd, Mead & Co. Copyright, 1908, by Dodd, Mead & Co. Renewed, 1935, by Gilbert Keith Chesterton.

Eustache, called Wednesday. Suddenly Sunday shut off debate and announced that there was a spy present. Bull was appointed to take care of the council's business alone, and Sunday then unmasked Gogol as a police spy. Gogol left hurriedly.

As Syme left the meeting, he was shadowed by the aged Professor de Worms. In spite of his best efforts, de Worms easily kept up with him. Then in a tavern, de Worms told him that he was really a young actor disguised as the professor. He was another police spy.

The two fellow spies resolved to visit Bull, who was apparently the man in charge of plots. In Bull's apartment they persuaded him to take off his dark spectacles. From his kindly eyes they deduced that he was in reality no anarchist; Bull confessed that he too was a police spy.

The three Scotland Yard men decided to cross the Channel and prevent St. Eustache from bombing the tsar and the president. They came upon St. Eustache in a café in Calais. Syme, having decided to insult the Frenchman and provoke him to a duel, tried to pull his nose. The angry man's challenge was accepted. Because the duel was to be fought near a railroad station, Syme thought the place had been chosen so that St. Eustache could board a Paris train immediately afterward. Hoping that St. Eustache would miss the train, Syme did his best to prolong the duel.

St. Eustache grew impatient and offered to end the duel by letting Syme pull his nose. Then, as the train came, St. Eustache pulled off his own nose and removed his wig; he too was a police spy. A menacing masked mob got off the train, led by the Secretary, and gave chase to the men from Scotland Yard. The four confessed spies began to run.

The chase was a mad one. The pursued used horses and a car to seek safety with the police, but the well-disciplined mob kept up with them. At last the spies were crowded onto a pier. Arrayed against them was the mob, firing rifles and pistols. To their horror they saw the police also lined up against them with their enemies.

But, as matters turned out, the Secretary was still another Scotland Yard man, attempting to capture the others because he wanted to thwart the bombing. The five returned to London, where they picked up Gogol. They were determined to confront Sunday, the leader.

When they found him, Sunday began to run with surprising speed and grace. He used several hansom cabs and a fire engine in his flight, and he even commandeered an elephant from the zoo. On the outskirts of London he jumped into the basket of a balloon and floated out of their reach.

The six spies pursued Sunday in spite of the rough countryside. When his balloon came to earth, they thought they had overtaken him at last. A servant met them, however, and showed them to a carriage. They were taken to a nearby castle and royally received. A valet laid out costumes for them symbolizing the days of the week. Syme was given a gown embellished with a sun and a moon, for according to Genesis the Lord created the sun and the moon on Thursday.

They learned that Sunday had been the Scotland Yard official who had employed them all. By now the huge Sunday seemed beneficent. At a party in the garden the councilors were seated on thrones. Sunday was gowned in pure white, symbolizing the sanctity of the Sabbath. He lectured them on the Sabbath as a holy day; they should use it to gather strength and comfort for the week's work. When Gregory came to the party he was denounced as the real enemy—he was an intellectual anarchist.

MANFRED

Author: George Gordon, Lord Byron (1788-1824)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Locale: The Alps

First published: 1817

Principal characters:

MANFRED, a lonely, guilt-haunted magician

A CHAMOIS HUNTER

THE ABBOT OF ST. MAURICE

Critique:

Manfred is Byron's first great poem of revolt, and readers familiar with the poet's life will find in Manfred an embodiment of the autobiographical urge which prompted much of Byron's poetry. The rationalization of his social ostracism, his failure to cope with the outraged virtue of English society, and, more directly, his disturbance at being separated from Augusta Leigh lay behind his romantic brooding in this particular poem. There are parallels between Manfred and Goethe's Faust: the wild mountain scenery, the ability of a man of learning to summon other-world spirits, the symbolic adventures of the hero, and the philosophical references. Only in the end is Manfred unlike Faust. Because he has not contracted with evil, he dies free of hell's power. If one can separate the poem from its author, Manfred becomes a study of an isolated individual who cannot seek deliverance from any external social machinery, but who must work out his own destiny.

The Story:

Alone in a Gothic gallery at midnight, Manfred meditated deeply about his life. He had undergone many experiences, but none had profoundly affected him. When he called upon the spirits of the universe to appear before him, none came. Three times he summoned them. At the third call, a summons in the name of his own cursed soul, the spirits arose.

The first was the Spirit of Air. The Spirit of Interior Fire next appeared, followed by the Spirit of Ocean. The spirits of Earth, Exterior Fire, and Night arose in succession, each demanding to know what the mortal magician wished. Finally the star, Manfred's own star of ill-fated destiny, joined the spirits.

Manfred's reply was that he desired forgetfulness. When the Spirit of Air sought further explanation, Manfred could not reveal what he wanted to forget. Surely, he insisted, spirits that controlled earth, sky, water, mountains, winds, night, and destiny, could bring the oblivion he sought. But the spirits replied that they had no powers beyond their own realms. When Manfred, failing in his hopes, asked the spirits to take bodily forms, the seventh spirit, the star of his destiny, took the shape of a beautiful woman. At sight of her Manfred, hinting at a former love, attempted to hold her, but she vanished, leaving him senseless. In her place came a formless voice, the voice of himself as a magician, uttering a long incantation, mysterious and despairing.

Next morning, alone on a cliff of the Jungfrau Mountain, Manfred mourned the failure of his magic powers to assist him. Marveling at the surrounding beauty of the mountain, he weighed the possibility of leaping from the cliff. A passing hunter saw the lonely man and wondered what Manfred was doing so high on the mountain, where even the best hunters could not climb. Fearing that Manfred would lose his footing when the morning mist arose, the hunter approached him cautiously, for Manfred appeared to be tottering. Actually Manfred was about to jump when the hunter caught hold of him and led him down the steep slope.

In his cottage in the Bernese Alps, the hunter urged Manfred to rest a while before journeying on. Manfred, refusing guidance, declared that he would go on alone. When the hunter offered Manfred his best wine, Manfred exclaimed in horror that he saw blood, symbolic of Manfred's alienation from social contact, on the rim of the cup. The hunter, thinking Manfred mad, suggested that the wretched man seek comfort in contemplation and in the Church. Manfred, spurning the suggestion, said that he wished he were mad, for then his mind would be tortured by unrealities instead of the truths which now beset him. He envied the hunter's simple life, but when the hunter, noting Manfred's high-born appearance, wonderingly asked if his guest would then wish to change stations in life, Manfred replied that he would not wish any human to suffer his own wretchedness. To this the hunter said that surely a man capable of such tenderness could not harbor a soul belabored by evil. Manfred, departing, protested that the evil was not within himself; he had destroyed those whom he loved.

Below, the Witch of the Alps answered Manfred's summons that she share the loveliness of nature with him. To her he described his past spiritual life, when he had lived among men but not with them. Preferring solitude, he had studied ancient mysteries and had loved and destroyed with love a woman said to have resembled him. The Witch promised to aid him if he would swear obedience to her, but he refused her offer and she left him.

The three destinies and Nemesis gathered for a festival in the Hall of Arimanes, Spirit of Evil, Prince of Earth and Air. Manfred, daring to approach, was recognized as a magician. He told them he had come in quest of Astarte, the symbol of his sin. When she had been summoned from her tomb, she prophesied only that the next day would end his despair.

Back in his castle, Manfred felt a sublime calm. The Abbot of St. Maurice, having heard that Manfred had practiced witchcraft, arrived to save his soul. To Manfred's bitter assurance that his sins lay between heaven and himself, the abbot urged that Manfred turn to the Church for help. Manfred explained that he had always lived alone and would remain alone. The abbot mourned that he could not help such a noble man.

While the servants gossiped about their master's strange behavior, Manfred stood alone in his tower. There the abbot came once more in a last vain attempt to save Manfred. Warned that a dangerous spirit was approaching, the abbot insisted that he would confront the spirit, who had come to summon Manfred. Manfred, however, defied the summons; he was willing to die but not to join the spirits of hell, to whom he owed nothing.

As the demon disappeared, Manfred died, still lonely and unconquerable to all but death itself.

Critique:

Mardi and a Voyage Thither was Herman Melville's answer to those people who refused to believe that his first two travel books—Omoo and Typee—were anything but sailor's yarns that Melville had spun for the credulous. Actually, those books were based on Melville's own adventures in the South Seas. In this book, a true romance, he thought he might make people take fiction for fact, since they had been so obstinate in taking fact for fiction in earlier volumes. The second part of Mardi, the account of a mystical voyage through the world, is so filled with symbols that one finds it difficult to state what much of the symbolism means. Obviously the moral teaching of the novel is that one should avoid the vanity of human wishes—a message painted in such vivid colors that one loses sight of the didacticism. The characters, most of them supposedly Polynesian, discuss for Melville almost every topic thought of, from a belief in the hereafter for whales to Spanish customs and manners.

The Story:

The Narrator of the story, a young American sailor, was picked up at Ravavai, a Pacific island, by a whaling vessel, the Arcturion. The voyage of the Arcturion was not a successful one, and when the ship began to head for the cold climate of the Bay of Kamchatka, the young Narrator and his special friend in the fore-castle, Jarl, decided to leave the ship. Knowing the captain would not land them anywhere, they provisioned a small boat and in it escaped from the ship under cover of darkness.

Heading westward, the two men hoped to reach some hospitable islands. After sailing for many days they came upon a drifting ship that seemed to be a derelict. Finding it in fairly seaworthy condition, they boarded it. The following morning a native man and woman were found in the rigging, where they had hidden from the Narrator and Jarl. With the help of the natives, who had escaped with the ship from an unfriendly tribe of islanders after the latter had killed the ship's crew, the Narrator and Jarl continued their voyage in search of land.

After many days of voyaging the vessel was becalmed. In the storm which followed, the vessel was wrecked. Jarl and the Narrator, with the native man, Samoa, set out in a little whaleboat. The native woman had been killed during the storm.

Many days later they saw a sail in the distance. Taking up their oars to aid the force of the sail, they slowly closed in on the craft they had spotted. As they drew close, they saw it was a strange arrangement of two native canoes with a platform built over them. After some discussion between the native priest in charge of the craft and the Narrator, the sailor and Samoa boarded the native vessel. Once aboard the craft, they discovered a beautiful blonde girl, but they had to force a passage through the natives in order to regain the whaleboat. In the scuffle they took two of the natives prisoners. From the natives they learned that the blonde girl was the priest's prisoner. Going back aboard the native craft, the sailor and Samoa rescued the girl and escaped with her from the natives.

The girl, whose name was Yillah, wished to return to her native islands. The Narrator soon fell in love with her, and the girl, in native fashion, returned his affection. The Narrator then decided that he would remain with her on her island home.

Sighting a group of islands at last, the party headed for the nearest beach. Before they reached the shore, however, natives swam out to the whaleboat and gave them an excited welcome. Towing the boat into shallow water, the natives picked it up and carried it ashore on their shoulders. The visitors were completely puzzled by their reception until they learned that the Narrator had been mistaken for the natives' god, Taji, who, according to an ancient prophecy, would one day revisit them in human form. The natives also thought that the other three occupants of the whaleboat were semi-deities whom Taji had brought from another world for companionship.

Media, king of the atoll, made the guests welcome, and Taji, as the Narrator was now called, decided to make the best of his position, as long as his godhood put him under no particular constraints. He and Yillah, housed in a splendid grass house, lived a life of tranquil happiness, doing no more than the islanders, who in their turn had little to do to make life comfortable. Then, suddenly, unhappiness struck the island and Taji. He awoke one morning to find Yillah gone without a trace.

Within a few days of Yillah's disappearance, Taji received a visit from a portentously disguised messenger, who gave the young sailor a set of flower symbols from Queen Hautia, the dark queen of a group of distant islands.

The natives interpreted the flower symbols from Hautia to mean that the queen loved Taji, wished his presence, and bade him not look for Yillah, his lost love. Not to be dissuaded, however, Taji, accompanied by King Media and a party of his courtiers, including Yoomy the poet-singer and Babbalanja the philosopher, set sail in a huge, ornate native canoe in search of Yillah.

Before the voyagers had journeyed far on the ocean they met a black canoe containing more emissaries sent to Taji from Queen Hautia. The messengers, again using flower symbols interpreted by Yoomy, bade Taji forget his quest of the fair love and turn his canoe toward the kingdom of Hautia. Taji refused and continued on his quest.

His first stop was on the island of Juam, where Taji made a friend of King Donjalolo, a monarch who tried to escape reality by moving from one bower to another in his island kingdom and by taking no heed of anyone's happiness but his own and that of people who were in his company. Donjalolo aided Taji in his quest by sending messages throughout his island kingdom to ask for news of Yillah. After the petty princes had come to Donjalolo's court to report that they knew nothing of the girl, Taji decided to set out once more in the canoe, in the company of Media and his courtiers, to continue his search for his lost love. Again, this time in more menacing fashion, he was accosted at sea by a canoe-load of emissaries from Queen Hautia, who demanded that he go to her immediately. Again Taji refused.

After many days and nights, during which Taji and his companions had lengthy conversations on many branches of knowledge and philosophy, they touched at an island where they visited the temple of Oro and learned of the Polynesian prophet, Alma, who had many years before, according to legend, brought peace, serenity, and love to the islands.

Continuing their voyage through the archipelago of Mardi, representing the world and all its ideas, Taji and his party visited Vivenza, modeled on the United States, passed the Cape of Capes, saw many other islands, regaled one another with many philosophical conversations during the long hours at sea, and were finally becalmed. After the calm a death-cloud passed them. Following that adventure they landed at Serenia, a land which proved too quiet and too good for them.

At last the only place left to look for Yillah, who had not been found on any one of the many atolls Taji and his companions had visited, was the bower of Queen Hautia herself. Babbalanja the philosopher, who remained in Serenia, told Taji he would never find the unattainable Yillah, but Taji went on until three emissaries from Queen Hautia met him and guided him to her land. Taji found himself entranced by Hautia, who seemed in some strange way connected with Yillah, though she invited him to sin. But still he asked in vain for word of Yillah. He was left in that land by the companions of his travels.

MARIA CHAPDELAINE

Author: Louis Hémon (1880-1913)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Northern Quebec

First published: 1916

Principal characters:

MARIA CHAPDELAINE, a French-Canadian farm girl

SAMUEL CHAPDELAINE, her father

MRS. CHAPDELAINE, her mother

FRANÇOIS PARADIS, a trapper

EUTROPE GAGNON, a farmer-pioneer

LORENZO SURPRENANT, a factory worker

Critique:

This novel is, in part, autobiographical. Hémon, born, reared, and educated in France, emigrated to the Canadian Lake St. John country in 1912. There he worked as a laborer for eight dollars a month on a farm near Péribonka, the village which is named in Maria Chapdelaine and which forms part of the background of the novel. On a neighboring farm lived a young woman, Eva Bouchard, who became the heroine of Hémon's novel. Maria Chapdelaine's parents were modeled on Samuel Bedard and his wife, the owners of the farm on which Hémon was employed. The novel had astounding success during the early 1920's, although the author, killed by a train shortly after posting the manuscript, did not live to see that success. As a result of the popularity of this novel, a search was made of Hémon's manuscripts and four other volumes were published.

The Story:

Maria Chapdelaine was a French-Canadian girl whose family lived in the northern part of Quebec province near Lake St. John, a country to which spring came very late in the year and the winters, always severe, came too soon. Maria's father, Samuel Chapdelaine, had moved his family several times to new locations in the north country. Each time he hoped to get away from neighbors and civilization, for he was a man who took great delight in the hard work of clearing land from the wilderness but disliked to farm that land after it had been won.

When she was in her late teens, Maria Chapdelaine was sent to spend part of one winter with relatives in town. Her father met her on her return to Péribonka, the settlement nearest to the farm, and they stayed in the village overnight in order to attend church before leaving for their home in the wilderness. At church they met François Paradis, a young man who had lived near the Chapdelaines in another location some years before. Young François Paradis instantly fell in love with Maria and promised to visit the family on his way into the back country to trade for furs with the Indians.

The following summer was one of hard work for the entire Chapdelaine family. The women, including Maria, had their part in putting away food for the winter and taking care of the men's needs as they reclaimed farmland from the forest by cutting away the trees and underbrush and removing the stumps that were left. The first break in the difficult and tedious work came near the end of July, when the blueberries ripened. At that time everyone stopped work to go on a berry-picking expedition.

The night before the berry-picking, François Paradis arrived at the Chapdelaine cabin. The next day he and Maria wandered off from the rest of the berry-pickers. After they had filled their large pails with berries, they sat down to rest. François, in an offhand manner that betrayed the emotion he felt, asked Maria to marry him the following year. He told her that he would be back to visit her once again before going off into the woods to act as foreman of a logging crew during the winter.

The summer passed with all the hard work attendant on carving a farm from the Canadian forests. Before long the winds of winter began to blow, and soon afterward deep snow fell. François Paradis went to the logging camps, as did many of the men, including the two oldest brothers of Maria Chapdelaine.

In the meantime two other suitors for Maria's hand presented themselves. Eutrope Gagnon was a hardworking young man who, like Maria's father, was trying to hew a farm from the wilderness. The other, Lorenzo Surprenant, was a young French-Canadian who had emigrated to the United States to work in a factory. The first of the suitors said very little, knowing he had small chance against François Paradis. The second talked a great deal about the easier life in cities of the United States far to the south. Maria barely listened to his wily talk.

Shortly after Christmas, word came of the tragic death of François Paradis. Leaving the lumber camp to visit Maria and her family during the holidays, he had arrived at a railroad line only to learn that trains were not running. He then set out on foot across barren wastes and forests to reach the Chapdelaine farmstead, but he had lost his way and died of exposure. Maria was greatly saddened by his death, even though their engagement had been only between themselves and no word had been given to her parents or the parish priest. Because of her grief, her father was forced to take her to the village to get advice from the priest. After talking to him, Maria seemed outwardly composed.

The following summer was a bad one for the district, including the Chapdelaine family. Spring came late, drought occurred during the summer, and the snows of winter came several weeks early. Everyone, including Maria, began to wonder if life were worth the struggle against the elements in northern Quebec.

During the second winter, Gagnon and Surprenant still spoke to Maria about marriage, and she, apathetically, listened to them. Gagnon said much less than the other suitor, for he knew that if Maria married him she would merely exchange the hard life on her father's farm for a similar life on his farm. But Surprenant spoke glowingly of life in the Massachusetts city in which he worked and told how much easier urban life in a warmer climate was than rural life in the far north. Maria heard him patiently and with some interest, for the northern wilderness which had swallowed François Paradis had become an enemy to her.

At Christmas time Surprenant made a special trip north to see Maria and to tell her once more how much happier she could be. Almost, but not quite, Maria made up her mind to accept his offer of marriage and leave the wilderness. For Gagnon she had few words; she felt that there was little he had to offer.

Soon after Christmas, Maria's mother fell ill, and nothing the family could do for her seemed to help. At last Samuel Chapdelaine decided to brave the wintry storms to get a doctor. He was successful in reaching the settlement, but when the doctor arrived and examined Mrs. Chapdelaine, he could find nothing to help her, and he advised that they send for the priest. While Chapdelaine went for the priest, the rest of the family decided to call in a skillful bonesetter in whom they had great faith. He, like the doctor, told them he knew of nothing to help the ailing woman. The priest finally arrived and administered the last rites of the Church to Mrs. Chapdelaine, who died soon afterward.

Sitting up with the corpse, to keep her father company during the long hours of night, Maria listened to her father's stories of the aid her mother had given him during his long struggle to carve first one farm and then another from the wilderness. Maria, listening avidly, finally resolved that she, like her mother, could stand the hardships of wilderness life. When Eutrope Gagnon again spoke of marriage, telling her how he could work in the lumber camps for a winter to earn the money needed to set up housekeeping, Maria agreed that she would wait and marry him when he returned.

MARIA MAGDALENA

Author: Friedrich Hebbel (1813-1863)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Germany

First presented: 1844

Principal characters:

ANTHONY, a cabinetmaker

ANTHONY'S WIFE

CLARA, his daughter

KARL, his son

LEONARD, Clara's fiancé

THE SECRETARY, a second suitor for Clara's hand

Critique:

Friedrich Hebbel was a playwright and literary critic who has only in recent years been recognized for his important place in the literature of his country. Of his literary work, his dramas are the most important, and this play is generally considered one of his best. In his plays, as in Shakespeare's, we find the tragedy of man as an individual. The consequences that befall his characters are a result of the incurable defects in humans, rather than the results of evils in an entire society. In Maria Magdalena, however, we find the tragedy of the individual fused with a new type of realism that was new to all literature of the time and especially the drama. There is an abundance of the details of everyday life in a lower middle-class German household under older family traditions of Germanic culture. The play anticipates the later realism of Ibsen.

The Story:

After a long illness, from which she was not expected to recover, Anthony's wife, a woman in her fifties, felt that she had been given another chance to make herself worthy of heaven. To show her gratitude for another chance, she dressed herself in her wedding gown, which was also to be her shroud, and went to church the first Sunday morning she was able. Before she went, she and her daughter Clara had a heart-to-heart talk, during which the mother disclosed her fears about her son Karl, who spent too much time drinking and playing, and not enough time working steadily. The mother felt that his attitudes and his conduct were her fault, but still she refused to believe he was really a bad young man.

The mother and Clara also discussed Clara's fiancé, a young clerk named Leonard, who had only a little money and very poor prospects. The mother told Clara that she hoped the girl could find a better man. Shortly after the mother left for church, Leonard came to see Clara and explained that he had not seen her for two weeks for a particular reason. During that time he had been attentive to the mayor's daughter in an effort to get himself a job as clerk for the city.

Leonard also accused her of being in love with another man, even though a very short time before Clara had given herself to Leonard in order to prove her love. After they had straightened out the situation, Leonard told Clara he had come to ask her father for her hand in marriage. Clara assured him that they must soon be married, unless her sin were to show. Even so, she had some misgivings about him when she learned of the chicanery he had executed in securing his position as town clerk.

Her father, when he learned of the proposed marriage and Leonard's prospects, seemed agreeable to the marriage. Then the young man, knowing that old Anthony had a large sum of money out at interest, brought up the question of a dowry. He was surprised to learn, however, that Anthony had called in his money and paid it to help an old man who had befriended him in his youth. When the man had died, Anthony refused to collect from the widow and put the dead man's note in his casket. Leonard began to think that, pregnancy or no, Clara was not a desirable wife for him.

At that time the mother came home from church and told of having seen a newly prepared grave at the churchyard, a grave the sexton dug as an extra, in case they were needed while he was on a holiday. Old Anthony viewed it as an evil omen. Then the talk turned to a jewel robbery at the home of a rich merchant in town. Anthony recalled that his worthless son Karl had done some work at the house on the day of the robbery. Hardly had he said so when bailiffs knocked at the door and demanded permission to search the house for the stolen goods. The shock was so great that the mother swooned and died. Leonard, who was already none too eager to marry Clara, seized upon the charge as an excuse to break his betrothal to the girl.

As the days passed Anthony's house was a place of wretchedness. All evidence seemed to point to Karl's guilt in the matter of the theft, even though the jewels were not discovered in the house. And Anthony began to suspect that Clara had strayed from the paths of virtue. He told her that he wished he had the courage to kill himself, now that everyone in the town was sneering at him for rearing such terrible children. Clara, not wanting to be the cause of her father's death, decided to commit suicide before her father could do away with himself. One day, while Anthony was away visiting a deaf old woodcutter who had not heard of his family's disgrace, the rich merchant appeared at the house with word that Karl was not guilty, that the jewels had been discovered in his own home, where the merchant's own mad wife had hidden them.

Clara, pleased to learn that Karl had been exonerated, believed also that something would occur to make her life right again. Her belief seemed to come true when a childhood sweetheart called to tell her that he still loved her and wished to marry her. Even after Clara told him of her fall from virtue, he said he loved her and would make her his wife. But he also swore that he would arrange a duel with Leonard and seek to kill the man who had seduced Clara. Since the man had a good job as a secretary, Clara knew that her father would be glad to see her married to him. After the secretary left, however, all Clara's doubts again assailed her, and she once more began to think of suicide.

At last Clara decided to go to see Leonard, whom she found planning to fulfill his ambitions by marrying the mayor's daughter. Clara confronted him with the letter he had written her on the day of her mother's death, a letter telling her that he found it impossible to unite himself with the sister of a thief. Even though her brother had been cleared of the charges, Leonard still did not want to marry her, for he knew that a marriage with the mayor's daughter held greater prospects for him. When Clara told him of her father's plans for suicide, Leonard said the old man thought too well of life to take his own. Even though Clara told him she herself contemplated death, he shrugged off her threat, telling her she was not the first woman to be faced with the prospect of producing an illegitimate child. While they spoke, a boy entered with a challenge from the secretary in love with Clara. After Leonard had again refused to marry her, Clara left.

Shortly after her departure the secretary appeared with a pair of pistols, and forced Leonard to leave with him. As they went to fight a duel, Clara, at home, met her brother, who told her of his plans to go to sea. He asked Clara to get him something to eat. She complied and then went to the well, ostensibly to get some fresh water, but actually to drown herself. While she was gone, Anthony returned from his visit with the woodcutter. Soon afterward the secretary, mortally wounded from the duel, staggered to the door. He told how Leonard had been killed and asked old Anthony to forgive the girl. Just as Anthony began to realize that he had been too harsh with Clara, the neighbors came to tell that she had drowned in the well. The secretary pointed out to Anthony that his own weakness and pride had caused him to talk of suicide and thus send his daughter to her death, lest her sin be a reflection on her father. All old Anthony could say was that he no longer understood the world.

MARIUS THE EPICUREAN

Author: Walter Pater (1839-1894)

Type of plot: Philosophical romance

Time of plot: Second century

Locale: The Roman Empire

First published: 1885

Principal characters:

MARIUS, a young Roman of pagan tradition

FLAVIAN, a close friend of Marius at school

CORNELIUS, a Roman army officer and friend of Marius

MARCUS AURELIUS, Philosopher-emperor of Rome

CECILIA, a friend of Cornelius and a Christian leader

Critique:

Pater's novel was an answer to those who had misunderstood his views on art and philosophy. The novel is, in great part, a fictional rendering of Pater's own struggle for a philosophical position, and the personality of Marius is a reflection of the author himself. The volume is also an appreciation of the culture of the second century of the Christian era in Roman Italy. Pater's careful study of the environment, while sharply criticized by historians of fact, has caught the spirit of the times and the people. No one who has not some familiarity with the writers of the time, and before, can read with signal success the intellectual adventures and development of the young Roman who is the central figure of the book; the work is, to some extent, a veritable patchwork of ideas and even quotations from the classical authors who would be the basis of knowledge for a young Roman studying seriously in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.

The Story:

Marius was a young Roman whose family had for many years lived on an estate in northern Italy. On that estate, White-nights, Marius had grown to adolescence in an atmosphere of pagan piety and rural simplicity. The family led a relatively simple life because Marius' grandfather had squandered much of the family fortune. In that atmosphere of his childhood Marius found a great joy in worshiping the household gods and in overseeing the work on the estate. His life one of contemplation rather than one of activity, his idealism and religiosity were almost morbid in their extreme.

While still in his teens, young Marius was taken to a temple of Aesculapius in the Etrurian hills for the cure of a childhood disease. There the quiet, fresh atmosphere of the place, as well as the teachings of Galen, the great Roman physician, gave him a new outlook on life. Upon his return home, Marius found his mother's health failing. She died shortly afterward, and the effect of her passing on Marius was to turn him into a skeptic, a young man who questioned all aspects of life as they presented themselves to him.

Soon afterward relatives sent young Marius to Pisa, where he attended school. While there, he conceived the idea of becoming a poet of the intellectual school. His inclination in that direction was stimulated by his friendship with a young boy named Flavian, a schoolmate. Flavian, three years older than Marius, had great influence over the younger boy. The two read all of the literature and philosophy they could find. Among the works they pored over was the Metamorphoses of Apuleius, the ornate style of which was a source of great joy to Marius.

But the studies in literature and philosophy which the two young men planned were short-lived, for Flavian became sick after an excursion he and Marius made; he died soon after of a plague brought back to Italy by the armies of Marcus Aurelius, who had just returned from a campaign into the eastern reaches of the Empire. After Flavian's death Marius, needing an intellectual crutch to carry him through the agony of seeing his young friend die, was attracted to the study of mysticism. But at last he put aside the desire to turn to Oriental mystic lore and turned to early Greek philosophers to find, if he could, some answer to his problems in their writings and thought.

One of the first writers he studied was Heraclitus, who taught him to limit his labors, lest he lose everything by trying to master all knowledge at once. From Heraclitus he turned to the teachings of Aristippus of Cyrene, founder of the Epicurean school. From his study of Cyrenaic philosophy Marius came to the conclusion that knowledge was limited to experiences received through the senses, and he thought therefore that he owed it to himself to have many sensuous experiences in order to reach the highest possible point of wisdom.

The idea appealed to Marius because of the immensely practical ethics that the whole concept implied. Life as the primary end of life was the code which Marius found himself professing; it was, of course, an antimetaphysical metaphysic. Through it Marius hoped to find, by means of cultural knowledge, the secret of the present in the everchanging universe, that he might discover all of the subtle realizations implied in each moment of life. Like epicureans of that time and since, Marius found there were those who misinterpreted his credo and believed that he sought pleasure as an end in itself; yet hedonism, the search for pleasure as the purpose of life, was farthest from his mind. Such a life would have been too gross for one of Marius' pietistic background.

During his search for an answer to life, Marius had turned from poetry to prose, for he felt that his nature and his studies had fitted him better for the latter.

About the time that his epicureanism became crystallized in his mind, Marius felt some pangs of regret that his emotional life seemed to have become stunted. He wondered why it was that he felt more inclined to research of the mind than to normal human emotions. He could not feel the necessity of pursuing feminine company and did not regret that he had not found it a matter of urgency that he acquire a wife. Love, in the ordinary sense of the word, did not seem to be a part of his makeup.

At a time when that problem was disturbing him, he had a summons to Rome which interrupted his worries. He was sent for to become secretary and editor to Emperor Marcus Aurelius, a prolific writer and a patron of the arts and philosophy. He had been working for some time on a memoir and a series of disconnected meditations which he wished someone to put into edited form. That task was assigned to Marius.

On the way to Rome, Marius met a young officer of the army named Cornelius, an officer of the famed Twelfth Legion, who was returning to Rome after service in the farther reaches of northern Europe. Under the tutelage of Cornelius, Marius quickly made himself at home in the city. Fortunately, Marius' family had a house in Rome, although it had not been used in many years. To the young epicurean, Rome was a wonderful place in which to live and for several years Marius was happy there. Experiences of the richest nature were his, for he moved, thanks to his family background and the emperor's patronage, in the best of circles.

There was, however, something which Marius could not fathom. His friend Cornelius seemed much happier than he. Since Cornelius was not a simple materialistic person, Marius could not understand why his friend was so much happier. One day, as they were returning from a trip away from Rome, Cornelius took Marius into a rich home on the Appian Way. It was the residence of the widow of Cecilius, and the Cecilia who was its mistress was a Christian, as was Cornelius. From that moment Marius began to comprehend something of the new religion that was making converts in the Empire. He found a strange kind of happiness in attending mass in the home of Cecilia, and he noticed too that he felt a strange attraction to Cecilia herself.

Some months later, when Cornelius and Marius were once again away from Rome, the small town in which they had stopped was shaken by an earthquake. After the first tremors of the quake had passed, Cornelius, accompanied by Marius, joined a group of Christians who were publicly thanking the Deity for their escape from death. The pagans of the town, fearing that the Christians had been the cause of the earthquake, assaulted them. Marius and Cornelius, because of their rank, were arrested and sent to Rome. On the way their captors learned that one of them was not a Christian. In order to save his friend, Marius said that the non-Christian was Cornelius, who was then set free. Marius himself became violently ill before he and his guards reached Rome. He was left behind to die, but some villagers, who were also Christians, found him and nursed him. He died with Christian prayers in his ears.

MARKET HARBOROUGH

Author: George J. Whyte-Melville (1821-1878)

Type of plot: Sporting romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1861

Principal characters:

JOHN STANDISH SAWYER, country gentleman and ardent fox hunter
ISAAC, Sawyer's groom and horse handler
THE HONORABLE CRASHER, Sawyer's friend and hunting companion
CECILIA DOVE, with whom Sawyer falls in love
PARSON DOVE, Cecilia's fox-hunting father
TIPTOP, The Honorable Crasher's groom and horse handler

Critique:

Whyte-Melville was an ardent hunter and a recognized authority on fox hunting in England. Market Harborough, like other sporting novels he wrote, is therefore regarded as an authentic account of that sport. Yet the twentieth-century reader, accustomed to naturalistic fiction, will not find here the realism of fact to which he is accustomed; there is very little specific information, as compared to what one would expect in a novel by Dreiser or Norris. Market Harborough was, however, Whyte-Melville's most popular novel. From a literary point of view, the novel is simply a series of hunting episodes fastened together by the presence of a single character. An interesting sidelight is that the author used his literary earnings to aid charity.

The Story:

John Standish Sawyer, a hard-riding, fox-hunting country gentleman whose farm lay not far from London, decided one fall afternoon that he had too little and too poor hunting in his own country. He also wished to show himself off as a horseman and hunter among a better class of hunters than those in his own vicinity. That evening he sat in his study alone, being a bachelor, and tried to decide, with the help of numerous glasses of brandy and water, what hunting community he would visit during the remainder of the season. He finally decided that he would go to Market Harborough, which had a good season and good attendance.

The following morning Mr. Sawyer walked to a neighboring farm to buy himself a new horse for hunting, since he had only two hunters in his stable. At the neighboring farm, whose owner was more a horse-trader than an agriculturist, Sawyer found a beautiful roan that was just what he wanted. Returning to his own farm, The Grange, Sawyer went out to the stables and informed old Isaac, the groom, that he was to bring the new horse home and then prepare to take the inmates of the stable by railway to Market Harborough. Isaac, knowing his master, did not argue, although he did not quite approve of the journey.

Two days later Isaac and the horses arrived at Market Harborough, where Sawyer joined them after traveling down to London to outfit himself with new, stylish boots and riding clothes. On the train from London to Market Harborough, Sawyer met a tired-seeming young gentleman, also an ardent fox hunter, named the Honorable Crasher. At the time, neither made much of an impression on the other, even though, from Sawyer's position, the Honorable Crasher was quite a fashionable figure.

The first morning after Sawyer's arrival at Market Harborough was a very foggy one. Nevertheless, Sawyer had his groom prepare one of his hunters and joined a group of hunters, one of whom was the Honorable Crasher. When the fog refused to break, the two new friends were invited to lunch with the parson of the neighborhood, Mr. Dove, who was also an ardent hunter. The luncheon was a pleasant one, especially for Sawyer, who was much taken with Cecilia Dove, the parson's pretty young daughter, a girl greatly devoted to fox hunting. The girl, finding Sawyer to be a pleasant chap with a respectable estate, was also quite taken with him.

Several weeks went by swiftly. Sawyer proved himself to be as good as or better than the other riders at Market Harborough. In addition, there were plenty of foxes to be hunted, most of which gave the hounds and the hunters a lengthy and swift chase. Sawyer's new horse, the roan, proved as good as he had expected. Sawyer found himself thrown into the company of some gay bachelors who enjoyed life to the utmost and respected him. In addition, he saw quite a bit of pretty Cecilia Dove, who was as captivated with Sawyer as he was with her.

Word went around one day that a steeplechase was being planned as a main event of the hunting season. The fox hunters of Sawyer's group at first scoffed at the idea, since there would be no fox, but at last they fell in with the plan; the event would provide an opportunity to show off horse and rider, to make a reputation, and to win some money by riding and betting. Sawyer, who really had no horse good enough for the race, kept very quiet with respect to the event; privately, he wanted to enter it.

Old Isaac, Sawyer's groom, knowing his master wanted to get in the race, hit upon a plan that involved a new horse. In Sawyer's stable there was a fine-looking bay which ate well, never got sick, but was a poor hunter. It was this animal that Isaac planned to palm off on the Honorable Crasher. To that end he dropped mysterious hints to Tiptop, the Honorable Crasher's groom. Tiptop fell for the bait and suggested to Isaac that the bay race with one of the Honorable Crasher's horses to see which was the faster.

Early one morning the two met, before sunup, to try out the two horses. The race was to be for a half mile. The two grooms raced and Isaac's horse, even though it was covered with a flowing sheet, won by several lengths. Little did Tiptop realize that Isaac had taken out another horse under the sheet and had won the race illegally, from a very strict moralist's standpoint. Isaac hurried to Sawyer and told his master that he was sure that the Honorable Crasher would ask to buy the unwanted bay.

Isaac was right. That very morning the worthless horse was sold for a tremendous price. When the Honorable Crasher and his groom tried to get speed out of the horse in training him for the steeplechase, however, he could scarcely run. The new owner and his groom were mystified, but Isaac and Sawyer did not breathe a hint of what had happened. With the money from the sale of the worthless bay, Sawyer bought a fine, fast hunter, with which he hoped to win the steeplechase. In honor of Cecilia Dove, of whom he was growing fonder each day, he named the horse Wood-Pigeon.

Before the steeplechase was run, a ball was given by the racing set at Market Harborough. Sawyer, dressed as neatly and dandyishly as a tailor could turn him out, attended in order to dance with Cecilia. She was very coquettish during the evening, however, and by acting warm and cool by turns she angered Sawyer, who finally left the ball. Such treatment was just what the coquette needed to make her realize that she loved Sawyer very much.

The day of the great steeplechase arrived. Six horsemen, all gentlemen, were entered, including Sawyer on Wood-Pigeon. Sawyer, in honor of his love, wore a plum-colored silk shirt, plum being Cecilia's favorite color. It was Sawyer's first steeplechase, but he was a fine horseman on a fine horse, and well coached on the nature of the course by Isaac the groom, who had ridden over it on a reconnaissance run.

Sawyer did not win. In fact, he took an ugly fall near the end of the course, although up to that time he had ridden a fine race. In the fall he suffered a broken collarbone. Cecilia, watching the race, decided then and there that she would marry Sawyer, who had proved himself a courageous gentleman. During his convalescence the engagement was announced, and not long afterward Sawyer and Cecilia Dove were married. Sawyer's new wife succeeded in stopping his hunting; he even sold his horses in the flush of married bliss. But one day a friend saw him reading a book about hunting and guessed that before long he would be back with the hounds again.

MARMION

Author: Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot: Semihistorical romance

Time of plot: Early sixteenth century

Locale: The Scottish Border

First published: 1808

Principal characters:

LORD MARMION, an English knight

RALPH DE WILTON, wronged by Marmion, disguised as a palmer

CLARE FITZ-CLARE, loved by de Wilton

CONSTANCE DE BEVERLEY, betrayed by Marmion

ARCHIBALD DOUGLAS, Earl of Angus

Critique:

Ranking with The Lay of the Last Minstrel and The Lady of the Lake as one of Scott's best-known dramatic poems, Marmion lacks some of the perfection of detail that marks the other two. It was hurriedly written and published, and its effects are often melodramatic. In this poem Scott did not do the careful revising that was his usual custom. He detracted from the unity of his story by writing for each canto an introduction which has little bearing on the action or the mood. These introductions, addressed to various of Scott's friends, dealt with his daily activities and thoughts. But in spite of its faults, Marmion has the lyrical beauty and the flow of brisk and exciting action which we associate with Scott's metrical romances.

The Story:

Wherever Lord Marmion went, he was welcomed and honored as a brave and valiant knight. The English king had sent him to the Scottish court to try to persuade that country's king to end armed raids throughout the Border country. Marmion asked a Scottish lord to furnish him a guide, someone peaceful appearing, and since there was no one else available the lord sent a palmer, a holy man who had made many pilgrimages to religious shrines.

At the same time an abbess, accompanied by several nuns, was making a sea voyage to Cuthbert Isle to hold an inquisition over two prisoners of the Church. One of the young nuns aboard, still a novice, was Clare Fitz-Clare, a lovely young girl who entered the abbey after her lover, dishonored, was believed dead. One of the accused was Constance de Beverley, a nun who had broken her vows and run away from the convent. Before she was put to death, Constance told the abbess and her other accusers the story of her fall from grace.

Her betrayer had been Lord Marmion. Believing his protestations of love for her, she had escaped from the convent and followed him for three years as his page. Then Marmion met lovely Clare Fitz-Clare, and because she was an heiress of great wealth he abandoned Constance to seek Clare for his bride. The king promised him that he should have Clare, but she loved another knight, Ralph de Wilton. Marmion forged papers which offered false proof that Wilton was not true to the king. The two knights fought a duel, and Wilton was left for dead. Constance, soon to die, gave the papers proving the forgery to the abbess and implored her to get the papers to the king in order to save Clare from a hateful marriage. Although the girl had entered a convent rather than marry Marmion, the king would force the marriage if Clare were found, for Marmion was a great favorite at court. Even though her judges pitied her, Constance was put to a horrible death after she had told her story.

Marmion continued on his way to the court. Guilty thoughts of Constance worried him; he had been responsible for her capture by the Church. But he soothed his conscience with the belief that she would not be severely punished. One night as they stayed at an inn a young boy sang a ballad about the soul's disquiet of every man who would betray a maid. At the end of the song Marmion thought he heard the tolling of a death bell. When the knight mentioned the tolling sound he heard, the palmer spoke his first words, saying that it was the toll of death for a friend. That night Marmion, unable to sleep, went out into the dark to ride. There he was attacked by what seemed a devil, for the man had the face of Wilton, long dead. The strangest part was that Marmion's mysterious adversary could have killed him, but instead sheathed his sword and rode off into the night.

As Marmion and his men rode through the Border country, they noticed everywhere huge numbers of armed clansmen readying for battle. On their arrival at the Scottish court, Marmion could not persuade King James to halt preparations for battle. The Scots, claiming that the English had wronged them, demanded vengeance. Courtesy required that Marmion be given safe conduct during his mission, however, and so the king put him in the care of Archibald Douglas, one of the most powerful of all the lords of Scotland. Douglas also was charged with the care of the abbess and her nuns, who had been taken captive by the Scots, for they were to be returned safely to their convent. But the abbess feared for Clare's safety if Marmion should learn that she was among the party of nuns. To save Clare from a forced and hated union, the holy woman gave the papers proving Marmion's forgery to the palmer and begged him to deliver them to the English king.

Marmion, learning the girl's identity, secured an order directing him to take Clare to her home, with Douglas for an escort. Separated from the abbess, Clare feared for her safety with Marmion, but he planned not to press his suit until she had been returned to her kinsmen, who would be dominated by the king. Marmion and Clare were quartered in Tantallon Castle, owned by Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, to await the impending battle between English and Scottish troops.

Clare, lonely and afraid, walked out onto the battlements of the castle. There she met a young knight who proved to be de Wilton. From his lips Clare heard his story. He had not been mortally wounded in his combat with Marmion, but had been healed and cared for by one of his servants. The loyal servant asked one boon for saving his life, that should de Wilton's deadliest enemy fall beneath his sword that enemy should be spared. The young knight wandered far, his name scorned by all who once loved him because he was now branded as a traitor. At last he disguised himself so well that no one recognized in the lowly palmer the once-proud knight. It was de Wilton who had so frightened Marmion during his midnight ride, but he had kept his promise to his old servant and spared the life of the man who had ruined him. The young man had told Douglas his story, which was confirmed by the papers given him by the abbess. That night Douglas restored de Wilton to his knightly honors, and the next day de Wilton would join the English troops.

Marmion, unable to resist the spectacle of troops drawn up for battle, defied Douglas and rode off to join the fight. Having learned from one of his company the palmer's true identity and fearing that he would lose Clare, he took the girl to a place of safety behind the English lines. When the battle began, Marmion was mortally wounded. Clare, pitying the man she hated, tended him gently. Before he died, Marmion learned of the death of Constance and repented all his sins.

The English defeated the Scots in that bloody battle on Flodden Field. De Wilton was everywhere in the thick of the fighting. After the battle, his lands and his titles were returned to him and Clare was given to him with the king's blessing. The proud name of de Wilton was known again through the land. Marmion, as he deserved, lay in an unmarked grave.

THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO

Author: Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais (1732-1799)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Spain

First presented: 1784

Principal characters:

FIGARO, a bridegroom-to-be

COUNT ALMAVIVA, his master

COUNTESS ALMAVIVA, his master's wife

DR. BARTHOLO, former guardian of the countess

SUZANNE, lady in waiting to the countess

MARCELINE, the housekeeper

CHÉRUBIN, a page

Critique:

Continuing the merry tale of the little barber of Seville, Beaumarchais takes Figaro through more intrigues and adventures in The Marriage of Figaro, or to use the complete title of the drama, The Follies of the Day of the Marriage of Figaro. Again the shrewd and clever barber matches wits with those who would suppress him. The story is pure romance, for the lovers must overcome many obstacles planted by their more powerful enemies. But the high good humor and clever wit of Figaro are a match for all. Beaumarchais was the first of many dramatists to use the comic style of this play. Although the style was often copied by other writers of his day, it was never surpassed.

The Story:

Three years after Figaro, the clever barber, had helped Count Almaviva steal his loved one from her guardian, Dr. Bartholo, the count tired of his lovely wife. Instead, he desired Suzanne, the countess' lady in waiting, who was betrothed to Figaro. The count, in fact, desired almost every beautiful girl he saw, but Suzanne in particular stirred his passions. His plan was to send Figaro as a messenger to France so Figaro would be out of the way and not interfere with the count's pursuit of the lovely Suzanne. Figaro knew of the count's plot and swore to prevent it. He was especially incensed because it was he who had aided the count to win his countess only a short time before.

Figaro had trouble from still another source. Marceline, the housekeeper, had his note for some money she had lent him. The note agreed that Figaro would pay her the money or else marry her. Marceline wanted only to get married; any husband would do. Because Figaro was the only man over whom she held power, he was the likeliest prospect. Figaro was young and Marceline old, but her desires were nonetheless strong. She had an ally in Dr. Bartholo, who was still seeking revenge on the count and Figaro for outwitting him.

The count had a page, Chérubin, an amorous young lad in love with all women. The countess was his special desire, and when the count learned of his passion, he banished the page from the castle after ordering him to join the count's regiment. But Figaro had other plans for the page. His plot was to dress the page in Suzanne's clothing and send him to keep a tryst with the nobleman. Figaro believed that the count would appear so ridiculous when it was learned he had been tricked that he would no longer try to outwit Figaro. Figaro also sent the count an anonymous letter saying that the countess had a lover. When the count burst into his wife's chambers, he found no one but Suzanne. The page, who had been in the chamber a few minutes before, jumped out a window. Figaro was delighted when the count was forced to beg his wife's pardon for his unfounded suspicions.

Figaro did not get a chance to send the page to keep a tryst with the count; the countess and Suzanne, meanwhile, were plotting to foil the count's plan to have Suzanne for his own. He had told Suzanne that he would not permit her to marry Figaro unless she met him at a pavilion on a certain night. She consented to meet him only after she and the countess had made plans to outwit him.

Before the time appointed for the tryst Marceline took to court her case against Figaro. Since he wanted to harm Figaro, the count himself presided at the hearing. He ruled that Figaro must either pay Marceline the money he owed her or else marry her, according to the terms of the note. After the sentence had been pronounced, however, Marceline discovered that Figaro was her son by Dr. Bartholo. She said that this relationship was the reason for the love which had made her want to marry Figaro. Marceline and Dr.

Bartholo were then married, but Dr. Bartholo was not happy to have his worst enemy for his son.

The countess and Suzanne, carrying out their plan, exchanged clothing in preparation for fooling the count. Figaro, who had not been told of the plot, heard that Suzanne was to meet the count and hid himself in the pavilion to observe her treachery. Dr. Bartholo and Marceline accompanied him. The countess, disguised as Suzanne, met the count and permitted him to woo her. The count, protesting his love for her, compared her with the countess, to the detriment of his wife. Figaro, angered by what he believed was Suzanne's duplicity and thinking that the woman in the countess' clothing was his mistress, also eavesdropping, asked the countess for her favor. Suzanne, revealing her true identity, slapped him soundly for trying to be unfaithful to her. Figaro was happy in the knowledge that Suzanne had not been false to him and that the count had betrayed himself to his wife.

After a confusing scene, during which the chagrined count did not know which way to turn, the situation was untangled. After some persuasion the count won back the favor of his wife, but with no choice except to give his consent to the marriage between Suzanne and Figaro. At the same time Chérubin, who it seemed would forever plague the count, was matched with a maid who had long loved him. Dr. Bartholo and Marceline joined in good wishes for all the happy couples. Both the count and the countess gave heavy purses to Figaro and his bride. Figaro thought himself far removed from the humble barber he had once been. He was now blessed with a mother, a father, a fortune, and a beautiful wife.

MARSE CHAN

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Civil War period

Locale: Virginia

First published: 1887

Principal characters:

SAM, Marse Chan's Negro servant

MARSE CHAN, a young Virginian

ANNE CHAMBERLIN, his sweetheart

Critique:

"Marse Chan," from In Ole Virginia, is typical of much local color writing in its use of dialect and a regional setting. It is an idealized narrative of Old Virginia, highly romanticized, but emotional in its appeal. Its author was a diplomat as well as a novelist, and served as U. S. ambassador to Italy during World War I.

The Story:

When the baby was born, there was a great ceremony on the Channing plantation. Mr. Channing brought out the baby and let colored Sam hold him. Then he told the young Negro boy that he was to be the baby's body servant from that day on.

When Marse Chan, as Sam called him, grew up and went to school, he carried Anne Chamberlin's books and they were very close friends. The two neighboring families hoped that the friendship would result in a marriage to unite the two families. One day, when the river rose suddenly and Anne was in danger from the high water, Marse Chan waded in and carried her to safety. Mr. Channing was so pleased that he gave his son a pony.

The friendship between the two families was broken soon afterward. When Mr. Channing declared himself a candidate for Congress, Colonel Chamberlin was nominated to oppose him. Mr. Channing lost the election, and from that day on there was enmity between the families.

One day Colonel Chamberlin announced that he intended to sell some of his slaves. Mr. Channing wanted to buy Maria because her husband was one of his own slaves, but the colonel asked far too much for her. Learning of Mr. Channing's intention, the colonel sent someone to bid against him at the auction, but

Mr. Channing was successful in buying Maria. Then followed a series of lawsuits between the families.

In the meantime Marse Chan had been going to college. During vacations, in spite of family opposition, his romance with Anne flourished. One day a barn on the Channing plantation caught fire. Old Mr. Channing, in an effort to release the trapped animals, went into the burning structure. He was so badly burned that he lost the use of his eyes. A short time later Colonel Chamberlin and Marse Chan became involved in a public debate on secession. Marse Chan, in the crowd's opinion, was the victor, and he was lustily cheered. The colonel was so angry that he challenged Marse Chan to a duel. Marse Chan fired over the colonel's head and said that he was making a present of him to his family. The colonel was furious.

When the war broke out, Marse Chan was called up for service. He sent a note to Anne and the night before he left he met her in the garden of her home. In reply to his pleadings, she told him that she did not love him. The next day Marse Chan went off to fight for the South. He was accompanied by Sam, his servant since birth. While at the front, Marse Chan met a fellow soldier who spoke disrespectfully of Colonel Chamberlin. The two men had a fight and Sam promptly wrote to his wife Judy to tell her about it. Judy just as promptly informed Anne of the incident. At last Colonel Chamberlin, aware that Anne was suffering and that she really loved Marse Chan, told her to attempt a reconciliation. Accordingly, Anne wrote to Marse Chan that she still loved him. Marse Chan read the letter again and again with great pleasure.

He was killed in battle the next day.

Sam took his body back to his home and his family. Then Sam hurried over to the Chamberlin estate because he felt sure that was what Marse Chan would have wanted him to do. After he had told his story, Anne set out with him for the Channing home. Mrs. Channing, who had found Anne's letter in one of Marse Chan's pockets, was on the porch to greet her. They fell into each other's arms and the feud between the families was over. From that day on Anne lived with the Channings and took care of old Mr. Channing and his wife as long as they lived. After the old Channings died Anne went to work in a military hospital. Shortly before the fall of Richmond she became ill with a fever and died. She was buried next to Marse Chan in the Channing graveyard.

Sam, the servant, lived on. Whenever anyone came along the path and saw him with the dog that constantly followed him, he would tell the passerby about Marse Chan. The dog had been Marse Chan's dog; they were the ones, according to Sam, who remembered Marse Chan best.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT

Author: Charles Dickens (1812-1870)

Type of plot: Sentimental-mystery romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England and America

First published: 1843-1844

Principal characters.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT, a selfish old man

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT, his grandson

MARY GRAHAM, old Martin's ward

ANTHONY CHUZZLEWIT, old Martin's brother

JONAS CHUZZLEWIT, his son

MR. PECKSNIFF, a hypocrite

CHARITY, and

MERCY, his daughters

TOM PINCH, young Martin's friend

RUTH PINCH, his sister

MARK TAPLEY, another friend of young Martin

MRS. SARAH GAMP, a bibulous cockney

Critique:

Martin Chuzzlewit is a novel complicated in plot but rich in characterization and Dickensian humor. In addition, this book contains the writer's most outrageous caricatures, in those scenes dealing with young Martin Chuzzlewit's experiences in America. Dickens himself had been disappointed in the United States, and his account of the land and its people is far from flattering. The pictures of rude frontier life fade, however, beside his portraits of Mr. Pecksniff, the arch-hypocrite, and the cockney vitality of Mrs. Gamp, perhaps the author's best humorous character.

The Story:

Selfishness was the quality which set the Chuzzlewits apart from all other men, and the two aged brothers, Martin and Anthony, were not lacking in that strong family trait. From his cradle Jonas Chuzzlewit, Anthony's son, had been taught to think only of money and gain, so that in his eagerness to possess his father's wealth he often grew impatient for the old man to die. Elderly Martin Chuzzlewit suspected the world of having designs on his fortune, with the result that his distrust and lack of generosity turned his grandson, his namesake, into a model of selfishness and obstinacy.

Perhaps old Martin's heart was not as hard as it seemed, for he had taken into his house as his companion and ward an orphan named Mary Graham. Although he told her that she would have a comfortable home as long as he lived but that she could expect nothing at his death, his secret desire was that love might grow between her and his grandson. But when young Martin told him that he had already chosen Mary for his own, he was displeased, afraid that the young couple were acting in their own interests. A disagreement followed, and the old man harshly turned his grandson loose in the world.

Thrown upon his own resources, young Martin decided to become an architect. In a little Wiltshire village, not far from Salisbury, lived Mr. Pecksniff, architect and land surveyor, whose practice it was to train two or three pupils in return for a large premium and exorbitant charges for board and lodging. Mr. Pecksniff thought highly of himself as a moral man, and he had a copybook maxim to quote for every occasion. Although he and Mr. Chuzzlewit were cousins, there had been bad feeling between them in the past. But Mr. Pecksniff saw in Martin a possible suitor for one of his daughters, and he accepted him as a student without payment of the customary fee.

Mr. Pecksniff had never been known to build anything, a fact which took nothing away from his reputation for cleverness. With him lived his two affected daughters, Charity and Mercy, as hypocritical and mean-spirited as their father. His assistant was a former pupil named Tom Pinch, a meek, prematurely aged draftsman who looked upon Mr. Pecksniff as a tower of knowledge.

Arriving in Wiltshire, young Martin took the place of John Westlock in Mr. Pecksniff's establishment. Westlock had never been a favorite in the household; his contempt for Mr. Pecksniff was as great as his regard for honest, loyal Tom Pinch. At first Martin treated Tom in a patronizing manner. Tom, accustomed to the snubs and ridicule of Charity and Mercy, returned Martin's slights with simple good-will, and before long the two became close friends.

One day Mr. Pecksniff and his daughters departed suddenly for London, summoned there by Mr. Chuzzlewit. The old man called on them at Mrs. Todgers' shabbily genteel rooming house and accused Martin of deceiving the worthy man who sheltered him. Mr. Pecksniff was pained and shocked to learn that Mr. Chuzzlewit had disowned his grandson, but he was cheered when the visitor hinted at present good-will and future expectations if the architect would send the young man away at once.

Although Mr. Chuzzlewit's proposal was treacherous and his language insulting, Mr. Pecksniff agreed eagerly enough to the conditions imposed. Returning to Wiltshire, he virtuously announced that Martin had ill-treated the best and noblest of men and taken advantage of his own unsuspecting nature. His humble roof, he declared, could never shelter so base an ingrate and impostor.

Homeless once more, Martin made his way to London in hopes of finding employment. As the weeks passed, his small store of money dwindled steadily. At last, when he had nothing left to pawn, he decided to try his fortunes in America. A twenty-pound note in a letter from an unknown sender gave him the wherewithal for his passage. With him on his adventure went Mark Tapley, hostler of the Blue Dragon Inn in Wiltshire, a jolly fellow with a desire to see the world. Martin could not leave London, however, without seeing Mary Graham. He read her a letter he had written to Tom Pinch, in which he asked his friend to show her kindness if the two should ever meet, and he arranged to write to Mary in care of Tom.

As passengers in the steerage Martin and Mark had a miserable voyage to New York. Martin did not care much for the bumptious, tobacco-chewing Americans he met, but he was excited by accounts of the fortunes to be made out West, Taken in by a group of land promoters, he wrote to Mary telling her of his bright prospects.

Old Anthony Chuzzlewit died suddenly in the presence of his son, Mr. Pecksniff, and a faithful clerk, Chuffey. Mrs. Sarah Gamp was called in to prepare the body for burial. She was a fat, middle-aged cockney woman with a fondness for the bottle and the habit of quoting endlessly from the sayings of Mrs. 'Arris, a friend whom no other of her acquaintances had ever seen. Jonas Chuzzlewit was disturbed by Chuffey's conduct at the funeral. Mrs. Gamp declared that Jonas bore himself in a manner that was filial and fitting.

After the burial Jonas went with Mr. Pecksniff to Wiltshire, for his cautious inquiries had revealed that Mr. Pecksniff was prepared to make a handsome settlement on his daughters when they married, and Jonas was ready to court one or the other. A short time later old Martin Chuzzlewit and Mary Graham arrived to take rooms at the Blue Dragon Inn in the village. There Tom Pinch met Mary and in his humble manner fell deeply in love with her. Only his friendship for Martin kept him from declaring himself.

Mr. Pecksniff had hoped that Jonas would marry Charity, his older daughter, but Mercy was the suitor's choice, much to her sister's dismay. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Jonas Chuzzlewit returned to London, where, before long, he began to treat his bride with ill-humor and brutality. Having some business to transact at the office of the Anglo-Bengalee Disinterested Loan and Life Insurance Company, he discovered that Mr. Montague Tigg, the president, was in reality Montague Tigg, a flashy speculator whom Jonas had previously known as an associate of his rascally cousin, Chevy Slyme. Lured by the promise of huge profits, Jonas was persuaded to invest in the company and become a director. Tigg, however, had little trust for his new partner. He told Nadgett, his investigator, to learn whatever he could about Jonas.

Jonas had a guilty secret. Before his father's death he had obtained some poison from a debt-ridden young doctor and had mixed it with old Anthony's medicine. Actually, his father had not taken the dose, but the circumstances, known also to Chuffey, the clerk, would have incriminated Jonas had they been revealed. This secret, uncovered by Nadgett, gave Tigg a hold over his partner.

In Wiltshire, old Martin Chuzzlewit's condition grew worse. When the invalid's mind seemed to fail, Mr. Pecksniff saw his own opportunity to get control of his kinsman's fortune. Hoping to make his position doubly secure, he planned to marry Mary Graham. But Mary found his wooing distasteful. At last she told Tom Pinch about his employer's unwelcome attentions, and Tom, for the first time, realized that Mr. Pecksniff was a hypocrite and a villain. Having overheard the conversation, Mr. Pecksniff discharged Tom after telling Mr. Chuzzlewit that the young man had made advances to Mary.

Tom went to London to see his sister Ruth. Finding her unhappily employed as a governess, he took her with him to hired lodgings and asked John Westlock, his old friend, to help him in finding work. Before Westlock could go to his assistance, however, an unknown patron hired Tom to catalogue a library.

In America, meanwhile, young Martin and Mark fared badly. They had bought land in Eden, but on their arrival they found nothing more than a huddle of rude cabins in a swamp. Martin fell ill with fever. When he recovered, Mark became sick. While he nursed his friend, Martin had time to realize the faults of his character and the true reason for the failure of his hopes. More than a year passed before the travelers were able to return to England.

John Westlock had also become interested in Jonas Chuzzlewit. He had befriended Lewsome, the young doctor from whom Jonas had secured the poison, and from Mrs. Gamp, who nursed the physician through an illness, he learned additional details to make him suspect the son's guilt in old Anthony's death.

While old Martin seemed in his dotage, his grandson and Mark went to Mr. Pecksniff's house, where Mr. Chuzzlewit was staying. Martin tried to end the misunderstanding between them, but Mr. Pecksniff broke in to say that the grandfather knew the young man for a villain, a deceiver who would not be allowed to wrong the sick old man as long as Mr. Pecksniff lived. Old Martin said nothing. Young Martin and Mark went to London. There they found Tom Pinch and Ruth and heard from John Westlock his suspicions of Jonas Chuzzlewit.

Jonas became desperate when Tigg forced him into a scheme to defraud Mr. Pecksniff. On their journey into Wiltshire, Jonas made plans for disposing of the man he hated and feared. After Mr. Pecksniff had agreed to invest his money in the company, Jonas returned to London, leaving Tigg to handle the transfer of securities. That night, disguised as a workman, he went secretly to the village and assaulted Tigg, who was walking back to his room at the inn. Leaving the body in a wood, he took a coach to London and arrived there at daybreak. But Nadgett, ever on watch, had seen Jonas leave and return, and he followed the murderer when he tried to dispose of the clothing he had worn on his journey.

restored in body and mind, arrived unexpectedly in London for the purpose of righting many wrongs and turning the tables on hypocritical Mr. Pecksniff. Having heard Westlock's story, he went with him to confront Jonas with their suspicions. A few minutes later police officers, led by Nadgett, appeared to arrest Jonas for Tigg's murder. Trapped, the wretched man took the rest of the poison he had obtained from Lewsome.

The next day old Martin met with all concerned. It was he who had hired Tom Pinch, and it was he who now confessed that he had tested his grandson and Mary and found them worthy. When Mr. Pecksniff entered and attempted to shake the hand of his venerable friend, the stern old man struck him to the floor with a cane.

The passing years brought happiness to the deserving. Young Martin and Mary were married, followed a short time later by Westlock and Ruth Pinch. Mark Tapley won the mistress of the Blue Dragon Inn. Old Martin, out of pity, befriended Mercy Chuzzlewit. He himself rejoiced in the happiness of his faithful friends. But there was no joy for Mr. Pecksniff. When news of Tigg's murder had reached the city, another partner in that shady enterprise had run away with the company funds. Mr. Pecksniff, ruined, became a drunken old man who wrote begging letters to Martin and Tom and who had little comfort from Charity, the shrewish companion of his later years.

Critique:

The Master Builder belongs to a series of dramas which were a departure from the earlier types written by Ibsen. In this play the bitter satire of the social dramas is not present; instead, the play is mysterious, symbolic, lyrical. Ibsen here deals with the human soul and its struggle to rise above its own desires. The idea had been in Ibsen's mind for many years before he actually wrote the play, which is one of the most original of his works.

The Story:

Halvard Solness had risen to his high position as a master builder because of a fire which had destroyed the ancestral estate of his wife's family. On the site he had built new homes which won him fame and assured success in his profession. The fire had given him his chance, but he made his own opportunities, too, by crushing all who got in his way.

Knut Brovik, employed by Solness, had once been a successful architect, but Solness had crushed him and then used him as he had many others. Ragnar, Brovik's son, was a draftsman in Solness' office, and it was Brovik's only wish that before his own death his son should have a chance to design something of lasting value. Although Ragnar had drawn plans for a villa which Solness did not wish to bother with, the builder would not give him permission to take the assignment. Ragnar was engaged to Kaia Fosli, Solness' bookkeeper, and he could not marry her until he had established himself. Ragnar did not know that Kaia had come under the spell of the master, as had so many other young girls. Solness pretended to Kaia that he could not help Ragnar because that would mean losing her; in reality he needed Ragnar's brain and talent and could not risk having the young man as a competitor.

Solness' physician, Dr. Herdal, and his wife feared that the builder was going mad. He spent much time in retrospection and also seemed to have morbid fears that the younger generation was going to ruin him.

But not all of the younger generation frightened Solness. When Hilda Wangel appeared at his home, he was at once drawn to her. He had met Hilda ten years before when he had hung the traditional wreath atop the weather vane on a church he had built. She had been a child at the time. Now she told him that he had called her his princess and had promised to come for her in ten years and carry her off to build her a kingdom. Since he had not kept his promise, she had come to him. Solness, who could not remember the incident, decided that he must have wished it to happen and thus made it come to pass. This, he believed, was another example of his power over people, and it frightened him.

When Hilda asked to see all he had built, especially the high church towers, he told her that he no longer built churches and would never build one again. Now he built homes for mothers and fathers and children. He was building a home for himself and his wife, and on it he was building a high tower. He did not know why he was putting the high tower on the house, but something seemed to be forcing him. Hilda insisted that he complete the tower, for it seemed to her that the tower would have great meaning for her and for him.

Hilda told Solness that his need of her was the kingdom he had promised her and that she would stay near him. She wanted to know why he built nothing but homes, and he told her of the fire that had given him his chance. At the time of the fire, he and his wife had twin baby boys. Although all had been saved from the fire, the babies died soon afterward from the effects of the fevered milk of their mother. Solness knew that his position and his fame were based on the tragedy of the fire and on his wife's heart-rending loss, but he believed also that he had willed the fire in order to have his chance. Whatever he willed happened, and afterward he had to pay somehow the horrible price for his almost unconscious desires. And so he built homes for others, never able to have a real home himself. He was near madness because his success was based on his and his wife's sorrow.

Solness seemed to have power over human beings as well as events. Brovik was one man who served him, his son Ragnar another. Solness, afraid of Ragnar's younger generation, believed that it would crush him as he had crushed others.

Hilda, begging him to give Ragnar and the other young people a chance, said that he would not be crushed if he himself opened the door to them. She told him that his near-madness was caused by a feeble conscience, that he must overcome this weakness and make his conscience robust, as was hers. She persuaded him to give Ragnar the assignment the young man wanted. She wished Solness to stand completely alone and yet be the master. As final proof of his greatness, she begged Solness to lay the traditional wreath on the high tower of his new home and she scoffed at a builder who could not climb as high as he could build.

Hilda alone wanted Solness to climb the tower, and only she believed that he would do so. Once she had seen him standing on a church tower, and his magnificence had thrilled her. She must have the thrill again. On that other day she had heard a song in the sky as the master builder shouted into the heavens, but it was not until now that she learned what he had shouted. He told her that as he had stood at the top of the church he had known why God had made the fire that destroyed his wife's estate. It was to make Solness a great builder, a true artist building more and more churches to honor God. God wanted him to have no children, no real home, so that he could give all his time to building churches. But Solness had defied God that day. He had shouted his decision to build no more churches, only homes for mothers and fathers and their children.

But God had taken His revenge. There was little happiness in the homes Solness built. From now on he would build only castles in the air, with Hilda to help him. He asked Hilda to believe in him, to have faith in him. Hilda, however, demanded proof. She must see him standing again, clear and free, on the top of the tower. Then his conscience would be freed and he would still be the master builder. He would give her the kingdom he had promised.

Even though his wife and others pleaded with him not to make the ascent, Solness was guided by Hilda's desire. As he climbed higher and higher, she heard a song in the air and thrilled to its crashing music. But when he reached the top of the tower, he seemed to be struggling with an invisible being. He toppled and fell to the ground, lifeless. Then Hilda heard music in the sky. Her master builder had given her her kingdom.

THE MAYOR OF ZALAMEA

Author: Pedro Calderón de la Barca (1600-1681)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Zalamea, Spain

First presented: c. 1640

Principal characters:

PHILIP II, King of Spain

DON LOPE DE FIGUEROA, commander of a Spanish regiment

DON ALVARO DE ATAIDE, a captain

PEDRO CRESPO, a farmer of Zalamea

JUAN, his son

ISABEL, his daughter
REBOLLEDO, a soldier
CHISPA, his mistress

Critique:

The Mayor of Zalamea constitutes Calderón's finished and in many ways original reworking of a play by his illustrious predecessor, Lope de Vega. Calderón, who was himself a soldier, delineates in this play the military life of seventeenth-century Spain. He also portrays with sympathy the proud, independent, and canny farmer of the provinces. There are hints of two subplots in the prominence given to several secondary characters at the beginning of the play, but these subplots never fully develop.

The Story:

As the troops of Don Lope de Figueroa approached the village of Zalamea, old campaigner Rebolledo grumbled in true veteran fashion about the hardships of the march. Quite ready to stop and relax in the village, Rebolledo predicted that the mayor of the village would bribe the officers to march the regiment through and beyond the little community. When he was taken to task by his fellows for this unsoldierly talk, Rebolledo declared that he was mainly concerned for the welfare of his mistress, Chispa, who accompanied the troops. Chispa retorted that although she was a woman she could endure the march as well as any man. To cheer up the men, she broke into a marching song.

Chispa's song was barely finished when the column reached Zalamea. It was announced that the troops would be billeted in the village to await the imminent arrival of their commander, Don Lope. The captain of the column was pleased to learn that he would be billeted in the home of a proud farmer whose daughter was reputed to be the beauty of the neighborhood.

At the same time that the troops entered Zalamea, a down-at-heels squire, Don Mendo, accompanied by his servant, Nuño—the pair bore a marked resemblance to Don Quixote and Sancho Panzo—came to the village also. Don Mendo sought the favors of Isabel, the daughter of the proud farmer, Pedro Crespo. Isabel banged together the shutters of her window when Don Mendo greeted her in foolishly extravagant terms. Crespo and his son Juan found the presence of Don Mendo highly objectionable.

When the sergeant announced to Crespo that the captain, Don Alvaro de Ataide, would be quartered in Crespo's house, the farmer graciously accepted this imposition; Juan, however, was displeased and suggested to his father that he purchase a patent of gentility so that he might avoid having to billet troops in his home. Crespo declared that as long as he was not of gentle blood he could see no point, even though he was rich, in assuming gentility.

Isabel and her cousin Ines, having learned of the presence of the troops, went to the attic of the house, where they would remain as long as the soldiers were in the town.

On the captain's arrival, the sergeant searched the house but was unable to find Isabel. However, he reported that a servant told him the girl was in the attic and would stay there until the troops departed. The captain planned to win Isabel by any means.

Rebolledo asked the captain for the privilege of officially conducting gambling among the soldiers. The captain granted the privilege in return for Rebolledo's help in his plan to discover Isabel. The captain and Rebolledo then pretended to fight; Rebolledo, feigning great fright, fled, followed by the captain, up the stairs to the attic. Isabel admitted him to her retreat and in pleading to the captain for his life she presented such a charming aspect to the young officer that he was completely smitten.

The clamor of the pretended fight drew Crespo home. He and Juan, with swords drawn, raced upstairs to the attic. Juan sensed the trick and hinted as much, but Crespo, impressed by the captain's courtesy, was duped. Insulted by Juan's innuendoes, the captain was about to come to blows with Juan when Don Lope, the regimental commander, entered. When he demanded an explanation of the scene, the captain said that Rebolledo's insubordination had been the cause. Rebolledo, in denial, explained that the disturbance had been intended to discover Crespo's daughter. Don Lope ordered the captain to change his quarters and the troops to remain in their billets; he himself chose to stay in Crespo's house.

Crespo, jealous of his honor, declared that he would give up all of his worldly goods in submission to the will of the king, but that he would destroy the man who would jeopardize his good name.

The captain, stricken with desire for Isabel, courted her under her window; she remained disdainful. Don Mendo, hearing what had happened, armed himself and set out to meet the captain on the field of honor. Meanwhile the captain had prevailed upon Rebolledo to assist him further in his suit. Rebolledo, reconciled, suggested that Isabel could be overcome with song.

At Crespo's, the proud farmer, mollified by Don Lope's seeming gentility, invited the commander to sup in the garden. Don Lope, wounded in the leg in the Flemish wars, so that he was in constant pain, played upon his infirmity in order to arouse Crespo's pity. When he requested the company of Isabel at supper, Crespo readily assented, assuring Don Lope that he would be proud to have his daughter wait on such a fine gentleman. After Isabel had joined Don Lope, the sound of a guitar and a vocal serenade came from the street outside. Those in the garden were so disturbed by the serenade that the supper came abruptly to an end.

Outside, armed Don Mendo could barely refrain from attacking the captain and his followers, but as long as Isabel did not appear in her window he did not attack. As Chispa sang a particularly vulgar song, Crespo and Don Lope, swords drawn, fell upon the serenaders and scattered them. In the fray, Don Lope belabored Don Mendo, who had somehow become involved. A short time later the captain reappeared with soldiers in an official capacity to maintain the peace. Don Lope commended the captain and assured him that the trouble was of no moment. Since dawn was approaching, Don Lope told the captain to order the regiment out of Zalamea.

The next day, the troops having left, the captain expressed his determination to stay and make a last attempt to enjoy Isabel's favors. Further encouraged by the news that Juan had decided to become a soldier and that he would leave that day with Don Lope, he ordered Rebolledo to accompany him and the sergeant on his mission. Chispa declared that she would go along, disguised as a man.

Toward sundown, Don Lope said his farewell to Crespo and gave Isabel a diamond brooch. Crespo gave fatherly advice to Juan. As father and daughter watched Don Lope and Juan gallop away, Isabel observed that this was the day for the election of municipal officers. Suddenly the captain and his followers came upon them. The captain seized Isabel; the sergeant and Rebolledo seized Crespo.

Later that night, in the forest near Zalamea, distracted Isabel came upon her father tied to a tree. She told how Juan had come upon the scene of her violation and had fought the captain. Frightened, she had run away from the fight. Crespo, comforting Isabel, vowed revenge. As the old man and his daughter started home, they encountered the town notary, who announced that Crespo had been elected mayor. He added that the wounded captain was in the village.

In Zalamea, Crespo confronted the captain in private. He suggested that the captain, having disgraced the family honor, take Isabel as his wife, but the captain, not fearing a provincial mayor, scoffed at Crespo's request. Crespo then ordered his officers to place the captain and his followers in jail to await the judgment of the king, who was approaching Zalamea.

Returning to his house, Crespo found Juan prepared to take Isabel's life, to wipe out the disgrace she had innocently brought on her family. Crespo, sternly just, ordered his officers to take Juan to jail for having fought his superior officer, the captain.

Don Lope, on the highway, was informed that the captain had been jailed by the mayor of Zalamea. He returned to the village, went to Crespo, and, unaware that Crespo had been elected mayor, declared that he would thrash the town official for arresting one of the king's officers. Crespo revealed that he was the mayor and that he fully intended to see the captain hanged. Don Lope ordered the regiment to return to the public square of Zalamea.

The soldiers having returned, a pitched battle between them and the townspeople of Zalamea seemed imminent when King Philip II entered the village with his entourage. Don Lope explained the situation to the king, and Crespo showed his majesty depositions taken from the captain's associates. The king agreed that the captain's crime was vile; he declared, however, that Crespo had authority neither to judge nor to punish an officer of the king. When Crespo revealed that the captain had already been garroted in his cell and that no one knew who had strangled him, the king, unable to deny that Zalamea had meted out true justice upon the captain, appointed Crespo perpetual mayor of the village.

Crespo, after declaring that Isabel would take the veil of a nun, released Rebolledo, Chispa, and Juan from jail, and returned Juan to the charge of his military mentor, Don Lope.

MEASURE FOR MEASURE

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Vienna

First presented: c. 1603

Principal characters:

VINCENTIO, Duke of Vienna

ANGELO, the Lord Deputy

ESCALUS, an ancient counselor

CLAUDIO, a young gentleman

LUCIO, his friend

ISABELLA, Claudio's sister

MARIANA, Angelo's former sweetheart

JULIET, Claudio's fiancée

Critique:

This often-overlooked play by Shakespeare is probably his most contemporary offering, since its theme is sociological. Dealing with political and governmental affairs, it reveals, more than any other of his works, Shakespeare's real attitude toward the society of his day. One of the so-called "dark" comedies, it presents the thesis that honesty and common sense are the basis of good government. A remarkable feature of the play is the deep psychological probing of its chief figure, Angelo.

The Story:

The growing political and moral corruption of Vienna were a great worry to its kindly, temperate ruler, Duke Vincentio. Knowing that he himself was as much to blame for the troubles as anyone because he had been lax in the enforcement of existing laws, the duke tried to devise a scheme whereby the old discipline of civic authority could be successfully revived.

Fearing that reforms instituted by himself might seem too harsh for his people to accept without protest, he decided to appoint a deputy governor and to leave the country for a while. Angelo, a respected and intelligent city official, seemed just the man for the job. The duke turned over the affairs of Vienna to Angelo for a temporary length of time and appointed Escalus, a trustworthy old official, second in command. The duke then pretended to leave for Poland, but actually he disguised himself in the habit of a friar and returned to the city to watch the outcome of Angelo's reforms.

Angelo's first act was to imprison Claudio, a young nobleman who had gotten his betrothed, Juliet, with child. Under an old statute, now revived, Claudio's offense was punishable by death. The young man was paraded through the streets in disgrace and finally sent to prison. At his request, Lucio, a rakish friend, went to the nunnery where Isabella, Claudio's sister, was a young novice about to take her vows. Through his messenger, Claudio asked Isabella to plead with the new governor for his release. At the same time Escalus, who had known Claudio's father well, begged Angelo not to execute the young man. But the new deputy remained firm in carrying out the duties of his office, and Claudio's well-wishers held little hope for their friend's release.

The duke, disguised as a friar, visited Juliet and learned that the punishment of her lover was extremely unfair, even under the ancient statutes. The young couple had been very much in love, and been formally engaged, and ~~would have~~ been married, except for the fact that Juliet's dowry had become a matter of legal dispute. There was no question of seduction in the case at all.

Isabella, going before Angelo to plead her brother's cause, met with little success at first, even though she had been thoroughly coached by the wily Lucio. Nevertheless, the cold heart of Angelo was somewhat touched by Isabella's beauty, and by the time of the second interview he had become so passionately aroused as to forget his reputation for saintly behavior. After telling Isabella frankly that she could obtain her brother's release only by yielding herself to his lustful desires, Angelo threatened Claudio's death otherwise.

Shocked at these words from the deputy, Isabella asserted that she would expose him in public. Angelo, amused, asked who would believe her story. At her wit's end, Isabella rushed to the prison where she told Claudio of Angelo's disgraceful proposition. When he first heard the deputy's proposal, Claudio was also revolted by the idea, but as images of death continued to terrify him he finally begged Isabella to placate Angelo and give herself to him. Isabella, horrified by her brother's cowardly attitude, lashed out at him with a scornful speech, but was interrupted by the duke in his disguise as a friar. Having overheard much of the conversation, he drew Isabella aside from her brother and confided that it would still be possible for her to save Claudio without shaming herself.

The friar told Isabella that, five years before, Angelo had been betrothed to Mariana, a high-born lady. The marriage had not taken place, however, because Mariana's brother, with her dowry, had been lost at sea. Angelo had consequently broken off his vows and hinted at supposed dishonor in the poor young woman. The friar suggested to Isabella that she plan the requested rendezvous with Angelo in a dark and quiet place, and then let Mariana act as her substitute. Angelo would be satisfied, Claudio released, Isabella still chaste, and Mariana provided with the means to force Angelo into marriage.

Everything went as arranged, with Mariana taking Isabella's place at the assignation, but cowardly Angelo, fearing public exposure, broke his promise to release Claudio and ordered the young man's execution. Once again the good friar intervened. He persuaded the provost to hide Claudio and then to announce his death by sending Angelo the head of another prisoner who had died of natural causes.

On the day before the execution a crowd gathered outside the prison and discussed the coming events. One of the group was Lucio, who accosted the disguised duke as he wandered down the street. Very furtively Lucio told the friar that nothing like Claudio's execution would have taken place if the duke had been ruler. Lucio went on confidentially to say that the duke cared as much for the ladies as any other man and also drank in private. In fact, said Lucio, the duke bedded about as much as any man in Vienna. Amused, the friar protested against this gossip, but Lucio angrily asserted that every word was true.

To arouse Isabella so that she would publicly accuse Angelo of wrong-doing, the duke allowed her to believe that Claudio was dead. Then the duke sent letters to the deputy informing him that the royal party would arrive on the following day at the gates of Vienna and would expect a welcoming party there. Also, the command ordered that anyone who had had grievances against the government while the duke was absent should be allowed to make public pronouncement of them at that time and place.

Angelo grew nervous upon receipt of these papers from the duke. The next day, however, he organized a great crowd and a celebration of welcome at the gates of the city. In the middle of the crowd were Isabella and Mariana, heavily veiled. At the proper time the two women stepped forward to denounce Angelo. Isabella called him a traitor and virgin-violator; Mariana claimed that he would not admit her as his wife. The duke, pretending to be angry at these tirades against his deputy, ordered the women to prison and asked that someone apprehend the rascally friar who had often been seen in their company.

Then the duke went to his palace and quickly changed to his disguise as a friar. Appearing before the crowd at the gates, he criticized the government of Vienna severely. Escalus, horrified at the fanatical comments of the friar, ordered his arrest and was seconded by Lucio, who maintained that the friar had told him only the day before that the duke was a drunkard and a frequenter of bawdy houses. At last, to display his own bravado, Lucio tore away the friar's hood. When the friar stood revealed as Duke Vincentio, the crowd fell back in amazement.

Angelo, realizing that his crimes would now be exposed, asked simply to be put to death without trial. The duke ordered him first to marry Mariana. After telling Mariana that Angelo's goods, legally hers, would secure her a better husband, the duke was surprised when she entreated for Angelo's pardon. Finally, because Isabella also pleaded for Angelo's freedom, the duke relented. He did, however, send Lucio to prison. Claudio was released and married to Juliet. The duke himself asked Isabella for her hand.

MEEK HERITAGE

Author: Frans Eemil Sillanpää (1888-

Type of plot: Impressionistic realism

Time of plot: 1857-1917

Locale: Finland

First published: 1919

JUSSI TOIVOLA, a mild peasant

RINA, his wife

BENJAMIN, his father

KALLE, Rina's son

Critique:

Meek Heritage conveys the atmosphere of a brooding folk epic. Jussi, the protagonist, symbolizes the lower-class Finn who is jostled and led by fate. The harsh climate, the grubbing toil, the cruel class cleavages are his natural lot. Even the birth and death cycles are indifferent to him. His redeeming virtue is his ability to work hard under direction. Over the whole novel lies a tone of melancholy. The style is discursive and penetrating. Sillanpää was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1939.

The Story:

Benjamin was an old man who had already buried two wives. His overtures to Maja, the servant girl, were matter-of-fact, but somehow Maja saw in this tobacco-dribbling tyrant an opportunity for improvement. She had borne one child out of wedlock and she longed for position. When they were married, the parson was at some pains to refer to Maja as a maidservant.

As she awaited Jussi's birth, she thought that now she might be like other farm wives. Benjamin drank far too much and quarreled incessantly. The night her labor started, he went to drink with Ollila, a neighbor. Maja was left with only Lovisa, the copper-woman, to look after her. Lovisa was sharp-tongued but competent; before Maja came to the farm as mistress, she herself had enjoyed Benjamin's favors. In fact, when Benjamin stumbled home long after his son was born, he called for Lovisa.

While Jussi was little, he stayed in his cradle fretting at the lice. As he grew older, he drank coffee sometimes. He early learned to avoid his father, who for fun would poke plug tobacco into his protesting mouth. He played with poorer children on top of Pig Hill and was initiated into many mysteries. He looked forward to his confirmation, for he believed it was the dividing line between childhood and man's estate.

A period of drought seriously impaired the family fortunes. Maja was no longer afraid of Benjamin. Too old and weak to beat her, he continued to drink with Ollila and to borrow money from him. When things got too bad, he took his deeds to Ollila and returned bearing food and money. The sheriff came to take possession of Benjamin's farm the night the old man died. Maja and Jussi set out for her brother's farm on foot. Maja left Jussi at Tuorila with her reluctant brother while she looked for work; she, too, died soon afterward.

While he lived with his uncle, Jussi was confused. For one thing, the house was so big and clean. And he was neither servant nor family. Although he received many orders, he understood few of them. He would have liked to run errands for his aunt, but he could never find things. He finally became a herdsman, a job he could do fairly well.

After his first confirmation Jussi was disappointed because people still treated him like a child. Little by little, however, his uncle gave him more responsibility. One fall evening he was sent to round up crofters for the harvest. Luckily, he found most of them at a harvest celebration. At the merriment Jussi was treated like everyone else: he was given ale to drink and he danced with a boy his age. Later he was in a group that escorted Manda, a farm girl, back to Tuorila. The men made so much noise trying to follow Manda up to her loft that they awoke Jussi's uncle. The master came with a stick and beat the revelers.

Tuorila prospered and the family decided to invite the gentry to a social gathering. Jussi had the job of looking after the horses and carriages. A comrade, Gustav Toivola, loosened the wheel nuts on the guests' rigs. Jussi's uncle blamed him for the accidents and cast him out. Jussi found a temporary home at Toivola with Gustav's parents.

At Toivola, Jussi was not exactly welcome, but he stayed on, helping where he could. A kind of liberation came with the arrival of the timber cutters. The foreman, Keinonen, hired Jussi and helped him keep his wages away from the Toivola family. When the timber cutters left, Jussi went with them. For years, working on the lakes and shores, he earned a little money but not enough to put anything by. Sometimes, although he was too shy to pursue women, he went on sprees with the other men.

After a time the logging slackened off. The best Jussi could do was to go back to his native countryside and take a job as farmhand at Pirjola. Rina, the maid, slept on the other side of the fireplace. She was a slack girl and loose-natured. Jussi often thought of going over to her bed, but he lacked the courage. One Sunday in July, however, he drank some liquor he had bought and slept in Rina's bed. She was willing enough, for she was pregnant and it would be better if her child had a father.

Jussi and Rina were given an old cabin in the swamp. Although they were not regular crofters, for they had no contract, they could raise what they wished on an acre of ground allowed them. Jussi worked for his rent when the master of Pirjola needed him. Rina's first child was born soon afterward. From the beginning Kalle did not seem to belong to the family. Then Jussi's children, Hilda and Ville, came, and much later Lempi and Marti. Once Jussi was prosperous enough to have a horse and a cow, but after the horse died he never had enough money to buy another. Rina, not a good manager, often sold the bread Jussi brought home.

Kalle, always a strange child, hit Ville with a rail and paralyzed his younger half-brother. Medicine for Ville took all Jussi's money until the child died. Kalle was sent away to work as soon as he was big enough. Hilda, a quiet girl, went into service in a distant town. She drowned herself when only the son of the house was at home. Rina, always tired from farm work and weak after the birth of her last child, died of a mysterious feminine complaint.

As he grew old and bald, Jussi's teeth crumbled. Working less and less, he spent more time in the village. Lempi and Marti brought themselves up as best they could. Only on sufferance did Jussi keep his land. Kalle, now a cab driver in the city, sent home newspapers which Jussi had someone read to him. The unrest caused by the war resulted in changes. The working day was now only twelve hours instead of sixteen, and there was agitation for more reforms. Because he had become garrulous, Jussi gained a reputation for frank speaking. When the Socialists began to rule that section of Finland, he was even a member of a delegation.

During the strikes the Socialists posted armed guards and requisitioned what they needed from the farms. Jussi was made a sentry at Paitula and given a rifle. Everyone else knew the strike was ending, but Jussi stayed on, faithful to his assignment. When Paitula was looted, the fleeing Socialists killed a landowner. At last suspecting something, Jussi threw down his rifle and went home.

Government officials came to the farm for Jussi. In the house they found only the two crying children, but in the barn they captured the cowering Jussi. There was a trial which Jussi did not understand very well, and the judge was in a hurry to restore order. Jussi was one of fourteen led out to an open grave and shot.

MELMOTH THE WANDERER

Author: Charles Robert Maturin (1782-1824)

Type of plot: Gothic romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Ireland

First published: 1820

Principal characters:

JOHN MELMOTH, a young Irishman

MELMOTH THE WANDERER, young Melmoth's ill-starred ancestor

ALONZO MONCADA, a Spaniard shipwrecked in Ireland

YOUNG MELMOTH'S UNCLE

Critique:

Maturin's novel has been called by many literary scholars the greatest of the novels of terror so popular in English fiction during the early years of the nineteenth century. In addition, other writers have admired and have been influenced by Melmoth the Wanderer, partly because of the striking qualities of the plot and partly because of the theme of the never-ending life which it describes. Balzac wrote a sequel to Maturin's novel entitled Melmoth Reconciliated. Among the admirers of the novel were Edgar Allan Poe, Dante Gabriel Rossetti, and Baudelaire. Oscar Wilde, after his disgrace in the 1890's, took for himself the name of Sebastian Melmoth, which combined the idea of the wanderer with that of the arrow-pierced saint. Interestingly enough, Maturin, in his preface, said that he was ashamed of appearing as a novelist but that his profession as a clergyman did not pay him enough to avoid such shameful activities as writing novels.

The Story

In the autumn of 1816, John Melmoth, a student at Trinity College, Dublin, left his school to visit an uncle, his only surviving relative, who was dying. Melmoth's uncle was particularly glad to see his young nephew, for the old man was fearfully afraid of something which he had not revealed to anyone else. The uncle died, leaving all his money and property to John Melmoth. At the end of the will was a note telling John Melmoth to destroy the hidden portrait of an earlier John Melmoth, a painting dated 1646, and a packet of letters to be found in a secret drawer.

The day after his uncle's death young John Melmoth made inquiries to learn whether his uncle had been a man of superstitious nature. He was told that the uncle was not a superstitious man, but that in recent months he had insisted that a strange man appeared and disappeared about the manor house.

Young Melmoth destroyed the portrait, as the will requested, but opened the packet of manuscript, which contained a strange story about the man whose portrait he had destroyed. The document, telling how the original John Melmoth had been seen many times after his reported death in Germany, had been written by an Englishman named Stanton, who had actually met Melmoth the Wanderer in Spain. The Wanderer, apparently angered by Stanton's curiosity, had prophesied that Stanton would be confined in Bedlam, even though he was sane. The prediction having come true, the Wanderer appeared to Stanton in his misery and promised the miserable man his freedom if he would sell his soul to the devil. Stanton refused, and the Wanderer disappeared. Stanton wrote down his experiences and left the manuscript with the Melmoth family when he visited Ireland in order to discover more about the man who had tempted him.

After reading the manuscript, young Melmoth went to bed. That night he, too, saw the Wanderer. His strange ancestor paid the young man a visit and as proof of his appearance left a bruise on John Melmoth's wrist.

The next night a ship was wrecked on the Irish coast not far from the Melmoth estate. When young Melmoth and his retainers went to help rescue the sailors, Melmoth saw the Wanderer high on a rock overlooking the ruined ship and heard him laugh derisively. Young Melmoth tried to ascend the rock but fell into the sea, from which he was rescued by Alonzo Moncada, a Spaniard who escaped from the doomed ship. Young Melmoth and the Spaniard returned to the manor house. A few days later the Spaniard disclosed that he, too, knew the Wanderer.

Moncada told young Melmoth a series of stories about the activities of the Wanderer in Spain. The first story was about the Spaniard himself, who was an exile from his country, even though he was descended from a noble family. Moncada, having been born out of wedlock, could not inherit the ducal title of his ancestors. As a means of getting him out of the way, lest his presence tarnish the proud name of his house, his family had destined him for a monastery. Moncada did not want to be a monk, but his wishes in the matter were ignored by his family, including his own mother.

After a few years Moncada's brother had a change of heart and tried to secure the monk's release from his vows and thereby called down the hatred of the Church upon both Alonzo and himself. Failing to secure a release legally, the brother then arranged for Moncada's escape. Monastery officials, learning of the scheme, had the brother killed and denounced Moncada to the Inquisition.

While he lay in prison, Moncada was visited by Melmoth the Wanderer, who tempted him to secure release by selling his soul to Satan. Moncada refused; he escaped later when the prison of the Inquisition burned.

Moncada found refuge with an old Jewish doctor who had become interested in the history of the Wanderer. From the Jew Moncada learned the story of still another person whom the Wanderer had tempted.

The Jew told how Don Francisco di Aliaga, a Spanish nobleman, had lost his daughter in a shipwreck while she was still little more than a baby. The child and her nurse had been cast upon an unknown and uninhabited island. The nurse died, but the baby grew up alone on the island, to become a beautiful girl. To her the Wanderer appeared on several occasions, each time tempting her to sell her soul to Satan in order to gain knowledge of the world. Strangely enough, the girl and the Wanderer fell in love. She refused to marry him, however, under any auspices but those of the Church.

Soon afterward the girl was found and returned to her family in Spain. There the Wanderer saw her again. Their love being still great, they were, unknown to anyone, married in what was actually a Satanic ceremony. Meanwhile the Wanderer, conscience-stricken by fears that he would bring sorrow to the one he loved, had appeared to Don Aliaga and warned him, by stories of the Wanderer's Satanic activities, of dangers surrounding the girl.

The Wanderer told Don Aliaga of the temptation of a father whose children were starving, and of a young woman, during the reign of Charles II of England, who had been tempted in order to have the man she loved. In both cases, however, those tempted had refused to pay the price of damnation in return for earthly happiness. Don Aliaga recognized the meaning of these tales, but pressing business affairs kept him from acting at once.

When Don Aliaga finally returned to his home, he brought with him the young man he had selected to be his daughter's husband. Unknown to all, however, the girl was about to give birth to a child by the Wanderer. When the Wanderer appeared to claim her at a masked ball, her connection with the accursed guest was revealed and she was turned over to the Inquisition. Shortly after giving birth to her child she died, her dying words the wish that she, and the Wanderer too, would enter Heaven.

Such was the tale the Jewish doctor told to Alonzo Moncada, who was escaping from Spain when he was shipwrecked on the Irish coast. The tale ending, the Wanderer suddenly appeared in the room with them. He told his horrified listeners that he had returned to his ancestral home to end his earthly wanderings. His fate had been to roam the earth for one hundred and fifty years after his death, under a terrible command to win souls for the devil. Everyone he had tempted, however, had refused to exchange earthly happiness for eternal damnation.

The Wanderer then asked that he be left alone to meet his destiny. A short time later young Melmoth and the Spaniard heard strange voices and horrible noises in the room where they had left the Wanderer. The next morning the room was empty. The only sign of the Wanderer was a scarf caught on a bush at the place where he had plunged or had been thrown into the sea.

Critique:

All of Carson McCullers' fiction turns on the theme of loneliness and longing as the inescapable condition of man. In The Member of the Wedding the issues of the larger world are reflected in the experiences of the twelve-year-old girl trapped in the confusion of her own adolescence. The novel tells the story of several decisive days in the life of Frankie Addams, and much of the meaning of her plight is made clear in her random talk with Berenice Sadie Brown and John Henry West as the three sit around the table in the kitchen of the Addams house. Frankie seizes upon her soldier brother's approaching wedding to will herself into the social community, only to discover that the bride and groom must by necessity reject her and that she must learn to fend for herself. In the story of Frankie Addams the writer has reduced the total idea of moral isolation to a fable of simple outlines and a few eloquently dramatic scenes, set against a background of adolescent mood and discovery familiar to us all. It is easy enough to understand why this novel has also been a success in dramatic form. The play of the same name, written by Mrs. McCullers, is a sympathetic study of inward conflicts. It received both the Donaldson Award and the New York Drama Critics Prize in 1950.

The Story:

In the summer of her twelfth year Frankie Addams felt that she had become an unjoined person. She was a lanky girl with a crew haircut and skinned elbows. Some of the older girls she had played with the year before had a neighborhood club and there were parties with boys on Saturday nights, but Frankie was not a member. That summer she got herself into so much trouble that at last she just stayed home with John Henry West, her little cousin, and Berenice Sadie Brown, the colored cook. Through long, hot afternoons they would sit in the dingy, sad Addams kitchen and play cards or talk until their words sounded strange, with little meaning.

Berenice Sadie Brown was short and black and the only mother Frankie had ever known, her own mother having died when she was born. The cook had been married four times and during one of her marriages she had lost an eye while fighting with a worthless husband. Now she owned a blue glass eye which always interested John Henry West. He was six and wore gold-rimmed glasses. Sometimes Frankie grew tired of him and sent him home. Sometimes she begged him to stay all night. Everything seemed so mixed up that she seldom knew what she did want.

Then, on the last Friday in August, something happened which made life wonderful once more. Her brother Jarvis, a soldier home from Alaska, had come to dinner with Janice Evans, a girl who lived at Winter Hill. They were to be married there on Sunday, and Frankie and her father were going to the wedding. After dinner Janice and Jarvis returned to Winter Hill. Mr. Addams went downtown to his jewelry store. Later, while she sat playing cards with Berenice and John Henry, Frankie thought of her brother and his bride. Winter Hill became all mixed up in her mind with snow and icy glaciers in Alaska.

Jarvis and Janice had brought Frankie a doll, but she had no time for dolls any more. John Henry could have it. She wished her hair were not so short; she looked like one of the freaks from the Chattahoochee Exposition. Suddenly angry, she chased John Henry home. When Berenice teased her, saying that she was jealous of the wedding, Frankie declared that she was going to Winter Hill and never coming back. For a minute she wanted to throw a kitchen knife at the black cook. Instead, she hurled it at the stairway door.

Berenice went out with Honey Camden Brown, her foster brother, and T. T. Williams, her beau. Because Honey was not quite right in the head, Berenice was always trying to keep him out of trouble. T. T. owned a colored restaurant. Frankie did not know that the cook's pity for the unhappy, motherless girl kept her from marrying T. T.

Left alone, Frankie wandered around the block to the house where John Henry lived with Aunt Pet and Uncle Eustace. Somewhere close by a horn began to play a blues tune. Frankie felt so sad and lonely that she wanted to do something she had never done before. She thought again of Jarvis and Janice. She was going to be a member of the wedding; after the ceremony the three of them would go away together. She was not plain Frankie Addams any longer. She would call herself F. Jasmine Addams, and she would never feel lonely or afraid again.

The next morning, with Mr. Addams' grunted permission, Frankie went downtown to buy a new dress and shoes. On the way she found herself telling everyone she met about the wedding. That was how she happened to go into the Blue Moon, a cheap café where she knew children were not allowed. But F. Jasmine Addams was no longer a child, and so she went in to tell the Portuguese proprietor about the wedding. The only other person in the café was a red-headed soldier from a nearby army post. Frankie scarcely noticed him at the time, but she remembered him later when she saw him on the street. By that time he was drunk and trying to buy an organ-grinder's monkey. The soldier bought Frankie a beer and asked her to meet him that night at the Blue Moon.

When Frankie finally arrived home, she learned that Berenice and John Henry were also to attend the wedding. An aged kinsman of the Wests had died and Aunt Pet and Uncle Eustace were going to the funeral at Opelika. Berenice, dismayed when she saw the orange silk evening dress, the silver hair ribbon, and the silver slippers Frankie had bought to wear at the wedding, tried, without much success, to alter the dress for the gawky young girl. Afterward they began to talk about the dead people they had known. Berenice told about Ludie Freeman, the first husband she had truly loved. The story of Ludie and the three other husbands made them all feel lonesome and sad. Berenice held the two children on her knees as she tried to explain to them the simple wisdom life had taught her. They began to sing spirituals in the half-dark of the dingy kitchen.

Frankie did meet the soldier that night. First she went with John Henry to Big Mama's house and had her palm read. Afterward she told John Henry to go on home; she did not want him to know she was meeting someone at the Blue Moon. The soldier bought two drinks. Frankie was afraid to taste hers. He asked her to go up to his room. Frightened when he tried to pull her down beside him on the bed, she picked up a glass pitcher and hit him over the head. Then she climbed down the fire escape and ran all the way home. She was glad to get into bed with no one but John Henry by her side.

The wedding next day turned into a nightmare for Frankie. Everything was lovely until the time came for the bride and groom to leave. When they carried their bags out to the car, she ran to get her own suitcase. Then they told her, as kindly as possible, that they were going away alone. She grasped the steering wheel and wept until someone dragged her away. Riding home on the bus, she cried all the way. Berenice promised her a bridge party with grown-up refreshments as soon as school opened, but Frankie knew that she would never be happy again. That night she tried to run away. Not knowing where else to go, she went to the Blue Moon. There a policeman found her and sent for her father.

But by November Frankie had almost forgotten the wedding. Other things had happened. John Henry had died of meningitis. Honey Camden Brown, drug-crazed, had tried to hold up a drugstore and was in jail. Mary Littlejohn had become her best, real friend. She and her father were leaving the old house and going to live with Aunt Pet and Uncle Eustace in a new suburb. Berenice, waiting to see the last of the furniture taken away, was sad, for she knew that Frankie would depend on her no longer. Frankie—she wanted to be called Frances—was thirteen.

Critique:

Never was there a more lovable, merrier rogue than Sir John Falstaff. Indeed he has become the very essence of all stumbling, drunken scoundrels, but scoundrels against whom no one can long hold a grudge. It is to Falstaff that The Merry Wives of Windsor owes its great popularity. The plot is simple but highly amusing, a story of women plotting toward the ruination of one man and the complete subjection of another. The resulting situations are hilarious. The subplot of love conquering all is another favorite of the theater. But it is Falstaff, the lovable oaf, who brings the reader back to this play again and again.

The Story:

Sir John Falstaff was, without doubt, a rogue. True, he was fat, jolly, and in a way lovable, but he was still a rogue. His men robbed and plundered the citizens of Windsor, but he himself was seldom taken or convicted for his crimes. His fortunes being at low ebb, he hit upon a plan to remedy that situation. He had met Mistress Ford and Mistress Page, two good ladies who held the purse strings in their respective houses. Falstaff wrote identical letters to the two good ladies, letters protesting undying love for each of them.

The daughter of one of the ladies, Anne Page, was the center of a love triangle. Her father wished her to marry Slender, a foolish gentleman who did not love her or anyone else, but who would marry any girl that was recommended to him by his cousin, the justice. But Mistress Page, on the other hand, would have her daughter married to Doctor Caius, a French physician then in Windsor. Anne herself loved Fenton, a fine young gentleman who was deeply in love with her. All three lovers paid the doctor's housekeeper, Mistress Quickly, to plead their cause with Anne, for Mistress Quickly had convinced each that she alone could persuade Anne to answer yes to a proposal. Mistress Quickly was, in fact, second only to Falstaff in her plotting and her trickery.

Unknown to poor Falstaff, Mistress Ford and Mistress Page compared the letters received from him, alike except for the lady's name. They decided to cure him of his knavery once and for all. Mistress Ford arranged to have him come to her house that night when her husband would be away. Mistress Page wrote that she would meet him as soon as she could cautiously arrange it. In the meantime two former followers of Falstaff had told the two husbands of that knave's designs on their wives. Page refused to believe his wife unfaithful, but Ford became jealous and planned to spy on his wife. Disguising himself as Mr. Brook, he called on Falstaff. His story was that he loved Mistress Ford but could not win her love, and he came to pay Falstaff to court her for him. His stratagem was successful; he learned from Falstaff that the knight already had a rendezvous with the lady that very night.

At the appointed time, having previously arranged to have several servants assist in the plot, the two ladies were ready for Falstaff. While Falstaff was trying to make love to Mistress Ford, Mistress Page rushed in and said that Ford was on his way home. Quickly the ladies put Falstaff in a clothesbasket and had him carried out by the servants, to be dumped into the Thames. Ford did arrive, of course, for, unknown to his wife, he knew Falstaff was to be there. But after looking high and low without finding the rogue, he apologized to his wife for his suspicions. Mistress Ford did not know which had been the most sport, having Falstaff dumped into the river or listening to her husband's discomfited apologies.

The ladies had so much fun over their first joke played on Falstaff that they decided to try another. Mistress Ford then sent him another message, this one saying that her husband would be gone all of the following morning, and she asked Falstaff to call on her at that time so that she could make amends for the previous affair of the basket. Again Ford, disguised as Brook, called on Falstaff, and again he learned of the proposed assignation. He learned also of the method of Falstaff's previous escape and vowed the old roisterer should not again slip through his fingers.

When Mistress Ford heard from Mistress Page that Ford was returning unexpectedly, the ladies dressed Falstaff in the clothes of a fat woman whom Ford hated. Ford, finding the supposed woman in his house, drubbed the disguised knight soundly and chased him from the house. Again Ford searched everywhere for Falstaff, and again he was forced to apologize to his wife in the presence of the friends he had brought with him to witness her disgrace. The two ladies thought his discomfiture the funniest part of their joke.

Once more the wives planned to plague poor Falstaff, but this time they took their husbands into their confidence. When Mistress Page and Mistress Ford told about the letters they had received from Falstaff and explained the details of the two adventures already carried out, Ford felt very contrite over his former suspicions of his wife. Eagerly the husbands joined their wives in a final scheme intended to bring Falstaff to public shame. The ladies would persuade Falstaff to meet them in the park at midnight. Falstaff was to be disguised as Herne the Hunter, a horned legendary huntsman said to roam the wintry woods each midnight. There he would be surrounded by Anne Page and others dressed as fairies and elves. After he had been frightened half to death, the husbands would accost him and publicly display his knavery.

But a quite different event had also been planned for that night. Page plotted to have Slender seize Anne in her disguise as the fairy queen and carry her away to marry her. At the same time Mistress Page arranged to have Doctor Caius find Anne and take her away to be married. But Anne had other plans. She and Fenton agreed to meet in the park and under cover of the dark and confusion flee her parents and her two unwelcome suitors.

All plans were put into effect. Falstaff, after telling the supposed Brook that on this night he would for a certainty win Mistress Ford for him, donned the horns of a stag and met the two ladies at the appointed place. Quickly the fairies and witches surrounded him, and the women ran away to join their husbands and watch the fun. Poor Falstaff tried to pretend that he was asleep or dead, but the merry revelers burned his fingers with tapers they carried, and pinched him unmercifully. When Falstaff threw off his disguise, Ford and Page and their wives laid hold of him and soundly scolded him for his silly gallantry and bombast. The wives ridiculed his fat and his ugliness and swore that none would ever have such a fool for a lover. But such was Falstaff's nature that no one could hate him for long. After he had admitted his guilt and his stupidity they all forgave him.

While all this merriment was going on, Anne and Fenton had stolen away to be married. They returned while the rest were busy with Falstaff. But Page and his wife were in such good humor over all that had occurred that they forgave the young lovers and bestowed on them their blessing. Then the whole company, Falstaff with them, retired to Page's house, there to laugh again over the happenings of that night.

MICHAEL AND HIS LOST ANGEL

Type of work: Drama

Type of plot: Social tragedy

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England and Italy

First presented: 1896

THE REVEREND MICHAEL FEVERSHAM, vicar at Cleveheddon

ANDREW GIBBARD, a parish clerk

ROSE GIBBARD, his daughter

AUDRIE LESDEN, Michael's mistress

SIR LYOLF FEVERSHAM, Michael's uncle

FATHER HILARY, a priest

Critique:

Although Michael and His Lost Angel was not one of Henry Arthur Jones' most popular plays at the time of its presentation, he himself considered it his most serious and best work. The play, which has become a familiar anthology piece, is the tragic story of a man's loss of faith in himself, for the death of Audrie Lesden is secondary to the disintegration of Michael Feversham's own soul. The character development is excellent, accurately portrayed, with deep insight into a minister's struggle with his own conscience.

The Story:

The Reverend Michael Feversham regretted that he must deal harshly with Rose, the daughter of his clerk, Andrew Gibbard. Because the girl had sinned, and Andrew had lied about Rose and her now dead child, Michael sternly insisted upon a public confession before the whole congregation of Cleveheddon Church. Only in that way, he believed, could Andrew and his daughter be absolved of their sin and deceit. Later Michael sent the girl away to an Anglican religious house where she could start life anew.

Andrew owed everything he had in life to Michael, but he could not forgive him for exposing Rose to the scorn of the smug, self-righteous parishioners. He recognized, however, the moral fervor which had prompted Michael's attitude and convictions.

Michael, having dedicated his life to his church and his people, felt that he was watched over by his dead mother, whose picture hung in his study. She was his guardian angel, he thought, knowing everything he said or did. He knew he must try always to be worthy of her guardianship.

When Audrie Lesden came to his parish, he was afraid he would be unworthy of his guardian angel's love and care. Audrie was a wealthy woman, reported a widow, who had been attracted to Michael because of a book he had written. Although she subscribed large sums for Michael's project of restoring the minister of Saint Decuman, an ancient Gothic church at Cleveheddon, she was a worldly woman, one torn in half by her emotions and desires. She wanted to be a good woman, to be worthy of Michael, but she wished also to enjoy the pleasures of the world. Sir Lyolf Feversham, Michael's kinsman, warned the young clergyman against her. Michael, thinking her possessed of great possibilities for good or evil, fought against her influence and pleaded with her to use him only as her spiritual adviser. At the same time he found himself almost helpless against her charm.

Andrew Gibbard watched Michael's struggle with an evil pleasure which he too fought against. He knew that the vicar had acted as he thought right in his daughter's case, but he was human enough to enjoy seeing a saintly man learn what temptations of the flesh were like.

The ancient shrine on Saint Decuman's Island in the Bristol Channel was a place to which Michael often went for study and meditation. One day Audrie took an excursion steamer to the island and remained behind after the boat had returned to the mainland. It was then impossible for her or Michael to return to Cleveheddon before the next day. She and Michael spent the night on the island. Although he did his best to resist her, he found himself weak. They sinned, just as Rose Gibbard had sinned. Afterward Michael tried to conceal the truth, more to protect Audrie than himself, but Andrew finally uncovered the clergyman's secret. He did not reproach Michael; in fact, he promised to keep silent. For the next several months, however, Michael could sense Andrew's scorn because the vicar did not make the same confession he had forced from Andrew and his daughter.

Audrie went to Michael with some disturbing news. She had heard from her husband, whom she had allowed everyone to believe dead. Their married life had been wretched, she said, and at last she had paid him to go to America and never bother her again. Now he was returning to England. Michael advised her to go back to her husband; that course, he said, was the road to true repentance for their sin. After Audrie had left Cleveheddon she continued to send him money for the restoration of the minster. Although the money was sent anonymously, Michael knew the gifts came from her.

Andrew also guessed the source of the donations.

When the minster of Saint Decuman had been restored, Michael sent for Rose Gibbard. Having decided that he could no longer live with his own conscience if he did not confess publicly, he wanted the girl to witness his disgrace so that she would know that he could be just and unsparing with himself as well. Andrew tried to dissuade him from his plan, but Michael was firm. Then Andrew really forgave Michael and blessed him.

At the church, shortly before the dedication service, Audrie came to Michael again. Her husband had died and she hoped that she and Michael might love each other honorably at last. But Michael felt that their sin had been too great ever to allow them happiness with each other. He sent her away after making her promise not to attend the service the next day.

Before the reconsecration of the minster the next morning, Michael bared his sin to his congregation. He told them that he could no longer be their vicar because he was not worthy, and he asked the people to pray for him after he left the parish.

A year later Michael was living in a monastery at Majano, Italy. He was almost ready to change his faith and join the Catholic Church in order to find peace of mind. Also at Majano were Sir Lyolf and Father Hilary, a priest whom Michael had known at Saint Decuman's shrine. Longing for Audrie had made the young clergyman almost physically ill. Even his mother's picture brought him no happiness; he felt that his guardian angel had justifiably deserted him because of his wickedness.

During his absence from the monastery Audrie arrived. She was sick and soon to die, and she wanted to see Michael once more. Sir Lyolf was greatly concerned over her condition. When Michael returned, Sir Lyolf reminded him of his promise that he would go to Audrie if she ever needed him. Michael was almost beside himself when he saw her and realized that she was dying. Audrie, still torn between love for him and love for the world, said that she would become his guardian angel, that they would never part again. His mother, she whispered, would forgive. As she died in his arms, Michael threw himself on her body and cried to Father Hilary that he was willing to suffer all but that he must meet Audrie again. He asked the priest to help him to believe.

Critique:

The capriciousness, the changeableness of lovers is obviously the theme of the perennially romantic and entertaining comedy, A Midsummer Night's Dream. Shakespeare presents a group of lovers so irresponsible in their actions that their freakish behavior can be explained only by the intervention of supernatural beings. All of the lovers in the play switch their affections from time to time, but they are not responsible for their infidelity; love makes them irrational. The play is a delightful comedy, one of the favorites by the master dramatist. It enjoys frequent revivals by noted producers and actors and will undoubtedly always retain its popularity.

The Story:

Theseus, the Duke of Athens, was to be married in four days to Hippolyta, Queen of the Amazons, and he ordered his Master of the Revels to prepare suitable entertainment for the nuptials. But other lovers of ancient Athens were not so happy as their ruler. Hermia, in love with Lysander, was loved also by Demetrius, who had her father's permission to marry her. When she refused his suit, Demetrius took his case to Theseus and demanded that the law be invoked. Theseus upheld the father, which meant that Hermia must either marry Demetrius, be placed in a nunnery, or be put to death. Hermia swore that she would enter a convent before she would consent to become Demetrius' bride.

But Lysander plotted with Hermia to steal her away from Athens, take her to the home of his aunt, and there marry her. They were to meet the following night in a woods outside the city. Hermia confided the plan to her good friend Helena. Demetrius had formerly been betrothed to Helena, and although he had switched his love to Hermia he was still desperately loved by the scorned Helena. Helena, willing to do anything to gain even

Unknown to any of the four young people, there were to be others in that same woods on the appointed night, Midsummer Eve. A guild of Athenian laborers was to meet there to practice a play the members hoped to present in honor of Theseus and Hippolyta's wedding. The fairies also held their midnight revels in the woods. Oberon, king of the fairies, desired for his page a little Indian prince, but Oberon's queen, Titania, had the boy. Loving him like a son, she refused to give him up to her husband. In order to force Titania to do his bidding, Oberon ordered his mischievous page, called Puck or Robin Goodfellow, to secure the juice of "Love in Idleness," a purple flower once hit by Cupid's dart. This juice, when placed in the eyes of anyone sleeping, caused that person to fall in love with the first creature seen on awakening. Oberon planned to drop some of the juice in Titania's eyes and then refuse to lift the charm until she gave him the boy.

While Puck was on his errand, Demetrius and Helena entered the woods. Making himself invisible, Oberon heard Helena plead her love for Demetrius and heard the young man scorn and berate her. They had come to the woods to find the fleeing lovers, Lysander and Hermia. Oberon, pitying Helena, determined to aid her. When Puck returned with the juice, Oberon ordered him to find the Athenian and place some of the juice in his eyes so that he would love the girl who doted on him.

Puck went to do as he was ordered, while Oberon squeezed the juice of the flower into the eyes of Titania as she slept. But Puck, coming upon Lysander and Hermia as they slept in the woods, mistook Lysander's Athenian dress for that of Demetrius and poured the charmed juice into Lysander's eyes. Lysander was awakened by Helena, who had been abandoned deep in the woods by Demetrius. The charm worked perfectly;

Lysander fell in love with Helena. That poor girl, thinking that he was mocking her with his ardent protestations of love, begged him to stop his teasing and return to the sleeping Hermia. But Lysander, pursuing Helena, left Hermia alone in the forest. When she awakened she feared that Lysander had been killed, for she believed that he would never have deserted her otherwise.

Titania, in the meantime, awakened to a strange sight. The laborers, practicing for their play, had paused not far from the sleeping fairy queen. Bottom, the comical but stupid weaver who was to play the leading role, became the butt of another of Puck's jokes. The prankster clapped an ass's head over Bottom's own foolish pate and led the poor fool a merry chase until the weaver was at the spot where Titania lay sleeping. Thus when she awakened she looked at Bottom, still wearing the head of an ass. She fell instantly in love with him and ordered the fairies to tend his every want. This turn pleased Oberon mightily. When he learned of the mistake Puck had made in placing the juice in Lysander's eyes, however, he tried to right the wrong by placing love juice also in Demetrius' eyes, and he ordered Puck to have Helena close by when Demetrius awakened. His act made both girls unhappy and forlorn. When Demetrius, who she knew hated her, also began to make love to her, Helena thought that both men were taunting and ridiculing her. And poor Hermia, encountering Lysander, could not understand why he tried to drive her away, all the time protesting that he loved only Helena.

Again Oberon tried to set matters straight. He ordered Puck to lead the two men in circles until weariness forced them to lie down and go to sleep. Then a potion to remove the charm and make the whole affair seem like a dream was to be placed in Lysander's eyes. Afterward he would again love Hermia, and all the young people would be united in proper pairs. Titania, too, was to have the charm removed, for Oberon had taunted her about loving an ass until she had given up the prince to him. Puck obeyed the orders and placed the potion in Lysander's eyes.

The four lovers were awakened by Theseus, Hippolyta, and Hermia's father, who had gone into the woods to watch Theseus' hounds perform. Lysander again loved Hermia and Demetrius still loved Helena, for the love juice remained in his eyes. Hermia's father persisted in his demand that his daughter marry Demetrius, but since that young man no longer wanted her and all four were happy with their partners, he ceased to oppose Lysander's suit. Theseus gave them permission to marry on the day set for his own wedding to Hippolyta.

Titania also awakened and, like the others, thought that she had been dreaming. Puck removed the ass's head from Bottom and that poor bewildered weaver made his way back to Athens, reaching there just in time to save the play from ruin, for he was to play Pyramus, the hero. The Master of the Revels tried to dissuade Theseus from choosing the laborer's play for the wedding night. Theseus, however, was intrigued by a play that was announced as both tedious and brief as well as merry and tragic. So Bottom and his troupe presented Pyramus and Thisbe, much to the merriment of all the guests.

After the play all the bridal couples retired to their suites, and Oberon and Titania sang a fairy song over them, promising that they and all their children would be blessed.

THE MILL ON THE PO

Author: Riccardo Bacchelli (1891- )

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: 1812-1872

Locale: The region of the Po River, near Ferrara

First published: 1938-1940

Principal characters:

LAZZARO SCACERNI, a miller on the Po

DOSOLINA, his wife

GIUSEPPE, his son

CECILIA, his daughter-in-law

Critique:

The epic sweep and poetic fervor of The Mill on the Po give Bacchelli's novel a significant place in Italian fiction of the twentieth century. Its story fills two volumes of a projected trilogy and embraces the stormy period of Italian unification. Political events, however, are not the prime consideration of the author, except as they affect the lives of people who are caught in the backwash of historical events. His chief interest is centered in the obscure heroes who struggle to obtain peace and security without becoming submerged by the mighty forces of history and nature.

The Story:

In 1817 a new water mill appeared on the Po River, near the city of Ferrara. Its owner was young Lazzaro Scacerni, who had become a miller in an odd fashion indeed. Nevertheless, he was no stranger to the river—his father had been a ferryman at Ariano before dying in the peasant uprising of 1807. Shortly afterward the boy Lazzaro had been sent, along with other orphans, to serve as cabin boy in the navy. When he became older, he went over to the army pontoniers, and in 1812 he found himself a part of Napoleon's ill-fated Russian campaign.

It was in Russia that the story of the mill really started. During the terrible retreat, a dying captain gave Lazzaro a mysterious receipt, which the illiterate young Scacerni could not read. He guarded it closely, however, as he straggled homeward from a debacle in which fourteen out of every fifteen Italian soldiers had perished. Finally regaining the neighborhood of Ferrara, Lazzaro led a hand-to-mouth existence while waiting for a chance to make use of his one asset. He learned to read well enough to decipher the name and address attached to the receipt, and subsequent search led to Ezekiel the Jew, in Ferrara's ghetto. The receipt was for jewels, plundered from Spanish churches by Lazzaro's benefactor. His windfall once assured, Lazzaro cannily pondered its best use. Millers, he decided, were least affected by times of adversity, and he arranged with a friendly old shipwright to build him a mill. In due time it was finished, christened St. Michael's, and put into operation.

As the years passed, the miller prospered. One, two, and finally three boys were hired for helpers as his trade grew. His success inspired more envy than affection among his neighbors, but not a few of their wives and daughters succumbed to his dashing gallantries. Nearly forty and wearying of bachelorhood, Lazzaro fell in love with Dosolina, poor but delicately beautiful and twenty years his junior. Lazzaro bought a house, married Dosolina, and settled down to enjoy his prosperity.

But fate was not always to smile. Floods came, the bane of the Po River millers, and smugglers, crossing between Italy and Austria, insolently adopted his mill for a rendezvous. On the birth night of his son Giuseppe, Lazzaro's troubles reached a climax. While Dosolina was writhing in difficult labor, the desperate Lazzaro fought to save his mill from the swollen menace of the Po. Slipping on the wet deck, he broke a leg but continued to direct his helpers, two of whom worked manfully. The third was malformed Beffa, who secretly hated his master and who had become a tool of the smugglers. Shedding all restraint, Beffa openly exulted over his master's plight and scornfully asserted that the miller had been cuckolded—whereupon Lazzaro reached out, seized Beffa with his muscular arms, and hurled him into the river.

Dosolina recovered, and the mill was saved; but Beffa's damp dismissal caused Lazzaro to receive disturbing threats from Raguseo, king of the smugglers. A gang feud, however, broke out among the outlaws soon afterward, disposing of both Raguseo and Beffa. Lazzaro breathed more easily thereafter. One danger was over, but another seemed constant, for intermittent floods continued to threaten St. Michael's Mill. One day a large mill washed ashore near Lazzaro's own, its only occupant a young girl orphaned by the flood. To Cecilia her mill meant home; she was very happy when the Scacernis befriended her and reestablished her mill alongside theirs. From that time on Lazzaro regarded the girl almost as his own daughter.

He was much less pleased, however, with the character and disposition of his own son. Bandy-legged, crafty, and cowardly, Giuseppe cared nothing about his father's trade except its profit. He early showed great skill, as well as great avarice, in business dealings of any kind, and he was held in contempt, except by his mother. During the late 1840's he began successfully trafficking in grain with the hated Austrians, but the same years brought new distress to his family. Roving bands of partisans, now Italian and now Austrian mercenaries, infested the countryside and disturbed the peace and security of the Scacernis. Finally, both mills were commandeered by the Austrians, and Lazzaro and Cecilia were required to transfer them to the opposite side of the river.

After a few months the mills were allowed to return, but the political atmosphere was still cloudy and confused among the rival claims and interests of the papacy, the Italian nationalistic movement, and Austria. Lazzaro, who was growing old and querulous, found much to complain about. Only at the mills, in the company of his helpers and Cecilia, did he feel comfortable; and even there he sometimes railed at the open smuggling which carried scarce grain across the river to Austria. He was outraged when he learned that Giuseppe took a leading role in such transactions.

Suddenly an unexpected family affair arose which gave concern to both the elder Scacernis, though for entirely different reasons. Giuseppe, apparently inattentive to women, had long slyly coveted Cecilia for his wife, in spite of her obvious indifference to him. Not daring to risk her mockery by a proposal, he went about winning his goal by characteristic trickery. Meantly playing on her fondness for his father, Giuseppe blandly announced that Lazzaro had broken a law by possessing concealed firearms. His son could exert influence to head off his arrest and punishment—but only for a price, Cecilia's consent to marry him. Cecilia, taken by surprise, was confused, angry, and ignorantly fearful. Her devotion to Lazzaro, however, was greater than her repugnance for his son, and in the end Giuseppe had his way.

Lazzaro, unaware of Cecilia's sacrifice, felt baffled and hurt by what he considered her poor judgment. In turn, Dosolina regarded her new daughter-in-law as little better than a river gipsy and quite unworthy of her son. Neither of the parents, however, had long to lament the marriage. In 1855 Dosolina was the victim of a wave of cholera which swept all Europe. The next morning Lazzaro was found dead beside her.

The structure of Italy changed: time was bringing Austrian defeat, the end of papal rule, and the dawn of a united nation. These things, of course, meant little to Cecilia Scacerni. But the small warmth of her nature found, at last, a suitable outlet. Her first-born and favorite, Lazzarino, was vigorous and intelligent, a reminder of his grandfather in more than name. Even his grasping, mean-natured father openly adored him.

But Lazzarino was not destined to match his grandfather in years. Miserable at mockery of his father's cowardice, he ran off to join Garibaldi's volunteers. News of his death staggered Cecilia, but its effect on Giuseppe was catastrophic. Grief gnawed at his reason, and the destruction of his house and crops by flood completed his downfall. Howling obscenely, he was carted off to the asylum. Left alone, Cecilia looked about her with calm courage. There was work to do, and she would see that it was done.

THE MINISTRY OF FEAR

Author: Graham Greene (1904- )

Type of plot: Psychological melodrama

Time of plot: World War II

Locale: London and environs

First published: 1943

Principal characters:

ARTHUR ROWE, a middle-aged Englishman who has killed his wife

ANNA HILFE, an Austrian refugee

WILLI HILFE, Anna's brother and a fifth-column leader

DR. FORESTER, English dupe of Willi Hilfe

Critique:

This novel records a train of incidents halfway between horror and insanity, while demonstrating how fifth-column agents worked in England during World War II. The ministry of fear was, of course, an organization of fascist agents operating in England and using as their tools people who had something in their pasts which they preferred to hide. In addition, there are descriptions of the blitz of 1940, when the German bombers obliterated a large section of London. The scenes describe not only the destruction and the confusion attendant upon it but also the reactions of Londoners who suffered through the raids day after day and night after night. As a whole, the novel captures the madhouse-like quality which hung for so many years over England and the rest of the world; the very disruption of values in human life is brought home to even an insensitive reader.

The Story:

Arthur Rowe, a middle-aged Englishman, happened one day onto a fête in blitz-torn London. In an effort to recapture some spirit of the brighter past, he entered the grounds. While there he had his fortune told, and the seer told him the weight of a cake which was to go to the person who guessed the weight correctly. Rowe won the cake and started to leave, but the clergyman who was in charge of the affair tried to get the cake back again. Rowe, angered, gave a pound note to the cause and left.

That same night, just before the German bombers flew up the Thames to terrorize the city, Rowe had his first visitor in months, a man who had just rented rooms in the same house. The visitor behaved very oddly. When given a piece of cake by Rowe, he crumbled it as if looking for something. Then, while Rowe was out of the room, the man slipped something into Rowe's tea. Rowe, returning, smelled the peculiar odor of the tea, but before he could say or do anything a bomb fell wrecking the house. He regained consciousness to find the house demolished.

The next day the worried Rowe, who had few friends to whom he could turn because he had killed his wife in a mercy killing, went to a detective agency, where he hired a man named Jones to watch after him and discover why someone wished to take his life. Rowe then went to the relief office which had been in charge of the fête at which he had won the cake. There he found a young woman, Anna Hilfe, and her brother Willi in charge of the office. The two said they were Austrian refugees. Willi Hilfe went with Rowe to the home of the fortune-teller in an effort to uncover the reason for the attempt on Rowe's life.

At the fortune-teller's home the two men were invited to stay for a seance. During the seance the man sitting next to Rowe was murdered with Rowe's knife. Rowe, with Willi's aid, escaped from the house before the police arrived. He went to an air-raid shelter and remained there through the night. He wrote a letter to the police, but before he posted it he called Anna, who told him that "they" were still after him. "They" were supposed to be Nazi agents. Still Rowe could not understand why he had become a marked man. Anna agreed to aid Rowe and told him to send an address where he could be reached.

After talking to her, Rowe called the detective agency, only to find that Jones, the man he had hired, had disappeared and that the head of the agency had called the police in on the case. Rowe wandered aimlessly about the city until the afternoon, when he met a man who asked him to take a valise full of books to a Mr. Travers at a hotel. When Rowe arrived at the hotel, he was escorted to Travers' room. There he found Anna waiting for him. In fear of their lives, the two waited for the air raids to begin. They believed that Nazi agents would kill them during the noise and confusion of the raids. Then a bomb fell on the hotel. Rowe awoke in a private nursing home without any memory beyond his eighteenth year.

Anna visited him several times in the nursing home, and Rowe fell in love with her during the visits. She would not tell him of his past, and claimed that the head of the institution, Dr. Forester, wanted the recovery to be slow enough not to cause shock. One day a military officer being treated in the home confided that he had seen someone digging on the island in a pond on the grounds. The officer was immediately put into a strait jacket, while Rowe was confined to his room without newspapers or his clothes on the pretext that he had suffered a mild relapse.

Convinced that some evil was afoot, Rowe escaped from the room and visited the officer. His visit with the officer confirmed his suspicions. Within a few hours the doctor returned and, extremely angry at Rowe, threatened him, too, with a strait jacket. With the help of an attendant, Rowe escaped and went to Scotland Yard. He turned himself in as the murderer of the victim at the seance, but to his surprise he was told that no one had been murdered there. The police turned him over to a counter-intelligence agent, who told Rowe that the murder had been a fraud to drive him into hiding and that the nursing home was actually a front for fifth-column activities.

The agent, Rowe, and a man from the hotel where Rowe had been injured went to the tailor shop run by the man who had supposedly been murdered. During the interview the tailor placed a phone call and after it was completed killed himself. The agent, angry at losing the man before learning any information, told Rowe that he had inadvertently been given a cake containing secret film which had been taken by Nazi agents from British documents.

Rowe and the agent then went to the home of the fortune-teller. There they failed to find the film, and they got no information. The last stop of the trip was at the nursing home. There they found the military officer dead, killed by Dr. Forester, who, Rowe now remembered, had been at the fortune-teller's home on the night of the supposed murder. The doctor was also dead, having been killed by the attendant who had helped Rowe to escape.

Without telling the counter-intelligence agent, Rowe called the number he had seen the tailor dial. When the call was answered, he found Anna at the other end. Going to her apartment, Rowe discovered that it was her brother Willi who was the head of the fifth-column ring. With Anna's help Rowe almost got the film. Anna, torn between love for her brother and for Rowe, allowed Willi to escape. Rowe, whose memory was almost complete, followed Willi and regained the film at the railroad station. He returned Willi's gun to him with but one bullet in it. Willi then went to the wash-room and killed himself, but not before he had revealed the last piece of information which Rowe had failed to remember, the fact that Rowe had killed his first wife to put her out of pain. With the film in his possession, ready to give to the police, Rowe returned to Anna's apartment to tell her of her brother's death and to declare his love to her. Anna, even though he had driven her brother to his death, pledged her love for him as well.

MINNA VON BARNHELM

Author: Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Germany

First presented: 1767

Principal characters:

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, a discharged officer

JUST, his servant

PAUL WERNER, his sergeant
MINNA VON BARNHELM, in love with Tellheim
FRANZISKA, her maid

Critique:

Minna von Barnhelm is important for two reasons. First, it was a beginning of a drama native to Germany, with much appeal for its original audience: the historical background touched their patriotism; its treatment of German soldiers and German women aroused their sympathy; and its amusing blend of comedy and pathos touched their hearts. Secondly, it ranks high in Lessing's canon. Modern readers follow the action easily, for the unity of plot and setting keeps the play in small compass.

The Story:

Major von Tellheim had been wounded in the right arm, and after heroic deeds he had been discharged from the army. Crippled and poor, he had been put out of his room at the inn; in his absence his effects had been placed in a mean chamber with no view. The landlord had perhaps been justified. Two ladies had arrived asking for good accommodations, and Tellheim was behind in his rent.

Tellheim's servant, Just, sat in the inn parlor muttering about the injustice done to his master. The landlord came in and gave Just several drinks, but the worthy servant would not cease his complaints. Tellheim, entering in time to hear some of the dispute, ended the controversy by saying that the bill would be paid and that he would move out immediately. The landlord declared he was not afraid the bill would not be paid, for he had found a rich purse in Tellheim's writing desk.

When they were alone, Tellheim explained to Just that the money in the purse belonged to Werner, his sergeant; it was a trust. For immediate needs Tellheim asked his servant to pawn a ring for eighty louis. He tried to dismiss Just with a month's wages, but the servant preferred to work on for nothing. Then a widow came in to repay a loan Tellheim had made to her dead husband. Tellheim sent her away, vowing her husband owed him nothing. Werner tried to help the major by giving him all he could realize from the sale of his farm, but Tellheim would accept no help.

The ladies who had taken Tellheim's rooms were Minna von Barnhelm, a rich girl of twenty-one, and Franziska, her maid. Minna was agitated, for she had come in search of Tellheim. They had been betrothed, but she had had no word from him since the peace.

The landlord, who was inquisitive about his guests, came to their room to fill out an official form. When his questions became too personal, Minna, to turn the conversation, asked about the soldier whose room they had taken. The landlord contemptuously declared that he was only a discharged officer and showed her the ring Just had pawned with him. Minna recognized it at once as the ring she had given Tellheim. In the joy of her recognition, she put money to redeem it on the table and asked the landlord to bring in Tellheim at once.

When Tellheim first saw Minna, he spoke to her as a lover; but he promptly recovered himself and addressed her more formally. Hurt, Minna demanded a direct answer as to whether he still loved her. Tellheim admitted that he did. Crippled as he was, however, penniless, and discharged from service, he was no longer a suitable husband.

Tellheim wrote a note to Minna in which he explained fully why he could no longer expect to marry her. While Just was delivering the note, he fell into conversation with Franziska, who asked about the rest of Tellheim's servants. Just admitted that he alone was left. The valet had decamped with Tellheim's wardrobe; the huntsman had been imprisoned for treachery during the war, and the footman had run up debts in Tellheim's name.

The curious landlord attempted to get the story behind the reunion of Minna and Tellheim, but Franziska gave him little satisfaction. When he attempted to get a hundred louis for the pawned ring, she reminded him tartly that the loan was only eighty louis.

Werner returned to the inn with his pockets full of money. He emphatically denied that Tellheim was poor; all the sergeant's money really belonged to the major. When Franziska told him about the pawned ring, Werner tried to pass off the matter by saying that so many women give rings to soldiers. Undoubtedly Tellheim had twenty rings. Franziska left in anger, but she left Werner meditating on her charms.

Werner, meeting Tellheim, tried to give him the money he had collected by selling all his goods. He was put out by Tellheim's refusal because he felt old comrades in arms should help each other.

Franziska brought Tellheim's letter to Minna back to the major with word that Minna had not read it. Instead, she expected him to take her riding. Werner, seeing that the major was really fond of Minna, confessed to Franziska his falsehood about the twenty rings. She teased him coquettishly about his ready tongue. When she went back to Minna, her mistress told her she had a plan to recapitulate Tellheim.

Minna's scheme was to let Tellheim think that she, too, was poor after being disinherited; Franziska would tell him that her uncle, Count von Bruchsal, had cut her off because he objected to her marriage to Tellheim. In preparation for the plot, Minna took off the ring Tellheim had given her and put on the ring she had redeemed from the landlord.

Lieutenant Riccaut, seeking Tellheim, arrived at the inn. He announced that he was a great friend of Tellheim's and that he had good news for the major. A high government official had told him that Tellheim would soon have a letter from the king restoring his commission and righting his financial troubles. Minna, delighted with the news, questioned Riccaut about himself. He was a gambler who had had bad luck for a long time. Minna gave him money to start up a bank again. Riccaut promised to repay the money and let her have a third of the profits. As their talk continued, Minna was repelled to realize that Riccaut was a sharper rather than a gentleman gambler.

Tellheim had a long interview with Minna. He rehearsed again his misfortunes and added that he was under suspicion by the war ministry. Instructed to levy a war tax on the people in Minna's neighborhood, he had nobly advanced the money out of his own fortune. After the peace he had tried to collect from the government, but he was discharged under suspicion of double-dealing. Obviously he could not marry Minna and be dependent on her.

Minna pretended anger at his reasoning and gave him back the ring she had recovered from the landlord. After she left, Franziska told Tellheim that Minna was also poor. In great relief he straightway went in search of her to get her back.

Thinking Minna destitute, Tellheim asked Werner for all the money he could get. Soon Tellheim would go to the wars in Asia as a mercenary soldier, and Werner and Minna would go with him to the Orient. The delighted Werner brought in all the gold he could lay his hands on.

The plan never materialized, however. An orderly brought a letter from the king in which Tellheim learned his bill against the government would be honored and that he was recommissioned in the army. Tellheim's jubilation ended when he learned that Minna had not given him back her engagement ring after all, but rather the ring he had pawned. He interpreted her redemption of the pledge as proof that Minna had sought him out to break the engagement. The lovers were reconciled, however, by the arrival of Count von Bruchsal. The count declared his love for them both and sanctioned their marriage.

Werner thought he had as good luck as his master, for he became engaged to Franziska.

MR. KLEAVER, the surgeon

Critique:

Esther Forbes is probably the outstanding woman writer of historical novels in America today. She is primarily interested in New England, where she lives and where her ancestors have lived since Massachusetts was settled. She was peculiarly equipped to write A Mirror for Witches, since witches are common to the folklore and history of her region and it is said that one of her ancestors died in jail after being charged with witchcraft. While the nineteenth-century Hawthorne used this kind of material symbolically, and others have used it romantically or sentimentally, Esther Forbes has written originally and brilliantly in making A Mirror for Witches a psychologically realistic novel. Under the same title, a successful modern ballet has been based on this tale of demonism and witchcraft in early Puritan times.

The Story:

Mr. Jared Bilby, captain of an English brig, landed his ship in Brittany on a day when the French burned over two hundred witches and warlocks. Attracted by the holocaust, he saw a tiny girl trying to pass the guards in order to reach her burning mother. Bilby sheltered the child and took her home. He thought she would forget her past, for she lay in a swoon for days. But she remembered only the evil of the years before she met Bilby.

Bilby called the little one his dolly and soon the child was known as Bilby's Doll. They adored each other, but Bilby's wife Hannah hated the child as soon as she saw her. Hannah, who had been barren for years, had recently become pregnant. One searing look from Doll withered Hannah to the marrow, and she believed thereafter that Doll had blasted her unborn child.

Bilby took his family to America. On the ship they met Mr. Zelley, a minister who became friendly and settled close to them at Cowan Corners, near Salem.

on with disfavor by the townspeople because she associated with Indians in her search for herbs, was called to account by the churchmen because she had let fall in church a poppet she had made for Doll. No one would visit her, but suspicion fell away from her and centered on Doll when Hannah became strangely ill. Hannah told everyone that Doll was a witch who had cast a spell on Bilby so that it pleased him to pamper and fondle her. Mr. Zelley also befriended the girl.

To join their properties, Bilby proposed a marriage between Doll and Titus, the son of Deacon Thumb. Titus, a virtuous young man, was attracted to Doll and willing to wed. One day the Thumbs' black bull Ahab was missing. Titus got up early the next morning to catch the animal at a watering hole. The bull, ridden by an Indian, came crashing down to the water. Titus called out and shot at the Indian. In the twinkling of an eye Doll stood before him, her hands over her heart. Titus knew the bullet had gone through her, but there was no blood on her gown. He wanted to make love to Doll, but he felt only like a protecting big brother until after he had left her, when again he greatly desired her. From then on he began to pine away.

Bilby wished to speed the marriage. When Titus came courting, Doll frantically locked up the house, but at last she let him in. When he asked her to marry him, she bit his hand. He flung her away so hard that she hit her head and lay helpless. Titus wept.

Without telling Doll, Bilby had the marriage banns proclaimed the next Sunday. After Mr. Zelley had announced them, Doll screamed at her foster father. Cursed as he was, he took to his bed and died four days later. Doll kept herself hidden during his illness, but on the fourth day she went looking for Goody Greene. Tracing the herb woman's footsteps into the woods, Doll became lost. Lying down to sleep, she was startled to hear her father calling her. Then she knew that he was dead and she offered herself to the Evil One if he would only release Bilby's soul. Before and after sleeping she saw a host of evil signs and knew that she was a witch with powers for evil. On her return home Mr. Zelley assured her that her father had died from natural causes.

No one came to see Hannah and Doll during the winter except Mr. Zelley, who spoke to each separately because the women kept apart. When spring came, Doll noticed that by thought she could make the bull Ahab rush at Titus, and by twisting her fingers compel the deacon to break into fits of coughing. She kept looking for an agent of the Devil to instruct her in arts of evil.

Doll was lonely. The only house in which she was welcome was Goody Greene's. When she went there, Doll could feel a presence in the room which the woman would not identify. She could even see a bulge against the bed curtains. In the cellar, where she went for herbs, Doll was frightened by a little imp that looked like an Ethiopian.

In May there was a fire at the Thumbs'. Fascinated but terrified because fires reminded her of her parents' death, Doll went to watch the blaze. Ahab, penned in the burning barn, came thundering out as the roof fell in. Doll ran up a short ladder to the top of a haystack. There she found her demon prince, dressed like a sailor and carrying the imp she had seen in the cellar. The fiend called his imp the Bloody Shad.

Doll spent the summer nights happily with her demon lover, who taught her to say her prayers backwards. He told her that her parents were safe in hell and that she would have a short life, then life everlasting. Before he left her for good he told her that he would come back to be with her when she lay dying.

Shortly afterward three pirates were caught and executed at Boston harbor. One, called the Bloody Shad, carried a monkey that resembled a tiny imp.

Without her demon, Doll was lonely again. She spent much time in the Thumbs' pasture talking to Ahab, who was friendly with her but savage with anyone else. At last Titus' mother persuaded him to pen the beast. One day Doll met Titus' small twin sisters and gave them pumpkin seed poppets. Without telling their mother about them, the children ate the seeds and became deathly sick. Mrs. Thumb was sure Doll had withered the children's vitals when she learned that Doll had given them the poppets. The children screamed that Doll was visiting them and pinching them, but no one could see her. Strange things blamed on Doll happened to people in nearby towns. Convinced that Doll was a witch, Deacon Thumb and Mr. Kleaver, the surgeon, had her jailed.

At her trial the judges were at first convinced that Hannah's hatred for Doll had produced all the complaints against the girl. The twins, brought into the court, went into convulsions at the sight of her. When she touched them, the devil went out of them into her and they quieted. Then Doll, in reciting the Lord's prayer, said the last half backwards. When Doll spoke of her lover, Goody Greene claimed that he had been her pirate son, but the old woman was thrown out of court. The judges seemed so sympathetic that Doll told them why she thought she was a witch. She insisted, however, that she had never harmed the twins.

Held for a jury trial, Doll was put in irons. Mr. Zelley, going to comfort her, was confused by a third presence he could feel in the cell. Doll told him that her demon had come back to be with her. When she was found dead one dismal morning, her face was peaceful.

The genius of Molière has not been dimmed by time, for his plays are as popular today as they were to past generations. Almost every year sees a major theatrical company producing one of his dramas. The Miser (L'Avare) ranks with his best. Filled with satire, humor, and love interest, it meets all requirements for romance and comedy. Harpagon is often compared with Shylock as his equal in avarice and miserliness. All of the characters are clear-cut and well presented. The plot is exciting and fast-moving. It is little wonder that this and the other plays of Molière never lose their popularity.

The Story:

Valère, the steward of Harpagon's house, was in love with his employer's daughter Élise. Valère was sure that he was of a good family, but until he could find his relatives he had little hope that Harpagon would give his consent to a marriage between his daughter and his steward. Harpagon was a miser of such great avarice and stinginess that he loved nothing but money. He lived in constant fear that someone would rob him of the large sum he had buried in his garden. Valère knew that his only hope lay in insinuating himself into Harpagon's affection by flattering the old man beyond belief.

Harpagon's son Cléante was also in love. The object of his love was Mariane, a poor girl who lived with her widowed mother. But Cléante's love was as hopeless as that of his sister Élise and Valère. Since Mariane had no money, Harpagon would not consent to a marriage, and Cléante kept his love for the girl from his father. What he did not know was that his father had seen Mariane and wanted her for himself. He had been a widower for many years and the young girl's beauty made him desire her. He must first, however, secure a dowry for her; his miserliness was stronger than his love.

Élise learned from her father that against her wishes she was to be married to Anselme, a wealthy man of fifty. The fact that Anselme would take his daughter without a dowry was too good a proposition for Harpagon to pass by. Élise appealed to Valère for help. The clever lad pretended to agree with her father while he whispered to her to take heart and trust him to prevent the marriage. If all else failed, he and Élise would flee from the house and be married without her father's consent.

Cléante was so determined to marry Mariane that he arranged through an agent to borrow from a money-lender. Never was a higher rate of interest demanded. Cléante was to pay twenty-five percent interest and take part of the loan in goods which he must sell. With no choice but to agree, he went to meet the money-lender. He was horrified to find his own father. Harpagon was equally angry that his son should be such a spendthrift that he must borrow money at such high rates. The two parted without completing the loan, Cléante to try to arrange a loan elsewhere and Harpagon to try to secure a dowry for Mariane.

Harpagon arranged a party in honor of Mariane, whom he had not as yet met. He cautioned the servants to be very sparing with the food and drink, as it was an injustice to one's guests to stuff them full. Although Mariane found Harpagon repulsive, she was bound by her poor mother's wish to take a rich husband. When Mariane learned that Harpagon was the father of her beloved Cléante, she detested him more than ever. Cléante got a small measure of revenge on his father by taking a huge diamond ring from his father's finger and presenting it to Mariane after telling her that Harpagon wanted her to have it. The miser was helpless; he could not get it back unless he admitted his stinginess to the girl he wished to marry.

After Harpagon tricked Cléante into admitting his love for Mariane, the old man vowed more than ever to have her for himself. Cléante cursed his father and swore that the old miser should never have the girl, and Harpagon disinherited his son. Then a servant rushed in with the news that Harpagon had been robbed of his buried money. All else was forgotten by the miser as he cried out for help. He suspected everyone of stealing the money, even himself. He would have the whole household hanged, and if the money were not found he would hang himself.

A jealous servant told Harpagon that Valère had taken the money. Harpagon ordered the magistrate to arrest the steward, even though there was no true evidence against him. Anselme arrived in time to hear Valère shouting to Harpagon that he would marry Élise in spite of the miser's objections. Anselme said that he would bow out of the courtship, for he had no desire to take the girl against her wishes. Harpagon was furious. Where else could he find a wealthy son-in-law, particularly one who would demand no dowry? He pressed the magistrate to arrest Valère, but that young man stopped the official with the announcement that he was the son of Don Thomas d'Alburci, a nobleman of Naples who had had to flee his native city.

Valère said that he and a manservant had survived a shipwreck and made their way to Paris. He produced the family seals to prove his identity. Then Mariane rushed to him and told him that she was his sister, that she and her mother had also been saved from the wreck and had thought the rest of the family dead. But there was more joy to come for the reunited brother and sister. Anselme was their father, the former Don Thomas d'Alburci, who had also been saved. Thinking his loved ones dead, he had settled in Paris under the name of Anselme.

These revelations made no difference to Harpagon. He still insisted that Valère return his money. While he was ranting, Cléante entered the room and said that he had found the money and would return it to his father as soon as his father gave him permission to marry Mariane. That was no hard choice for Harpagon to make. He would gladly exchange Mariane, even his own children, for his money. Anselme also gave his consent to the marriage. Harpagon insisted that Anselme pay for both weddings. This the kind father was willing to do, and the happy couples and Anselme went off to tell Mariane's mother the glad news. Harpagon had an errand of his own. He went to examine his cashbox, the true love of his mean and stingy nature.

MISS JULIE

Author: August Strindberg (1849-1912)

Type of plot: Naturalism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: A country estate in Sweden

First presented: 1888

Principal characters:

MISS JULIE, a headstrong gentlewoman of twenty-five

JEAN, Miss Julie's lover and her father's valet

CHRISTINE, a cook, fiancée of Jean

Critique:

Strindberg termed this long, one-act play a naturalistic tragedy in his author's preface to the drama, which represented an effort on his part to popularize the naturalism of French literature in the literature of Sweden. In his preface Strindberg declared that the impetus for the play's content came from his reading of the novels of the Goncourt brothers rather than the fiction of Zola, who is generally considered the fountainhead of naturalism in European literature. Readers will quickly note the emphasis which Strindberg placed on the environment of the three characters in this play, especially on the importance environment played in the shaping of Julie's personality. Such elements of determinism are, of course, the hallmarks of naturalism.

The Story:

Miss Julie's broken engagement to the county attorney was quite a scandal to the servants in the house. Miss Julie, daughter of a count, had made the man actually jump over her horsewhip several times, giving him a cut with the whip each time. He had finally put an end to such conduct and the engagement by snatching the whip, breaking it, and striding away from the manor.

held throughout the Swedish countryside a few weeks later, Miss Julie entered into the festivities and danced with the servants. She dared to do so because her father had gone to the city and was not expected to return. Although the servants disliked her entrance into their fun, they were powerless to make their dislike known; she was their mistress. Her father's valet, Jean, left the festivities after dancing once with Miss Julie. He retreated to the kitchen, where his fiancée, Christine the cook, gave him a little supper.

But Miss Julie gave Jean no peace. She came into the kitchen and dragged him out to dance with her again, even though she knew that he had promised to dance with Christine. After dancing another time with Miss Julie, Jean escaped once more to the kitchen. He was afraid that Christine was angry. She assured him, however, that she did not blame him for what had happened. Just then Miss Julie returned to the kitchen and demanded that Jean dance with her again after he had changed from his livery into a tailcoat. While he was changing, Christine fell asleep in a chair. When he returned Miss Julie asked him to get her something to drink. Jean got a bottle of beer for her and another for himself.

After finishing the beer, Miss Julie teased Christine by trying to wake her up. Christine, moving as if asleep, went to her own room. After she had gone, Miss Julie began to ogle Jean, who warned his mistress that it was dangerous to flirt with a man as young as he. But Miss Julie paid no attention to him. Jean, falling in with her mood, told about his early life as a cottager's child and how, even as a small child, he had been in love with his young mistress. They talked so long that the other servants came to look for the valet. Rather than expose themselves to the comments and the scandal of having drunk together in the kitchen, Jean and Miss Julie went into Jean's room. They were there a long time, for the servants stayed in the kitchen and danced and sang. During that time Miss Julie gave herself to Jean.

After the servants had gone, neither Jean nor Miss Julie knew just what to do. They agreed only that it was best for them to leave the country. Jean suggested that they go to Como, Italy, to open a hotel. Miss Julie asked Jean to take her in his arms again. He refused, saying that he could not make love to her a second time in her father's house, where she was the mistress and he the servant. When she reminded him of the extravagant language he had used a little while before, he told her the time had come to be practical.

To cheer her, Jean offered Miss Julie a drink of wine from a bottle he had taken from the count's cellar. She saw whose it was and accused Jean of stealing. An argument followed, with bitter words on both sides. When they had both calmed a little, Miss Julie tried to tell Jean how she had come to be what she was. She said that she had been brought up to do a man's work by her mother, because the mother had hated to be a slave to men. She told also how her mother had revenged herself on Miss Julie's father by taking a brick manufacturer as her lover and how her mother's lover had stolen great sums of money from the count. From her mother, said Miss Julie, she had learned to hate men and to wish to make them her slaves. He understood then why she had treated her fiancé as she had with the whip. Miss Julie ended her recital with the recommendation that she and Jean go abroad at once. To her suggestion that when they ceased enjoying one another they should commit suicide, Jean, far more practical, advised her to go away by herself. Miss Julie, helpless in the urgency of the situation, did as Jean suggested and prepared to leave.

While Miss Julie was upstairs dressing, Christine came into the kitchen. It was morning. Seeing the glasses on the table, she knew that Miss Julie and Jean had been drinking together. She guessed the rest, and Jean admitted what had happened. Christine, angry at Miss Julie, told Jean that fine people did not behave so with the servants. Christine urged him to go away with her as soon as possible. Loving him, she did not intend to lose him to her mistress.

Christine persuaded Jean to get ready to go to church with her, since it was Sunday morning. When they were both dressed, Miss Julie and Jean met in the kitchen. The mistress carried a bird cage. When Jean said she could not take her pet finch with her, she ordered him to kill it. Seeing her bird die, Miss Julie's love turned to hate. Despising him for killing in cold blood the pet she had loved so much, she raged at Jean and told him that her father would soon return. Then he would learn what had happened. Miss Julie declared she would welcome her father's discovery; she wished now only to die.

When Christine appeared ready for church, she told Miss Julie bluntly that she would not allow her mistress to run off with the man who had promised to become her husband. Miss Julie then tried to persuade Christine to go with them to Como. While the two women talked, Jean left the room. He returned a few moments later with his razor. Christine, refusing to join in the flight, left for church after saying that she had spoken to the men at the stables about not letting anyone have horses until the count's return.

After Christine's departure Miss Julie asked Jean what he would do if he were in her position. He indicated the razor in his hand. At that moment the valet's bell rang. The count had returned. Jean, answering the bell, received instructions to have boots and coffee ready in half an hour. His master's voice reduced Jean once again to the mental attitudes of a servant. Miss Julie, almost in a state of trance, was filled with ecstasy at the thought of freeing herself by committing suicide. She took the razor Jean gave her and left the kitchen with it in her hand.

Time of plot: The Civil War period

CAPTAIN COLBURN, a Federal officer

COLONEL CARTER, his superior

LILLIE RAVENEL, a Southern belle

DR. RAVENEL, her father

MRS. LARUE, a relative of the Ravenels

Critique:

It is unfortunate that Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty has been neither well-known nor widely read, for in its war scenes and in its fidelity to human nature it is, as William Dean Howells said, "of an advanced realism before realism was known by that name."

Without labored detail, it presents civil war; without grisly enterprise, it depicts civil war. With an artist's fine sensitivity it unfolds a tender love story. De Forest's style and tastes are quite modern; possibly these facts account for the failure of his novel to achieve popularity when first published and for its later obscurity. But it is a versatile book, well-developed in plot, character, and background. Much to the writer's credit is his skillful handling of character and situation so that Lillie Ravenel's final acceptance of Colburne is without loss of dignity or womanliness.

The Story:

Edward Colburne, of New Boston, met Miss Lillie Ravenel shortly after the outbreak of the Civil War and not long after she had come to New England with her father, Dr. Ravenel, who had been forced to leave Louisiana on account of his refusal to support the Confederacy. Lillie was a loyal daughter of the South, Colburne an equally adamant supporter of the North.

Among Lillie's acquaintances was Lieutenant Colonel Carter, on leave because of an injury. Colonel Carter was a general favorite with the ladies, and Colburne could find only one defect in his attractive personality; he drank too much. Carter, foreseeing that the war would be a long one, hoped to enlist more troops. Colburne, a loyal Yankee, agreed to recruit a company of his own.

Lillie's flirtation with Carter alarmed her father. He liked Colburne, instead, but his daughter did not encourage that young man's attentions.

After saying farewell to Lillie, Colonel Carter and Captain Colburne set out under orders which eventually led them to New Orleans. Some time later Dr. Ravenel and Lillie returned to their former home. Lillie found the city changed; women spoke bitterly about the Yankee soldiers. When Dr. Ravenel, having no other practice in the city, accepted a position as head of a hospital held by Union forces, he added further insult to the pride of the local citizens. Because Colonel Carter had tried to help the doctor find employment, his efforts gained him a welcome in the Ravenel house, although the doctor did not approve of the officer's attraction for Lillie.

Dr. Ravenel's kinswoman, Mrs. Larue, was attracted to Carter. When the doctor reproved her, she turned her attentions to Colburne. Because the captain innocently rebuffed her attempted flirtation, Mrs. Larue took her revenge by telling Lillie that he had dined with the Meurices, a Creole family that had aided the Northern invaders.

Colonel Carter, preparing to drive a Southern regiment from the area, declared his love to Lillie before he left. Dr. Ravenel, adamant, would not consent to Carter's proposal, for he thought the officer's character questionable. Lillie wept and her father suffered. After the engagement Carter, for his heroism, was appointed Lieutenant Governor of Louisiana and stationed in New Orleans. A constant visitor in the Ravenel house, he gradually overcame the doctor's distrust, and at last he and Lillie became engaged. Carter was again ordered to active duty. Returning to New Orleans on leave, he hurriedly married Lillie before rejoining his troops.

Dr. Ravenel left his post at the hospital in order to take charge of a plantation in nearby Taylorsville, where he hoped to rehabilitate freed slaves. To Lillie's horror, he asked her to teach his charges how to read. Letters came quite frequently from Carter, and Lillie waited for his return.

Colburne, wounded in the arm, was hospitalized for a short time. When Dr. Ravenel found Colburne in the hospital, which reeked of sickness and decay, he took his young friend to the plantation. There Colburne had to endure Lillie's constant prattle about her husband. Colburne's visit was interrupted by a Confederate raid. Taking command, the captain secured the Ravens and the Negroes in a nearby fort. In command was Major Gazaway, a cowardly and uncertain officer who urged surrender when the Southerners attacked. Colburne literally took command while Gazaway huddled in a protected spot with Lillie. After the Confederate troops had been repulsed, Dr. Ravenel attended the wounded. Lillie had been impressed by Colburne's courage.

Reporting to Carter, Colburne found him celebrating a victory with whiskey and women. The young man felt sorry for Lillie. A few days later Carter established his wife in a local cottage, and Dr. Ravenel returned to head the hospital in New Orleans. Colburne spent much time with the Carters. Carter, however, was gradually sinking under his debts. A summons to Washington took Colonel Carter away from his wife after he had borrowed two hundred dollars from Colburne. Another passenger on the ship with Carter was Mrs. Larue. Although he berated himself for his infidelity, Carter carried on an affair with Lillie's aunt.

Carter did try, unsuccessfully, to obtain a promotion for Colburne. In Washington he himself bowed to custom and beguiled senators and officials until he was promised promotion to the rank of a brigadier general. He called on Mrs. Larue in New York. They traveled together to New Orleans on the return trip. Carter borrowed one hundred dollars from the widow.

After his return Carter sank more deeply into debt. He and Mrs. Larue met frequently in a private room behind his office. When Lillie's baby was born, however, he promised himself to have nothing more to do with Mrs. Larue.

To alleviate his indebtedness, Carter began to speculate with government funds. Shortly afterward he received his appointment as brigadier general and was recalled to active duty. At that time Dr. Ravenel found and read a letter written to him by Mrs. Larue. Heartsick, the doctor tried to hide the news from Lillie. Unfortunately, she came upon the same letter and, accustomed to reading her father's mail, read it.

When Lillie became seriously ill, her father took her and the baby on a sea voyage, his intention being to take Lillie north after her recovery. The letter he wrote to his son-in-law, informing him of that decision, was delivered on the eve of a battle in which Carter was mortally wounded. Colburne grieved for the fallen officer and for the bereaved wife.

Gradually Lillie readjusted herself and devoted her time to her child. When Colburne, worn out and sick, returned to New Boston near the end of the war, Dr. Ravenel undertook to cure him. During his convalescence, Colburne renewed his friendship with Lillie, who more and more began to display her old charm. Still in love with her, he was too hesitant to speak up boldly. When he finally asked her to marry him, Lillie realized that she truly loved him, better than she had loved any other.

Critique:

Published a year after the writer's death, Mr. Facey Romford's Hounds is the most involved of Surtees' novels and in part a sequel to Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour. A number of characters from the earlier novel appear in this posthumous work, notably Facey Romford, who played only a minor role in Sponge's adventures, and Mrs. Sponge, the former Lucy Glitters, that dashing actress and sportswoman. Like its predecessors, the novel belongs to the great comic tradition in English fiction. Unlike the others, it is less episodic in form, showing that Surtees at the end of his career was working toward the novel of plot. The story is boisterous, aggressive, and satirical. Surtees, who wrote about life as he saw it, was an unappreciated novelist of manners as well as a chronicler of sport, and his downright honesty and hearty humor won for him the dislike of the fox-hunting fraternity, a prejudice which in criticism at least exists to this day. Yet Surtees reflected an age and a whole society in his books, and we go back to him for our best picture of one important segment of that society, country sporting life. At a time when most of the nineteenth-century writers have been reclaimed and evaluated, the comparative neglect of Surtees' novels is difficult to understand.

The Story:

Facey Romford had the reputation of being the most impudent man in the country. Because his first name was Francis and he kept a hound or two, strangers sometimes mistook him for the rich and sporting Francis Romford, Esq., owner of Abbeyfield Park. Facey, always willing to profit by the other Mr. Romford's name and reputation, never contradicted that false impression. In fact, he kept for use on some of his own correspondence a broad seal of the right Mr. Romford's crest, a turbot sitting on its tail on a cap of dignity, taken from an envelope in which Squire Romford had redirected a dunning shoemaker's bill intended for Facey but delivered in error at Abbeyfield Park.

Facey lived on expectations. Early in life he had elected himself heir to his cattle-jobbing uncle, Mr. Francis Gilroy, whose farm he was supposed to look after during the old man's business trips. Living in lodgings in the village, Facey spent his days hunting and fishing on other men's properties, his evenings playing on his flute or estimating the amount he would someday inherit. On occasion, under the influence of a third glass of gin, the figure rose as high as thirty thousand pounds.

Uncle Gilroy died suddenly, leaving all his worldly goods to the wife and numerous progeny he had been maintaining secretly in a London suburb. When his sharp-tongued widow arrived with her brood to take possession of the farm, Facey realized there was no hope for him in that quarter. But he was never one to let the grass grow under his feet. Before word of the Widow Gilroy's coming could spread through the district he carried word of his uncle's death to Mr. Jogglebury Crowdey, a neighbor, secured a check for fifty pounds from that unwary gentleman, cashed it, and set out immediately for London.

There his first act was to look up Soapey Sponge, an old acquaintance who had once tricked him out of seven pounds ten in a card game. In palmier days Soapey had married Lucy Glitters, the actress, and set up a cigar and betting establishment. When an unfeeling government passed laws against betting houses, however, the business ceased to prosper. Although lovely Mrs. Sponge never sold her husband's cheap cigars under sixpence or gave change for a shilling, they had a hard time making ends meet. Facey found the shop but no Mr. Sponge, for Soapey, seeing the caller first, went out the back way. Whether Facey called early or late, Soapey was never at home, and since he called frequently he spent much of his time in Mrs. Sponge's company.

One day, while looking into a saddlery window, Facey had his great idea. He would become a master of hounds. A short time later Bell's Life in London carried an advertisement stating that a gentleman was prepared to treat a country where he could enjoy shooting and fishing as well. In the correspondence which followed, Facey's letters sealed with the turbot crest proved sufficiently impressive to members of the Heavyside Hunt. Their wives, learning from Burke that Francis Romford, Esq., was a bachelor, decided that he was a possible match for unmarried daughters, and without further delay Facey became master of the Heavyside hounds. To celebrate, he bought Mrs. Sponge a tiara of brilliants, but when he went to deliver his gift he was greeted by the news that Soapey had bolted for Australia with all the loose cash on hand. On Facey's advice Lucy sold the furnishings of the store to a secondhand dealer, packed her clothes, and went to stay with her mother while she waited for something to turn up.

At Minshull Vernon, meanwhile, Facey found the Heavyside hounds a splay-footed, crooked-legged pack. On his first day out he was forced to ride a borrowed mount, but even so his daring horsemanship put to shame the fat, timid huntsman, Jonathan Lotherington. The members were so enthusiastic about their new M. F. H. that few cared when the disgruntled huntsman resigned. Facey immediately appropriated Lotherington's horses, the property of the hunt, for his own use. Planning to improve his pack, he wrote, under the turbot crest, to the huntsmen of the best packs in the kingdom and engaged their draughts. In this way he secured a fine lot of hounds without the necessity of paying for them, for some of the huntsmen were pleased to oblige Francis Romford, Esq., without cost and those who presented bills received such abusive letters denouncing their hounds as overrunning, sheep-worrying beasts that they were ashamed to press their demands further.

Facey next consulted Mr. Goodhearted Green, a shady horse-trader, and bought from him three mounts of good appearance but vicious habits, Honest Robin, Brilliant, and Leotard. At Tattersall's he hired two disreputable grooms and whippers-in, Daniel Swig and Tom Chowey. Although his horses and grooms were such as only he could manage, Facey might have had a long career with the Heavyside Hunt if he had not been tempted to make a handsome profit by selling Leotard to Mrs. Rowley Rounding. After Leotard had dumped his new mistress into a mud puddle, the horse was sent back to Facey. Insisting that the sale had been without condition and to Colonel Chatterbox, the lady's intermediary, he refused to return the money. Because some of the hunt sided with Mrs. Rounding, Facey planned to prove Leotard a suitable lady's mount by having Lucy Sponge, a magnificent horsewoman, ride him in the next meet.

Having been drunk the night before, Swig and Chowey were in no condition to ride on the day of the hunt, and Facey asked Lucy to act as whipper-in. His scheme had unforeseen results. Lucy, dressed in a fashionable London habit, rode with such ease and skill that the members unanimously judged Leotard a perfect horse for a lady. But if she won the approval of the gentlemen, Lucy also aroused the envy and dislike of their wives. Claiming that her performance and presence were an outrage to the proprieties, they insisted that the M. F. H. must go. Facey was not to be bought off lightly, however, and as a result he found himself with fifty excellent hounds in his kennels and money in his pockets. Deciding that the way to fortune was to keep hounds, hunt a country, and get his sport at the expense of others, he advertised his services once more.

As luck would have it, the Larkspur Hunt in Doublemupshire needed a M. F. H. for the remainder of the season. Again the turbot seal did its work, and before long Facey was engaged for a subscription of two thousand pounds a year. The seal also brought offers from people anxious to let their houses to the new master. At last Facey decided on Beldon Hall, the property of Lord Viscount Lovetin, who, living abroad, vaguely remembered a Francis Romford at Eton. Supposing Facey to be the same Romford, and without consulting his agent, Mr. Lonnergan, his lordship announced his willingness to rent his house at a nominal fee to so desirable a tenant.

Lucy had enjoyed her taste of country life at Minshull Vernon. Having no intention of returning to London, she persuaded Facey that it would be to his advantage for him to have a lady exhibit his horses. Finally it was decided that she would pass as his half-sister, Mrs. Somerville, the widow of an Indian officer, and that her mother, to be known as Mrs. Sidney Benson, would be installed at Beldon Hall to keep her daughter company. To prepare for their venture into society, Facey ordered new outfits for himself and his grooms, while Lucy required the newest creations of London dressmakers and milliners. The turbot seal and Lord Viscount Lovetin's address did the rest. There was no question of payment on the part of tradesmen, little intention to pay on the part of the new tenants of Beldon Hall.

Wishing to convert some coach houses into kennels, Facey sent Proudlock, the keeper, to ask Mr. Lonnergan's permission to make the change. The agent was away but his son, Lovetin Lonnergan, sent back word that Mr. Romford might do as he liked. Acting on that reply, Facey broke open the nobleman's wine cellar. He also wrote to Goodhearted Green and bought six more horses of uncertain habits to add to the three already in his starting stud. Lucy, meanwhile, had opened the rooms of the mansion and bullied Mrs. Mustard, the housekeeper, and her three slatternly daughters, locally called the Dirties, into somewhat presentable appearance and behavior.

The whole country was eager to meet the new M. F. H. and his sister. Among the early callers were Mr. and Mrs. Watkins and their daughter Cassandra Cleopatra, of Dalberry Lees. In his seedy younger days Watkins had emigrated to Australia. There he had struck it rich in the diggings, even richer when he married the daughter of an ex-convict who had made a fortune in land speculation. Anxious to display their wealth and to find Cassandra's equal in marriage, they had returned to England to establish themselves as a landed family. Mrs. Watkins was not one to hold back when opportunity arose to exhibit her daughter's simpering charms to an eligible bachelor.

Facey's first day out with the Larkspur Hunt was a great success. The hounds raised a fox in a wood near Pip-pin Priory and after the long, spirited chase Facey showed his mettle when he put his horse to a flooded river, leaving the others to ride around by the bridge. The hunt was delighted with the day's run and their new master. Reports of Facey's prowess finally reached Mr. Hazey of Tarring Neville, a shrewd horse-trader and master of the Hard and Sharp Hunt. So great was his curiosity that he and his son Bill rode over to Beldon Hall to pay their respects.

Enterprising Mrs. Watkins invited Facey and Lucy to dine with them and stay overnight for a meet at Dalberry Lees the next morning. The dinner and the hunt breakfast were on a grand scale, but the lady's plans came to nothing because the fox she had ordered for a draw in her gardens failed to arrive on time.

Facey, who had nothing but contempt for bag foxes, rode away disgusted. Returning home that evening, he found the fox, sent to him with Mrs. Watkins' compliments, caged in his front hall. He gave orders that the animal was to be turned loose early in the morning, when he and Lucy would ride after it with only a few hounds.

The next day's chase carried them as far as Tarring Neville, where they breakfasted after the fox had gone to earth. Mr. and Mrs. Hazey made much of their unexpected guests, and their daughter Anna Maria, forewarned by her anxious mother, was especially attentive to the Larkspur M. F. H. A few days later came an invitation asking Facey and Lucy to dine at Tarring Neville and hunt with the Hard and Sharp pack the next day. They went, but Facey formed no high opinion of the Hard and Sharp hounds or their master.

Mrs. Watkins, not to be outdone by Hazey hospitality, decided to organize a stag hunt. Mr. Stotfold and his stag were engaged for the occasion and the chase was started from Dalberry Lees. The affair was a fiasco. The stag created havoc on the premises of a young ladies' finishing school and mired itself at last in the mud of a tilery. Facey decided to stick to fox hunting.

Christmas promised to be a gay season at Beldon Hall. Lucy had invited down from London a good friend of her theatrical days, buxom, jolly Betsy Shannon. Introduced to the gentry as Miss Hamilton Howard, she soon had the swains of the neighborhood vying for her smiles. Betsy's success led Lucy to her great resolution—she would give a party. Once more the turbot seal worked its magic. Caterers came from London with great hampers of food and drink, for a simple at home had become in the planning an elaborate ball. Facey, who had voted for a few people with rabbit-pie and cheese or sandwiches and sherry, was dismayed when he estimated the cost of Lucy's expensive entertainment, but after several glasses of champagne he unbent so far as to entertain the guests with several tunes on his flute. Disaster threatened when the coachmen and grooms, tired of waiting in the cold outside, invaded the house and carried away the food laid for a second supper, but not even that rum-pus dashed the spirits of the guests. Everyone agreed that the ball had been the affair of the season.

The next day Goodhearted Green showed up unexpectedly with a prospective new horse for Facey. At the infirmary ball, a short time later, he was presented to the country as Sir Roger Ferguson. And on that memorable night young Lovetin Lonnergan made his offer to Miss Hamilton Howard and was accepted.

Once more Leotard was to involve Facey in difficulties. Mr. Hazey, having admired the horse and Lucy's performance in the saddle, wished to purchase the mount for a third-hand sale to the Countess of Caperington. Lucy finally agreed to part with the animal for one hundred and fifty pounds. The countess paid two hundred guineas for a headstrong horse that first carried his mistress afield and then threw her over his tail. During the wrangling for refund of the Caperington guineas the countess decided to see for herself the famous Mrs. Somerville who rode Leotard with such ease. Attending a meeting of the Larkspur Hunt, she recognized Lucy as a former friend of the days when she herself had been the cigar-smoking, actress-wife of dissipated Sir Harry Scattercash. The countess greeted her old friend haughtily, calling her Mrs. Sponge and a pernicious woman.

The awkward situation might have been explained away if Lord Lovetin had not chosen that particular time to return to England, where to his surprise he found the wrong Mr. Romford comfortably installed in Beldon Hall. Disputing the possession of the premises with his lordship, Facey demanded a large bonus if he was to leave the house immediately. During the proceedings he continued to hunt his hounds as usual, but Lucy went to stay with Betsy, who in the meantime had married young Lonnergan. The opinion of the Larkspur Hunt was divided, some of the members declaring that their Mr. Romford might be the wrong man for Lord Lovetin but that he was the right Mr. Romford for them. Among his defenders were the Watkinses. Having recently lost much of their wealth through unfortunate speculations in Australia, they saw in Facey their final hope for Cassandra Cleopatra. At last Facey, deciding that he could hunt from Dalberry Lees as easily as he could from Beldon Hall, led the eager Miss Watkins to the altar.

When both parties realized that they had been tricked, and harsh words had been spoken, it was decided that Facey and his bride should go to Australia and there try to save the wreck of Mr. Watkins' fortune. Facey, who had prudently collected his subscription money, was willing. In Melbourne he accidentally ran into his old acquaintance Soapey Sponge, who had done uncommonly well for himself in the mines. When news of Soapey's prosperity reached England, Lucy dropped the name of Somerville in favor of Sponge and sailed to share her husband's prosperity. Last reports stated that all parties were happily reunited in Australia and that Soapey and Facey had established a private bank. Everyone expected them to set up next a pack of hounds.

MR. SPONGE'S SPORTING TOUR

Author: Robert Smith Surtees (1803-1864)

Type of plot: Picaresque satire

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1853

Principal characters:

MR. SOAPEY SPONGE, a cockney sportsman

LUCY GLITTERS, an actress

JAWLEYFORD, a sportsman

PUFFINGTON, another sportsman

JOGGLEBURY, a carver of canes

Critique:

Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour is one of a number of novels dealing with the lower classes who are striving to emulate the aristocracy. This novel differs somewhat from the others in two ways: it has a reasonably coherent plot, and it is much more picaresque in tone. Sponge is quite plainly a sharper, out to live well on the bounty of his fellows. He is the one character we follow rather closely in a number of related situations. The hero is different from Surtees' renowned and clumsy Jorrocks in that Sponge is a skillful, dedicated hunter of foxes.

The Story:

Soapey Sponge led a remarkably consistent life while he was in London. Each day he appeared at the same pub or betting stall at exactly the same time. No man had a better knowledge of London's streets and transportation. In fact, he spent all his spare time studying his street guide. He affected loud clothes, and he was intimate with grooms and horse dealers.

Just outside London was a small farm run by Buckram, a sharp horse trader. Sponge, in need of mounts for the hunting season, decided to visit him. Buckram had two horses to show, Hercules and Multum in Parvo; both could be bought cheaply, for they were incurably vicious. Sponge, an expert horseman, concluded a deal whereby he could take the horses on an installment basis. Since he would need a groom if he were to cut a figure among fox hunters, he engaged Leather, Buckram's slippery factotum. Leather had neither morals nor standing, but Sponge believed he could make him behave acceptably.

The hunt at Laverick Wells had become popular among certain of the sporting fraternity, and Sponge decided to try his luck there first. He sent Leather and the horses on ahead to prepare for his coming. Leather was too efficient, however; he puffed his master up too much. He extolled Sponge's rich wardrobe and extensive stables to such an extent that the whole town was sick of Sponge before he even arrived.

Waffles, the master of the hunt, determined to show up the newcomer by substituting a drag hunt for the real fox hunt. All the town knew of the substitution and secretly hoped Sponge would come to grief. On the day of the hunt Sponge mounted Hercules in private. By the time he joined the crowd the horse was considerably subdued. The drag hunt was thrilling. The pack ran through all the bogs and flinty pastures, through all the stout fences. The casualties were numerous, but Sponge kept on bravely. Riding ahead of Waffles, he was first at the supposed kill.

The daring horsemanship of Sponge changed the atmosphere a great deal; now he was admired and his horse was praised. Waffles made indirect overtures to buy Hercules; by pretending indifference Sponge closed the deal at three hundred guineas. As a favor, Waffles allowed a friend to ride Hercules soon afterward. That animal, vicious as always, took the bit in his teeth and crashed through the window of a drapery shop.

After four weeks Waffles was heartily sick of his bargain and told people of his unlucky deal. When Buckram turned up and offered twenty pounds for Hercules, Waffles was glad to let the horse go. But Sponge pretended that Lord Bullfrog, Hercules' former owner, was incensed at the report that he had sold Sponge a vicious horse. Sponge supposedly agreed to return Hercules and get his money back. Waffles had to admit the horse was gone, he knew not where. To avoid a lawsuit for slander, he paid over two hundred and fifty pounds to Sponge to quiet Lord Bullfrog.

At Laverick Wells, Sponge had met Jawleyford, a boaster who had invited him to Jawleyford Court to hunt with Lord Scamperdale's hounds. Jawleyford had invited Sponge in so general a way that he never expected him to accept. But Sponge, thick-skinned, wrote a note announcing his acceptance and then appeared before Jawleyford could think up a good excuse for putting off the visit. The host and hostess consoled themselves with the idea that Sponge was rich and might make a match with one of their daughters.

Sponge was a most disagreeable guest. His appetite was prodigious. He smoked cigars in the house, read his beloved guide to London's streets, and paid no attention at all to the daughters. The family was relieved every time he rode out to hunt with Scamperdale's pack.

Sponge's mount was quite unmanageable on the first hunt. In spite of Sponge's best efforts he ran among the hounds and hurt some of them. Scamperdale was furious. He had no love for Jawleyford and his guest seemed a dangerous man to have around. Back at Jawleyford Court, rumor eventually began to circulate that Sponge was no rich hunter but a penniless adventurer. As hints to leave became stronger, Sponge was relieved to have an invitation from Puffington, a neighbor who kept his own pack of hounds.

At Puffington's house, a rich bachelor establishment, Sponge was well situated for a time. He was puzzled for a while by the cordiality of his reception, but Spraggon, Lord Scamperdale's man, soon made the situation clear. Somehow Puffington had the notion that Sponge was a sports writer intent on gathering material for hunting stories. Spraggon induced Puffington to give Sponge thirty pounds to secure a flattering writeup. After pocketing the commission Sponge gladly paid him for his help, Spraggon sat down to dictate a story on the Puffington hounds.

As it turned out, Spraggon had no definite ideas on writing a hunting story. Sponge used a blotchy pen. In addition, neither of them knew much about spelling. They sent their completed effort to the local weekly paper, where it was edited by a spinster who had only contempt for hunting. When Puffington saw the garbled story, he was furious. Learning that Sponge had written it, he retired to his room with a supposed illness and instructed the butler to give strong indications that Sponge was to leave.

In the nick of time Jogglebury came over to invite Sponge for a visit. Jogglebury was no hunter; he was too fat and asthmatic even to stoop over. But he had a young son due to be christened, and Mrs.

Jogglebury badly wanted a rich godfather. So Sponge was invited.

Jogglebury was a niggardly host. When he agreed to take Sponge to a neighboring hunt, he stopped so often to hack out likely looking saplings that they missed the pack completely. Jogglebury lived only for his hobby of carving canes in the likeness of famous men. Sponge could scarcely stay long with the Joggleburys; he detested children, and his hosts soon gave him to understand that he was wearing his welcome thin.

At last Sponge found a refuge with Sir Harry Scattercash, a rake married to a former actress who smoked cigars. Sir Harry and his party were much more interested in liquor than in hounds, but Sponge stayed on long enough to fall in love with Lucy Glitters, an actress whom he admired greatly for her daring riding in the field. After their marriage, Lucy and Sponge stayed on with Sir Harry until the bailiffs arrived to attach the property. Then they set out for London, where Sponge opened up a betting establishment and seemingly prospered. It was soon commonly supposed that he was a rich man.

T. F. Powys has said of himself that he thinks too much of God, and this novel, like most of his literary endeavors, reflects his preoccupation with things religious. Like his other novels, also, this one presents a small English village as a microcosm of the earth's macrocosm. An invalid for a large part of his life, Powys has had to limit his literature to his experience in a small portion of the world. It would seem, however, that his works bear out Thomas Hardy's doctrine that the humanity of a small district can reflect the universality of mankind. Certainly the portrayal of the Deity and His attitudes toward the earth and man, as found in Mr. Weston's Good Wine, reflect an unorthodox set of religious doctrines, a position which Powys presents but does not try to justify.

The Story:

On the evening of November 20, 1923, an old Ford car stopped on a hill overlooking Folly Down, a village in western England. Within the car Mr. Weston, a wine merchant, conferred with Michael, his assistant, about possible customers in the village. They had a large book which listed the names of the inhabitants, and Michael had detailed knowledge about them which only a supernatural being could possess. As they talked, their coming was forecast to the village of Folly Down by an electrical sign displayed atop the car.

Down in the village many people noticed the sign on the hill; they could scarcely avoid seeing it, for it lit up the sky. As the men gathered in the inn for their evening beer, they began to speak of the peculiar sign, but the conversation drifted to the cause of all the pregnancies among the village maidens. Most of the men blamed Mr. Grunter, the sexton, but Mr. Bunce blamed God. While they argued the question, the men noticed the clock had stopped. Mr. Grunter announced that eternity had come. He seemed to be correct, for all over the village time stood still at seven o'clock.

Mr. Weston arrived in the parlor of the inn and announced his wares. Although no one was interested in buying, they all felt an affection for the man and believed that they had known him somewhere before. When asked if he knew whether God or Mr. Grunter was responsible for the misfortunes of the village maidens, Mr. Weston referred them to Mr. Grobe, the rector, and then went himself to visit the clergyman.

Mr. Grobe was a melancholy man, for the accidental death of his vivacious and pretty wife had proved to him, clergyman though he was, that there was no God. Life weighed heavily upon him that evening; his bottle of London gin was empty. From Mr. Weston he ordered a bottle to try. He did not see the merchant leave a bottle, but after Mr. Weston's departure Mr. Grobe found, in place of his large Bible, a vast flagon of delicious wine, a flagon that remained full as long as he drank. Much later, although the clocks still pointed to seven o'clock, Mr. Weston appeared with a small bottle which he said gave eternal peace. After being assured he would meet his long-dead wife, Mr. Grobe drank from the small bottle and died peacefully.

While he was gone from the rectory, Mr. Weston had seen a number of the village people and transacted business with them. He had seen Tamar Grobe, who had looked all her life for an angel to marry, in whose arms she would be so happy that she would die. Mr. Weston sent her to see his assistant Michael, who waited under an old oak tree, the village trysting place where so many of the maidens had lost their virtue. There, in Michael's company, Tamar found happiness. They went to the church, where Mr. Weston married them and entered their names in the register.

After the couple had gone, Mr. Grunter found the wine merchant in the church. He thought at first that Mr. Weston was the devil, but he soon discovered that Mr. Weston had every right to be there. He agreed to aid Mr. Weston in some further transactions that evening.

Mr. Weston met Jenny Bunce, a simple-hearted girl who wanted only to marry a good man, like Mr. Bird, and care for him as long as she lived. But her father thought Mr. Bird a fool and had said that they could marry only when Mr. Bird's well ran with wine. Mr. Weston told Jenny to curl up in his car and wait while he went to see Mr. Bird. Mr. Weston found Mr. Bird an honest, virtuous man who preached the gospel to animals as well as men, when they would listen. Like Mr. Grunter and Mr. Grobe, Mr. Bird recognized Mr. Weston. Unlike the other two, Mr. Bird was willing to listen to a chapter from the book Mr. Weston had written long before he became a wine merchant. Mr. Weston recited to him the One Hundred Fourth Psalm.

Then Mr. Weston asked for a drink from Mr. Bird's well, which, much to the owner's surprise, ran wine. Jenny Bunce's father happened along and in his surprise agreed to the wedding. Mr. Weston took Jenny Bunce and Mr. Bird to church and married them.

Two men whom Mr. Weston visited while the clocks stood still were the rascally sons of Squire Mumby. Because they were responsible for the large number of illegitimate children in Folly Down, Mr. Weston took them to the churchyard to see the corpse of a girl who had committed suicide after she had been with them. Failing to recognize Mr. Weston or understand his motives, they left him in a huff. Before they had gone far they were chased by a wild beast that had hoofs and a roar like a lion's, a beast which Mr. Weston controlled on a very light chain.

The Mumby boys were so frightened that they ran to the cottage of the evil woman who pandered to their desires and, finding two of their victims there, promised to marry the girls. The strange beast walked about the cottage for several minutes. The evil old woman died crying out that the devil was taking her down to hell.

After the Mumby boys had left the churchyard, Mr. Weston helped Mr. Grunter bury the corpse of the dead girl. The interment depressed Mr. Grunter until Mr. Weston told him to look at the sky. There, among a band of angels, Mr. Grunter saw the dead girl's soul singing happily. On his way home Mr. Grunter passed the oak tree which had seen the dead girl's downfall. Thinking sorrowfully of her life's end, Mr. Grunter called down a curse in her name. The effect was instantaneous; lightning struck and shattered the tree. The lightning also killed Tamar Grobe, who was lying beneath its branches with Michael. Unscathed, Michael gave a signal, whereupon two angels appeared and carried the dead girl to heaven.

A short time later Michael and Mr. Weston met and decided that their business in Folly Down was complete. Climbing into the battered old car that had brought them, they drove out of the village by the same road they had come. As they left Folly Down, all the clocks again began telling time. Much to everyone's surprise, it was only ten o'clock.

At the top of the hill, where they had sat discussing the inhabitants of the village some time before, Mr. Weston stopped the car and turned off the motor and lights. Mr. Weston remarked that the beast in the rear of the car might like to return to his element in fire, and so Michael set a match to the gas tank. When the flames died away, everything had disappeared. Mr. Weston and Michael were gone from human sight.

MRS. DANE'S DEFENCE

Author: Henry Arthur Jones (1851-1929)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Near London

First presented: 1900

Principal characters:

MRS. DANE, a woman of questionable reputation

SIR DANIEL CARTERET, a distinguished jurist

LIONEL CARTERET, his adopted son, in love with Mrs. Dane

MRS. BULSOM-PORTER, a gossip

MR. JAMES RISBY, her nephew

LADY EASTNEY, Mrs. Dane's friend

JANET COLQUHOUN, her niece

Critique:

Mrs. Dane's Defence belongs to the period of dramatic literature which saw the introduction of naturalism into the English theater. The attempt to portray people as they really are was coupled with another new tendency in drama—humanitarianism. Although Mrs. Dane's sin was not condoned, her weakness was forgiven by those who were really her friends. Henry Arthur Jones was one of the early so-called Modern dramatists, the school founded by Ibsen just before the turn of the century.

The Story:

Young Lionel Carteret was madly in love with Mrs. Dane, a woman three years older than he. The difference in their ages was not too important to those who loved the young man, but the nature of Mrs. Dane's reputation made them try to dissuade Lionel from his attachment. Mrs. Bulsom-Porter, a local gossip, had been told by her nephew, James Risby, that Mrs. Dane was actually one Felicia Hindemarsch.

Miss Hindemarsch had, five years previously, been involved in a horrible scandal in Vienna, when she had had an affair with a married man for whom she worked as governess. The wife, learning of the affair, had committed suicide; the man himself was still in an insane asylum. Risby, however, had since told Mrs. Bulsom-Porter that he had been mistaken. Although he at first thought that

Mrs. Dane was Felicia Hindemarsch, he was now completely convinced that he had been wrong. In fact, he declared that Mrs. Dane did not even much resemble the sinful Miss Hindemarsch. But his retraction meant little to Mrs. Bulsom-Porter, who knew absolutely nothing of Mrs. Dane except that she was attractive and charming. Those qualities were enough to make Mrs. Bulsom-Porter hate her, and she continued to spread the story about Mrs. Dane's past, without admitting that there might be some doubt about her story.

Lionel had the year before been deeply in love with Janet Colquhoun, but had been persuaded by Sir Daniel Carteret, his foster father, to wait before he asked her to marry him. Sir Daniel tried to make Lionel see that his latest infatuation might also pass away, but Lionel would not listen to that well-meaning advice. He accused Sir Daniel of never having known love. What the young man did not know was that many years before Sir Daniel had been in love with a married woman. They had decided to defy the conventions and go away together, but on the night of their departure her son had become dangerously ill. She had stayed with her child, and she and Sir Daniel had then renounced their affections. The woman had been Lionel's mother. After her death, and the subsequent death of her husband, Sir Daniel had adopted Lionel, giving him his name and his love. The young man was so dear to Sir Daniel that he could not stand to see the boy ruin his life by marrying Mrs. Dane, at least while she had a cloud on her reputation.

Sir Daniel and Lady Eastney, Mrs. Dane's friend, set about to try to solve the mystery once and for all. Although Risby had retracted his story, Mrs. Bulsom-Porter would not stop spreading the scandal until she was proved wrong beyond a doubt. Mrs. Dane herself would do nothing to stop the gossip, but at last Sir Daniel persuaded her to tell him enough about her background to allow an investigation. While he was trying to piece together the facts, Mrs. Bulsom-Porter employed a detective to go to Vienna and find evidence to prove Mrs. Dane was Miss Hindemarsch.

When the detective returned from Vienna, Mrs. Dane met him first and begged him to declare her innocence. She offered him any sum not to reveal what he had learned. Consequently, when he was asked by Mrs. Bulsom-Porter and Sir Daniel to reveal his findings, he said that those in Vienna who had known Felicia Hindemarsch swore that there was absolutely no resemblance between her and the photograph of Mrs. Dane which he had shown them. His account satisfied everyone but Mrs. Bulsom-Porter. Sir Daniel, Lady Eastney, and even her own husband insisted that she sign a retraction and a public apology, but she refused. She still hoped to catch Mrs. Dane in a lie.

Because it might be necessary for Mrs. Dane to sue Mrs. Bulsom-Porter for slander, Sir Daniel continued his own investigation. He talked again with Mrs. Dane in an attempt to find out everything about her history. She told him that she had lived in Canada for several years, a fact which made it difficult to trace her past. Then she betrayed herself by mentioning her uncle's name, for when Sir Daniel looked up that name and her relative's place of residence, he found a reference to a Reverend Mr.

Hindemarsch.

At first Mrs. Dane claimed that Felicia Hindemarsch was her cousin, and that she had tried to conceal the fact because of the disgrace, but at last she was forced to confess that she was in reality Felicia. Risby and the detective had known the truth but had shielded her because they thought she had suffered enough for her sin.

Because Mrs. Bulsom-Porter was a troublemaker who needed to be cured of her vicious ways, and because no one else wished to make Mrs. Dane suffer more, Sir Daniel and Lady Eastney forced Mrs. Bulsom-Porter to make a public apology for the scandal she had caused. No one would ever know that she had been right all the time. Lionel wanted to marry Mrs. Dane anyway, but Sir Daniel persuaded her to forsake him, even though she loved him sincerely. Mrs. Dane had had a child as a result of her unfortunate earlier affair, and Sir Daniel knew that even though Lionel loved her he would forever remember that she had lied once and might lie again. Also, the man in the case was still living, though insane, and the wise Sir Daniel knew that these facts were no foundation for a successful marriage. Since Lionel would never forsake her, Mrs. Dane must use her love for him wisely and disappear from his life forever. She agreed, never doubting the wisdom of Sir Daniel's decision, and left the region without telling Lionel goodbye.

Because Sir Daniel had been so kind and wise in dealing with Mrs. Dane and Lionel, Lady Eastney accepted the proposal that Sir Daniel had made to her sometime before. She knew that she would always feel secure with him. Although Lionel thought that he could never be happy or fall in love again, he promised to try to carry out his foster father's wishes.

Janet, who had tried hard to pretend that their last year's love was over, kissed Lionel understandingly, promising him better times to come.

THE MISTRESS OF THE INN

Author: Carlo Goldoni (1707-1793)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Mid-eighteenth century

Locale: Florence, Italy

First presented: 1752

Principal characters:

MIRANDOLINA, mistress of the inn

THE CAVALIER DI RIPAFRATTA, a woman-hater

THE MARQUIS DI FORLIPOLLI, in love with Mirandolina

THE COUNT D'ALBAFIORITA, also in love with Mirandolina

FABRICIUS, a serving-man, also in love with Mirandolina

Critique:

This play, La Locandiera in the original, is one of the sprightliest comedies to flow from any dramatist's pen. From beginning to end the situations and dialogue are sparkling and vivacious. Nowhere in the play do the misogyny of the Cavalier di Ripafratta and the wiles of Mirandolina become vicious or biting. Because an atmosphere of gaiety pervades the entire work, no reader can take the pretensions of the noblemen with anything but delight. Goldoni's characters are only creatures of the stage, but during the reading there is enough of what Coleridge called "a willing suspension of disbelief" to make the comedy entirely plausible. While the play is unpretentious, it does reveal the ability of Goldoni to construct a well-knit plot that holds together in every respect.

The Story:

A Florentine innkeeper died and left his young and pretty daughter, Mirandolina, mistress of his inn. The girl continued to run the hostelry with much success, for she was as shrewd as she was pretty. On his deathbed her father had made her promise to marry Fabricius, a faithful young serving-man in the inn. She had promised the father to obey his wishes, but after her father's death she made excuses for not marrying. She told Fabricius that she was not yet ready to settle down to married life, although she loved him very much. Actually, Mirandolina liked to have men fall in love with her, and she did her best to make fools of them in every way possible. She took all and gave nothing.

A short time after her father's death two noblemen staying at her inn fell in love with her. One was the Marquis di Forlipopoli, a destitute man who, despite his lack of money, was excessively proud of his empty title. The other love-smitten lodger was the Count D'Albafiorita, a wealthy man who boasted of his money. The two men were constantly at odds with each other, each feeling that his suit should be viewed more favorably by Mirandolina. In private she laughed at both of them.

The Count gave Mirandolina expensive diamond brooches and earrings, and he also spent a great deal of money as a patron of the inn. The Marquis, having no money to spend, tried to impress Mirandolina with his influence in high places and offered her his protection. Occasionally he gave Mirandolina small gifts, which he openly stated were much better than the Count's expensive presents because little gifts were always in the best taste.

Pleased at the attentions of the Count, the Marquis, and her faithful Fabricius, Mirandolina was somewhat taken aback

when a guest of another kind stopped at her inn. Her new guest, the Cavalier di Ripafratta, professed to be a woman-hater. Even when he received a letter telling of a beautiful girl with a great dowry who wished to marry him, he became disgusted and angry and threw away the letter. Although his attitude toward Mirandolina was almost boorish, she seemed much taken with a man who was immune to her charms. More than a little piqued by his attitude she vowed to make him fall in love with her.

Seizing an opportunity presented by the Cavalier's demand for better linens, Mirandolina went to his room and by engaging him in conversation struck up a friendship of sorts. She told him that she admired him for being truly a man and able to put aside all thoughts of love. The Cavalier, struck by her pose, said that he was pleased to know such a forthright woman, and that he desired her friendship.

Mirandolina followed up her initial victory by cooking extra dishes for the Cavalier with her own hands and serving them to him in his room with her own hands, much to the displeasure of the Marquis and the Count because the former was of much greater rank and the latter was far more wealthy. Mirandolina's strategy began to have immediate success. Within twenty-four hours the Cavalier found himself in love with the woman who served him so well and was so agreeable to his ways of thinking.

The Cavalier, however, was much disturbed by his new-found love and vowed that he would leave for Leghorn immediately. He believed that out of Mirandolina's sight he would soon forget her. He had already given orders to his servant to pack for his departure when Mirandolina learned of his plans. She herself went to present his bill and had little trouble in beguiling him to stay a little longer. At the end of the interview, during which the Cavalier professed his love, Mirandolina fainted. The Marquis and the Count ran into the room to see what had happened. The Cavalier, furious at them for discovering Mirandolina in his room, threw the bottle of restorative at them. The Marquis vowed to have satisfaction, but when the Cavalier accepted his challenge the Marquis showed his cowardice by refusing to fight a duel.

The Cavalier, now almost beside himself with love, sent a solid gold flask to Mirandolina, who refused to accept it and threw it into a basket of clothes to be ironed. Fabricius, seeing the flask, became jealous. He was also displeased by the offhanded treatment he had been receiving from the girl who had promised to marry him. Mirandolina finally appeased him by saying that women always treat worst those whom they love best.

Later in the day, while Mirandolina was busy ironing the linen, the Cavalier came to her and asked why she had rejected his suit. He refused to believe that she had been playing a game with him, just as she had been doing with the Count and the Marquis. In addition, he became angry because Fabricius continually interrupted the interview by bringing in hot flatirons for Mirandolina to use on the linen. After a lengthy argument, during which the Cavalier became furious and refused to let Fabricius bring in the irons, Mirandolina left the room.

After Mirandolina left, the Marquis entered and began to taunt the Cavalier for having fallen victim to the innkeeper's charms. The Cavalier stormed out of the room. Looking about, the Marquis, very much embarrassed for money, saw the gold flask. Intending to sell it, he picked it up and put it in his pocket. At that moment the Count entered and the two began to congratulate themselves on Mirandolina's success in making a fool of their latest rival. They could not help remembering, however, that she had done things for him that she had not done for them: cooked special foods, provided new bed linen, and visited with him in his room. Finally, having come to the conclusion that they were as foolish as the Cavalier, they resolved to pay their bills and leave the inn.

While Mirandolina was bidding them goodbye, the Cavalier pushed his way into the room and tried to force a duel upon the Count. But when he seized the Marquis' sword and attempted to pull it from the scabbard, he found only the handle. Mirandolina tried to calm him and send all three away. She bluntly told the Cavalier that she had simply used her wiles to make him love her because he boasted of being a woman-hater. Then, declaring her promise to her father that she would marry Fabricius, she took the serving-man by the hand and announced her betrothal to him. The Cavalier left angrily, but the Count and the Marquis received the news more gracefully. The Count gave the newly betrothed couple a hundred pounds, and the Marquis, poor as he was, gave them six pounds. Both men left the inn wiser in the ways of women than they were when they arrived.

MODERN CHIVALRY

Author: Hugh Henry Brackenridge (1748-1816)

Type of plot: Picaresque satire

Time of plot: First years of the United States

Locale: Pennsylvania

First published: 1792-1815

Principal characters:

CAPTAIN JOHN FARRAGO, a gentleman of Pennsylvania

TEAGUE O'REGAN, the captain's Irish servant, a rascal

DUNCAN FERGUSON, another servant of the captain

Critique:

The application of the term novel to Modern Chivalry is almost incorrect; it is, rather, a bulky, episodic narrative that is almost completely devoid of plot. The real importance of the novel lies in the fact that it heralded the appearance of something new in early American fiction: satire. It is a brilliant and ironic inquiry into the faults and weaknesses of political activities during the first years of the United States, written by a man who had taken part in the incidents of those years, including the Whiskey Rebellion. Like all great satires, it was written, not with the aim of simply finding fault, but with the aim of improving what the author saw as weaknesses in the persons and institutions of mankind. Curious as the satire is, and unkind as it sometimes appears to be to the Irish as they are seen in the person of Teague O'Regan, the book is also humorous in a quizzical and often reflective way. Among other things, Modern Chivalry brought the spirit of Cervantes, Rabelais, and Montaigne to the American frontier.

The Story:

Captain John Farrago, a Pennsylvanian in his fifties, decided to get on his horse and, accompanied by his servant Teague O'Regan, to travel about the country. He wanted to see how things were getting on and to observe human nature.

His first adventure was at a horse-race. After the race the crowd became embroiled in arguments. When the captain tried to calm them, in the name of reason, he had his head broken for his pains. Starting out again the next morning, Captain Farrago came to a village where the election of a legislator was taking place. The candidate, a weaver, was not, in the captain's opinion, worthy of the office, and so he spoke out against the backwoods politician. Much to his dismay, the villagers wanted to send

Teague, Captain Farrago's servant, as their elected representative. The captain finally convinced his Irish servant, who had far more brawn than brains, that he was better off as a servant of one man than as the servant of many.

A short time later the captain found the carcass of a very large owl. Upon taking it to a town, he met a philosopher who offered to have him made a member of the philosophical society on the basis of his discovery. When Captain Farrago refused, the philosopher asked if the servant Teague might be made a member. Once again the captain had to convince simple Teague that he was better off as a private servant than he would be chasing over the country after dangerous animals.

That same night Teague got into a scrape at an inn, where he tried to get into bed with a girl who raised a great hue and cry. Teague, a cunning chap, shifted the blame to a young clergyman by claiming that the clergyman had attempted to molest the girl and that he, Teague, had been her rescuer. The tale got out, and Captain Farrago finally had to bribe Teague with half a crown to tell the truth to the presbytery in order to clear the innocent preacher's good name. Teague, by means of blarney and flattery, convinced the presbytery that he wished to be a candidate for the ministry; only the captain's intercession with an explanation that Teague would have to give up his vices and enter into a war with the devil himself prevented the gullible clergymen from taking Teague, ignorant as he was, into the ministry.

Sometime later Captain Farrago met a Miss Fog. In his efforts to court the young lady, who had a considerable fortune, Captain Farrago only managed to insult her. Miss Fog's other suitor, Jacko, then challenged the captain to a duel. Captain Farrago, after warning the man who delivered the challenge that such conduct was against the law, kicked him out of his quarters. Calling in Teague, the captain offered to let him fight the duel if he wished; Teague, a coward, refused to do so, whereupon Captain Farrago sent a letter telling Jacko that he would not duel because one of them might be hurt or killed for no reason at all. That was the end of the matter.

Not long afterward a man approached Captain Farrago and asked to hire Teague from the captain. The man, a maker of treaties with the Indians, wanted to use Teague as a bogus chief of the Kickapoo tribe. He pointed out that the government wanted treaties and that he was going to provide treaties; he received a good salary for his work, in addition to making money from the gifts that were given to his bogus chieftains. Captain Farrago, an honest man, refused to be a party to the scheme. Fearing that Teague might take to the idea of easy money, Captain Farrago told him to stay away from the maker of treaties, lest the latter take Teague's scalp. Simple-minded Teague, fearful for his life, stayed his distance, and the man gave up his fraudulent plan.

Having kept his servant from becoming everything thus far, the captain soon faced a new problem. Teague imagined himself in love with a beautiful young woman considerably above his station, and nothing Captain Farrago could say swayed him from his illusion. In a final effort to bring Teague to his senses, Captain Farrago told the girl's brother what was happening. The brother, by a judicious and heavy application of a horse-whip, cured Teague of his matrimonial aspirations for the time being.

Later in their wanderings the captain and Teague stopped overnight at the home of a widow who took a fancy to Teague. Teague, anxious to improve his lot, flattered the woman, and the two quickly decided to get married, much to Captain Farrago's disgust. Only the captain's friendly warning to Teague that the widow might prove to be a witch or sorceress, so quickly had she won his affection, turned the servant away from the probability of marriage. As it was, he was anxious to be gone, lest some spell be cast upon him.

Shortly afterward Teague disappeared while he and Captain Farrago were in a city. All the captain's efforts, including a visit to a house of prostitution, were in vain so far as locating Teague was concerned. At last the Irishman was discovered by the captain in a theater, where Teague was being used in place of a comedian who imitated the Irish. Teague was anxious to keep his place, until the theater manager gave him a cudgeling for paying attentions to the manager's mistress.

Captain Farrago determined to make something better of his servant while they were in the city. Dressing him smartly and impressing on him some semblance of manners improved Teague so much that the Irishman was given the post of exciseman in the customs service. Having lost Teague, Captain Farrago found himself a new servant, a Scot named Duncan Ferguson, who had recently arrived in America.

Teague, acting as an excise officer, was badly treated by the populace, who tarred and feathered him when he tried to collect duties in outlying towns. He returned hastily to Captain Farrago. Then the captain, upon the advice of a French friend, sent Teague to France. Arriving in France, Teague was taken up as a great common citizen, since there was no taint of the nobility about him. But Teague soon tired of France and returned to Captain Farrago's employ in America. Accompanied by his servant, the captain once again began his travels to observe human nature.

One day the captain arrived at a town where there was considerable discussion over the local newspaper. The citizens, dissatisfied with the editor, decided to let Teague write the editorials. When he proved unsatisfactory and was quickly dismissed, the town was glad to have the original editor return. Shortly afterward, with the captain's help, Teague wrote his memoirs. So successful was the volume that Teague was suggested for the professorship of rhetoric at the local college. Only the outrage of the faculty kept the plan from going through.

Teague's adventures finally proved too much for the Pennsylvania village, and so the captain, accompanied by Teague and a retinue of hangers-on, moved westward. Because of his learning and good sense, Captain Farrago soon became governor of a new territory, which he attempted to set to rights according to Greek and Roman tradition. Thus ended his travels, for he now found himself in such a position of responsibility that he had to cease his aimless wanderings in favor of a settled life.

A MODERN INSTANCE

Author: William Dean Howells (1837-1920)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: New England

First published: 1882

Principal characters:

MARCIA GAYLORD, a small-town girl

SQUIRE GAYLORD, her father

BARTLEY HUBBARD, her husband

ATHERTON, a Boston lawyer

BEN HALLECK, a moral man

KINNEY, a vagabond

Critique:

William Dean Howells had a long and distinguished career, and he was the author of nearly seventy books and countless shorter pieces. In his time his reputation as a man of letters was high. Although modern criticism places less value upon his work, A Modern Instance is representative of his restrained realism and still widely read for its sympathetic analysis of human character.

The Story:

In the little town of Equity, in northern New England, Bartley Hubbard was an up-and-coming young man. An orphan whose life had so far been one of great promise, he had a free and easy way about him and a ready tongue that made him a general favorite. Squire Gaylord was well pleased with his work as editor of the village paper, the Free Press, but not so well pleased when Bartley became engaged to Marcia Gaylord, the squire's only daughter.

One afternoon Bartley and Marcia went for a sleigh ride. In a swamp they met another cutter which overturned in deep snow while trying to pass them on the narrow trail. The women in the overturned vehicle were Mrs. Morrison and her daughter Hannah, who worked in the office of the Free Press. Bartley jumped out to help them. Mrs. Morrison got into the cutter by herself. Because Bartley lifted Hannah Morrison to her place, Marcia was angry enough to precipitate their first quarrel.

Hannah was the daughter of the town drunkard. Young Bartley encouraged her greatly, thinking to improve the quality of her work, but she interpreted his interest as love. Her father called on Bartley one morning, drunk as usual, and asked Bartley's intentions toward his daughter. The young editor was so vexed and infuriated that he ejected Hannah's father bodily. His foreman, Henry Bird, in his turn accused Bartley of stealing Hannah's affections. When he hit Bartley in the face, the latter retaliated with an open-handed slap. Henry fell, suffering a concussion when his head hit the floor.

The scandal was immense. Squire Gaylord took a legal view of the possibility that Bird might die. Marcia took the fight as proof of an affair between Bartley and Hannah and broke their engagement. Bartley resigned his job, even though Bird soon recovered. Bartley went to stay with Kinney, a crackerbox philosopher who cooked in a nearby logging camp.

At the camp Willett, the owner, came to visit with a fashionable party. Mrs. Macallister, one of the guests, flirted with Bartley, and he tried to curry favor by poking fun at the quaint Kinney. That same night Bartley and Kinney parted in anger, and the young man walked back to town.

After selling his horse and cutter, Bartley went to the station to catch the Boston train. Marcia caught up with him at the depot. Asking his forgiveness, she begged him to take her back. They were married that same day and left for Boston together.

In the city Bartley went to work. He turned his visit to the logging camp into a feature article which he sold for twenty-five dollars. That was the start of his fairly comfortable, although uncertain, income as a free-lance writer. Marcia and he could afford only one room, but they were happy together. Marcia's father, Squire Gaylord, came to see her once, to make certain she was married. He refused to meet her husband again.

About the time Marcia learned that she was pregnant, Bartley was offered a job as managing editor of Events, whose publisher was a shrewd, unprincipled man named Witherby. With a regular salary at last, Bartley moved his wife into a private house.

In college Bartley had known Ben Halleck, a member of one of Boston's older families. Marcia knew no one at all, and she often wondered why Bartley did not resume his acquaintance with the Hallecks. Now that Bartley had a better job, he did call on the Hallecks, and they at once befriended the Hubbards. Through them the young couple also got acquainted with Mr. Atherton, a conservative lawyer. Halleck cared no more for Bartley than he ever had, but he was sorry for trusting Marcia, saddled with a shallow husband. After the birth of her child Flavia, Marcia saw less and less of Bartley, who spent many of his evenings away from home.

Witherby offered to sell some stock in the newspaper. For this deal Bartley borrowed fifteen hundred dollars from Halleck. Before long he had assumed a prosperous air, and his drinking added greatly to his girth. After a quarrel with Marcia, one night, he stayed out late and became quite drunk. Halleck saw him on the street and rescued him from a policeman. When Halleck took the drunken man back to Marcia, his pity for the poor wife increased.

Kinney, visiting the Hubbards, entertained Bartley and another newspaperman with stories of his picturesque life. After he left, Bartley wrote up the tales and sold them to another paper without Kinney's permission. Witherby was upset at seeing Bartley's work in a rival newspaper, and when he learned that his managing editor had written the article in violation of ethical considerations he dismissed Bartley.

Bartley returned to free lancing. Halleck was absent from the city; hence Bartley could not repay the fifteen hundred dollars. He intended to do so, but he gambled with the money and before long lost several hundred dollars. Atherton and Halleck were confirmed in their suspicions of Bartley's moral weakness.

Marcia, returning from the Halleck house one evening, saw a drunken woman on the street. To her surprise she recognized Hannah Morrison. When she tried to talk with Hannah, the latter insisted that Bartley was to blame for her present status in life. Suspecting and believing the worst of Bartley, Marcia rushed home and accused him of having seduced Hannah. During the ensuing quarrel they separated, and Bartley took a train for Cleveland.

On the train Bartley's wallet was stolen; in consequence he was unable to send money back to Halleck. In Boston, Marcia regretted her hasty conclusions and stayed on at their house awaiting her husband's return. When creditors began to hound her, she enlisted Atherton's sympathetic aid. He and Halleck continued to look after the deserted wife. In time she thought of Bartley as dead, and Halleck wondered when he would be free to speak to her of his love.

By chance a western newspaper came into Halleck's hands, a paper in which Bartley had given notice of suit for divorce. Marcia, her small daughter, Squire Gaylord, and Halleck took a train to Indiana to contest the suit. They arrived in time to have the divorce set aside, but during the trial Marcia's father had a stroke from which he never recovered. After the trial Bartley drifted farther west and became the editor of a weekly paper in Whited Sepulchre, Arizona. He was shot there by a citizen of the town. When Bartley's death was reported, Halleck wondered whether morally he was free to ask Marcia to marry him.

A MODERN MIDAS

Author: Maurus Jókai (1825-1904)

Type of plot: Philosophical romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Hungary

First published: 1872

Principal characters:

MICHAEL TIMAR, a modern Midas

ALI TSCHORBADSCI (EUTHRYN TRIKALISS), a Turkish political refugee

TIMÉA, his daughter

THÉRÈSE, a trader on No Man's Land

NAOMI, her daughter

ATHANAS BRASOWITSCH, a prosperous Hungarian trader

ATHALIE, his daughter

LIEUTENANT IMRE KATSCHUKA, betrothed to Athalie

Critique:

The name of Maurus Jókai is inseparably connected with the course of Hungarian history in the nineteenth century. He began his career as a writer largely through patriotic motives, and at one time he was exiled because his books were so highly regarded in the revolutionary circles of Hungarian Youth. Later he served as a member of the Hungarian Parliament and in the House of Mag-nates. Although Hungarian has never been a popular literary language, Jókai's works were widely read and translated into many languages during his lifetime. Influenced chiefly by the romantic writers of England and France, he excelled in the field of the imaginative romance, one which depended for its effect upon a wealth of incident and character, an involved plot mingling the ideal and the fantastic, and an idyllic, pastoral atmosphere. A Modern Midas, the work of a master of storytelling and romantic atmosphere, is typical of Jókai at his best.

The Story:

In the season of autumn gales a man calling himself Euthryn Trikaliss and his young daughter Timéa took passage up the Danube on the Saint Barbara, a cargo boat owned by Athanas Brasowitsch, the wealthy merchant of Komorn, in Hungary. Although Trikaliss posed as a Greek trader, proprietor of the cargo of grain carried by the vessel, the crew felt that there was some mystery about him and his lovely daughter, a suspicion confirmed when a Turkish gunboat was sighted in pursuit. By quick wit and daring, Michael Timar, supercargo of the Saint Barbara, outwitted the pursuing brigantine, brought the craft safely through the perilous rocks of the Iron Gate, and anchored it near an unnamed island on the left bank of the river.

Seeing signs of habitation on the island, Michael went ashore in hopes of buying fresh provisions for the Saint Barbara. In the midst of several acres of cultivated ground lived a woman who gave her name only as Thérèse and her daughter Naomi. Thérèse agreed to supply fruits, flour, kids, and cheese, but refused to take any money in return. She and her daughter, she explained, lived by barter, trading with farmers and smugglers of the district. When Michael returned to the boat for grain to offer in exchange for Thérèse's goods, he brought Timéa and her father ashore with him.

During their overnight stay on the island another visitor, apparently an unwelcome one, appeared. He was Theodore Kristyan, who announced himself as Naomi's betrothed. That night Michael heard Kristyan demanding money of Thérèse and threatening to report the existence of the island to the Turkish government if she refused. Since she had no money to give him, he took a bracelet which had been Timéa's present to Naomi.

The next morning, after Kristyan's departure, Thérèse told Michael her story. Twelve years before her husband had endorsed the older Kristyan's note to Athanas Brasowitsch. Defaulting, the older Kristyan had run away, and Thérèse's husband had been ruined when he was forced to satisfy Brasowitsch's claims on his property. The unfortunate man committed suicide. Penniless, the widow had found a refuge for herself and her child on the island which she called No Man's Land. There they lived happily, persecuted only by the infrequent visits of Theodore Kristyan, to whom Naomi had been betrothed before his father's disgrace and her own father's death.

Euthryn Trikaliss seemed despondent when the Saint Barbara resumed the voyage up the river. That night the passenger called Michael to his cabin. After telling that he had taken a fatal dose of poison, he confided that he was not a Greek trader but Ali Tschorbadtschi, a Turkish government official fleeing in disgrace from the sultan's wrath. Having recognized Kristyan as a spy of the sultan, he knew that the informer would hurry ahead to carry the news of Ali's coming, and he preferred death to capture. He asked Michael to take Timéa to Brasowitsch, a distant kinsman. Then, muttering some strange words about a red crescent, he died.

Ali was buried in the river. His fears proved correct. At Panscova Turkish officials came aboard the boat and demanded the person of Ali Tschorbadtschi, but after Michael had reported the circumstances of his passenger's death and burial the Saint Barbara was allowed to proceed. Another disaster was to follow. Not far from Komorn the boat struck a snag and sank. Only at the risk of his own life was Michael able to save a small casket containing the thousand ducats which Ali had entrusted to him as provision for Timéa's future.

Brasowitsch was furious when he heard that his ship had foundered with its valuable cargo of grain, and he had only a surly welcome for Timéa, who was still dazed by grief over her father's death. He and his vulgar wife having agreed that the orphan was to become a servant in their household, he paid no attention to Michael's suggestion that the grain be salvaged for Timéa's sake. He did, however, give Michael power of attorney to dispose of the cargo.

Among Michael's friends was Lieutenant Imre Katschuka, betrothed to Athalie, Brasowitsch's daughter. The officer informed Michael that army maneuvers were to be staged near Komorn, and he suggested that the sunken grain could be used to make bread for the troops. Acting on information supplied by Katschuka, Michael underbid Brasowitsch on the bread contract for the army and later, having purchased the cargo cheaply at a public auction, he proceeded to salvage the grain from the Saint Barbara. During the operations he found one sack marked with a red crescent instead of a black wheel. Opening the bag in private, he found in it a fortune in gold and jewels. This, then, was Timéa's real fortune, which he had bought at auction for ten thousand gulden.

Michael's first impulse was to take the fortune to Brasowitsch, as Timéa's guardian. His second was to keep the treasure and eventually provide for Timéa without allowing Brasowitsch to profit by using it in his own speculations. Having decided on the second course, he began a series of operations which soon made him the great man of the region. After disproving Brasowitsch's charges of bribery over the bread contract he offered the government a generous rental for the vacant Levetinczy estate. As Baron Michael Timar von Levetinczy he planted and bought and sold so shrewdly and successfully that he became known throughout all Hungary as a modern Midas.

Meanwhile he continued to visit the Brasowitsch household, where Timéa was ridiculed and humiliated by Brasowitsch's spiteful wife and arrogant daughter. Their cruellest jest was to let the poor child believe that she was the bride intended for Katschuka, with whom she had innocently fallen in love. The approaching wedding gave Michael an opportunity to plot Brasowitsch's ruin. Because Katschuka refused to marry Athalie without a dowry of one hundred thousand gulden, Brasowitsch, acting on hints supplied by Michael, mortgaged all his possessions to buy land where it was rumored the government intended to build a new fort. The merchant's intention was to resell the ground to the government at a high price. But on the day of the wedding the officials informed him that the fort was to be built on other lands owned by Michael. Brasowitsch had a stroke and died. Katschuka refused to go through with the wedding.

When the house and furnishings of dead Brasowitsch were sold at auction, Michael bought the property and presented it to Timéa with his offer for her hand. He was overjoyed when she accepted, for he believed that he was returning to her at last all that was hers by right. One stipulation Timéa made was that Athalie and her mother were to occupy the house as before. Michael reluctantly agreed to the request.

But the marriage proved unhappy. Timéa, although grateful to her husband, was still in love with Katschuka, and he with her. Ungrateful Athalie, hating all three, informed Michael of the true state of affairs and so added to his wretchedness. Wanting Timéa's love more than anything else, he tried in every way, but unsuccessfully, to win her unasked affection. Timéa was a faithful and dutiful wife, but no more.

During a visit to the Levetinczy estate Michael had a sudden impulse to return to No Man's Land, which he had secretly secured for Thérèse and Naomi. During his visit Kristyan appeared and ordered Thérèse to sign a contract which would have stripped the island of its valuable timber. To silence his threats, Michael informed him that he had secured from the Turkish and Hungarian governments a deed giving the rental of the island to the present colonists for ninety-nine years. When Michael left the island Kristyan tried to shoot him. Forgiving the act, Michael offered Kristyan an opportunity to make an honest living by acting as his South American agent in a new project, the shipment of Hungarian flour to Brazil.

The next spring Michael returned to No Man's Land. When Naomi frankly offered him her love, he accepted it without telling her that he was wealthy and already married. He returned to his home in the fall, to learn that Timéa had managed his enterprises during his absence and added greatly to his wealth. On his return to the island the next year he found that Naomi had borne his child, a boy named Dodi. Their grief was great when the baby died. Michael himself almost succumbed to fever. He was sad when the time came for him to leave the island in the fall, but he rejoiced to find another Dodi in the cradle when he returned the next year.

At last Michael decided that he could bear his double life no longer. For a time he thought of committing suicide and willing all his possessions to Timéa, but he found it impossible to contemplate giving up forever his idyllic life with Naomi. While he was trying to find a way out of his dilemma he went to inspect one of his fishing enterprises. There Kristyan arrived to accuse him of theft. Kristyan, having abused Michael's trust, had been sent to the galleys in Brazil and from his father, a fellow prisoner, he had heard the full story of Tschorbad-schi's activities. Suspecting the source of Michael's wealth, he had returned to denounce his benefactor. He offered to hold his tongue, however, if Michael would give up No Man's Land and Naomi. While the two men talked, Kristyan, scoffing at all promises of great wealth for himself, took off his own ragged clothing and put on a suit belonging to Michael. Then he started off across a frozen lake to make his accusations. Michael followed with the intention of drowning himself. As he approached a crack in the ice he saw Kristyan's floating body. The knave had accidentally fallen in and had drowned.

The body found at the time of the spring thaws was identified as Michael's because of the suit the dead man wore and a purse in one of the pockets. Everyone mourned the death of the great Baron Levetinczy, who was honored by an impressive state funeral. After a proper period of mourning Timéa married Katschuka. Jealous Athalie went to prison after an attempt to kill Timéa on her wedding day. And on No Man's Land, surrounded by three generations of their descendants, Michael and Naomi lived to a contented and peaceful old age. All trade of the colony was carried on by barter. Wise old Michael would never allow money, the breeder of selfishness, misery, and crime, to be used or kept on the island where he ruled as a beloved patriarch.

THE MONK

Author: Matthew Gregory Lewis (1775-1818)

Type of plot: Gothic romance

Time of plot: The Spanish Inquisition

Locale: Madrid, Spain

First published: 1795

Principal characters:

FATHER AMBROSIO, the monk

MATILDA (ROSARIO), his evil mistress

LORENZO DE MEDINA, a young nobleman

AGNES, his sister

ANTONIA, a virtuous maiden

ELVIRA, her mother

THE MARQUIS RAYMOND DE LAS CISTERNAS, a wealthy relative of Elvira

MOTHER ST. AGATHA, prioress of St. Clare Convent

VIRGINIA DE VILLA FRANCA, a beautiful heiress

Critique:

Although not widely read today, Ambrosio, Or, The Monk won instant fame for its twenty-year-old author when it was first published, and it was one of the most popular books of its day. An excellent example of Gothic horror, the book is by modern standards fantastic, crude, and stilted. Lewis, attacked by many for his immorality, was praised by others for his honesty and his vividness of description. The story is pure romance, filled with mystery and terror. The book is important because its plot was the forerunner of later novels of mystery and romance.

The Story:

Whenever Father Ambrosio talked in the church, all Madrid went to hear him. He was the most learned, the most virtuous, the most admired monk in the city. Such was his own purity that he would tolerate no sin in others, and he berated the worshipers viciously. In the audience one day was a young girl named Antonia. The girl and her mother had come to Madrid to seek the financial aid of their relative, the Marquis Raymond de las Cisternas. At the church Antonia met Lorenzo de Medina, a wealthy young nobleman who, charmed by her sweetness, promised to petition Raymond in her behalf. Before he left the church, Lorenzo saw Raymond and learned that he was the man who had supposedly spurned Lorenzo's sister Agnes and caused the heart-broken girl to enter the convent of St. Clare. Lorenzo challenged his former friend, but Raymond begged him to hear the story and then make his judgment.

The marquis did not know the fate at that moment befalling Agnes. Father Ambrosio had intercepted a note written to Agnes by Raymond, acknowledging that the child she would soon bear was his and laying plans for her escape from the convent. Ambrosio summoned Mother St. Agatha, the prioress, and Agnes was carried away to torture and probable death. The young girl begged Ambrosio for mercy, but he was cold to her pleas. Then she cursed him, calling on him to remember her when he himself yielded to temptation.

Ambrosio was to remember Agnes' words when he yielded to the passions of Matilda, an evil woman who had disguised herself as a novice at the monastery and who was known to the monks as Rosario. Ambrosio struggled with his conscience, but his lust overcame him and he surrendered himself completely to Matilda. He could not let the monks learn that a woman was in the monastery, however, for then he would be exiled and reviled by all who now honored him.

After hearing Raymond's story, Lorenzo forgave his friend for his supposed betrayal of Agnes. Agnes, persuaded by unscrupulous relatives that Raymond had deserted her, had in her sorrow entered the convent of St. Clare. Raymond found her there and by bribing the gatekeeper managed to see her each night. When she found that she was to have his child, she sent a note to him, and it was his note, in reply, planning the escape and their subsequent marriage, that Ambrosio had intercepted. Neither of them aware of the fate that had befallen her, Lorenzo joined with Raymond in the plan to rescue Agnes.

Before the proposed rescue, Lorenzo paid court to Antonia, but her mother Elvira, fearing that his family would not permit his union with a girl without noble family or fortune, begged him not to call again until he should secure his family's permission to marry Antonia. He was unable to consult his family until after his sister's rescue. When Agnes did not appear at the appointed time, Lorenzo went to the convent and demanded to see her. For several days Mother St. Agatha told him that Agnes was too ill to receive him. When he insisted, the prioress told him the girl had died while delivering a still-born child. Wild with anger, Lorenzo and

Raymond swore vengeance on the prioress. Raymond would not believe his beloved really dead.

In the meantime Ambrosio, satiated by his lust, learned to his horror that Matilda worked magic and consorted with the devil. Although his desire for Matilda was gone, his passion for women was still great and he turned his attention toward Antonia, who had come to beg him to go to her sick mother. The innocent girl did not suspect his intentions, but her mother did. Elvira came upon them once when the monk was attempting to ravish Antonia, but the girl was so innocent that she did not understand the monk's actions. Matilda came to his aid and cast a spell so that he could ravish Antonia as she slept. The plan would have succeeded if Elvira had not come into the room. When Elvira tried to call out for help, Ambrosio strangled her to death.

Raymond became ill after learning of Agnes' fate. Lorenzo, learning from another nun that Mother St. Agatha had murdered Agnes, laid plans to have the prioress seized. Ambrosio, meanwhile, had not given up his plan to possess Antonia. With the aid of a magic potion mixed by Matilda, he took the girl to a dungeon in the monastery and there ravished her. Immediately afterward he was penitent and begged her forgiveness, but she would not hear his pleas and tried to escape from him. Fearing her escape, he plunged a dagger into her heart. She lived only long enough to die in the arms of Lorenzo, who had suddenly appeared upon the scene.

Lorenzo had obtained from the cardinal an order to arrest Mother St. Clare and to have her tried for the murder of Agnes. News of the arrest turned the fury of the mob against the prioress and she and several of the other nuns were killed by the crowd. While the mob stormed the convent, Lorenzo was led by screams for help into the cellar of the convent. There in the darkness he found a pitiful figure clutching a baby. The woman's ravings were almost insensible, and she was all but dead of starvation. Lorenzo sent her to the home of Virginia de Villa Franca, a beautiful heiress. Searching the rest of the crypt, he came upon dying Antonia.

Ambrosio and Matilda were arrested by the Inquisition. Lorenzo and Raymond learned that the pitiful woman they had saved from death was Agnes, who had been imprisoned and starved by the prioress. The love of Raymond and the kind ministering of Virginia restored her to health, and she and Raymond were married. Lorenzo for a long time lay ill of grief for his lost Antonia, but at last the kindness of Virginia healed his spirit, and those two were married also.

The Inquisitors tortured Matilda and Ambrosio to make them confess their crimes and their sorcery. Matilda confessed and was condemned to death by fire. Ambrosio, refusing to confess, was to be tortured again the following day. That night Matilda came to his cell a free woman. The devil had released her and she begged the monk to give his soul to Lucifer and thus escape death. The monk wrestled with his conscience until his fear of the torture overcame his fears of hell, and he sold his soul to the devil.

His freedom was short-lived. Lucifer took him through the sky to a high precipice. There he taunted him with the knowledge that he would have been released by the Inquisition had he been true to his faith. The monk heard also that through the accident of a mixed-up family relationship Antonia was his own sister and Elvira his mother. Ambrosio himself was to die. The devil had promised him only release from prison in exchange for his soul—not freedom. Lucifer held the monk high in the heavens, then dashed him to death on the rocks below.

MONSIEUR LECOQ

Author: Émile Gaboriau (1835-1873)

Type of plot: Mystery romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1869

Principal characters:

M. LECOQ, a young detective

FATHER ABSINTHE, an old detective

M. D'ESCORVAL, an examining judge

M. SEGMULLER, another judge

MAY, a suspect

TABARET, a consulting detective

Critique:

Monsieur Lecoq is of special interest to detective story fans. In this novel we find an exciting incident in the early career of the greatest of French detectives in fiction. The exposition of the methods and persistence of Lecoq is painstakingly detailed, and we see in embryo the future pride of the French Sureté. The novel is better in some respects than much of Gaboriau's work because there is not such an abundance of the melodramatic and the theatrical. But the inconclusive ending and the problem left in the air may prove a disappointment to readers familiar with the well-plotted detective story of modern times.

The Story:

A party of police agents left the Barrière d'Italie to make their nightly rounds in a tough, sparsely settled district inhabited by thugs and cheap crooks. In that precinct the police were careful always to go in groups. Their leader was old Gevrol, an unimaginative, fearless inspector.

About a hundred yards from Mother Chupin's wineshop they heard some loud cries, and the whole party rushed forward over the rough ground. The house was closed up tight; only bands of light through the shutters gave evidence of life within. One eager young officer climbed up on a box to peer through the shutters, and his evident horror at what he saw caused the officers to hasten their attempt to break into the house.

At Gevrol's order two men battered down the door. Inside on the mud floor were three bodies, two men dead and one wounded. Swaying on his feet was a stocky man with a revolver in his hand. On the stair hysterical Mother Chupin hid her face in her apron. One agent seized the murderer and disarmed him, while another man knelt beside the wounded victim, who was clothed in a soldier's uniform. Murmuring that he had received his just deserts, the man died.

Gevrol, diagnosing the affair as a drunken brawl, was pleased that the murderer had been so quickly caught. But the young officer who had peered through the shutters expressed doubts about the case. Gevrol patronizingly asked him if he suspected some mystery. When the young man said he did, Gevrol told him he could stay with the bodies until morning and investigate to his heart's content.

After the doctors had gone and a wagon had taken away the accused murderer and Mother Chupin, the young man stayed behind with a stolid, seasoned companion, grizzled Father Absinthe. The young detective was Lecoq, who, after drifting from one job to another for several years, had decided to join the police force. With Father Absinthe to help him, he eagerly looked around the house.

His first find was an earring, half buried in the mud on the floor. It was a diamond earring, jewelry too expensive to be found in Mother Chupin's establishment. Encouraged, Lecoq went outside. There was enough snow on the ground for him to reconstruct some of the happenings prior to the murders. Two women, one young and one older, had come to the house. They had been running when they left. A man had met them outside the garden and had led them to a cab. There the traces were lost. Lecoq remembered also what the suspect had said when he was captured, "Lost! It is the Prussians who are coming!" Only a man who knew Napoleonic history would have used that allusion. He evidently had been expecting someone to return and help him.

Lecoq presented his lucid report to the examining judge in the morning. M. d'Escorval was greatly impressed with Lecoq's report. In spite of Gevrol's insistence that the case was merely a wine-shop brawl, M. d'Escorval agreed with Lecoq and prepared to look fully into the affair. Disgruntled and jealous, Gevrol ever afterward was Lecoq's enemy.

As soon as the preliminaries were over, Lecoq hurried to the police station to attend the examination of the prisoner. To his disappointment, M. d'Escorval brusquely ordered him to wait in the corridor. Lecoq overheard enough of the examination to realize that the judge seemed unwell or upset. He asked only a very few routine questions, and the prisoner's answers were almost nonsensical. In a very short time the judge hurried out and drove rapidly away.

Lecoq was curious. Looking into the prisoner's cell, he surprised the man in the act of strangling himself. Lecoq removed the band from the prisoner's throat just in time. Continuing his investigation, he learned that the night before, after the murders, a drunken man had created a disturbance outside the jail. He was locked up for the night, in the same cell with the murderer. In the morning the police let him go. From the description, Lecoq believed him the accomplice, the man who had waited outside the wine-shop and helped the two women to their cab.

The next morning Lecoq had a fresh disappointment. M. d'Escorval fell and broke his leg while descending from his carriage. There was more delay while a new judge was assigned to the examination. The new examiner, M. Segmuller, listened attentively to Lecoq's analysis and agreed that there was a mystery behind the case. At last the prisoner was brought in for formal examination.

The murderer, giving his name as May, irritatingly insisted he had no given name. He said he was a circus performer, and he gave convincing imitations of a barker in French, English, and German. His story was that he had been attacked by the three men, and had shot them in self-defense. May was returned to his cell and Lecoq continued his patient investigation.

The quest for the murderer's identity was a long hunt. Lecoq and Father Absinthe, working for weeks on fruitless clues, were never successful in tracing the diamond earring. They found the cab that had picked up two women at the scene of the crime, but the women had left the cab at an apartment house, gone into the courtyard, and disappeared through a back door.

So it went with all clues. A visitor came to see the prisoner and showed a pass issued to a relative of Mother Chupin. Father Absinthe tried to trail the visitor but lost him. Lecoq learned of the visit later. He was sure the man was the drunk who had been locked up with the murderer that first night, the man whose general build Lecoq had reconstructed from the footprints in the snow. Then, by spending six days hidden in the garret above May's cell, Lecoq learned that the prisoner received cipher notes from the outside rolled in bits of bread. Lecoq even suspected Gevrol of helping May, but he could prove nothing.

In despair Lecoq pulled the old trick of letting the prisoner escape; then he followed him closely. May joined his accomplice outside a high wall. Lecoq watched while the accomplice boosted May over the wall into the garden of the Duke of Sairmeuse. The accomplice was captured, but no trace of May could be found, although Lecoq searched the duke's house thoroughly. He learned nothing from May's accomplice, an ex-convict.

As a last resort Lecoq consulted old Tabaret, the oracle of the force. The sage listened eagerly. Then he explained logically Lecoq's errors. M. d'Escorval had conveniently broken his leg because he knew who the prisoner was and did not dare prosecute him. Lecoq could not find May in the Duke of Sairmeuse's house because May was the duke.

Lecoq had to agree; an obscure detective could do nothing against a duke who undoubtedly was engaged in some mysterious intrigue. If he persisted in trying to arrest so great a noble, Lecoq himself would be convicted as a madman. Lecoq gave up the case, but he was determined that sooner or later he would get to the bottom of the whole affair.

A MONTH IN THE COUNTRY

Author: Ivan Turgenev (1818-1883)

Type of plot: Realistic comedy

Time of plot: The 1840's

Locale: Russia

First presented: 1850

ARKADY ISLAYEV, a wealthy landowner

NATALYA (NATASHA), his wife

KOLYA, their son

VERA, Natalya's ward

LIZAVETA, a companion

RAKITIN, a family friend
BELYAYEV, a young tutor
SHPIGELSKY, a doctor

Critique:

This play is comedy barbed with psychological realism and social satire. Turgenev has presented a timeless interlude with a little Russian coloring, for the kind of atmosphere found in Chekhov's work is only lightly sketched in. The characters run a range from a near-cuck-olded husband to a buffoon doctor. The main action concerns the struggle between Natalya, an older woman, and her young ward, Vera. The courtship of a neighbor and the affairs of Lizaveta and the doctor are side actions. The play reads well, but it is a little long for modern staging.

The Story:

In her drawing-room, Natalya, a twenty-nine-year-old wife and mother, was talking confidentially to her good friend Rakitin. She admitted that her husband Islayev had one fault: he went into things too enthusiastically. He was with his workmen constantly, and he himself demonstrated how they should do their work. Her complaint ended, she bade Rakitin go on reading The Count of Monte Cristo to her. She really had no interest in the book, but it was being discussed by her friends.

It was read aloud in the big room, where a card game was in progress. Schaaf, the German tutor, had been winning until Lizaveta, companion to Islayev's mother, made a mistake; the German grumbled at her ineptness. The doctor, Shpigelsky, breezed in and, as was his wont, told a long, pointless story. He had really come to discuss privately with Natalya a friend of his who wished to marry Vera. Natalya, claiming that at seventeen Vera was too young, put off a definite answer.

Kolya, Natalya's little son, came running up, full of news about Belyayev's doings. Now the energetic young tutor, who had been there nearly a month, was making a kite. Vera, also coming from play, told how Belyayev could climb trees as nimbly as a squirrel. Islayev tried to induce Natalya and Rakitin to look over his new blowing machine, but only Rakitin was interested.

As the room gradually cleared, Natalya had a chance to talk with Belyayev at some length. She complimented him on his good singing voice and asked about his family. She was touched to learn that his mother was dead and that he had a sister also named Natalya. In spite of her friendly attitude, Belyayev was nervous and persisted in being formal and polite with her.

In the garden Katya, the maid, was listening to the butler's proposal. She had some trouble in fending him off, and the arrival of Schaaf made matters a little more complicated. Schaaf archly sang a love song and tried to kiss her. She escaped by running into a raspberry patch.

Vera and Belyayev called her out after Schaaf left. They were working on the kite and, as they worked, they companionably shared Katya's raspberries. Belyayev told Vera much of his past life, of his studies in Moscow, of his poverty. Vera described her loneliness without friends her own age. Interrupted by the arrival of Natalya and Rakitin, they slipped out of the garden.

Natalya professed to Rakitin her uneasiness about Vera; the girl was very young and probably should not be so much alone with Belyayev. Rakitin began to suspect what was happening. Natalya had always been so frank and tender with him. Now she seemed preoccupied and talked distractedly. She even accused him of having a languid mind, and she no longer cared for his descriptions of nature.

Rakitin sought out Belyayev to get better acquainted with him. He was troubled when he discovered that the young tutor hid such an engaging manner underneath his gawky exterior. Although Belyayev thought of Natalya only as an older woman and his employer, Rakitin sensed a possible rival.

Shpigelsky brought Bolshintsov, a neighbor of forty, to the house and coached him carefully on what he was to say. Bolshintsov was shy with women, but, having decided to make an offer to Vera, he had enlisted the busybody doctor as an intermediary. If the match came off, Shpigelsky was to get three horses as his reward.

When Natalya could not disguise her increasing coldness toward Rakitin, he accused her of being attracted to Belyayev. Although she proclaimed that she still loved Rakitin, she could not deny the young tutor's charms. Rakitin delicately hinted that she owed her love to her husband and suggested that both he and Belyayev should leave the house.

With Vera, Natalya assumed a sisterly air and told her of Bolshintsov's proposal. She did not press the point too much after Vera laughed at the idea of marrying such a funny old man. Instead, with mature skill, she probed into her ward's feelings and got her to confess her love for Belyayev. Her suspicions confirmed, she was torn between her inclinations as a woman and her duty as wife and guardian.

Natalya, sending for Belyayev, warned him that Vera was quite immature and that it was easy for her to misinterpret friendship. When the young man finally understood that Vera was in love with him, he was amazed; he had no notions of love at all. He resigned his job and offered to leave the house immediately. Natalya, unable to bear his willingness to leave the house, asked him to defer his decision for a while.

Meanwhile, Shpigelsky was impressing Lizaveta by diagnosing the ills and attitudes of members of the family. He reminded her that she would not want to remain a companion all her life; hence he would make her an offer of marriage. Lizaveta, adopting a coquetish manner, began a coy reply, but the doctor kept on talking. He insisted on telling her all his faults and the extent of his fortune, and then proved to her he was a fine fellow because he had confessed his faults. Lizaveta promised to give him an answer the next day. To her surprise, Shpigelsky sang a peculiar song about a gray goat.

Vera made an effort to save the situation by telling Belyayev that she knew how Natalya had warned him of the girl's love. Bitter over Natalya's efforts to get her married off to Bolshintsov, she hoped that Belyayev would confess his love for her. The young man was unresponsive. Then Vera assured him that Natalya herself was in love with him.

When Natalya found them, Vera was openly reproachful. She accused her guardian of treating her as a child when she was a grown woman. Henceforth they would be equals and probably rivals. She left in an emotional state. When they were alone, Natalya confirmed that she was in love with Belyayev. Overwhelmed by her declaration, he could think only of going away.

Islyayev began to suspect that all was not well in his household, for he knew that Rakitin had been much in his wife's company. Being a forthright man, he asked Rakitin outright if he were in love with Natalya. Rakitin admitted that he was, and he added that he was going away immediately. Islyayev scarcely wanted him to leave, but his departure did seem a good solution. Rakitin made no mention of Natalya's infatuation for Belyayev.

Vera told Shpigelsky that she would accept Bolshintsov's offer because she could no longer remain under the same roof with Natalya. Belyayev, not trusting himself to meet Natalya, sent a farewell note by Vera. To Islayev, it seemed peculiar that so many people were leaving at once. Lizaveta also commented to Islayev's mother that she too would be going away one of these days.

THE MOTHER

Author: Grazia Deledda (1872-1936)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Sardinia

First published: 1920

Principal characters:

PAUL, a priest

MARIA MADDALENA, his mother

AGNES, his sweetheart

Critique:

The Mother is a searching study of a human problem, the age-old conflict arising out of the struggle between authority and inclination. The scene, as in most of this writer's work, is the island of Sardinia, with its poor peasants, its inbred superstitions, and its church-directed religion. The structure of the novel is compact in that the dramatic action covers only two days. The tragic ending is inevitable. The character of Maria Maddalena dominates the book, but Paul and Agnes become sympathetic creations. Grazia Deledda was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1926.

The Story:

Maria Maddalena had been an orphan, brought up in drudgery by aunts. Part of her work was to bring flour from the mill. If there were no other customers, the old man who waited on her would follow her out and kiss her by force behind the bushes. His whiskers pricked her. When her aunts learned what was happening, they forbade the girl to go near the mill again. To their surprise, the old man came to the house one day and asked for Maria in marriage.

Maria continued to live in her aunts' house; her husband stayed at the mill.

Each day, when she visited him, he would steal flour and give it to her. Widowed shortly after she became pregnant, she supported her son by working as a servant. She refused to sully herself with the demanding servants and masters of the places in which she worked, for she wished to make her son a priest and she felt purity was required of her as well.

When her son Paul went to the seminary, she worked there to be near him. The bishop often commanded Paul to seek out his sacrificing mother and kiss her hand. During vacation periods they sometimes went back to their native village. One summer Paul visited the town prostitute several times. He was fascinated by her white skin; he thought it was so pale because her house was in constant shade. After that summer Paul threw off desires of the flesh and felt himself sanctified.

His studies completed, Paul was assigned to the remote village of Aar, a mountainous town where strong winds blew all the time. The mother was proud that her dreams were coming true as the population gathered in the square to meet the new priest. She settled down placidly in the presbytery to keep house for her son.

Aar had had no priest for some time. The former priest had been a drunkard and a gambler; some people said a sorcerer. They had half-liked him, however, and had never complained to the bishop because they were afraid of his magic. Prudently Maria had bars in the form of a cross put on the front door to ward off the evil eye, for it was common knowledge that the old priest had sworn to drive away any successor. But then, Maria was an ignorant woman.

One night Maria was desperately afraid. For some time Paul had had a mirror in his room; he cleaned his nails and washed with scented soap. He even let his hair grow long and tried to comb it over his tonsure. She knew what was happening. Agnes was the only member of the family left in the big house; Paul had begun to visit her on his parish rounds. From the sounds in his bedroom, Paul was again getting ready to go out that night.

Paul left hurriedly. Ashamed but desperate, his mother followed after him. She saw him go to the side gate of the big house and disappear inside. Finding the gate locked, she circled the grounds; all the entrances were shut. She returned home to wait for Paul.

Dozing as she waited, she thought the wicked old priest was sitting beside her, leering at her from his whiskered face. He drew off his socks and ordered her to mend them. Calmly enough, she asked him how she could mend socks for a dead man. The priest declared he was not dead; furthermore, he would drive them out of the village. When she called him wicked, he argued with her that God had put us on earth to enjoy ourselves.

With a start she awoke looking about her for the socks. She thought she heard ghostly footfalls leaving the presbytery. Earlier she had considered denouncing Paul to the bishop. Not sure of his guilt, however, she resolved to face the problem at once.

When Paul came in, he curtly told his mother that he had been calling on a sick person. Maria was determined, however, to leave the village, never to see him again unless he broke with Agnes. She wondered if her own son could be so selfish that he could not see he was endangering Agnes' soul as well as his own. In his chamber Paul fell into a troubled sleep after calling on God for help.

In the morning his mother waked him early. Before he left his room he wrote a letter renouncing Agnes. With a pale face he gave it to his mother and told her to deliver it to the girl in person. After hearing confessions, he said mass. His sermon was cutting. The congregation was growing smaller each day; only on Sunday were the pews filled. Afterward he learned that Agnes had received his letter.

During the morning word came that King Nicodemus was dying. Nicodemus was a wild hunter who lived far up the mountain, where he had removed himself so he could do no harm to man. His relatives had brought him into the village when he was far gone in sickness. Paul, with his server Antiochus, went to the hut to give the hunter extreme unction. To their surprise, Nicodemus had disappeared. With his last strength he had left the hated village, to die in his own mountain cabin.

Later a woman brought to Paul a little daughter who was having a tantrum. The mother thought the girl possessed of a demon, for it took force to get her into the presbytery. Humoring the superstitious mother, Paul read the parable of the Gadarene swine. As he read, the girl became quiet and receptive. Maria and the others were sure Paul had exorcised an evil spirit.

The people of the village, believing him a miracle worker who could cast out demons, held a celebration for Paul. He was thankful when some of the merry-makers went home with him. He needed help that night to keep him from going to Agnes.

Antiochus lingered after the rest of the company to remind Paul of a promise to visit the boy's mother. Antiochus wanted to be a priest, and Paul had promised to speak about the plan. Wearily he set out. While he was impressing on his server's mother the sacrifices demanded of the priesthood, one of Agnes' servants came with the news that Agnes had fallen and was bleeding at the nose. Accepting his fate, Paul went to see her again.

Agnes was pale and older looking but not ill. She reproached him for the letter and inquired about his promise to marry her and take her away. Paul declared only a brother's love for her. Angry, Agnes said that he came at night and seduced young girls. She would so denounce him in church if he did not leave the village before morning.

Paul told his mother of the threat. Both were apprehensive of going to church; they were thankful to see Agnes' pew empty. But toward the end of the service she appeared, looking straight at Paul. As the services were ending he heard a cry. His mother had dropped dead. Paul went to her side. He saw Agnes staring at him.

MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA

ORIN, his son
LAVINIA, his daughter
CAPTAIN ADAM BRANT, Christine's lover
HAZEL NILES, and
PETER NILES, cousins of the Mannons
SETH, the Mannon caretaker

Critique:

The plot of Mourning Becomes Electra is based on the Greek tragedy of Electra and her brother Orestes. In keeping with the nature of the story, O'Neill chose for his time and setting the Civil War era, a period not too far off to be forgotten by the American public and yet remote enough to be viewed in legendary aspect. The Orestes of the Greek plays had killed his mother because she had murdered his father. According to Greek ethics, it was a son's duty to avenge his father, and Orestes had acted justly according to the gods, who in the end saved him from punishment. Because such a conclusion would not be acceptable to a modern audience, O'Neill created Orin's madness to complete his tragedy. The separate parts of this trilogy are entitled Homecoming, The Hunted, The Haunted.

The Story:

The Civil War was over, and in their New England home Christine and Lavinia Mannon awaited the homecoming of old Ezra Mannon and his son Orin. Lavinia, who adored her father, detested Christine because of Ezra's love for his wife. Christine, on the other hand, jealously guarded Orin's love because she hated her husband and her daughter. In this house of hidden hatred, Seth, the gardener watched the old mansion and saw that Lavinia also despised Captain Brant, who was a steady caller at the Mannon home.

The Mannons, descended from old New England stock, had their family skeleton. Dave Mannon, Ezra's brother, had run off with an Indian woman named Marie Brantôme. Seth, seeing the antagonism between Lavinia and her mother, disclosed to Lavinia that Captain Brant was the son of Marie and Dave Mannon.

Embittered by her mother's illicit romance with Brant and jealous of Christine's hold on Ezra, Lavinia forced Christine to send her lover away. But Christine was too powerful a woman to succumb to her daughter's dominance. She urged the grudge-bearing Brant to send her some poison. It was common knowledge that Ezra had heart trouble, and Christine was planning to rid herself of the husband whom she hated so, that she would be free to marry Brant. Lavinia cruelly reminded her mother that her favorite offspring was Orin, who was born while Ezra had been away during the Mexican War.

The family jealousies were obvious by the time Ezra came home. Ezra, a kind, just man, realized that Christine shrank from him while she attempted to pretend concern for his health. That night in their bedroom Ezra and Christine quarreled over their failing marriage. Ezra had a heart attack, and when he gasped for his medicine Christine gave him the poison instead. As he lay dying in Lavinia's arms, the helpless man feebly but incoherently accused Christine of guilt in his murder. Lavinia had no proof, but she did suspect her mother's part in Ezra's death.

Peter and Hazel Niles, cousins of the Mannons, came to the mansion after Ezra's death. Peter was a rejected suitor of Lavinia, and Hazel was in love with Orin. Lavinia spied upon her mother constantly. When Orin came home, the two women vied for his trust, Lavinia trying to create suspicion against her mother and Christine attempting to regain her son's close affection. Uncomfortable under her daughter's looks of silent, sneering accusation, Christine finally realized that Lavinia had found the box of poison. While Hazel, Peter, and Christine tried to make a warm welcome for Orin, Lavinia hovered over the group like a specter of gloom and fatality. Able to get Orin alone before Lavinia could speak to him, Christine told her son about Lavinia's suspicions concerning Captain Brant and Ezra's death, and she tried to convince Orin that Lavinia's distraction over Ezra's death had warped her mind.

Orin, whose affection for his mother had made him dislike Ezra, believed Christine, but the returned soldier swore that if he ever discovered that the story about Captain Brant were true, he would kill Brant. Desperately Christine told Lavinia that Orin's trust had been won, that Lavinia need not try to take advantage of his credulity; but Lavinia stared at her mother in silent defiance. Under her daughter's cold stare Christine's triumphant manner collapsed into a pathetic plea that Lavinia should not endanger Brant's life, for Orin had threatened to kill him.

Lavinia slyly hinted the truth to Orin, and his old childhood trust in his sister led him to believe her story in part, unwillingly however, for he was still influenced by love for his mother. Lavinia hinted that Christine might run to Brant at the first opportunity. Orin agreed to wait for proof, and if sufficient proof were offered, then to kill Brant. Lavinia instructed Orin to maintain his pretense that he believed her to be mad.

Shortly after Ezra's funeral, Christine did go to Brant. Orin and Lavinia had pretended to be paying a call on a nearby estate, but they followed their mother to Brant's ship, where they overheard the lovers planning to run off together. Although Orin was consumed with jealous hatred of Brant, Lavinia restrained him from impulsive action. When Christine had gone, Orin went into the cabin and shot Brant. Then the brother and sister rifled the ship's cabin and Brant's pockets to make the death appear to have been a robbery and murder.

Orin and Lavinia returned to the Mannon mansion and told Christine what they had done. At the sight of his mother's grief Orin fell to his knees, pleading with her to forgive him and to give him her love. Fearing he had lost his mother's affection, the bewildered boy rushed from the room, but Lavinia faced her mother victoriously. Christine went into the house and shot herself. Orin, in a frenzy of grief, accused himself of his mother's murder.

Lavinia took her brother on a long sea trip to help him overcome his feeling of guilt. When they returned, Orin was completely under Lavinia's control, reciting in toneless speech the fact that Christine had been an adulteress and a murderess, and that Orin had saved his mother from public hanging. He was changed in appearance and spirit; it was plain that strange thoughts of grief and guilt preyed on his mind. During the trip Lavinia had grown to look and behave like Christine.

Lavinia was now able to accept Peter's love, but when Orin saw his sister in Peter's embrace, he became angered for a brief moment before he congratulated Peter and Lavinia. When Orin became engaged to Hazel, Lavinia was afraid to leave Orin alone with the girl for fear he would say too much about the past.

Orin began to write a family history, urged by a remorseful desire to leave a record of the family crimes. Becoming jealous of Lavinia's engagement to Peter, he threatened to expose her if she married him. Orin kept hinting to Lavinia that, like Christine, she was planning to poison him as Christine had poisoned the man who held her in bondage. Finally, driven to distraction by Orin's morbid possessive attitude toward her and by his incessant reminding of their guilt, Lavinia suggested to the crazed mind that he kill himself. As Peter held Lavinia in his arms, Orin went to the library to clean his pistol. His death was assumed to have been an accident.

Hazel suspected some vile and sinister fact hidden in Orin's accidental death. She went to Lavinia and pleaded with her not to ruin Peter by marrying him, but Lavinia denied that there was any reason to put off the marriage. While she spoke, however, Lavinia realized that the dead Mannons would always rule her life. The others had been cowards, and had died. She would live. She sent Peter away. Then she ordered Seth the gardener to board up the windows of the mansion. Alone, the last surviving Mannon, Lavinia entered the old house to spend the rest of her life with the dead.

Critique:

One of the most brilliant of Shakespeare's plays, Much Ado about Nothing is nevertheless not among the favorites of most readers. The plot and the dialogue are artfully conceived and executed, but the comedy is often so near tragedy that it does not have the flavor of many of the other comedies. It was the first of his plays in which the comic and serious plots were so woven together that the outcome of one was dependent upon the other. This work was one of the last comedies Shakespeare wrote; it is thought that his awakening moral consciousness, evidenced here, forced him into the tragedies which were based so completely on themes of moral transgression and human frailty.

The Story:

Don Pedro, Prince of Arragon, arrived in Messina accompanied by his bastard brother, Don John, and his two friends, Claudio and Benedick, young Italian noblemen. Don Pedro had been successful over his brother in battle. Reconciled, the brothers planned to visit Leonato before returning to their homeland. On their arrival in Messina, young Claudio was immediately smitten by the lovely Hero, daughter of Leonato. In order to help his faithful young friend in his suit, Don Pedro assumed the guise of Claudio at a masked ball and wooed Hero in Claudio's name. Thus he gained Leonato's consent for Claudio and Hero to marry. The bastard Don John tried to cause trouble by persuading Claudio that Don Pedro meant to betray him and keep Hero for himself, but the villain was foiled in his plot and Claudio remained faithful to Don Pedro.

Benedick, the other young follower of Don Pedro, was a confirmed and bitter bachelor who scorned all men willing to enter the married state. No less opposed to men and matrimony was Leonato's niece, Beatrice. These two were at each other constantly, each one trying to gain supremacy by insulting the other. Don Pedro, with the help of Hero, Claudio, and Leonato, undertook the seemingly impossible task of bringing Benedick and Beatrice together in matrimony in the seven days remaining before the marriage of Hero and Claudio.

Don John, thwarted in his first attempt to cause disharmony, now formed another plot. With the help of a serving-man, he arranged to make it appear that Hero was unfaithful to Claudio. The serving-man was to gain entrance to Hero's chambers when she was away. In her place would be her attendant, assuming Hero's clothes. Don John, posing as Claudio's true friend, would inform him of her unfaithfulness and lead him to Hero's window to witness her wanton disloyalty.

In the meantime Don Pedro carried out his plan to get Benedick and Beatrice to stop quarreling and fall in love with each other. When Benedick was close by, thinking himself unseen, Don Pedro, Claudio, and Leonato would talk of their great sympathy for Beatrice, who loved Benedick but was unloved by him. To each other, the three told sorrowful tales of the love letters Beatrice wrote to Benedick and then tore up. Sadly they said that Beatrice beat her breast and sobbed over her unrequited love for Benedick. Meanwhile Hero and her serving-woman would, when Beatrice was nearby but thought herself unseen, tell tales of poor Benedick, who pined and sighed for the heartless Beatrice. Thus both the unsuspecting young people decided not to let the other suffer. Each would sacrifice principles and accept the other's love.

As Benedick and Beatrice were ready to admit their love for each other, Don John was successful in his base plot to ruin Hero. He told Claudio that he had learned of Hero's duplicity and he arranged to take him and Don Pedro to her window that very night, when they might witness her unfaithfulness. Dogberry, a constable, and the watch apprehended Don John's followers and overheard the truth of the plot, but in their stupidity the petty officials could not get their story told in time to prevent Hero's disgrace. Although Don Pedro and Claudio did indeed witness the feigned betrayal, Claudio determined to let her get to the church on the next day still thinking herself beloved. There, instead of marrying her, he would shame her before all the wedding guests.

All happened as Don John had hoped. Before the priest and all the guests Claudio called Hero a wanton and forswore her love for all time. The poor girl protested her innocence, but to no avail. Claudio said that he had seen with his own eyes her foul act. Then Hero swooned and lay as if dead. Claudio and Don Pedro left her thus with Leonato, who also believed the story and wished his daughter really dead in her shame. But the priest, believing the girl guiltless, persuaded Leonato to believe in her too. The priest told Leonato to let the world believe Hero dead while they worked to prove her innocent. Benedick, also believing in her innocence, promised to help unravel the mystery. Then Beatrice told Benedick of her love for him and asked him to kill Claudio and so prove his love for her. Benedick challenged Claudio to a duel. Don John had fled the country after the successful outcome of his plot, but Benedick swore that he would find Don John and kill him as well as Claudio.

At last Dogberry and the watch got to

Leonato and told their story. Claudio and Don Pedro heard it also, and Claudio wanted to die and to be with his wronged Hero. Leonato allowed the two sorrowful men to continue to think Hero dead. In fact, they all attended her funeral. Leonato said that he would be avenged if Claudio would marry his niece, a girl who much resembled Hero. Although Claudio still loved the dead Hero, he agreed to marry the other girl in order to let Leonato have the favor he had so much right to ask.

When Don Pedro and Claudio arrived at Leonato's house for the ceremony, Leonato had all the ladies masked. He brought forth one of them and told Claudio that she was to be his wife. After Claudio promised to be her husband, the girl unmasked. She was, of course, Hero. At first Claudio could not believe his senses, but after he was convinced of the truth he took her to the church immediately. Then Benedick and Beatrice finally declared their true love for each other. They too went to the church after a dance in celebration of the double nuptials to be performed. Best of all, word came that Don John had been captured and was being brought back to Messina to face his brother, Don Pedro. But his punishment must wait the morrow. Tonight all would be joy and happiness.

MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL

Locale: Canterbury, England

Principal characters:

ARCHBISHOP THOMAS BECKET

CHORUS OF WOMEN OF CANTERBURY

Critique:

This liturgical drama dealing with the assassination of Thomas Becket is essentially an impartial representation. Eliot shows the politics, both temporal and churchly, which lay behind the murder; and he presents the archbishop as a man torn between acting and suffering. Most of the drama is in poetic form, with effective expression by the chorus. The archbishop's sermon is in prose, as are the anachronistic speeches of justification by the knights. Murder in the Cathedral was written for the Canterbury Festival, June, 1935.

The Story:

The women of Canterbury had been drawn to the cathedral. Instinctively, they knew that they had been drawn there by danger; there was no safety anywhere. But they had to come to bear witness. Archbishop Thomas Becket had been gone seven years. He had always been kind to his people, but he really should not return. During the periods when the king and the barons ruled alternately, the poor had suffered all kinds of oppression. Like common people everywhere, the women had tried to keep their households in order and to escape the notice of the various rulers. Now they could only wait and witness.

The priests of the cathedral were well aware of the coming struggle for power. The archbishop had been intriguing in France, where he had enlisted the aid of the pope. Henry of Anjou was a stubborn king, however, and these struggles for power would hurt someone. The priests knew that the strong rule by force, the weak by caprice; and the only law was to seize power and hold it.

A herald announced to them that the archbishop was nearing the city. They were to prepare at once for his coming. With great interest they asked if there would be peace or war, whether the archbishop and the king had been reconciled. The herald was of the opinion that there had been only a hasty compromise. He did not know that when the archbishop had parted from the king, the prelate had said that King Henry would not see him again in this life.

After the herald left, one priest expressed the pessimism felt by all. When Thomas Becket was chancellor and in temporal power, he had been flattered and fawned on by courtiers, but even then he had felt insecure. It would be better if the king were stronger or if Thomas were weaker. For a time, however, they dispelled their fears; Thomas was returning to lead them. The women thought the archbishop should return to France. He would still be their spiritual leader, and in France he would be safe. As the priests started to drive out the babbling women, the archbishop arrived and bade them remain.

Thomas Becket told his priests of the difficulties he had encountered, for rebellious bishops and the barons had sworn to have his head. They had sent spies to him and intercepted his letters. At Sandwich he had barely escaped with his life. His enemies were waiting to pounce.

The first tempter came to talk with Thomas. When he was chancellor, Thomas had known worldly pleasure and worldly success. Many had been his friends, and at that time he knew how to let friendship overweigh principles. To escape his present hard fate, he needed only to relax his severity and dignity, to be friendly, to overlook disagreeable principles. Thomas had the strength to give the tempter a strong refusal.

The second tempter reminded Thomas of his temporal power as chancellor. He could be chancellor again and have lasting power. It was well known that the king only commanded, while the chancellor ruled, and ruled richly. Power was a present attribute; holiness was more useful after death. Real power had to be purchased by wise submission, and his present spiritual authority led only to death. Thomas asked about rebellious bishops whom he had excommunicated and barons whose privileges he had curtailed. The tempter was confident that these dissidents would come to heel if Thomas were chancellor with the king's power behind him. Again Thomas had the strength to say no.

The third tempter was easier to deal with. He represented a clique intent on overthrowing the throne. If Thomas would lead them, they could make the power of the Church supreme. No more would both the barons and the bishops be ruled by a king. Thomas declined the offer to lead the malcontents.

The fourth tempter was unexpected. He showed Thomas how he could have eternal glory. As plain archbishop, the time would come when men would neither respect nor hate him; he would become a fact of history. So it was with temporal power, too: king succeeds king as the wheel of time turns. Shrines are pillaged and thrones totter. But if Thomas would only continue in his present course, he would become a martyr and a saint, to dwell forevermore in the presence of God.

Thus the archbishop's dilemma came to him. No matter if he acted or suffered, he would sin against his religion.

Early on Christmas morning Thomas preached a sermon on peace. Christ left us his peace, but not peace as the world thinks of it. Spiritual peace did not necessarily mean England at peace with other countries or the barons at peace with the king.

After the Christmas time had passed, four knights came to Canterbury on urgent business. Refusing all hospitality, they began to state charges against Thomas, saying that he owed all his influence to the king. Thomas, they argued, had been ignobly born, and his eminence was due solely to King Henry's favor. The knights tried to attack Thomas, but the priests and attendants interposed themselves.

The charges were publicly amplified. Thomas had gone to France to stir up trouble in the dominion and to intrigue with the King of France and the pope. Yet in his charity King Henry had permitted Thomas to return to his see. Thomas had repaid that charity by excommunicating the bishops who had crowned the young prince; hence the legality of the coronation was in doubt. The knights then pronounced his sentence: he and his retinue must leave English soil.

Thomas answered firmly. In France he had been a beggar of foreign charity, and he would never leave England again. He had no dislike for the prince; rather, he had only carried out the pope's orders in excommunicating the bishops.

These words availed little. In the cathedral proper, the knights fell on Thomas Becket and slew him.

In turn the knights gave their reasons for the slaying. It looked like four against one, and the English believed in fair play; but before deciding, the people should know the whole story. First, the four knights would not benefit from the murder. The king, for reasons of state, would deplore the incident, and the knights would at least be banished. And really, it was hard for a good churchman to kill an archbishop.

Secondly, Thomas had been an able chancellor. The king had hoped, in elevating him to the archbishopric, to unite temporal and spiritual rule and to bring order to a troubled kingdom. But as soon as Thomas was elevated, he became more priestly than the priests and refused to follow the king's orders.

Thirdly, he had become an egotistical madman. There was evidence that before leaving France he had clearly prophesied his death in England. He was determined to suffer a martyr's fate. In the face of this provocation, the people must conclude that Thomas had committed suicide while of unsound mind.

After the knights left, the priests and populace mourned. Their only solace was that so long as men will die for faith the Church will be supreme.

THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD

Type of work: Novel

JACK JASPER, Edwin's young uncle and guardian

ROSA BUD, Edwin's fiancée

NEVILLE LANDLESS, an orphaned young man

HELENA LANDLESS, Neville's sister and Rosa Bud's schoolmate

DURDLES, a stonemason and friend of Jack Jasper

MR. CRISPARKLE, Neville Landless' tutor and friend

Critique:

The Mystery of Edwin Drood was Charles Dickens' last novel, begun when the author was already sick and exhausted. It was not finished, and no notes to indicate what the solution in Dickens' mind might have been have ever been discovered. Many people have tried to hypothesize a probable ending and to write a conclusion, but no solution has been satisfactory; Dickens' secret died with him. One of the most interesting theories, however, finds Mr. Jasper the murderer and relates the death of Edwin Drood to the secret society of Thugs in India, a sect that murdered by strangulation. This novel is almost entirely a murder mystery. Although some of Dickens' earlier novels had contained elements of a mystery plot, this book is the only one to be so completely of that type. It was probably inspired by the work of Dickens' friend, Wilkie Collins, a famous author of mysteries.

The Story:

Mr. Jack Jasper was the young choir-master of the cathedral at Cloisterham. Young as he was, he was also the guardian of his orphan nephew, Edwin Drood, who was only a few years Jasper's junior. In spite of his positions of trust, Jasper was an opium addict. Edwin Drood was an apprentice engineer who would one day become a partner in the firm that employed him, for his father had been one of the owners. Drood's profession took him all over the world, but he came back at every opportunity to Cloisterham to see his uncle and his fiancée.

Drood's fiancée, Rosa Bud, was attending a finishing school in Cloisterham. She had been there for several years, for both her parents were dead. The fathers of the two young people had been extremely close friends and each had requested in his will that the two be engaged and, at the proper time, married. As the years passed, however, the two young people realized that they were not in love and, contrary to their parents' wishes, had no desire to marry. In Rosa's last year at the finishing school they agreed that they would remain friends, but they put aside all ideas of marriage.

No one except Rosa realized that Jasper was in love with her. Rosa was very much afraid of Jasper, so afraid that she dared not tell anyone of Jasper's infatuation. But she almost gave her secret away when she ceased taking music lessons from him, lest he annoy her during the hours when they were alone.

During one of Drood's visits to Cloisterham a young couple from Ceylon, Englishmen who had been orphaned in that far-off island, came to the city. The girl, Helena Landless, who was Rosa Bud's age, entered the finishing school; the young man, who was the age of Edwin Drood, began studies under one of the minor officials at the cathedral, Mr. Crisparkle. Crisparkle, a friend of Jasper and Drood, introduced his charge, Neville Landless, to the two men in the hope that they would all become fast friends.

It turned out, however, that young Landless was very much affected by Rosa and was irritated by Drood's casual attitude toward her. The very first evening that they were together in Jasper's lodgings, the two quarreled, and Jasper realized that if he had not interceded Landless would have killed Drood in a fit of rage.

Rosa and Helena did become close friends, and Rosa confessed to Helena that she was in love with the latter's brother. Although she did not tell Jasper, he soon discovered the truth for himself and became exceedingly jealous. Jasper, who was extremely mysterious at times, and more than a little peculiar because of his addiction to opium, became acquainted with another peculiar man, Durdles, a stonemason. Durdles took Jasper about the cathedral and pointed out the various old tombs under the ancient edifice. On one of those visits, which took place in the dead of night, Durdles became very drunk. While he was asleep, Jasper took the key to an underground tomb from Durdles' pocket. What he did with it later on remained a mystery.

During the next Christmas season Mr. Crisparkle tried to patch up the quarrel between Landless and Drood. He proposed that they meet together at Jasper's lodgings and, after mutual apologies, have a congenial evening together. The two young men agreed. On Christmas morning, however, Drood was reported missing by his uncle, with whom the nephew was staying. Jasper said that late the night before the two young men had walked out of his lodgings and turned toward the river. No one had seen them afterward. When Mr. Crisparkle appeared, he reported that young Landless had left earlier that morning on a solitary walking trip. A searching party set out after him and brought him back to Cloisterham. Young Landless was unable to convince anyone of his innocence, although there was not enough evidence to convict him of any crime. Indeed, the body of Drood was not found, although Mr. Crisparkle discovered his watch and tie pin in the river.

At first only Rosa and Helena were convinced of Landless' innocence. Soon they won Mr. Crisparkle over to their side, and he aided Landless to leave Cloisterham for a refuge in London.

Jasper vowed that he would unearth evidence that would incriminate the murderer. He also intimated that he had some evidence that Landless was the guilty person. Publicly, however, there was no indication that Edwin Drood had actually been killed.

After a few months Jasper appeared at the school and requested an interview with Rosa. As they walked in the school gardens, Jasper told of his love for her and warned her that he had sufficient evidence to send Neville Landless to the gallows. He also implied that he would use his knowledge unless Rosa returned his love. After he had gone, Rosa left the school and went to London, where she sought the protection of her guardian, Mr. Grewgious, an odd man but one who loved her because he had been in love with her mother years before. Mr. Grewgious arranged to have Rosa remain in safe lodgings in London. Mr. Crisparkle arrived the next day and began to lay plans to extricate Landless and Rosa from their troubles.

One day a white-haired stranger arrived in Cloisterham. His name, he let it be known, was Datchery, and he was looking for quiet lodgings where he could end his days in comfort and peace. Looking for a place of residence that would reflect the quaintness of the past, he took rooms across from Jasper's home in the old postern gate. Passersby would see him sitting by the hour behind his open door. Every time he heard some remark about

Jasper, he made a chalk mark, some long, some short, on the inside of his closet door.

A short time later Jasper was followed about, almost haunted; by a haggard old woman from whom he had bought opium. She had learned something about the choirmaster, apparently, and suspected a great deal more. Datchery, noting her interest in Jasper, followed her to a cheap hotel. The next morning he and the strange woman attended a service in the cathedral. When the woman told him that she knew Jasper, old Datchery returned home and added another chalk mark to those behind his closet door. . . .

(Here the story ends, for Dickens died suddenly, leaving the novel incomplete, with no notes among his papers to show how he intended to end the story.)

Critique:

The importance of The Naked Year is historical. During World War I and its aftermath of revolution, Russian prose almost ceased to exist, although some types of poetry flourished. This novel is the first prose work of any stature to be published after the hiatus. Pilnyak is strongly under the influence of poetical tenets; that is, this work exalts manner over matter. Quite literally there is no plot, nor are there characters in the usual sense. Rather the author gives a series of impressions of revolution-torn Russia during one year of civil war, pestilence, blockade, and change, just before the Soviets gained firm control in 1921. The reading is irritatingly obscure at times, but effective in its blending of lyricism and realism.

The Story:

Ordynin Town was a citadel which had for years lived a normal life. That is to say, poets, artisans, and merchants dwelt there, busy with their tasks. The Ratchin family had been merchants for two hundred years, and for much of that time they had leased the salt trade. Donat, a curly-headed youth, was the youngest son. Already he counted on taking his place in the market, on buying and selling and ruling his clerks.

The monastery held an important place in the lives of the people, for its bells regulated their lives. At nine o'clock the town went to bed. Anyone up and about after that hour had to identify himself to the watch. Pranks of boys and dwarfs provided the only excitement, and the stationer's store was the intellectual center of the town.

Donat at fifteen fell in love with a chambermaid named Nastia. Every evening he went to her kitchen and read church history aloud to her. When Ivan, his autocratic father, heard of the attachment, he had both Donat and Nastia whipped; that same night Ivan sent his housekeeper to Donat's bed. Afterward Donat learned how to get out of the house at night. For a while he clambered out of a window and went to see the persecuted widow of a rich money-lender.

In 1914 war came, and in 1917 revolution. From ancient Ordynin the inhabitants were called up to learn the craft of murder, to kill and die. Donat was sent to the Carpathians. The first casualty of Ordynin was Classic-Spark, a loafer who committed suicide when the vodka ran out. Because the merchants of Ordynin refused to pay a sufficient bribe to the engineers who were laying the railroad tracks, the railway station was put some distance away. Ordynin was doomed to remain in the backwash of progress and change.

The Ratchin house was requisitioned by the Red Guard, and the salt market was broken up. Donat returned from the war full of hatred for the old order. He ordered that the salt building was to be destroyed and a house for the people erected in its place.

In the monastery Olly Kuntz printed blank orders for arrest and imprisonment. Arkhip, a peasant unused to writing, was in command, and frequently he laboriously penned orders of execution. Comrade Laitis took Olly to the cinema and saw her home. Later he came back with his soldiers to arrest Andrey, a lodger, but Andrey cleverly gave them the slip and got away. The soldiers broke into Olly's room when they searched the building, and Olly wept out of sympathy for Andrey. Semyon, a bookish man interested in masonry, was much impressed by Andrey's cleverness.

Old Arkhipov, Arkhip's father, went to see the doctor. His fears were confirmed when the doctor and Natalia Ordynin, his assistant, told him he had cancer of the stomach. At the moment Arkhipov decided that he must die, Arkhip was signing an execution warrant. That evening the father asked Arkhip's advice, and on his son's suggestion he shot himself in the mouth.

After two years Gleb returned to the manor. No one could remember whether the town was named for the Ordynin family or whether the family took its name from the town. At any rate the Ordynins had been lords for a long time; now the seal of Cain was on them. In the rundown house no one greeted Gleb, but soon Egor, his brother, half-naked and dirty, came stumbling in with the servant Martha. Martha had found her master in a brothel and brought him home. Egor had paid for the spree by selling his sister Natalia's coat.

Gleb learned bad news. Earlier Boris, his older brother, had locked Egor in his room and then had raped Martha. Since Egor was half in love with her, the crime seemed serious. When Boris came into Gleb's room, Boris announced gloomily that he was suffering from syphilis, a family disease. Then Gleb thought of his lunatic father, a religious fanatic in his old age, and of the brothers and sisters who had died in infancy.

Arina, the mother, sold clothes and furniture to make ends meet. Natalia, already suspected of too much fondness for Arkhip, alienated herself from the family by going to live at the hospital where she worked. Catherine, the youngest daughter, was pregnant, and Lydia, the other sister, advised her to have an abortion. To her dismay, Catherine learned that she also had syphilis, but when she ran to Lydia for comfort, her sister, under the influence of morphine, paid little attention to her.

Andrey joined a brotherhood near the Black Streams. The peasant girls called him out to their dances at night and he was happy for a time. Aganka, the gayest and hardest-working of the girls, attracted him greatly, but she died during the hot summer. Smallpox and typhus broke out and all Russia suffered from pestilence and famine and war. Andrey became Irina's betrothed, although the comrades frowned on marriage as sentimental nonsense. Donat Ratchin was the unbending leader of their anarchistic commune.

The commune ceased to be a haven when the band of strangers arrived. Armed, they killed most of the men at the instigation of Harry, their English leader, and then rode on to join an uprising in the Ukraine. Andrey was lucky to get away.

Boris was furious at first when Ivan, president of the poverty committee, requisitioned the Ordynin manor. He had known Ivan for years and despised him as an unlettered peasant. In a spirit of bravado Boris left home on foot. A friendly peasant gave him shelter the first night, but the apprehensive peasant made him leave early the next morning. Later that day Boris found space in a refugee wagon.

The famine became worse. The old men would barter with traveling merchants because there was no money to use in buying. There were no young men left to work; they had all gone off with the Reds or the Whites. People did anything they could for bread. At Mar Junction, the railway station, the Red Guards would often requisition young women who came in on the refugee train.

The Whites occupied Ordynin, and when they left the Reds swarmed back. All over the town committees and commissions sprang up. The Moscow functionaries even reopened a mine outside the town. Although the mine was a deathtrap because of its antique equipment, men were forced to work in it.

Arkhip, busy with his many duties, felt keenly his lack of education. Natalia, the only normal Ordynin, was a doctor under the new government. Arkhip had long known Natalia, and at last, needing an educated partner and wanting children, he asked her to marry him. Natalia thought of her university days, when she had been in love. It was a painful memory. She would welcome this new kind of mating, with no love and with no pain. But in spite of her resolutions she felt herself close to Arkhip and talked of the coziness of their union.

Arkhip went home and thumbed in vain through his dictionary. He did not know the word coziness, nor could he find it.

Critique:

Although The Napoleon of Notting Hill is at first glance an amiable fantasy and satire on staid government, its appeal to romance is a solid criticism of seriousness. In the early twentieth century, when Great Britain was at the height of a peaceful prosperity, it seemed that law and order would eventually swallow up eccentricity and puckish fun. Chesterton rebelled against orderly progress from precedent to precedent and struck a vigorous blow for human worth. As prediction his novel is undoubtedly false, but what he envisioned as desirable is far preferable to what we have in our own time.

The Story:

Although they were his friends, Barker and Lambert often considered Quinn a fool, even a dangerous man, for he persisted in seeing the ludicrous where they saw only the grave. On this particular afternoon Quinn was walking behind his two friends, and as he saw the buttons on their tail coats, he thought them very much like dragon's eyes. Forever afterward he thought of their backs as two dragons shuffling to the rear.

By the end of the twentieth century such imagination was scarcely appreciated. The whole world had become orderly. The smaller nations had disappeared, and among the larger nations Great Britain was by far the most extensive and best organized. The king was now chosen by lot instead of by heredity on the theory that anybody could be a good king. Parliament was only a memory of the days when government was a tedious process. As a reflection of the times, every one wore sober, uniform clothing. Armies and wars were almost forgotten.

During their walk Quinn and his friends were astonished to see a fine looking man in a green military uniform decorated with many insignia. The man was attracting a good deal of attention, for the people had never seen brilliant clothes before. When Lambert and Barker invited the man to dinner, they learned that he was the ex-president of Nicaragua, the last small state to be conquered. They considered the ex-president an affable, saddened man. He still believed firmly in the right of individuals and of states to be different, but he was obviously very old-fashioned in his thinking. In fact, after they argued with him and showed him the current reasoned view, he went out and committed suicide.

Quinn, later on, was as usual entertaining his friends with pointless quixotic stories. Barker and Lambert listened patiently at first, but the meaning of the vague stories always eluded them. At last, in exasperation, they told Quinn to go stand on his head. To their surprise, Quinn did so, and competently. While he was thus attracting attention from the passers-by, some policemen came up. Thinking they were to be reprimanded, all began to apologize. But the policemen brought word that Quinn had been chosen king. Barker protested loudly that Britain had no need to choose a buffoon as king. Quinn, however, was quite willing to be a king. He immediately styled himself King Auberon.

One day the king was taking a stroll when a boy of nine in a cocked hat struck him smartly with a wooden sword. Instead of punishing the boy, Auberon gave him a coin and complimented him on his knightly bearing. The sight of the boy in his make-believe armor gave the king an idea for bringing life and joy to staid London.

As soon as he could, he appeared before a historical society with his great innovation. All the districts of London which had been cities in earlier days were to be returned to their former autonomy. North Kensington, South Kensington, Notting Hill—all were to have a provost as their chief official. The provosts were to be garbed in medieval splendor and were to be accompanied by an honorary guard armed with halberds. Although the announcement was received with incredulity at first, the people humored their fanciful king. One provost objected to the guards, however, on the grounds that when he was obliged to take a bus, often there were no seats for his henchmen.

Ten years later the plan was still in effect. One day the Provost of North Kensington, who was in private life Mr. Buck, a linen draper, came to the king with a serious and angry face. A new highway through London was being planned, and the Provost of Notting Hill refused to sell the land necessary for a right of way. Soon other provosts came in to second Mr. Buck's complaint. The Provost of Notting Hill, they complained, was taking his office much too seriously; the offer for the land was more than fair, and anyway Notting Hill was little more than a slum. The king in a puckish mood upheld the independence of Notting Hill. He was interested to hear that the stubborn provost was Adam Wayne, once a nine-year-old boy with a wooden sword.

The difficulty arose from the fact that young Wayne had never been out of London, and he thought Notting Hill the most beautiful place in the world. Imbued with chivalric ideals, he had no intention of allowing a modern highway to run through his beloved narrow streets. To get help in his fight to preserve his domain, he visited the merchants in his territory. He found them apathetic to their peril. They were interested only in making money.

The one kindred spirit he found was Mr. Turnbull, who kept a toy shop. Mr. Turnbull had a collection of lead soldiers and a brick model of Notting Hill. With the enthusiastic toy dealer, Wayne sat down to plan the defense of Notting Hill. Coöperation was the easier to get because Wayne promised to make Turnbull a high officer in the army.

Mr. Buck reasoned out that Notting Hill could muster at best only two hundred defenders. If he could lead five or six hundred men against them, it was mathematically certain that the Notting Hill stronghold could be taken and the highway would go through. At dusk, thinking to have an easy conquest, he marched his men against the district. But Wayne had shut off the gas and plunged the streets into darkness. The cunning defenders of Notting Hill then fell on the attackers with halberds and swords.

After this defeat the other provosts combined a larger force and in broad daylight attacked again. This time they could find no opposition. While they were searching everywhere for the small Notting Hill forces, Wayne again used superior strategy. Giving a half crown to all boys he could find, he ordered the urchins to hire hansom cabs and have the drivers come to the heart of Notting Hill. Then Wayne kept the horses and used the carriages to construct a barricade around the center of his district. Amply provisioned, the defenders prepared to sit out a siege.

As more attackers came to join battle, it looked at last as if Notting Hill must fall. Once again Wayne was equal to the occasion. He sent out word that if the besiegers did not withdraw at once, he would open the reservoir and flood the narrow streets.

Suddenly the men from the other districts acknowledged their defeat for the time being. Again they prepared for a fresh attack. At last all of London was ready. With banners flying and with axes and halberds held high, the soldiers closed in on Notting Hill. Wayne knew his defeat was at hand. King Auberon, admiring the resurgence of local pride, went into the thick of things as a reporter. He was knocked down and left for dead on the ground. Wayne also fell mortally wounded. And so Notting Hill was taken.

Afterward, as disembodied voices, Auberon and Wayne compared notes. The king had brought laughter to London, Wayne had brought love. They were content.

A NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE OF DAVID CROCKETT

Type of work: Autobiography
Author: David Crockett (1786-1836)
Type of plot: History and adventure
Time of plot: 1780-1834
Locale: Tennessee
First published: 1834

Principal character:
DAVID CROCKETT, the narrator

Critique:

Davy Crockett has long been a familiar figure in American history. As a hunter and frontiersman he is often likened to Daniel Boone, and his heroic death at the Alamo has stirred our imaginations. Whatever charm this autobiography may have must rest in the reader's interest in Crockett himself, for the book is almost graceless. Crockett seldom locates places, gives dates, or names people. Even his two wives are never called by name. The sections dealing with the Creek War are almost completely flat. We see Crockett as a petulant hater of Andrew Jackson and a slaughterer of bears. Yet because of the author, and the picture of frontier life he presents, the book is an important document in our American past.

The Story:

Crockett claimed that he wrote his own story because a spurious autobiography had been circulated concerning his exploits. He had never had much schooling, and the writing was likely to be ungrammatical. But Crockett had become a figure by reason of his frontier life and his election to Congress. Those people who admired a real man who was no follower of Andrew Jackson were asked to take the narrative kindly.

John Crockett was born either in Ireland or on a ship bound for America. The earlier part of his life was spent in Pennsylvania. Rebecca Hawkins was born in Maryland. After John served in the Revolutionary War, he and Rebecca settled in Tennessee, a dangerous and troubled region. John's parents were killed by the Creek Indians, one of his brothers was captured, and another was wounded.

David, son of John and Rebecca, was born on August 17, 1786. His earliest recollection was of a near tragedy. He was playing on the bank of a river with his four older brothers and an older friend of fifteen. The five bigger boys got into the Crockett canoe for a lark. All would have been well if any of the Crockett boys had been paddling, but the fifteen-year-old asserted his authority and took the paddle. David watched from the shore as the boy let the canoe drift closer to a rapids. Fortunately, a neighbor working nearby saw the danger and waded out just in time to keep the canoe out of the treacherous rapids.

The Crockett family, dirt poor in that border area, moved several times before David was twelve, each time seeking a better living. At last John established a tavern on the road to Knoxville. The customers were largely wagoners. One day a Dutchman driving a herd of cattle stopped by, and John bound David over to him. The boy made a trip of over four hundred miles on foot to help the Dutchman deliver cattle.

At the end of the trip David was paid five or six dollars. He wanted to go home then, but his master ordered him to stay. Not knowing any better, David thought himself forced to remain with the Dutchman. But the plucky boy watched his chance and told his story to some friendly wagoners. They agreed to take him home if he could escape the Dutchman. In the middle of the night David crept away, and by riding in the wagons and walking a great deal, he eventually got back home.

John thought David should get some book learning. A neighbor had opened a school nearby, and David attended classes for four days. Then he had a fight with a bigger boy and was afraid of the beating the teacher would administer. Each day he hid out in the woods when he was supposed to be in school. When John discovered what David had been doing, he took after the boy with a hickory stick. David ran away, determined to avoid a beating.

Finding work here and there, David lived somehow. For months he helped a wagoner who kept his meager pay in trust for him. When the wagoner made a trip to the neighborhood of Baltimore, David resolved to look over the city. He was enchanted by the large ships in the harbor. Screwing up his courage, he went aboard a ship and had a talk with the captain. When he was offered a place as cabin boy on a voyage to England, he accepted joyfully. But when he returned to the wagoner to quit and collect his wages, his employer kept him by force from leaving and refused to turn over the money.

After some time he got away from his brutish wagoner and started the long trip home. Obtaining employment with a kindlier wagoner, David told his woes. Sympathetic people collected a purse of three dollars, and David thought himself amply provided for. Finally after a long succession of odd jobs, he got back home. He was fifteen years old. The family was still scrimping to get along in the tavern.

David worked out for various neighbors to pay off debts contracted by his father. At the end of a year his father was free and clear, but David kept on working for wages, as his clothes were worn out. One of his employers was a Quaker with a pretty niece to whom David paid court. When she at last told him she was already engaged, David was quick to leave his job.

Next he courted a neighbor girl who seemed pleased with his advances. When David proposed to her, she accepted and set a date for the wedding. The day before the marriage was to take place, David went part way to her house to stay overnight with another neighbor. There his intended's sister met him with the news that his fiancée had been married the day before to another man.

Nothing daunted, David with the help of friends was introduced to an Irish family with a marriageable daughter. Although at first the mother liked David, she turned against him as a son-in-law. She relented only after David prepared to take the girl away to be married at his house. With some calves, a few store articles, and his gun David settled his bride in an outlying cabin.

After the birth of his second son news came that the Creeks were on the warpath. Even though his wife objected, David left to join the militia. Soon his superior marksmanship and his knowledge of the woods made David a leader of the soldiers pursuing the Creeks. During the campaign the greatest hardship was hunger. In one engagement the militia trapped and burned to death forty-six Creeks in a log cabin. Afterward, hearing that potatoes had been stored in the cellar, David went back and rescued the supplies.

For nearly a year the whites pursued the Indians, killing all the Creeks they could find and burning their towns. At the end of the year the rebellion was crushed. Having had his fill of fighting, David returned home.

When his wife died, David was left with two sons and an infant daughter. Finding it impossible to live without a helpmate, he married a widow with two children. She had a tidy farm and David became a man of substance. In spite of his lack of education, he was successively a magistrate and a member of the legislature. He had good ability at vote getting, chiefly because he offered liquor and chewing tobacco to his constituents and told them racy stories.

By that time David had a mill and a distillery. During the spring floods his buildings were washed away. Once more a poor man, David took up new land farther west. There he gained great renown as a bear hunter, killing one hundred and five bears in a year. He was also elected to the legislature from his new territory.

David's reputation as a hunter and story-teller kept him in politics for a long time. He was shrewd enough to learn something of government by listening, and at last he passed for an able man. After being defeated once, he was elected to Congress, where he fought valiantly for the interests of his border region. He was proudest of the fact that he voted according to his conscience only, and put foremost the interests of his beloved Tennessee. Above all, he was one man who never knuckled down to Andrew Jackson.

ANTOINE ROQUENTIN, a French historian

ANNY, Roquentin's former sweetheart

OGIER P., "The Self-Taught Man," an acquaintance of Roquentin

FRANÇOISE, congenial owner of a café and Roquentin's friend

Critique:

Nausea, Sartre's first novel, was heralded as marking the advent of a twentieth-century Dostoevski, for the novel contains an intense revelation of a mind, strikingly similar to those revealed in the Russian author's works. For many readers, however, the excellence of Sartre's novel is distorted by the presence of the philosophical points of Existentialism, a modern-day French philosophy unpalatable to many. As a fictional presentation of Existentialism, Nausea is more lucid than Sartre's later novels and some of the nonfictional expositions he has attempted. Nausea has received high praise for its forceful description of setting and character, but the ultimate position of the novel will be determined by the philosophy it delineates and the success of that delineation.

The Story:

Antoine Roquentin, a thirty-year-old Frenchman, after traveling through Central Europe, North Africa, and the Orient, settled down in the seaport town of Bouville to finish his historical research on the Marquis de Rollebon, an eighteenth-century figure in European politics whose home had been at Bouville. For three years Roquentin searched the archives of the Bouville library in order to reconstruct the nobleman's life. All Roquentin's energies were concentrated on his task; he knew few people in Bouville, except by sight, and he lived more in the imaginary world he had created for the Marquis de Rollebon than in the actual world.

In the third year of his residence in Bouville, during the winter of 1932, Roquentin began to have a series of disturbing psychological experiences which he termed the Nausea. He felt that there was something new about commonplace articles; even his hands seemed to take on new aspects, to have an existence all their own. It was then that Roquentin's loneliness seemed a terrible thing to him, for there was no one to whom he could speak of his experiences. His only acquaintances were Ogier P., nicknamed by Roquentin The Self-Taught Man because he was instructing himself by reading all the books in the library, and a woman named Françoise, who operated a café called the Rendezvous des Cheminots. Françoise, who had become fond of Roquentin, was the outlet for his physical sexuality, beyond which their acquaintance had not gone. Roquentin, in his loneliness, began to think of Anny, an English girl who had traveled with him some years before and whom he had loved; but he had not heard from her in more than three years. Worst of all, the Nausea came oftener and oftener to plague Roquentin; it passed from objects into his body through his hands, and the only way he could describe it was that it seemed like a sweetish sickness.

One evening, shortly after the Nausea had first appeared, Roquentin went to the café, only to find that Françoise was gone for a time. He sat down to listen to some music on a battered old phonograph and, for the first time, the Nausea crept upon him in a place where there were bright lights and many people; even more horrible, it seemed as if the sickness were outside himself, in other objects.

Strangely enough, as the days passed, The Self-Taught Man made an effort to be friendly with Roquentin. Learning that the latter had traveled a great deal, he asked to see some of the photographs Roquentin had collected and to hear some of Roquentin's adventures. He even went to Roquentin's rooms one evening for that specific purpose. These friendly overtures were not entirely welcomed by Roquentin, who was immersed in his psychological problems, but he acquiesced in setting a date to have dinner with The Self-Taught Man a few days later.

In the interval before the dinner engagement, the book about the Marquis de Rollebon came to a halt. One day Roquentin suddenly stopped writing in the middle of a paragraph and knew that he would write no more, although he had spent more than three years' labor on the work. Roquentin suddenly felt cheated, as if his very existence had been stolen by the Marquis de Rollebon during those years, so that the marquis had been living in place of himself. The feeling was caused partially by the discovery on Roquentin's part that he could never know for certain the truth about the notorious marquis, who had used men for his own ends during his life.

But with the discovery that he was going to write no more, Roquentin also found that there was little or no purpose in his life. Indeed, there seemed to be no reason for his existence at all. For three years Roquentin had not reacted to his own existence because he had been working; now it was thrust upon him with disquieting abruptness.

One Wednesday Roquentin and The Self-Taught Man met for their dinner engagement. During the dinner, a rather stiff affair, The Self-Taught Man tried to convince Roquentin that he, like The Self-Taught Man, ought to be a humanist, that in the humanity of the world was to be found the true reason for the universe. Roquentin became so disquieted that the Nausea came over him during the discussion, and he abruptly left the restaurant.

A day or two later Roquentin received an unexpected letter from Anny, the letter having been forwarded from his old address in Paris. She wrote that she was to be in Paris for a few days and wished to see him. Roquentin looked forward to seeing her and planned to leave Bouville for the first time in three years to visit with her in Paris. When the day arrived, he presented himself at her address.

Anny was no longer the same, for she had become fat, but the changes that bothered him most were those he felt rather than saw. The interview was a dismal failure; Anny accused him of being worthless to her and finally thrust him from the room. Later he saw Anny getting on a train with the man who kept her, and he went back to Bouville with a sense of numbness. He believed that both he and Anny had outlived themselves. All that was left, he felt, was eating and sleeping, an existence not unlike that of an inanimate object.

Roquentin remained in Bouville only a few days more. Unhappy and lonesome, he sought out The Self-Taught Man, finding him in the library. Because The Self-Taught Man was reading to two young boys, Roquentin also sat down to read until The Self-Taught Man had finished. He never did get to open the conversation, for in the ensuing minutes The Self-Taught Man revealed himself as a homosexual and was brutally ejected from the library by the librarians. The only other person to whom Roquentin wished to say goodbye was the congenial woman who owned the Rendezvous des Cheminots. When he went to see her, however, she could give him only a moment, for another patron claimed her time.

Roquentin went to the railway station for the train that was to take him to Paris. His only hope was that he might write a book, perhaps a novel, which would make people think of his life as something precious and legendary, though he knew that the work on such a book, unlike his attempts at the history of the Marquis de Rollebon, could not keep from him the troublesome problems of existence.

LEO FOXE-DONNELL, an Irish patriot

JUDITH, his mother

JULIE, his wife

JOHNO O'DONNELL, son of Julie and Leo

JOHNNY HUSSEY, a policeman

BID, his wife

DENIS, son of Bid and Johnny

Critique:

Seán O'Faoláin, a distinguished member of the Irish Academy, here presents a study of the fortunes of one man. Leo, the central character, is far from admirable, but he does have one outstanding characteristic: his persistent fighting and plotting for Irish independence. He and Johnny, the policeman, are symbolic. Like the divided Irish population, the patriot and the police spy live together in a semblance of accord. In tone this novel is intense and somber. The only bright ray in the grim events is the hope of change.

The Story:

Foxehall was a bleak, remote manor house, and the family that owned it kept to themselves. Rachel and Anna Foxe were content to live prim maiden lives, poverty-stricken remnants of a landed family. Judith Foxe, however, married Long John O'Donnell, a close secretive farmer. For marrying beneath her Judith was cut off with a dower of five fields, and for seventeen years she did not see her sisters.

The marriage was a good one for Long John. Poor as he was, Judith's five fields were good pay for taking an unattractive wife. Judith had hips like a brood mare's. When her tenth child, Leo, was born, Rachel condescended to sponsor him. Afterward it seemed to Judith that Leo was her only true son. When her husband was near death she was determined that Leo should be the heir.

James, the oldest son, had worked like a servant for his harsh father. As the oldest, he would inherit the home farm. Phil was next in line; by rights he should have the five fields. Long John had obstinately refused to make a will, but as he grew weaker Judith harried him into telling a lawyer how the property should go. By dressing Leo in Phil's clothes, she tricked her weak and sinking husband into pointing to Leo as the heir to the five fields. By her deed James inherited only the heavily mortgaged home farm and the obligation to marry off his numerous sisters, Leo the five free fields, and Phil only what James would share with him.

After the funeral James drove the family home. Young Leo, sensing his state of mind, offered to give James all the land, an offer which infuriated the older brother. James whipped Leo savagely and drove him off the farm. Leo went to live with his maiden aunts.

Rachel and Anna did their best to make a genteel aristocrat of their rough and surly nephew. Nicholas, a ne'er-do-well, was his tutor, and Nicholas himself was rough. For long there was debate over Leo's future as a doctor or a gentleman farmer. Leo had little preference, but when he was sent to Limerick to study with Dicky, his doctor cousin, he went willingly enough.

Nicholas, influential in molding the boy's sympathies, accompanied him on the journey. Because the tutor had told him of the past insults and atrocities by the aristocracy, Leo was hot at the injustices suffered by the poor farmers. In Limerick the two called on Frankie C'Donnell, Leo's uncle, a tavernkeeper who was a revolutionary at heart. The rough welcome there was in sharp contrast with his treatment at Doctor Dicky's house. The old doctor was a gruff Protestant and a teetotaler. In his country clothes Leo was out of place. After a trial term Leo was sent home in disgrace; he had no head for medicine.

For years Leo lived an idle and dissolute life. After his aunts died, he became the owner of Foxehall. Taking no care of the property, he hunted and caroused and chased girls. One, Philly Cashen, was turned out of old Mag Keene's house because of her pregnancy. Distracted, Philly went to Foxehall. Judith, although she knew that Leo was guilty, refused to help the girl. At last Judith left her youngest son and his fine house and went back to live with James. Philly was not the only girl Leo ruined. Another was Julie Keene, too young to resist him successfully.

The Fenian spirit pervaded the countryside. Mad Leo, although a landowner, joined the plotters and led a raid on the police post. Julie by chance saw them and ran off to warn another sweetheart, a detective. The plotters were seized and Leo was sentenced to fifteen years in jail. While he was in prison his mother died, but Leo did not know of her death; his family never wrote to him. A change of government brought an amnesty and after ten years Leo was released.

Julie was still unmarried. Holding no grudge against her, Leo courted her again, and when she became pregnant he mortgaged his land to raise money to send her to Dublin. Julie bore her son, gave him away, and returned as gay as ever. Leo, continuing his shiftless ways, eventually lost his land to his grasping brother James. Finally, with the help of a neighborhood priest, Leo was bullied into marrying Julie, and the strange couple set themselves up in a small paper shop in Rathkeale.

After a time Bid, Julie's pretty youngest sister, came to live with them. Before long she was walking out with Johnny Hussey, a policeman. After innocent Bid went to visit the police barracks with Johnny, Leo questioned her closely about the visit, for at the age of sixty he was still an ardent Fenian. Bid assured Leo the policeman had said nothing about him, but she half guiltily remembered some joking remarks she had heard. Leo was perturbed.

Julie, almost hysterical, demanded that Leo bring back their lost son. To quiet her, he found Johnno O'Donnell, now a twenty-year-old sailor, and brought him as a nephew to Rathkeale.

After Johnny searched Leo's room and found suspicious letters, the police began to watch Leo carefully. Still a fiery patriot, Leo planned with his son Johnno to bring into a river port a shipment of rifles which Johnno had smuggled aboard his ship. Leo, with a few Fenians, was waiting with a skiff to take them off when the police came upon them. Leo fired a warning shot. When an officer was wounded, the conspirators quickly rowed out into the foggy harbor and got away. Leo landed on the other shore. Returning to Rathkeale, he was arrested and sentenced to five years.

Meanwhile Johnny had married Bid. When he was transferred to Cork, they took Julie, now old and broken, with them. After Leo's release from prison the old couple could see nothing to do but to live with Johnny, who had been promoted to the post of acting sergeant. Johnno and his wife completed the family circle.

Denis, Bid's oldest boy, was always prim. Because Leo and Johnno were gusty and loud, Johnny encouraged his son to be different. Bid, thinking of Denis as a scholar, planned for his education. Old Leo had a small shop where he sometimes took bets. As always, he knew what was going on among the revolutionaries.

Bid took in lodgers to get money for the boy's schooling. Although she was always tired, the effort seemed worthwhile. But Denis was a disappointment to her. Having no head for studies, he gave up his ambitions after he had failed the civil service examination three times. Worse than that, he quarreled with his father. All over Ireland rifles were cracking. When an uprising broke out in Dublin, Denis, after helping Leo and Johnno to escape arrest, called his father a police spy and went to take shelter with the O'Donnells. Like Ireland, his was a house divided.

JULIE D'ÉTANGE, a beautiful and virtuous young girl

BARON D'ÉTANGE, her father

SAINT-PREUX, her tutor

CLAIRE, her cousin

LORD EDWARD BOMSTON, Saint-Preux's patron and benefactor

MONSIEUR DE WOLMAR, Julie's husband

Critique:

Julie: Or, The New Héloïse, a novel written in epistolary form, owed a great deal to the English novels of seduction and sentiment published shortly before by

Samuel Richardson. In addition, it owed more than a little to Rousseau's own life, for there are many parallels between the careers of Saint-Preux and Rousseau. The author could never resist an opportunity to become didactic. As a result, the novel is filled with sermons on virtue, control of the passions, and the need for religion, as well as short essays setting forth Rousseau's ideas on education, his belief in natural love, his faith in the simple life, and his hopes for the triumph of man's innate goodness. All of the characters in the novel break into a didactic tone at the slightest opportunity. Indeed, many of the letters are simply tracts included to carry Rousseau's ideas to the reader.

The Story:

Saint-Preux, a young Swiss with unusual talents and sensibilities, was accepted by Madame d'Étange as tutor for her daughter Julie and Claire, Julie's cousin. Under Saint-Preux's instruction the girls made excellent progress, until Claire went away to visit her own family, about a year after Saint-Preux had been selected as tutor. During her absence Saint-Preux revealed his love for Julie. The girl, after some solicitation, admitted that she, too, was hopelessly in love. Both the young people viewed their situation as desperate, for the Baron d'Étange, Julie's father, had promised her as the bride of his friend, de Wolmar. In addition, the baron was a lineage-proud man who never would hear of his daughter's marriage to a commoner like Saint-Preux, regardless of the latter's abilities.

Julie, who feared that she might fall victim to her love for Saint-Preux, wrote to Claire and asked her to return as a protector. She wrote to her cousin because she was afraid that Madame d'Étange, if she suspected the truth, would immediately send the young man away. Claire returned, and for a time the romance continued to blossom. At last Claire and Julie decided that Saint-Preux ought to leave until the baron returned from an absence which had kept him from home for well over a year. The girls feared that he might dismiss Saint-Preux unless the way were paved by someone for the young man's continuation as tutor. Saint-Preux left. The girls showed themselves off to the baron when he returned, and he was so pleased with the progress of their education that he had Saint-Preux recalled.

Once again the love between Saint-Preux and Julie grew. In spite of her virtue, however, Julie fell victim to Saint-Preux's pleas and became his mistress. A short time later Saint-Preux was dismissed because the baron was planning to marry Julie to his friend, de Wolmar. The shock of seeing her lover depart, plus the news from her father that her marriage day was not far off, made Julie very ill. Only a visit from Saint-Preux, smuggled into the sickroom by Claire, saved the girl's life.

After Julie's recovery there followed more than a year of surreptitious meetings between the lovers. As her passion waxed, Julie's fear of her father grew less, until she even had Saint-Preux stay with her throughout the night. Neither of the young people believed that they were committing sin, for they honestly felt that they were already married in the eyes of heaven and that only the father's attitude kept them from living together publicly and with outward virtue.

In the meantime both young people had met Lord Edward Bomston, a British peer living in Switzerland. Saint-Preux and Lord Bomston became friends, even though Lord Bomston sought Julie's hand in marriage. The peer failed, however, in his suit. One night, while he and Saint-Preux were drinking, Bomston charged that someone had already found Julie's favor. Saint-Preux challenged Lord Bomston to a duel, but Julie, mindful of her reputation, sent a letter to Lord Bomston, telling him about Saint-Preux and herself and warning him that her fate and Saint-Preux's rested in his hands. She knew that Saint-Preux would be killed and that the duel would provoke enough scandal to ruin her and drive her to suicide. Lord Bomston, moved by her plea, called off the duel and publicly apologized to Saint-Preux. Again the two men became the firmest of friends.

Shortly afterward Lord Bomston, interceding on Saint-Preux's behalf with Baron d'Étange, urged that the baron permit a marriage between Julie and Saint-Preux. The baron refused, vowing that he would never break his promise to de Wolmar and that he never would, in any case, permit Julie to marry an adventurer. When the baron refused, Lord Bomston proposed that Julie and Saint-Preux elope to England and spend the rest of their lives as his pensioners on his estate in Oxfordshire. But Julie absolutely refused to leave her home without her father's consent.

Claire, Julie's cousin, in the meantime, had married a man friendly with both Lord Bomston and Saint-Preux. The tutor was forced to leave Julie's vicinity after her father had refused to permit their marriage. Through Claire's husband, however, the two lovers managed to keep up a correspondence.

Saint-Preux, after spending some months in France and England, returned to Switzerland to find that Julie was about to marry de Wolmar. He was so overcome that Lord Bomston spirited him away to England and arranged for him to embark with an expedition leaving England to travel around the world. Julie, meanwhile, reconciled herself to her father's will. Her mother, who might have permitted marriage to Saint-Preux, had recently died.

Four years passed before Saint-Preux returned to Europe. By that time Julie and her husband had two children and were settled into domestic tranquillity. De Wolmar, eager to see his wife happy, invited Saint-Preux to visit their home. During the visit it became obvious that the two lovers of years past had become more or less reconciled to their situation. Both seemed so filled with virtue that de Wolmar requested Saint-Preux to remain as tutor to his children. Saint-Preux, anxious to please everyone and to be near Julie, agreed to take on the responsibility, providing Lord Bomston did not need his services elsewhere. Saint-Preux felt that he could never adequately repay the Englishman for keeping him from crime, madness, and possible death at the time of Julie's marriage.

It turned out that Lord Bomston did need Saint-Preux's aid for a short time. The Englishman was traveling to Italy, where he had hopes of marrying a marchioness, and he wished Saint-Preux's aid in the affair. Saint-Preux, however, showed Lord Bomston that the woman was vicious and prevented the marriage; he also prevented a second attempt at marriage between the Englishman and a woman of doubtful reputation. During their absence Julie discovered that Claire, who had been widowed some time before, was in love with Saint-Preux. Hoping to help both Claire and Saint-Preux find happiness, Julie wrote to the tutor and told him of Claire's love. Saint-Preux replied that, although he esteemed Claire, he could not marry her, for he still loved Julie. Julie still hoped that she could arrange the match upon Saint-Preux's return from Italy.

Before his return an accident occurred. One day, while Julie and her family were walking alongside a lake, Julie's little boy fell in. In saving him from death, Julie suffered severe shock and exhaustion. The results were fatal to her. Before dying, however, she wrote a letter to Saint-Preux and asked him to take over the education of her children and Claire's. Her cousin, wrote Julie, would take her own place in making Saint-Preux's life complete.

Critique:

A new way to pay old debts is to use that priceless boon, credit. It is credit, seen in the actions of Lady Allworth, which enables the prodigal Wellborn to establish himself once again in the respectable world after having been cozened by his uncle, who resembles nothing so much as the dishonest city boss who operates in the background and uses public officers as his tools. The uncle, Sir Giles Overreach, was modeled after a famous extortioner of seventeenth-century England, Sir Giles Mompesson, who was discovered in his crimes and convicted a decade before the play appeared. The formula of the play, trickery to fool a criminal, was not a new one with Massinger, but he gave his theme dramatic interest and clever satire.

The Story:

Frank Wellborn, who by his prodigality had gone through a fortune and lost most of his friends, was at a point where even the alehouses refused to give him food or drink. One morning, as he was about to be thrown from an alehouse, he met a young page whom he had once befriended. The boy, Allworth, offered to lend him money, but Wellborn refused, knowing how little the boy had. Allworth confided to Wellborn that he was in love with Margaret, daughter of Sir Giles Overreach, who had despoiled young Wellborn in earlier days.

Later in the morning Wellborn went to see Allworth's widowed, wealthy young stepmother, Lady Allworth. When the lady promised to help him restore his reputation, his only request was that she receive him as a gentleman in her house.

Meanwhile Sir Giles Overreach was laying plans for his daughter's marriage, and for his own as well. After he had married Margaret to the rich Lord Lovell, he himself planned to marry Lady Allworth.

Overreach was angered to discover that Lady Allworth, who refused to be at home to him, had entertained the prodigal Wellborn as if he were a suitor. His anger was somewhat dissipated, however, by the fact that Lord Lovell was coming to visit. He realized also that if Wellborn got his hands on Lady Allworth's fortune, he, as the young man's uncle and creditor, might take it away.

Lovell, who had promised to visit Overreach's country place, knew of the love between Margaret and his page, Allworth, and he promised the page to do all he could to further the affair. Upon his arrival at the Overreach estate, he told Margaret of his plans, and the two pretended to carry on a courtship to deceive her father.

During Lovell's visit, Lady Allworth, accompanied by Wellborn, arrived also. Overreach, who was not in love with Lady Allworth but only desired her money, was pleased by his prospects of marrying his daughter to a nobleman and getting his hands on Lady Allworth's fortune through her possible marriage to his prodigal nephew. He even offered money to Wellborn, so that the latter could pay off his debts and appear once again as a respectable gentleman.

After the party had left Overreach's estate, Lovell released young Allworth from his position and told of further plans to help the page's suit. He intended to send the young man, ostensibly as a letter carrier, every day to the girl.

Overreach had revealed his true character to Lovell by promising him anything if the nobleman would but marry his daughter. The miser had even offered lands belonging to Lady Allworth, who was highly esteemed by Lovell. When told that those were not his to give, Overreach had explained to Lovell how he had acquired a fortune and would accumulate another. Lovell, indignant at what he heard, promised himself to right the many wrongs Overreach had done. Hence his decision to aid young Allworth's suit.

Lovell told Lady Allworth that he could never marry into the Overreach family. He added that he had an honorable motive in the pretense she had seen.

Meanwhile the suspected marriage between Lady Allworth and Wellborn, which had no basis in fact except that she treated him as a friend, had caused Wellborn's debtors to drop their claims against him. Wellborn paid his debts, however, with the money his uncle had lent on the strength of the supposed marriage.

One of Overreach's hangers-on, Marrall, promised to help Wellborn regain his lands, which his uncle had fraudulently taken from him for a fraction of their value. Marrall told Wellborn to ask Overreach to present the deed.

At Overreach's house young Allworth had supposedly carried a letter to Margaret and thus had a chance to talk with her. Overreach, reading the letter, learned that Lovell asked Margaret to marry him forthwith. Overjoyed, the miser sent a letter of command to his manor priest, telling the chaplain to marry Margaret to the gentleman who accompanied her with the letter. The young people, of course, went off and were immediately married, the letter acting as a means of getting the clergyman to perform the private ceremony.

Lady Allworth, in the meantime, told Lovell that she had helped Wellborn to regain his former position because Wellborn had aided her dead husband in years gone by. That action made clear, Lovell asked her to marry him. Lady Allworth consented.

A short time later Overreach appeared, driving Marrall before him and questioning him about a document that had disappeared. Overreach was also hunting for his daughter, who had failed to return home the night before. In his anger, Overreach asked for the thousand pounds he had lent to Wellborn. Wellborn, in turn, demanded an accounting of his estates. Overreach took his strongbox and removed a parchment which proved to be only a sealed paper with no writing on it. Marrall had removed the true deed.

Scarcely had Overreach realized that he no longer had any legal right to Wellborn's lands than his daughter and young Allworth, married the day before, arrived to tell of their marriage, in which Overreach had unconsciously aided them by sending a letter to his clergyman.

Overreach, angered beyond measure, would have killed his daughter with his sword, had not Lovell stopped him. Lord Lovell then announced his intended marriage to Lady Allworth and promised to speed the unraveling of Overreach's affairs so that Wellborn could regain his estates and Margaret and her husband have their rightful portion of the miser's wealth.

Critique:

During the 1830's the English heard many rumors that certain private schools in the north of England were badly mismanaged. Dickens made a trip to investigate the terrible conditions said to exist. The results of his findings appear in the academy run by Wackford Squeers in Nicholas Nickleby, a school where boys were not taught a thing, but were simply whipped, starved, and cowed in order to keep their spirits and the proprietor's expenses down. It has been claimed that to Dickens alone can be given the credit for arousing the wave of indignation that forced many institutions to close or to change. This novel, which also contains the Cheeryble brothers, the first of a series of exceptionally virtuous characters, was the first of Dickens' novels to have a truly complex plot. As such, it was a fitting antecedent for such later novels as A Tale of Two Cities and Great Expectations.

The Story:

When Nicholas Nickleby was nineteen years old, his father died a bankrupt. A short time after their bereavement, Nicholas, his sister Kate, and their mother went to London. There they hoped to get aid from the late Mr. Nickleby's brother Ralph. But Ralph Nickleby, a moneylender and miser, refused to help them except on his own terms. Ralph and his ways had to be accepted by the other Nicklebys, although they were not sure where life was taking them with Ralph as their protector.

Ralph Nickleby first secured a position for Nicholas as assistant to Wackford Squeers, who operated a boys' boarding school in Yorkshire. When Nicholas arrived at the school, he found it a terrible place where the boys were starved and mistreated almost beyond human imagination. But Nicholas had to put up with the situation, for his uncle had warned him that any help given to his sister and mother depended upon his remaining at the school where he had been placed. A crisis arose, however, when Wackford Squeers unmercifully beat an older boy named Smike, who was little better than an idiot. Nicholas interfered by taking the whip from Squeers and beating the schoolmaster in place of the boy. Immediately afterward Smike and Nicholas left the school and headed toward London.

In London, meanwhile, Mrs. Nickleby and Kate had been lodged in an old weatherbeaten cottage belonging to Ralph Nickleby, who hoped to use Kate to attract young Lord Verisopht into borrowing money at high rates. He also found work for Kate in a dressmaking establishment, where there was a great deal of labor and almost no pay. Kate did not mind the work at the dressmaker's, but she bitterly resented the leers which she had to endure when invited to her uncle's home to dine with Lord Verisopht and Sir Mulberry Hawk. Not long after she had taken the job, the dressmaker went bankrupt; Kate then found work for herself as companion to a rich but neurotic woman.

When Nicholas arrived in London, he sought out Newman Noggs, his uncle's clerk, who had promised aid if it became necessary. Newman Noggs helped Nicholas to clear himself of false charges brought by Wackford Squeers and Ralph Nickleby, for the latter denounced Nicholas as a thief.

With some notion of becoming sailors, Nicholas and Smike decided to go to Bristol. On the way they met Vincent Crummles, a theatrical producer, and joined his troupe. Both Smike and Nicholas were successful as actors. In addition, Nicholas adapted plays for the company to produce. After some weeks, however, Nicholas received a letter from Newman Noggs warning him that his presence was required in London. Upon his arrival in London, Nicholas accidentally met Sir Mulberry Hawk and Lord Verisopht at a tavern, where they were speaking maliciously of Kate. Nicholas, remonstrating with them, caused Sir Mulberry's horse to bolt. The baronet, thrown from his carriage and severely injured, vowed to take revenge.

Kate, meanwhile, had been exposed to the continued attentions of Sir Mulberry and Lord Verisopht, for Mrs. Nickleby, who failed to see them as villains, courted their favor and invited them into Kate's company. The future seemed very bleak indeed, until Nicholas, while looking for work at an employment agency, fell in with a kindly man who offered him a job. The man turned out to be one of the Cheeryble brothers, great workers of philanthropy. The Cheeryble brothers gave Nicholas a job in their counting-house at a decent salary, rented him a cottage reasonably, and helped him to furnish it for himself, Kate, and their mother. Suddenly the fortunes of the little family seemed much improved.

One day a beautiful young woman came into the Cheeryble brothers' office, and Nicholas fell in love with her. Shortly afterward Kate also fell in love with Frank Cheeryble, nephew of Nicholas' employers. Only Smike seemed unhappy; he, too, had fallen in love with Kate. Worse adventures were in store for him, however, for Wackford Squeers and Ralph Nickleby conspired to have Smike sent back to Squeers' school. Smike, recaptured after one escape, ran away a second time, and Nicholas managed to keep the lad from Squeers' clutches, much to the idiot's relief. But Smike's new happiness was short-lived. Sick with tuberculosis, he died a few months later.

By then Nicholas had discovered that his beloved's name was Madeline Bray and that her father was a bankrupt ne'er-do-well who lived off the little income she made by sewing and painting. Unknown to Nicholas, Ralph Nickleby and a fellow miser, Arthur Gride, were planning to force Madeline into a marriage with Gride, who was seventy years old. Fortunately, Madeline's father died just an hour before he was to hand his daughter over to the old miser. Nicholas arrived on the scene and took the girl to his home, to be cared for by Kate and his mother.

Meanwhile Gride's housekeeper, an old crone, left in a fit of jealousy and stole some of her employer's papers. One of the documents was a will which, if known, would have made Madeline Bray a rich woman. Ralph, learning of the will, had Squeers steal it from her. When he did, however, Frank Cheeryble and Newman Noggs caught him and turned him over to the police. The prisoner then confessed his part in the plot and also the conspiracy between Ralph and Gride to get Madeline's fortune.

As if Ralph Nickleby's fortunes were all against him, an old employee appeared and revealed to the Cheeryble brothers that Smike had been Ralph's son. Having always believed that the child had died in infancy, Ralph, when given that news, went home and hanged himself.

Nicholas, thinking that Frank Cheeryble was in love with Madeline, asked the Cheeryble brothers to see that she was taken care of elsewhere. Kate, who also believed that Frank was in love with Madeline, gave up seeing him. The Cheeryble brothers, in their good-hearted way, took the situation under observation and soon learned the true state of affairs. They then proceeded to unravel the lovers' troubles. They revealed to Nicholas that Frank was in love with Kate, and Frank readily admitted his love. While one Cheeryble brother did that, the other told the girls how matters stood. All four were, of course, exceedingly glad to have their affairs in order, and they were married shortly thereafter.

Years passed and both couples prospered. Nicholas had invested his wife's fortune in the Cheeryble brothers' firm, and he later, along with Frank Cheeryble, became a partner in the house. Newman Noggs, the Nickleby clerk who had helped Nicholas so many times, was restored to respectability; he had been a wealthy gentleman before he had fallen into Ralph Nickleby's hands. Old Gride, who had tried to marry Madeline for her money, was murdered by robbers; Lord Verisopht was killed in a duel, and Sir Mulberry Hawk came to a violent end. Thus the righteous prospered and the villains received their just deserts.

NICK OF THE WOODS

Type of work: Novel

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Locale: Kentucky

Critique:

Nick of the Woods, Or, The Jibben-ainosay remains one of the famous stories of the American frontier. A tale of Kentucky in the days when that state was the dark and bloody ground of border history and legend, it was written in part to counteract Cooper's heroic and sentimentalized characterization of the Indian and in part to retell a romantic story which had its foundation of truth in the early history of Pennsylvania. Dr. Bird, a Philadelphia physician, showed his deep interest in the historical development of his country in this book and in other of his novels and plays. The influence of Scott is apparent. The hero and heroine are the conventional lovers of romantic tradition, and the true interest of the novel centers about the wandering Quaker, Nathan Slaughter, a man driven to personal bloody vengeance against the Shawnees. Settlers like Colonel Bruce, Pardon Dodge, and Ralph Stackpole, a braggart of the breed of Mike Fink and other ringtail-roarers, add to the vividness and variety of the novel, which has appeared in almost thirty editions since the date of its original publication.

The Story:

The sun was still high, on a sultry August afternoon in 1782, when a train of emigrants emerged from the gloom of the forest and rode slowly toward Bruce's Station, one of the principal forts in the District of Kentucky. The travelers, consisting of men, women, and children, were accompanied by loaded pack-horses, cattle, and slaves, the whole giving the appearance of a village on the march. In the position of responsibility at the end of the cavalcade rode a young man of scarce twenty-three, whose five years in the camps and battles of the Revolution showed in his military bearing and in the mature gravity of his features. The beautiful young woman at his side was sufficiently like him in appearance to suggest their kinship. They were followed by two slaves, both mounted and armed.

Captain Roland Forrester and his cousin Edith were on their way to the Falls of the Ohio. The orphaned children of twin brothers who had died early in the Revolution, they had been reared as wards of their stern, wealthy uncle, Major Roland Forrester. A staunch Tory, the major had never forgiven his younger brothers for supporting the cause of the American patriots, and to keep them from inheriting his estate, for he was unmarried, he had executed a will in favor of an illegitimate daughter. About the time that his brothers fell in battle the child burned to death in the home of her foster mother. The major then adopted his nephew and niece and repeatedly declared his intention of making them his heirs. Young Roland Forrester forfeited his share of the inheritance, however, when he enlisted in a troop of Virginia horse. Shortly after Yorktown he returned to find his cousin destitute. On her uncle's death no will making her his heir-ess could be found. Richard Braxley, the major's lawyer and agent, had produced the original will and taken possession of the estate in the name of the major's daughter, who was, he claimed, still alive and soon to appear and claim her heritage. Having no funds to contest the will, Roland decided to move to Kentucky, his plan being to place Edith in the care of a distant pioneer relative at the Falls while he himself carved from the wilderness a fortune which would allow him to marry his lovely cousin.

Colonel Bruce, the commander of the station, welcomed the emigrants with hearty frontier hospitality, greeting the Forresters with special warmth and insisting that they share his cabin. Having served under Major Forrester in earlier Indian wars, he told many stories of those border campaigns. Mrs. Bruce, equally voluble, bustled about giving orders to her daughters and telling them to be as circumspect as Telie Doe, who remained quietly at her loom after a startled glance up from her work when she heard the name of Roland Forrester mentioned. When the others escorted Edith into the cabin she remained on the porch, where Roland was explaining his intention of pushing on toward the Falls the next day. The colonel, while deploring his guest's haste, said that there was no danger from Indians on the trace. At last the colonel noticed Telie and ordered her into the house. She was, he said, the daughter of a white renegade named Abel Doe. Out of pity the Bruces had taken her into their own home.

At that moment Tom Bruce, the colonel's oldest son, appeared with news that the Jibbenainosay had been active again; some hunters had found an Indian with a split skull and a slashed cross on his breast. The colonel explained. The Jibbenainosay, whom the settlers also called Nick of the Woods, was a mysterious avenger who had killed many Indians and marked them thus. The Shawnees, believing that he was either a ghost or a devil, had given him his name, which meant Spirit-that-walks. Some claimed to have seen him, a giant with horns and matted hair, always accompanied by a devil that looked like a small black bear.

The news of the Jibbenainosay's latest killing had been brought to the station by Roaring Ralph Stackpole, a swaggering braggart calling himself a ringtailed squealer whose middle name was Fight. When he challenged anyone in the settlement to a trial of strength, the rough frontiersmen decided to match him with Nathan Slaughter, a Quaker trapper derisively nicknamed Bloody Nathan because of his peaceful ways and gentle speech. Nathan, as thin as his horse and as meek-looking as his dog, finally consented to try a friendly fall. Much to the surprise of the crowd, he lifted the bully and threw him to the ground. Roaring Ralph, admitting that he had been fairly beaten, asked to borrow a horse so that he could continue his journey to Logan's Station. The Quaker trapper told the settlers that the Miami Indians were gathering, a threat of trouble on the frontier. When the others refused to take his news seriously, he exchanged his furs for lead and powder and quietly left the station.

That night Telie Doe begged Edith to let her go with the emigrants as a servant. When Edith refused, the girl crept sadly away. Roland slept with Bruce's sons on the porch of the cabin. Aroused from sleep during the night, he thought he heard a whispering voice telling him he was to cross Salt River by the lower ford. Only half awake, he decided that he was still dreaming.

The next morning there was great confusion at the station. Roaring Ralph had sneaked back into the settlement and stolen Roland's blooded brown horse. Knowing that the fugitive could not get far on the tired animal, Bruce's sons had ridden in pursuit. While the emigrant train started on ahead, Roland, Edith, and one of the slaves stayed at the station to await the return of the horse. The animal was found, wandering loose along the trail, and brought back by one of the boys. He said that the others were tracking the thief, intending to make him an object of frontier justice. As the travelers were about to set out to overtake the emigrant party, a horseman arrived with word that Indians had attacked Bryant's Station. The need to muster every fighting man in the settlement left Roland and his cousin without an escort; nevertheless, they announced their intention of starting with only one surly frontiersman to guide them. On the way their guide deserted them to return and join in the fighting. The travelers were relieved from their predicament when Telie Doe appeared and offered to act as their guide.

When they came to the branch to the two fords, Roland insisted on following the road to the upper ford, in spite of Telie Doe's pleadings. On the way they were startled by an unearthly yelling, and they found Roaring Ralph, his arms bound and a noose around his neck, astride a horse in such fashion that one movement of the animal would hang the rider from a limb overhead. Left to perish in that manner after the pursuers from Bruce's Station had overtaken him, he was grateful to his rescuers and offered to devote his life to Edith's service. Roland curtly sent the braggart and thief on his way.

Not far from the upper ford they met a fleeing settler named Pardon Dodge, who told them that Indians on the war-path blocked the road ahead. In their attempt to reach the lower ford they became lost. Riding in a circle, they found a dead Indian with a cross gashed on his breast. While they waited for the dread Jibbenainosay to appear, they saw harmless Nathan Slaughter, his faithful hound at his heels, coming through the forest. Hearing that Indians were close by, the Quaker became terrified. He promised to guide the party only if he were not called upon to fight.

The travelers took refuge at last in a ruined cabin near the flooded river. Indians attacked the cabin during the night, but after a savage hand-to-hand struggle they were repulsed. During the lull the Quaker suggested that he should try to evade the warriors and bring help to the besieged. Roland agreed. Shortly before daylight Roaring Ralph came down the river in a small dugout. It was desperately decided that the braggart was to take Edith and Telie across the flooded stream in his canoe, while Roland, Dodge, and the slave would try to follow on horseback. When Dodge's mount came ashore without his rider, the others decided that he had been washed from the saddle and drowned.

Later that morning the fugitives encountered another band of Indians. Edith was captured. Roaring Ralph escaped by rolling down the bank to the river; the slave was killed. Roland, knocked unconscious during the fight, awoke to find himself wounded and tightly bound. While he was wondering what had happened to Edith, a band of Kentuckians, led by young Tom Bruce, appeared and engaged the savages. When Roaring Ralph climbed the bank and joined in the fight, the Kentuckians, believing that they were seeing the ghost of the man they had hanged, scattered in confusion. Roaring Ralph, throwing wounded Tom Bruce over the saddle, rode away on Roland's horse.

The victorious Indians proceeded to divide a store of arms, cloth, and various trinkets, the distribution being made under the directions of an old chief by a brave whom Roland thought a half-breed. He learned the man's identity when Telle ran up to protest because Roland himself had been given to a Piankeshaw warrior. The light-skinned savage was Abel Doe, the renegade.

His arms bound, Roland was tethered to the Piankeshaw's saddle and, restrained on both sides by two younger warriors, forced to make a long, wearying march before his captors decided to camp for the night. Unable to sleep because of his cramped limbs, he was startled to hear an explosion close at hand, followed by crashing and the sounds of pursuit. Horrified when one of the Piankeshaws, his face shot away, fell across his prostrate body and died, Roland lost consciousness. He revived to find Nathan Slaughter bending over him, rubbing his chafed limbs. Another dead Piankeshaw lay nearby.

The Quaker, lurking in the forest while the Indians divided the spoils, had overheard the renegade and another white man discussing the price to be paid for the capture of Roland and Edith. Convinced by Nathan's account that his cousin had fallen into Braxley's hands, Roland wished to start at once to the main Indian village after the Quaker told him that the old chief must have been Wenonga; a Shawnee chieftain notorious for his brutality and the atrocities he had committed. On their way to the Shawnee camp Roland and the Quaker found five Indians capering about a white prisoner bound to a tree. While they struggled with the savages, the prisoner broke his bonds and aided them in killing the warriors. He was Roaring Ralph, the horse thief.

When they reached the Indian village, the Quaker daubed himself like a brave and went stealthily among the houses to find Edith. Peering through the chinks in one cabin, he saw Braxley and Abel Doe, and from the conversation he learned that Braxley had in his possession Major Forrester's second will. Having disposed of Roland, the lawyer was now planning to marry Edith and get her wealth. While he searched for Edith's place of imprisonment, Nathan found old Chief Wenonga lying drunk in the grass. He was about to plunge his knife in the savage's breast when he heard Edith's voice nearby. Leaving the chief, he went to a skin tent where he found Braxley and his prisoner. Taking the other man by surprise, the Quaker seized and bound him. With the will safe on his own person, Nathan was carrying Edith to safety when a clamor broke out in the Indian encampment.

Roaring Ralph, ordered to steal four horses upon which Edith and her rescuers could make their escape, had attempted to drive off the whole herd, and the stampeding horses ran through the village, arousing the warriors. Unable to escape, the party was captured. Roland and Roaring Ralph were bound and taken to separate wigwams. Nathan, dragged before the drunken old chief, defied Wenonga with such ferocity that the Quaker worked himself into an epileptic fit. The spasm, together with his fantastic disguise, convinced the Shawnee that his white prisoner was a great medicine man.

Doe and Braxley still had not reached an agreement over the renegade's pay. What Braxley did not know was that Doe had taken the will when he had searched the Quaker after his capture. The next day the renegade went to Roland and offered him his freedom and the estate if he would consent to marry Telie. Roland refused, but offered Doe half the estate if he would save Edith. The man left sullenly.

That night old Wenonga had the Quaker brought before him. After bragging of the white women and children he had killed and the scalps he had taken, the chief offered the prisoner his freedom if he would use his powers as a medicine man to put the Jibbenainosay in the power of the Shawnee. Nathan promised to do so if his bonds were cut. Freed, he revealed himself as the Jibbenainosay, a friendly settler whose wife and children Wenonga had treacherously killed years before. Seizing the chief's ax, he sank it into the savage's head. Then, after cutting away Wenonga's scalp lock and gashing the dead man's chest, the Quaker retrieved the scalps of his children and with a triumphant cry disappeared into the night.

The next morning, finding the Jibbenainosay's mark on their dead chief, the Shawnees were roused to wild fury. Roland and Roaring Tom were tied to the stake, timber heaped about them. The fires were lighted, but before the flames could reach them the sound of gunfire echoed above the yells of the savages and a band of Kentuckians rode through the smoke to set the prisoners free. Braxley struck spurs into his horse and rode away with Edith in his arms. The resistance ended when Nathan, with Wenonga's scalp at his belt, appeared striking right and left with his steel ax. The Indians scattered and ran, but the rejoicing of the Kentuckians was dimmed by the death of heroic Tom Bruce, who in spite of wounds he had suffered earlier had insisted on joining the attacking party.

During the confusion Pardon Dodge rode up with Edith on the saddle before him. Washed downstream in the flooded river, he had escaped on a raft and arrived back at Bruce's Station in time to enlist in the rescue party. Seeing Braxley riding away with Edith, he had mistaken the lawyer for an Indian and had shot him. Doe, mortally wounded, gave Roland the missing will, and the young Virginian promised to look after Telie with a brother's care.

Roland and Edith, preparing to return to Virginia to claim her inheritance, assured Nathan that they owed life as well as fortune to his bravery and daring. Although they begged him to return with them, he stoutly refused. But the work of the Jibbenainosay was done, and after a time the Quaker disappeared quietly into the woods. Roaring Ralph lived to cheat the law for many years. No one in the neighborhood of Bruce's Station ever heard of Nathan Slaughter again.

NIELS LYHNE

Author: Jens Peter Jacobsen (1847-1885)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Denmark

First published: 1880

Principal characters:

NIELS LYHNE, the hero

ERIK, his friend

FRU BOYLE, a widow

FENNIMORE, Niels' cousin

GERDA, Niels' wife

Critique:

Niels Lyhne is somber in tone and poetic in style. Perhaps some of the emotional overtones in the novel come from a rough parallel between the protagonist's and the author's lives. The plot, while complete and even tense at times, is always subordinated to the feelings of Lyhne as he goes through the quietly tragic experiences which were his lot. The pictures of Lyhne and Erik, Lyhne and Gerda, Lyhne and Fru Boyle are powerfully drawn. Always the reader seems to be inside the people, feeling as they feel.

The Story:

Bartholine was not like her family. They were common types, not desirous of knowledge or power, seeing little beyond the daily routine. But Bartholine loved beauty, lived in poetry. When Lyhne came to woo her, she accepted him as a matter of course, for he was of a family of poets and travelers. Her husband disappointed her, however; he was the youngest and all gifts of insight had been given to his older brothers.

When Niels was born, she put her hopes in him. Her son must be a real poet. She brooded on her boy and dreamed dreams for him. But Niels remained an ordinary insentient boy until he began to play with the pastor's son. The two youngsters played at the usual imaginative childhood games, but they had one special pastime. They told each other, turn and turn about, an interminable story which continued for months. Then Erik, a little older and a little stronger, became their leader. He had no time for stories; their play now was of pirates and secret caves.

When Niels was twelve years of age, two new people came to the Lyhne farm, Herr Bigum, a tutor, and Edele, Lyhne's unmarried sister. The tutor was forty and insignificant; he had failed to pass his examinations for the priesthood. Edele was a belle from Copenhagen. Her gay social life had ruined her health, and she had been sent to the country to recuperate. Niels, strongly attracted to his aunt, followed her constantly. One day he heard the ridiculous tutor declare his hopeless love for Edele. When Edele died, her death filled Niels with melancholy. He became quieter and more imaginative.

Since Erik was older, he went away to school first. He early showed promise as an artist. When Niels visited him, he found his old friend already a sculptor with a studio covered with dust. That first day Fru Boyle was in Erik's studio. She and Erik were laughing heartily over a book of poetry. Fru Boyle was a voluptuous widow of thirty. Her husband, who was in his sixties when they were married, had been dead for some three years. She led a Bohemian life, entertaining students and artists, and she was estranged from her family.

Niels, neglecting his duties as a student, spent most of his time with the widow. Wiser than he, she had no desire for a real love affair. Niels, too sensitive to push his love, was content to have their intimacy remain poetic and platonic. From time to time he felt guilty about his neglected studies and about his almost forgotten parents, to whom he seldom wrote. He was abruptly brought back to duty when he was notified of his father's sudden death.

Niels was alarmed when he saw how sad and aged his mother had grown. To please her he planned a trip so that she could see the places she had dreamed of so long. She agreed to go on the journey, but with many misgivings. They settled down in Clarens for the winter, a spot rich in memories of Rousseau. Bartholine grew weaker steadily, but she lived to see the gentle spring come to the Savoyard countryside. Niels buried her in Clarens.

Back in Copenhagen, he learned that Fru Boyle had closed up her town house to move into the country to be nearer her family. He resolved not to see her, but she wrote him an urgent note setting a meeting time for the next day. When they met, he embraced her ardently. At first she seemed to return his ardor, but after a while she drew away and told him she was engaged to be married. Niels left her for good, upset that she had forsaken him.

He took Erik with him to visit his uncle, a prosperous merchant who had an estate near the sea. There the two friends were comfortable, loafing and loving nineteen-year-old Fennimore, Niels' cousin, an eager girl with eyes only for Erik. Resignedly Niels gave way to his friend, who had already achieved some reputation as a painter rather than a sculptor. Niels attended the wedding in a melancholy spirit.

In the city Niels avoided his former friends. His only intimate was an atheistic doctor who influenced him strongly. Gradually Niels came to see that a personal God was a rationalized fiction, that Rousseau's innate nobility of man was a philosophic speculation.

Erik wrote him an appealing letter. Since his marriage he could no longer paint; his country companions gave him no inspiration. On a visit to his old friend, Niels found that his Erik had become a dissipated squire, drinking and gambling night after night. Niels' arrival induced him to stay home occasionally for a while, but soon Erik went back to his old haunts. He seemed to have no more ambition. Niels was thrown much in the company of Fennimore who had come to despise her husband. The cousins became lovers.

Fennimore seemed not to mind their secret kisses and their troubled rendezvous. One night, as she waited for Niels to come, word was brought that Erik had been in an accident. His carriage had overturned and his head had been smashed against a stone wall. The news threw her into a torment of grief and remorse. When Niels arrived she turned on him savagely for having despoiled the noble, dead Erik. Again saddened but resigned, Niels went back to his own estate.

For a while he was busy with farm affairs, content to learn about crops and rents. From time to time he visited a neighbor, a man with five children. The oldest was seventeen-year-old Gerda. By accident Niels came upon a curious scene: he saw the four younger brothers and sisters mimicking Niels' big city ways and unmercifully teasing Gerda, who defended him against his tormentors. Niels quietly went to her father to ask for her hand.

With Gerda he was very happy. At last Niels seemed to have found a haven. Charmed by his young wife's avid desire for knowledge, he patiently led her away from her old anthropomorphic God to his own independent humanism, and soon she was more convinced than he. Their son brought a new joy to them and bound them closer together.

After two years Gerda became gravely ill. Realizing that she was going to die, she renounced her advanced views and called for her pastor. When his son also died soon afterward, it seemed to Niels that there was nothing left in life for him.

After he had joined the army, he felt strengthened somehow to belong to something. During a battle he was fatally wounded in the chest. On his deathbed he rejected religion finally. In his memory he saw the people he had known. Had he been faithful to them? Were they worth caring about? Questioning to the last, he died a bitter death.

THE NIGGER OF THE NARCISSUS

Author: Joseph Conrad (Teodor Józef Konrad Korzeniowski, 1857-1924)

Type of plot: Psychological romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Bombay to London

First published: 1897

Principal characters:

JAMES WAIT, a Negro sailor on the Narcissus

DONKIN, a fellow sailor

OLD SINGLETON, another sailor

MR. BAKER, the first mate

Critique:

The Nigger of the Narcissus is more than a story of a sea voyage. It is a chronicle of character revealed by means of a dying Negro who brought Death aboard ship as a passenger. The tension of imminent death brought out the best and the worst in the crew of the Narcissus, and Conrad succeeded in capturing all the nuances of the situation for the reader. In this book there is a clue to the depth of Conrad's own understanding of human character under the tests of endurance and survival at sea. The author frequently said of this book that upon it he was willing to stand or fall, not as a novelist but as an artist striving for sincerity of expression.

The Story:

The British freighter Narcissus lay in Bombay harbor on a hot, sticky tropical night in the 1890's. Already loaded, it was to sail the next morning on its homeward voyage. The last crew member to come aboard was a huge Negro, James Wait. The Negro, who had a severe cough, asked his shipmates to help him in stowing his gear. A little later the men were in their bunks, and the only sound was snoring, interrupted at times by Wait's fits of coughing.

At daylight the Narcissus sailed. That evening, as the sailors gathered in little groups about the deck, the laughter and yarn spinning ceased at the sound of a weak rattle in Wait's bunk. It ended with a moan. The black man climbed up on deck, looked about, and made the men miserable by berating them for making so much noise that he, a dying man, could have no rest. It seemed, after a few days, that the Negro looked upon the approaching death as a friend. He paraded his trouble to everyone, railing bitterly at the salt meat, biscuits, and tea at mealtime.

All the men in the forecabin were touched by the dying man and his fits of coughing. There was nothing that they would not do for him, even to stealing pie for him from the officers' mess. Even Donkin, a Cockney who thought that no one was ever right but himself, catered to Wait. The Negro did no work after they were a week at sea. The first mate finally ordered him below to his bunk, and the captain upheld the mate's order. Each morning the men carried the invalid up on deck. Finally he was put in one of the deckhouse berths. He never let anyone doubt that his death was imminent. He fascinated the officers and tainted the lives of the superstitious sailors, even those who grumbled that his illness was a fraud.

As the Narcissus approached the Cape of Good Hope, heavier sails were set, the hatches were checked, and everything loose on deck was securely lashed in place in preparation for the winds that were sure to come. On the thirty-second day out of Bombay the ship began to put her nose into the heavy waves, instead of riding over. Gear blew loose, and the men were tossed about the deck. At sunset all sail was shortened in preparation for a terrific gale. That entire night nothing seemed left in the universe except darkness and the fury of the storm. In the gray morning half of the crew went below to rest. The remainder of them and the officers of the ship stayed on deck. Suddenly a great wall of water loomed out of the mist. The ship rose with it, as a gust of wind lay the vessel on its side. The watch below decks rushed out of the forecandle and crawled aft on hands and knees to join their comrades already on deck. The ship lay on its side for hours, while the men huddled against the various projections on the deck to which they had lashed themselves. At last someone asked about Wait. Another man shouted that he was trapped in the deckhouse, now half under water, and had drowned, because the heavy wave had jammed the door.

With five volunteers the bosun inched forward along the deck to see if the Negro might still be alive. Once above the side of the deckhouse they let go and slid down to it as the backwash of the heavy seas foamed around them. They crawled into the carpenter's shop next to the deckhouse cabin. One of the sailors drummed on the bulkhead with a piece of iron. When he stopped, they heard someone banging on the opposite side. Wait was still alive. He began to scream for help. Someone on deck found a crowbar and passed it below. The men in the tiny carpenter's shop battered at the planks until there was a hole in the bulkhead. Wait's head appeared in the hole and interrupted the work. Finally, on threat of being brained with the crowbar, he got out of the way. In another minute or two the men had made a hole large enough to pull him out. With great difficulty they carried him aft and lashed him tight. When he recovered his breath and began to lose his fear, he began to berate his rescuers for not being more prompt. The men hated and pitied him.

The day passed and night came. The ship still was afloat, but with half her deck under water. An icy wind from the Antarctic began to numb the men who had lain in the open for twenty-four hours without food. At dawn, the captain prepared to bring some order to the ship, for the wind was subsiding. Slowly the ship began to turn and gather way, with the decks still half under. At every lurch the crew expected the ship to slide from under them to the bottom of the sea. But when the wind was directly aft, the ship rose and was no longer at the mercy of wind and pounding seas.

The sailors were put to work, tired though they were, to make sail, to pump out the bilges, and to make the vessel shipshape once again. When they went below, they found the forecandle a ruin. Most of their gear had floated away.

A fair wind pushed the ship northward up the Atlantic under a blue sky and a dancing sea. Wait was again established in the deckhouse. Once more the doubt that he was really dying pervaded the ship, although no one dared say so. The captain went to interview him because he had to be sure. The crew was in an ugly mood. The captain, certain the man was dying, refused to let him go back to work. But the crew, convinced that the Negro was well enough to share in their labors, threatened mutiny. Sure that Wait would die, the captain wanted to let him die in peace. He persuaded the men that Wait was dying, and their mutterings ended.

As the ship drove northward Wait seemed to fade. His cheeks fell in, his skull lost its flesh; his appearance hypnotized the crew. Once again, pitying him in his dying, they humored his whims. He was always in their talk and their thoughts. The ship seemed too small to everyone; they could not get away from death.

As the ship approached the Flores islands Wait seemed better. But the older sailors shook their heads; it was common superstition that dying men on shipboard waited until they were in sight of land to breathe their last. Wait died as the Flores islands came over the horizon, and he was buried at sea. As the board on which his body lay was lifted to let the corpse slide into the sea, something caught. The men lifting the board held their breath. Everyone seemed in a trance until the corpse slid slowly downward and then plunged over the rail. The ship suddenly seemed lighter, as though relieved of the burden of Death itself.

Author: George Orwell (Eric Blair, 1903-1950)

Type of plot: Political satire

Time of plot: 1984

Locale: London

Principal characters:

WINSTON SMITH, a Party functionary

JULIA, a rebellious girl

O'BRIEN, a member of the Inner Party

MR. CHARRINGTON, one of the thought police

Critique:

Nineteen Eighty-Four is one of the keenest pieces of satire to be written in modern times, a dreadful warning of things that may come. In this queer, distorted society of Oceania, no institution or practice is without at least a rudimentary counterpart in our world. Television, thought control, the big lie, mass hysteria—all have been an accompaniment of the ills of the present. To present a picture of a completely totalitarian society, as Orwell has done here, is a painstaking accomplishment, and the result is a picture too credible for the thoughtful reader's comfort.

The Story:

In externals, at least, Winston Smith was well adjusted to his world. He drank the bitter victory gin and smoked the vile victory cigarettes. In the morning he did his exercises in front of the telescreen, and when the instructor spoke to him over the two-way television, he bent with renewed vigor to touch the floor. His flat was dingy and rickety, but at thirty-nine he was scarcely old enough to remember a time when housing had been better. He had a fair job at the Ministry of Truth, since he had a good mind and the ability to write newspeak, the official language.

He was a member of the outer ring of the Party.

One noon, by giving up his lunch at the ministry, he had a little free time to himself. Going to an alcove out of reach of the telescreen, he furtively took out his journal. It was a noble book with paper of fine quality unobtainable at present. It was an antique, bought on an illicit trip to a second-hand store run by old Mr. Charrington. While it was not illegal to keep a diary, for there were no laws in Oceania, it made him suspect. He wrote ploddingly about a picture he had seen of the valiant Oceania forces strafing shipwrecked refugees in the Mediterranean.

Musing over his writing, Winston found to his horror that he had written a slogan against Big Brother several times. He knew his act was a crime, even if the writing was due to gin; even to think such a slogan was a crime. Everywhere he looked, on stair landings and on store fronts, were posters showing Big Brother's all-seeing face, and citizens were reminded a hundred times a day that Big Brother was watching every move.

At the Ministry of Truth, Winston plunged into his routine. He had the job of rewriting records. If the Party made a wrong prediction on the progress of the war, if some aspect of production did not accord with the published goals of the ninth three-year plan, Winston corrected the record. All published material was constantly changed so that all history accorded with the wishes and aims of the Party.

There was a break in the day's routine for a two-minute hate period. On the big telescreen the face of Goldstein, the enemy of the Party, would appear, and a government speaker would work up the feelings of the viewers. Goldstein supposedly headed a great conspiracy against Oceania, and Winston loudly and dutifully drummed his heels as he took part in the group orgasm of hate.

A bold, dark-haired girl, wearing the red chastity belt, seemed often to be near Winston in the workrooms and in the commissary. He was afraid that she might be a member of the thought police. Seeing her outside the ministry, he decided she was following him. For a time he played with the idea of killing her. One day she slipped a note to him at work; the little paper announced that she loved him.

Winston was troubled. He had been married, but his wife belonged to the Anti-Sex League. For her, procreation was a Party duty. When they produced no children, his wife left him. Now this girl, Julia, spoke of love. Carefully making their conversation look like chance, Winston had a few private words with her in the lunchroom. She quickly named a country rendezvous. Winston met her in a woods, far from a telescreen, and she eagerly took him for a lover. Julia boasted that she had been the temporary mistress of several Party members and that she had no patience with the Anti-Sex League, although she worked diligently for it. She also bought sweets on the black market.

On another visit to Mr. Charrington's antique shop, the proprietor showed Winston an upstairs bedroom still preserved as it was before the Revolution. Although it was madness, Winston rented the room. Thereafter he and Julia had a comfortable bed for their brief meetings. Winston felt happy in the old room; there was no telescreen to spy on them.

Sometimes, while at work, Winston saw O'Brien, a kindly-looking member of the Inner Party. From a chance remark Winston deduced that O'Brien was not in sympathy with all the aims of the Party. When they could, Winston and Julia went to O'Brien's apartment. He assured them that Goldstein was really the head of a conspiracy and that eventually the Party would be overthrown. Julia told him of her sins against Party discipline, and Winston recounted his evidence that the Party distorted facts in public trials and purges. O'Brien then enrolled them in the conspiracy and gave them Goldstein's book to read.

After an exhausting hate week directed against the current enemy, Eurasia, Winston read aloud to the dozing Julia, both comfortably lying in bed, from Goldstein's treatise. Suddenly a voice rang out, ordering them to stand in the middle of the room. Winston grew sick when he realized that a hidden telescreen had spied on their actions. Soon the room was filled with truncheon-wielding policemen. Mr. Charrington came in, no longer a kindly member of the simple proletariat, but a keen, determined man of thirty-five. Winston knew then that Mr. Charrington belonged to the thought police. One of the guards hit Julia in the stomach. The others hurried Winston off to jail.

Winston, tortured for days, was beaten, kicked, and clubbed until he confessed his crimes. He willingly admitted to years of conspiracy with the rulers of Eurasia and told everything he knew of Julia. In the later phases of his torture O'Brien was at his side constantly. O'Brien kept him on a kind of rack with a doctor in attendance to keep him alive. He told Winston that Goldstein's book was a Party production, written in part by O'Brien himself.

Through it all the tortured man had one small triumph; he still loved Julia. Then O'Brien, knowing Winston's fear of rats, brought in a large cage filled with rodents and fastened it around Winston's head. In his unreasoning terror Winston begged him to let the rats eat Julia, instead.

Only one hurdle was left. Winston still hated Big Brother and said so. O'Brien patiently explained that the Party wanted no martyrs, for they strengthened opposition; nor did the leaders want only groveling subjection. Winston must also think right. The proletariat, happy in their ignorance, must never have a leader to rouse them. All Party members must think and feel as Big Brother directed.

When Winston was finally released, he was bald and his teeth were gone. Because he had been purged and because his crime had not been serious, he was even given a small job on a sub-committee. Mostly he sat solitary in taverns and drank victory gin. He even saw Julia once. She had coarsened in figure and her face was scarred. They had little to say to each other.

One day a big celebration was going on in the tavern. Oceania had achieved an important victory in Africa. Suddenly the doddering Winston felt himself purged. He believed. Now he could be shot with a pure soul, for at last he loved Big Brother.

NO TRIFLING WITH LOVE

Author: Alfred de Musset (1810-1857)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: France

First presented: 1864; first published: 1834

Principal characters:

THE BARON, a French nobleman

PERDICAN, his son

CAMILLE, his niece

ROSETTE, Camille's foster sister

MAÎTRE BLAZIUS, Perdican's tutor

MAÎTRE BRIDAINÉ, a village priest

Critique:

Alfred de Musset did not write his plays for the stage; he used the dramatic form rather as a vehicle for lyric expression. No Trifling With Love (On ne Badine pas Avec l'Amour), reflecting the writer's love affair with George Sand, is a romantic defense of love; but considered only as stage drama it has serious weaknesses. The chorus of peasants is a cumbersome device and extraordinary characters are mingled helter-skelter. The two priests are buffoons, Camille is very stubborn for a young girl, and Rosette dies in an unconvincing manner. This piece was classified by de Musset as a comedy, but its true merit lies in Perdican's defense of romantic love.

The Story:

Maître Blazius, with his three chins and round stomach, was proudly awaiting the arrival of Perdican whom he had tutored. Perdican had recently received a doctorate at Paris, and Maître Blazius felt that the credit was due to the boy's tutor. Gulping a huge bowl of wine presented by the chorus of listening peasants, he announced that Camille, niece of the Baron, was also expected home from the convent. The Baron was anxious to see his son Perdican married to Camille; he knew they had been in love since childhood.

Dame Pluche, chaperone of Camille, arrived out of breath. After drinking some vinegar and water, she announced that Camille was on her way. She told of Camille's education in the best convent in France and of the inheritance she was to get that day from her mother's estate. But she did not mention the projected marriage.

The Baron brought Maître Bridaine to the house. Since he expected the marriage to take place that day, he wanted the priest to perform the ceremony. To impress Camille, he arranged with Maître Bridaine to speak some Latin to Perdican at dinner; no matter if neither one understood it. Maître Bridaine was agreeable to the plan, but he was hostile at once to Maître Blazius, for he smelled wine on his breath.

When Perdican and Camille met, something seemed amiss. Perdican wanted to embrace his pretty cousin, but Camille spoke formally to her childhood sweetheart and refused a kiss. She was chiefly interested in looking at a portrait of her great-aunt, who had been a nun.

At dinner the two priests, Maître Bridaine and Maître Blazius, vied jealously with each other. Both were gourmets as well as gourmands, and they were apprehensive that there was no place for two priests in the luxurious household. After dinner Camille again refused a friendly talk with Perdican and even excused herself from walking in the garden. The Baron, upset at her coldness, grew even more indignant when Dame Pluche upheld Camille in her refusals. Perdican, with relief, renewed his acquaintance with Rosette, a pretty peasant girl who had been Camille's foster sister.

Maître Blazius, attempting to discredit his rival, told the Baron that Maître Bridaine had drunk three bottles of wine at dinner and was now walking about on unsteady feet. The Baron could scarcely listen because Maître Blazius' breath was so strong. Then Maître Bridaine hurried up to tell the Baron that Perdican was walking with Rosette on his arm and throwing pebbles about wildly.

Perdican was puzzled by Camille's coldness toward him. When Maître Blazius reminded him that the marriage was a project dear to the Baron's heart, the young man was willing to try again, but Camille was resolute. She would permit no holding of hands, and she even refused to talk to him about their childhood. She had come back only to receive her inheritance; the next day she would return to the convent. After Perdican left her, Camille asked the scandalized Dame Pluche to take a note to him.

Maître Bridaine was very unhappy. His rival was seated next to the Baron at mealtime, and Maître Blazius took all the choice morsels before he passed on the serving plate. In despair Maître Bridaine felt that he would be forced to give up his frequent visits; henceforth, though the prospect was repugnant, he would devote his time to parish work.

On a friendly walk Rosette complained to Perdican that women were kissed on the forehead or cheek by their male relatives and on the lips by their lovers; everyone kissed her on the cheek. Not displeased to oblige her, Perdican gave her a lover's kiss.

Dame Pluche was angry but she did take the note to Perdican. On the way she was spied on by Maître Blazius, who reported to the Baron that Camille undoubtedly had a secret correspondent. Since Perdican was making love to a girl who watched the turkeys, surely Camille was looking for a more satisfactory husband.

Invited to meet Camille at the fountain, Perdican found his cousin changed. She willingly kissed him and promised to remain a good friend. Then she frankly asked Perdican if he had had mistresses. Embarrassed, he admitted that he had. When she wanted to know where his latest was, Perdican had to admit he did not know. Camille, acquainted with no men except Perdican, had loved him until recently, when an older nun at the convent had changed her inclinations.

The nun had been rich and beautiful and much in love with her husband. After he took a mistress, she had taken a lover. At last she had retired to a convent. Her experience had convinced Camille that men were always unfaithful. She forced Perdican to admit that if they were married both of them might be expected to take other lovers.

Perdican valiantly defended earthly love, saying that it was worth all the trouble it caused and that of the two hundred nuns at the convent most of them would probably be glad to go back to their husbands and lovers. Seeing at last the futility of his argument, he told Camille to return to the nunnery.

Meanwhile Maître Blazius was unhappy because the servants reported that he was stealing bottles of wine. In addition, the Baron had decided that he had made up the story of Camille's secret correspondent. Disgusted with his second priest, the Baron forthrightly dismissed him. Not knowing that Maître Bridaine had fallen from favor too, Maître Blazius asked him to intercede with the Baron. Maître Bridaine refused; he thought the Baron would now reinstate him in favor.

Maître Blazius thought he saw a chance to regain lost ground when he met Dame Pluche carrying a letter. While he was trying to take the missive from her by force, Perdican arrived on the scene, took the letter, and read it out of curiosity. It was from Camille to a nun at the convent. In it Camille said she would soon be back; her young man was hurt and his pride wounded, just as they had foreseen. To Perdican the letter meant that the whole affair with Camille had been arranged in advance at the convent, and he resolved to spite her by courting Rosette seriously.

After writing a note to Camille to arrange a rendezvous, he brought Rosette to the fountain. Camille, hiding behind a tree, heard Perdican offer his heart to Rosette. As proof of his love, he gave her a chain to wear around her neck and threw a ring Camille had given him into the water.

Camille retrieved the ring and told Rosette to hide behind a curtain while she talked with Perdican. During the interview he confessed that he loved Camille. Camille then threw aside the curtain; Rosette had fainted. Perdican decided to go ahead in reality with his marriage to the peasant girl.

The Baron, told of his son's intention to marry Rosette, was angry, but in spite of his father's displeasure Perdican made arrangements for the ceremony. Camille, in despair, threw herself down before an altar and prayed for help. Coming in unexpectedly, Perdican, unnerved by her distress, clasped her in his arms while they confessed their love for each other. Suddenly they heard a cry behind the altar. Investigating, they found Rosette, dead. Camille was the first to realize their guilt in her death. To acknowledge that guilt, she said a final goodbye to Perdican.

Critique:

Northanger Abbey follows a more conventional pattern than most of Jane Austen's novels. In it an unspoiled girl meets a wholesome boy but is deterred from romance by an attractive cad. A lesser plot is a gleeful parody of the fantastic Gothic romances of Mrs. Radcliffe and other popular writers of the period. In the experiences of Catherine Morland the writer burlesques the misadventures and terrifying mishaps of the Gothic heroine. At the same time the novel presents a background picture of middle-class life in nineteenth-century England. The scenes laid in Bath, fashionable watering place of the day, are particularly good.

The Story:

Catherine Morland, though a plain girl, thought herself destined to become a heroine like those in her favorite Gothic novels. She might, however, have spent her entire life in Fullerton, the small village in which she was born, had not Mrs. Allen, wife of a wealthy neighbor, invited her to go to Bath. There a whole new world was opened to Catherine, who was delighted with the social life of the colony. It was at Bath that she met Isabella Thorpe, who became her best friend. Isabella was more worldly than Catherine and took it upon herself to instruct Catherine in the ways of society.

Isabella also introduced Catherine to her brother, John Thorpe. He and Catherine's brother, James Morland, were friends, and the four young people spent many enjoyable hours together. Catherine, however, had in the meantime met Henry Tilney, a young clergyman, and his sister Eleanor, with whom she was anxious to become better acquainted. John thwarted her in this desire, and Isa-bella and James aided him in deceptions aimed at keeping her away from Henry and Eleanor. After Isabella and James became engaged, Isabella doubled her efforts to interest Catherine in her brother John. Although Catherine loved her friend dearly, she could not extend this love to John, whom she knew in her heart to be an indolent, undesirable young man.

While James was at home arranging for an allowance so that he and Isabella could be married, Henry Tilney's brother, Captain Tilney, appeared on the scene. He was as worldly as Isabella. More important to her, he was extremely wealthy. Catherine was a little disturbed by the manner in which Isabella conducted herself with Captain Tilney, but she was too loyal to her friend to suspect her of being unfaithful to James.

Shortly after Captain Tilney arrived in Bath, Catherine was invited by Eleanor Tilney and her father, General Tilney, to visit them at Northanger Abbey, their old country home. Catherine was delighted, for she had always wanted to visit a real abbey, and she quickly wrote for and received a letter of permission from her parents. Henry aroused her imagination with stories of dark passageways and mysterious chests and closets.

When the party arrived at Northanger Abbey, Catherine was surprised and a little frightened to find that his descriptions had been so exact. Mrs. Tilney had died suddenly several years previously, and in her fear Catherine began to suspect that the general had murdered her. At the first opportunity she attempted to enter the dead woman's chambers. There Henry found her and assured her that his mother had died a natural death. Catherine was almost disappointed, for this news destroyed many of her romantic imaginings about Northanger Abbey.

For more than a week after this event Catherine worried because she had had no letter from Isabella. When she received a letter from her brother James, she learned the reason for Isabella's silence. He wrote that Isabella had become practically engaged to Captain Tilney. Catherine was almost ill when she read the news, and Henry and Eleanor Tilney were as disturbed as she. They knew that only greed and ambition drew Isabella from James to their wealthier brother and they feared for his happiness. They thought, however, that the captain was more experienced with such women and would fare better than had James.

They were right. Shortly afterward Catherine had a letter from Isabella telling the story in an entirely different light. She pretended that she and James had just had a misunderstanding, and she begged Catherine to write to James in her behalf. Catherine was not to be taken in. She wasted no time in sympathy for her one-time friend and thought her brother fortunate to be rid of such a schemer.

A short time later the general had to go to London on business and Eleanor and Catherine were alone at the Abbey, Henry's clerical duties compelling him to spend some time in his nearby parish. One night, soon after the general's departure, Eleanor went to Catherine's room. In a state of great embarrassment and agitation she told Catherine that the general had returned suddenly from London and had ordered Catherine to leave the Abbey early the next morning. Because she loved Catherine and did not want to hurt her, Eleanor would give no reason for the order. In great distress Catherine departed and returned to her home for the first time in many weeks. She and her family tried to forget the insult to her, but they could not help thinking of it constantly. Most of Catherine's thoughts were of Henry, whom she feared she might never see again.

Soon after her return home, Henry called on her and explained why his father had turned against Catherine. When the Tilney family first met Catherine, John Thorpe had told the general that she was the daughter of a wealthy family and that the Allen money would also be settled on her. He had bragged because at the time he himself had hoped to marry Catherine. But when Catherine rebuffed him, and after his sister Isabella was unable to win James again, John spitefully waited for the first opportunity to do her harm. He met the general in London and lost no time in telling him that Catherine had deceived him. Although she had never in any way implied that she was wealthy, the general gave her no chance to defend herself.

After Henry had told his story, he asked Catherine to marry him. Her parents gave their consent, with the understanding that the young couple must first win over the general. Henry returned home to wait.

Eleanor's marriage to a wealthy peer proved an unexpected aid to the lovers. The general was so pleased at having his daughter a viscountess that he was persuaded to forgive Catherine. When he learned also that the Morland family, though not wealthy, would allow Catherine three thousand pounds, he gladly gave his consent to the marriage. In less than a year after they met, and in spite of many hardships and trials, Catherine Morland married Henry Tilney with every prospect of happiness and comfort for the rest of her life.

Critique:

Nostromo is a well-told tale of adventure. Like many other Conrad novels, it begins in the middle of things and then by means of frequent flashbacks and an occasional glimpse ahead gradually reveals the information that the reader is eager to know, for Conrad is a master of suspense. Conrad wanted to make a study of what would happen to a man of good reputation, a victim of revolution, if he had a chance at great wealth. Nostromo is the result. The scene, as in much of Conrad's work, plays an important role, for the mist-hidden mountains, the brooding plain, and the San Tomé mine are an inscrutable background for the movements of little men.

The Story:

The Republic of Costaguana was in a state of revolt. Rebel troops, under the leadership of Pedrito Montero, had taken control of the eastern part of the country. When news of the revolt reached Sulaco, the principal town of the western section which was separated from the rest of the country by a mountain range, the leaders began to lay defense plans.

The chief interest of the town was the San Tomé silver mine in the nearby mountains, a mine managed by Charles Gould, an Englishman who, though educated in England, had been born in Sulaco, his father having been manager before him. Gould had made a great success of the mine. The semi-annual shipment of silver had just come down from the mine to the custom house when the telegraph operator from Esmeralda, on the eastern side of the mountains, sent word that troops had embarked on a transport under command of General Sotillo, and that the rebels planned to capture the silver ingots as well as Sulaco.

Gould decided to load the ingots on a lighter and set it afloat in the gulf pending the arrival of a ship that would take the cargo to the United States. The man to guide the boat would be Gian' Battista, known in Sulaco as Nostromo—our man—for he was considered incorruptible. His companion would be Martin Decoud, editor of the local newspaper, who had been drawn from Paris and kept in Sulaco by the European-educated Antonia Avelanos, to whom he had just become engaged. Decoud had incurred the anger of Montero by denouncing the revolutionist in his paper. Also, Decoud had conceived a plan for making the country around Sulaco an independent state, the Occidental Republic.

When Nostromo and Decoud set out in the black of the night, Sotillo's ship, approaching the port without lights, bumped into their lighter. Nostromo made for a nearby uninhabited island, the Great Isabel, where he cached the treasure. Then, leaving Decoud behind, he rowed the lighter to the middle of the harbor, pulled a plug, and sank her. He swam the remaining mile to the mainland.

Sotillo, on discovering that the silver had been spirited away, took possession of the custom house, where he conducted an inquisition. The next day Sulaco was seized by Montero, who considered Sotillo as of little worth.

When the Europeans and high-born natives who had not fled the town discovered that Nostromo was back, they took it for granted that the silver had been lost in the harbor. They asked Nostromo to take a message to Barrios, who commanded the loyalist troops on the eastern side of the mountains. In a spectacular engine ride up the side of the mountain and a subsequent six-day horseback journey through the mountain passes, Nostromo succeeded in delivering his message, and Barrios set out with his troops by boat to relieve the town of Sulaco.

Coming into the harbor, Nostromo sighted a boat which he recognized as the small craft attached to the lighter which had carried him and Decoud to Great Isabel. He dived overboard and swam to the boat. Barrios went on to Sulaco and drove the traitors out. Gould, meanwhile, had planted dynamite around the silver mine to destroy it in case of defeat, for he was determined to keep the mine from the revolutionists at any cost.

Nostromo rowed the little boat over to Great Isabel, where he discovered that Decoud was gone and that he had taken four of the ingots with him. He correctly guessed that Decoud had killed himself, for there was a blood stain on the edge of the boat. Decoud, left to himself when Nostromo returned to the mainland, had each day grown more and more lonely until finally he dug up four of the ingots, tied them to himself, went out in the boat, shot himself, and fell overboard, the weight of the ingots carrying him to the bottom of the harbor. Nostromo could not now tell Gould where the silver was, for he would himself have been suspected of stealing the four missing ingots. Since everyone thought the treasure was in the bottom of the sea, he decided to let the rumor stand and sell the ingots one by one, and so become rich slowly.

In gratitude for his many services to the country, the people provided Nostromo with a boat in which he hauled cargo as far north as California. Sometimes he would be gone for months while he carried out his schemes for disposing of the hidden silver. One day on his return he saw that a lighthouse was being built on Great Isabel. He was panic-stricken. Then he suggested that the keeper be old Giorgio Viola, in whose daughter Linda he was interested. He thought that with the Violas on the island no one would suspect his frequent visits.

Linda had a younger sister, Giselle, for whom the vagabond Ramirez was desperate. Viola would not allow her to receive his attentions and kept her under close guard. He would not permit Ramirez to come to the island.

To make his comings and goings more secure, Nostromo one day asked Linda to be his wife. Almost at once after that he realized that he was really in love with Giselle. In secret meetings he and Giselle confessed their mutual passion. Linda grew suspicious. Giselle begged Nostromo to carry her away, but he said he could not do so for a while. He finally told her about the silver and how he had to convert it into money before he could take her away.

Obsessed by hate of Ramirez, Viola began patrolling the island at night with his gun loaded. One night, as Nostromo was approaching Giselle's window, old Viola saw him and shot him. Hearing her father say that he had shot Ramirez, Linda rushed out. But Giselle ran past her and reached Nostromo first. It was she who accompanied him to the mainland. Nostromo, in the hospital, asked for the kindly Mrs. Gould, to whom he protested that Giselle was innocent and that he alone knew about the hidden treasure. Mrs. Gould, however, would not let him tell her where he had hidden it. It had caused so much sorrow that she did not want it to be brought to light again.

Nostromo refused any aid from Dr. Monygham and died without revealing the location of the ingots.

Dr. Monygham went in the police galley out to Great Isabel, where he informed Linda of Nostromo's death. She was thoroughly moved by the news and whispered that she—and she alone—had loved the man, that she would never forget Nostromo. Dr. Monygham observed, as Linda in despair cried out Nostromo's name, that triumphant as Nostromo had been in life this love of Linda's was the greatest victory of all.

The region about Sulaco finally did become the Occidental Republic. The San Tomé mine prospered under Gould's management, the population increased enormously, and the new country flourished with great vigor. Though Decoud, the country's first planner, and Nostromo, the hero of its inception, were dead, life in the new country went on richly and fully.

OBLOMOV

Author: Ivan Alexandrovich Goncharov (1812-1891)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Russia

First published: 1858

Principal characters:

ILYA ILYITCH OBLOMOV, a slothful Russian landowner

ANDREY STOLZ, Oblomov's only real friend

TARANTYEV, a parasitical friend of Oblomov

OLGA ILYINSKY, beloved of Oblomov

ZAHAR, Oblomov's valet

Critique:

Goncharov's study of sloth in a Russian landowner is second in Russian literature only to the tremendous studies of Russian psychology found in the work of Dostoevski. To the American reader the novel must inevitably stand as an indictment of the Russian mind in the nineteenth century. The one admirable character in the book is Stolz, who we are given to understand many times was half German and for this reason partly free from class prejudice and racial bias. Looking backward, an American is apt to feel that if all Russian landowners were as stupid as Goncharov portrayed them in Oblomov it is small wonder that the revolution of 1917 occurred. The novel strikes the reader as satire even more bitter than that found in Sinclair Lewis' novels about America during the 1920's.

The Story:

Ilya Ilyitch Oblomov was a Russian landowner brought up to do nothing. As a child he had been pampered in every way by his parents, even to the point where a valet put on and took off his shoes and stockings for him. The elder Oblomovs lived a bovine existence. Their land, maintained by three hundred serfs, provided them with plenty of money. Their days were taken up with eating and sleeping; they did nothing until an absolute necessity arose.

The chief influence on Oblomov during his childhood came from a German, a steward on a neighboring estate, who acted also as a tutor. Young Oblomov went to school at his home and there found his only boyhood friend, the German's son, Andrey Stolz. When the boys grew up, their lives seemed from the first destined to different ends. Stolz was sent off by his father with a few resources to make his way in the world, but among those resources was a great deal of practical experience. Stolz was able, within a few years, to amass considerable wealth for himself and to become a respected, vital businessman.

Oblomov, on the other hand, finished college after doing just enough work to get his diploma. He then became a clerk in a government office, one of the few positions considered an honorable post for a gentleman in Russia. Before three years had elapsed he resigned from his post, ostensibly because of ill health but actually because he could not bring himself to accomplish all his duties; he felt that the work was simply too much trouble for a gentleman. Having retired from the government, he began to do nothing during the daytime. The indolence, spreading like a poison, finally made him extremely inactive.

By his thirtieth birthday Oblomov was no farther along in life than he had been at his twentieth; he was, in fact, much worse off than before. His rooms were filthy and unkempt, for he was unable to control his valet, Zahar. Oblomov had no ambition whatever. Because he seldom left his rooms, he had no social life. Even at home he did nothing but lie around in a dressing gown and eat and sleep. How much money he got from his estates in southern Russia he did not know, for it would have been too much trouble to keep accounts. His bailiff, knowing his master would not stir out of Moscow, cheated Oblomov consistently, as did everyone else. Oblomov did not mind the cheating, so long as people did not disturb him.

At last two misfortunes, as Oblomov saw them, befell him. The bailiff reported by letter that only a few thousand roubles could be sent in the next year, and the landlord sent word that he needed Oblomov's apartment for a relative. Help, in the form of a parasitical friend, Tarantiev, seemed a godsend to Oblomov, for Tarantiev promised to find another apartment and to see what could be done about a new bailiff for the estates.

On the same day Stolz came to visit his boyhood friend and was aghast at the state in which he found Oblomov. His horror was increased when he learned that the doctors had told Oblomov he had only a few years to live unless he began to lead a more active life. Stolz hustled about, taking Oblomov with him everywhere and forcing his friend to become once more interested in life. When Stolz left on a trip to western Europe, he made Oblomov promise to meet him in Paris within a few more weeks.

Fate intervened so that Oblomov never kept his promise. Stolz had introduced him to Olga Ilyinsky, a sensitive vivacious, vital young woman. Oblomov had fallen in love with Olga and she with him. Visiting and planning their life together after marriage kept both of them busy throughout the summer, during which Oblomov was partly reclaimed from his apathy. But as winter drew on the actual wedding was no closer than it had been months before. Even for his marriage, Oblomov could not expend a great deal of effort; the habit of sloth was too deeply ingrained in him. Tarantiev had found an apartment for him in an outlying quarter of Moscow, with a thirty-year-old widow, and Oblomov lived there in comfort. Nor could he have given up the apartment, for without reading the contract he had signed it, and he was bound to keep the apartment at an exorbitant price.

Although concerned over his estates, Oblomov was unable to find anyone to set them in order, and he refused to make the journey home. He told himself he was too much in love to leave Olga; actually, he was too apathetic to travel twelve hundred miles to Oblomovka. Olga finally realized that she was still in love with the man that Oblomov could be, but that he would never become more than a half-dead idler. In an extremely pathetic scene she told him goodbye.

Following his dismissal by Olga, Oblomov

mov took to his bed with a fever. His valet, the valet's wife, and the landlady did all they could to help him, and so Oblomov slipped again into the habit of doing nothing. He realized the apathy of his mind and body and called it shameful, giving it the name of "Oblomovism." Tarantjev, the parasitical friend, planned to keep Oblomov in his clutches. First of all, he sent a friend of his to look after Oblomov's estates, but most of the money went into Tarantjev's pockets. Secondly, he tried to bring together the cowlike landlady and Oblomov; this second plot was easy, since the low-born woman was already in love with her gentlemanly tenant.

Meanwhile Olga had gone with her aunt to France. In Paris they met Stolz, who was there on business. Stolz, observing the great change in Olga, at last learned what had happened in Moscow after his departure. Having always loved Olga, he soon won her over and they were married. Realizing that Olga was still in love with Oblomov, however, Stolz returned to Moscow and tried to aid Oblomov by renting the estates and sending the money to Oblomov. Tarantjev, furious, recouped his losses by making Oblomov appear as the seducer of his landlady. The landlady gave a promissory note to Tarantjev and her brother, and they got one on her behalf from Oblomov. Thus Oblomov's income continued to pass into Tarantjev's hands, until Stolz learned of the arrangement and put an end to it.

Years passed. Olga asked her husband to look up Oblomov and find out if he had ever recovered from his terrible apathy. Stolz did so; Oblomov, he learned, had married his landlady and still did nothing. As the doctors had warned, he had suffered a slight stroke. He did ask Stolz to take care of his son, born of the landlady, after his death. Stolz agreed and not long afterward received word that he was to go for the boy. Oblomov had passed away as he had lived much of his life, sleeping.

OEDIPUS AT COLONUS

Author: Sophocles (495?-406 B.C.)

Type of plot: Classical tragedy

Time of plot: Remote antiquity

Locale: Colonus, near Athens

First presented: 405 B.C.

Principal characters:

OEDIPUS, former King of Thebes

ANTIGONE, and

ISMENE, his daughters

THESEUS, King of Athens

CREON, former regent of Thebes

POLYNICES, older son of Oedipus

ELDERS OF COLONUS

Critique:

It was probably inevitable that Sophocles, a great Greek patriot, should have written Oedipus at Colonus, a story dealing with the legendary past of his birthplace. Indeed, two of the high points of the play are magnificent odes in praise of Attica and Colonus. The Oedipus at Colonus is believed to be one of the last plays, if not the last play written by Sophocles, who died at the age of eighty-nine. The play represents the culmination of Sophocles' handling of the Cadmean myth. At the same time it is his last powerful affirmation of human dignity in the face of an incomprehensible universe.

The Story:

Many years had passed since King Oedipus had discovered to his horror that he had murdered his father and had married his own mother, who had given birth to his children. Having blinded himself and given up his royal authority in Thebes, he had been cared for by his faithful daughters, Antigone and Ismene. When internal strife broke out in Thebes, Oedipus, believed to be the cause of the trouble because of the curse the gods had put upon his family, was banished from the city.

He and Antigone wandered far. At last they came to an olive grove at Colonus, a sacred place near Athens. A man of Colonus warned the strangers that the grove in which they had stopped was sacred to the Furies. Oedipus, having known supreme mortal suffering, replied that he knew the Furies well and that he would remain in the grove. Disturbed, the man of Colonus stated that he would have to report this irregularity to Theseus, King of Athens and overlord of Colonus. Oedipus replied that he would welcome the king, for he had important words to say to Theseus.

The old men of Colonus were upset at Oedipus' calm in the grove of the Furies, whom they feared. They inquired, from a discreet distance, the identity of the blind stranger, and they were horror-stricken to learn that he was the infamous King of Thebes, whose dreadful story the whole civilized world had heard. Fearing the terrible wrath of the gods, they ordered him to be off with his daughter. Oedipus was able to quiet them, however, by explaining that he had suffered greatly, even though he had never consciously sinned against the gods. Furthermore, to the mystification of the old men, he hinted that he had strange powers and that he would bring good fortune to the land that would provide for him a place of refuge.

Ismene, another daughter of Oedipus, arrived in the grove at Colonus after searching throughout all Greece for her father and sister. She brought to Oedipus the unhappy news that his two sons, Polynices and Eteocles had fought for supremacy in Thebes. Polynices, defeated, had been banished to Argos, where he was now gathering a host to return to Thebes to regain control. Ismene also informed her father that the Oracle of Delphi had prophesied that Thebes was doomed to terrible misfortune if Oedipus should be buried anywhere but in that city. With this prophecy in mind, the Thebans hoped that Oedipus would return from his exile. But Oedipus, mindful of his banishment and of the faithlessness of his sons, declared to Ismene that he would remain in Colonus and that the land of Attica would be his tomb.

Having been informed of the arrival of Oedipus, Theseus went to Colonus and welcomed the pitiful old man and his daughters. Oedipus, offering his body to Attica and Colonus, prophesied that Attica would have good fortune if he were buried in its soil. Theseus, who had also known exile, was sympathetic; he promised to care for Oedipus and to protect the fearful old man from seizure by any Theban interloper.

After Theseus had returned to Athens, Creon, the former regent of Thebes, came to the grove with his followers. Deceitfully he urged Oedipus to return with him to Thebes, but Oedipus, aware of Creon's motives, reviled him for his duplicity. Oedipus cursed Thebes for the way it had disavowed him in his great suffering. Creon's men, at the command of their leader, seized Antigone and Ismene and carried them away. Blind Oedipus and the aged men of Colonus were too old and feeble to prevent their capture. Then Creon attempted to seize Oedipus. But by that time the alarm had been sounded, and Theseus returned to confront treacherous Creon and to order the rescue of Antigone and Ismene. Asked to explain his actions, Creon weakly argued that he had come to rid Attica of the taint which Oedipus surely would place upon the kingdom if its citizens offered shelter to any of the cursed progeny of Cadmus. Having checked Creon, Theseus rescued the two daughters of Oedipus.

In the meantime Polynices, older son of Oedipus, had been searching for Oedipus. Hoping to see the prophecy of the Delphic Oracle fulfilled, but for his own selfish ends, the young man came to the olive grove and with professions of repentance and filial devotion begged Oedipus to return with him to Argos. Oedipus, knowing that his son wished only to ensure the success of his expedition against his brother Eteocles, who was in authority at Thebes, heard Polynices out in silence; then he scathingly denounced both sons as traitors. Furthermore, with vehement intensity he prophesied that Polynices and Eteocles would die by violence. Polynices, impressed by his father's words but still ambitious and arrogant, ignored Antigone's pleas to spare their native city. He departed, convinced that he was going to certain death.

Three rolls of thunder presaged the impending death of old Oedipus. Impatiently, but at the same time with a certain air of resignation, Oedipus called for Theseus. Guiding the king and his two daughters to a nearby grotto, he predicted that as long as his burial place remained a secret known only to Theseus and his male descendants Attica would successfully resist all invasions. After he had urged Theseus to protect Antigone and Ismene, he dismissed his daughters. Only Theseus was with him when Oedipus suddenly disappeared. Antigone and Ismene tried to return to their father's tomb, but Theseus, true to his solemn promise, prevented them. He did, however, second them in their desire to return to Thebes, that they might prevent the dreadful bloodshed which threatened their native city because of Polynices and Eteocles.

THE OLD BACHELOR

Author: William Congreve (1670-1729)

Type of plot: Comedy of intrigue

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1693

Principal characters:

HEARTWELL, an old bachelor

BELINDA, a young woman of fashion

ARAMINTA, her cousin

BELLMOUR, a young bachelor in love with Belinda

VAINLOVE, his friend, in love with Araminta

SILVIA, Vainlove's former mistress

SIR JOSEPH WITTOL, a fool

CAPTAIN BLUFFE, his parasite

FONDLEWIFE, a banker

LAETITIA, his young wife

Critique:

The Old Bachelor was Congreve's first play and an immediate success. In it the twenty-three-year-old dramatist gave the dissolute Restoration theater audience the same comic fare that they had delighted in for three decades and which they still demanded: a light plot marked by witty but often gross dialogue, the cuckolding of bourgeois citizens, and ridicule of anything that bore the slightest trace of Puritanism. Congreve's plot is ingenious but not original, and his people are stock characters almost as old as the drama itself. But at the same time his brilliant style and high spirits lift his plays above the work of his contemporaries, now almost forgotten. One speech of Bellmour's in this play could easily stand as Congreve's own motto: "Come, come, leave business to idlers, and wisdom to fools: they have use of 'em: wit, be my faculty, and pleasure my occupation; and let Father Time shake his glass."

The Story:

Sir Joseph Wittol, a foolish young country knight, returned to the spot in London where he had been attacked by footpads the night before, a fracas from which Ned Bellmour, a gallant, had rescued him. Bellmour, meanwhile, had told his friend Sharper of the incident, and Sharper, encountering Wittol, pretended to be the man who had rescued the country bumpkin. Sharper, having ingratiated himself with his false story, declared that he had lost a hundred pounds in the scuffle, and Wittol promised to make good the loss. Wittol and Sharper were joined by Captain Bluffe, a spurious veteran of campaigns in the Low Countries and Wittol's mentor in the ways of the city. Bluffe's boasting and swaggering ways had deeply impressed the foolish young Wittol.

Meanwhile, in her apartment, Araminta was reproved by her cousin Belinda for being a devotee to love. A footman announced that Vainlove and Bellmour had arrived to pay their respects to Araminta. Belinda, who was preparing to go out but who was charmed by Bellmour, declared that she would remain to keep Araminta company. The young men having been admitted, Bellmour and Belinda exchanged amiable insults. Gavot, Araminta's singing-master, entertained the group with a song.

Silvia, a prostitute and Vainlove's discarded mistress, pined for his return to her. Lucy, her maid, suggested that they write a letter filled with foolish protestations of love, sign Araminta's name to it, and send it to Vainlove. This deception, they were sure, would cool Vainlove's ardor for Araminta. Meanwhile Heartwell, a professed woman-hater and a surly old bachelor, found himself against his will in front of Silvia's door. Bellmour and Vainlove saw him enter.

Lucy, masked, encountered Setter, Vainlove's man. When Setter used abusive language in speaking to her, she unmasked and demanded from her old acquaintance reparation in the form of information on the progress of the affair between Vainlove and Araminta. In the meantime Wittol gave Sharper a note of credit for a hundred pounds to be collected from Fondlewife, a banker. Bluffe rebuked Wittol for his misdirected generosity. When Sharper appeared with the cash and thanked Wittol, Bluffe intimated to Wittol that Sharper was a trickster. Replying to this insult, Sharper suggested that Bluffe was a fraud. When he struck Bluffe, the braggart was afraid to retaliate. Sharper soundly trounced Bluffe and departed; then Bluffe drew his sword and ranted brave words.

At Silvia's house Heartwell entertained the prostitute with hired singers and dancers. When he professed his love for her, she put him off coyly, asserting that she must be married to a man before he could enjoy her favors. Overcome by passion and by Silvia's wiles, he at last agreed to marry her. Saying he would return in the evening, he went to procure a marriage license.

Fondlewife, the banker, arranged to have a Puritan minister visit his young wife, Laetitia, while he was away on business. At the last minute, however, he grew wary and decided not to leave the city. In the meantime, Vainlove, who had been invited to visit Laetitia during the absence of her ancient, doting husband, sent Bellmour in his place. Vainlove received the letter to which Silvia had signed Araminta's name. The writer pleaded for an end to a slight disagreement between her and the gallant. Disappointed to find the lady so eager, Vainlove announced that his interest in Araminta had waned.

Bellmour, disguised as the Puritan minister, visited Laetitia and in private revealed his true identity; he explained that he had indiscreetly opened her letter to Vainlove and, the intrigue appealing to him, had come in Vainlove's stead. Laetitia, charmed by Bellmour's gallantry, entertained him in her bedroom.

Meeting Araminta in St. James Park,

Vainlove treated her coolly. Araminta failed to understand when he tossed the letter at her feet and stalked away. A few minutes later Wittol encountered Araminta for the first time and fell in love with her.

Fondlewife, accompanied by Wittol, who had come to get money from the banker, returned home prematurely, and Bellmour hid himself in the bedroom. Fondlewife went to get cash for Wittol. On his return the frantic Laetitia accused Wittol of attempting to ravish her. Wittol was asked to leave the house. Laetitia and Bellmour cleverly succeeded in keeping Bellmour's identity from Fondlewife until the cuckolded old gentleman discovered in the parlor the Scarron novel that Bellmour, in his disguise, had carried as a prayer book. Bellmour confessed to evil intentions, but declared that Fondlewife had returned too soon for the couple to have sinned. When Laetitia wept and declared their innocence, Fondlewife reluctantly accepted Bellmour's story.

Bellmour, still in his disguise, passed Silvia's apartment. Lucy, believing him a parson who would marry her mistress and Heartwell, stopped Bellmour. Bellmour revealed his true identity to Lucy and told her that he would provide both her and Silvia with proper husbands if she would agree to no more than a mock marriage of Heartwell and Silvia. Bellmour, practical joker that he was, could not bear to see his friend Heartwell marry a prostitute. He performed the service; then, during Heartwell's momentary absence, he told Silvia of the trick he had played.

Vainlove, meanwhile, learned from Setter that the letter signed by Araminta was probably Lucy's work, since Lucy had earlier made inquiries about the state of accord between Araminta and Vainlove. At the same time Sharper and Setter fooled Wittol into thinking that Araminta had conceived a passion for him. Wittol gave Setter gold to bring Araminta to him. Bluffe privately paid Setter a counter-bribe to convey Araminta to him.

Sharper, pretending no knowledge of Heartwell's marriage to Silvia, asked Heartwell to join him in a visit to the prostitute. Heartwell, in a predicament, told of his marriage and warned Sharper not to go near Silvia's house.

Vainlove and Bellmour brought Araminta and Belinda, both masked, to Silvia's house. Setter, in the meantime, had taken Lucy and Silvia, both also masked, to meet Wittol and Bluffe. Finding Heartwell alone, Vainlove, Bellmour, and the young ladies teased him unmercifully about his marriage. Setter returned with Wittol, Silvia, Bluffe, and Lucy. When the ladies all unmasked, the foolish knight and his roaring companion admitted indulgently that they had been hoodwinked. Heartwell, learning of the mock marriage, thanked Bellmour for his salvation; he vowed that if he ever really married it would be to an old crone. Vainlove and Araminta, and Bellmour and Belinda, planned their weddings for the next day.

THE OLD CURIOSITY SHOP

Author: Charles Dickens (1812-1870)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1840-1841

Principal characters:

LITTLE NELL TRENT, an orphan

NELL'S GRANDFATHER, a curiosity dealer and gambler

QUILP, a misanthropic, misshapen dwarf

KIT NUBBLES, Nell's friend

SAMPSON BRASS, an attorney, Quilp's creature in crime
SALLY BRASS, Sampson's sister and fellow criminal
THE SINGLE GENTLEMAN, Nell's great-uncle

Critique:

In its time one of the most popular of Dickens' novels, The Old Curiosity Shop is one of the most sentimental of novels written in a sentimental age. Emotion was held in check by Dickens in such novels as David Copperfield, and even in Oliver Twist, but in this novel he let emotions run riot, knowing full well that his audience reveled in an opportunity to let fall tears over such a pathetic fictional character as Little Nell. Moreover, Dickens himself had great feeling for his characters. The twentieth-century reader, however, product of a more hardened age, may be moved to scoff rather than to weep. Certainly he will feel that the novel is not "great" by present-day standards, even though it is a monument to the sentimentalism which moved a bygone generation, both in England and in America.

The Story:

Little Nell Trent lived alone with her aged Grandfather, who ran an old curiosity shop. The Grandfather, Little Nell's mother's father, had two obsessions. One was keeping Little Nell away from her brother Fred, a drunken profligate. The other was a burning desire to gamble. Hoping to provide a fortune for the little girl, the old man gambled away every penny he could get. Not content with using the income of the curiosity shop, the old man borrowed money recklessly.

One of his creditors was an ugly, misshapen, cruel dwarf named Quilp. Quilp, the husband of a pretty but browbeaten young wife, plotted to ruin the old man and someday marry Little Nell, who was only fourteen years old. Having discovered the old man's passion for gambling by forcing his wife to spy on Little Nell, Quilp was soon able, by due process of law, to take over the old curiosity shop. Little Nell and her Grandfather went away during the night and started an aimless journey from London to western England.

Almost penniless, the old man and the little girl found many friends on their way. For a time they traveled with a Punch and Judy troupe, until the girl became alarmed at the habits of the men connected with the show and persuaded her Grandfather to leave them. She and the old man were next befriended by Mrs. Jarley, owner of a waxworks, but the Grandfather's passion for gambling caused them to leave their benefactress. At last a schoolmaster, on his way to fill a new post, took them under his wing.

Under the schoolmaster's guidance the girl and her Grandfather were established in a little town as caretakers of a church. Their duties were very light because the church had a regular sexton as well.

Meanwhile the only friend Little Nell and her Grandfather had left behind in London, a poor boy named Kit Nubbles, was attempting to find them, but he was hampered by the enmity of Quilp and by the fact that he had to help support his widowed mother and two other children. In addition, Quilp, who had an unreasonable hatred for anyone honest, was trying to find Little Nell in order to wed her to one of her brother's worthless companions. That young man, Dick Swiveller, was a clerk in the office of Quilp's unscrupulous lawyer, Sampson Brass.

After Little Nell and her Grandfather had disappeared, a strange, single gentleman had appeared to rent an apartment from Sampson Brass. It turned out that he, too, was hunting for Little Nell and her Grandfather. Since he was obviously a man of wealth, no one could be certain of the stranger's motives. The Single Gentleman soon proved to Kit and Kit's honest employer that he wanted to aid the two runaways, and so Kit tried to help the stranger locate Little Nell and her Grandfather. Unfortunately, when they tried to follow the elusive trail of the old man and the girl, they came to a dead end. Their search carried them as far as the woman who ran the waxworks. Afterwards, apparently, the two had vanished from the face of the earth.

Quilp, angered that anyone might be willing to help Little Nell and prevent his plans for her marriage, tried to circumvent the Single Gentleman's efforts. To do so, he plotted with Attorney Brass and his sister Sally to make it appear that Kit had stolen some money. During one of the boy's visits to the stranger's rooms Brass placed a five-pound note in the boy's hat. When the money was discovered a few minutes later, Kit was accused of stealing it. In spite of his protestations of innocence and the belief of the Single Gentleman and Kit's employer that the boy had been unjustly accused, he was found guilty and sentenced to be transported to the colonies.

Dick Swiveller, not a complete rogue, discovered through a little girl he befriended, a girl kept virtually as a slave by the Brasses, that Kit had been falsely accused. With his aid, the Single Gentleman and Kit's employer were able to have the lad released before he was sent out of England. In addition, evidence that they found caused Brass to be stripped of his professional status and sent to prison. Sally Brass, who had been just as guilty in her brother's affairs, disappeared. Quilp, warned by Sally Brass of the turn his plot had taken, tried to flee prosecution. Leaving his riverside retreat late at night, he fell into the Thames and was drowned.

Shortly afterward the Single Gentleman learned the whereabouts of Little Nell and her Grandfather. Kit's employer's brother lived with the vicar of the church, where the girl and her Grandfather were caretakers, and the employer's brother had written to tell of the new couple in the village. The Single Gentleman, accompanied by Kit and his employer, started off at once to find Little Nell and her Grandfather. During the journey the Single Gentleman related his reasons for being interested in the pair.

The Single Gentleman was the Grandfather's younger brother. Years before, the Grandfather and he had both been in love with the same girl. Unsuccessful in his suit, the younger brother had left England. After many years he had returned, to learn that Nell's father and his profligate son, Nell's brother, had wasted the family fortune, leaving Nell and the old man in straitened circumstances from which her Grandfather had tried desperately to rescue them. The Single Gentleman, wealthy in his own right, wished to rescue his brother and Little Nell from the plight into which they had fallen.

The rescuers arrived in the village too late. Little Nell had just died, and she was buried the day after their arrival, in the churchyard where she had found happiness and employment. Her Grandfather, who felt he had nothing to live for after her death, died on her tomb a few days later and was buried beside her.

Kit, who had been in love with Little Nell as an ideal, returned with Nell's great-uncle to London. Through his patron's influence and with help from the same men who had judged him guilty of stealing money, only to find him honest and innocent, he found a proper place in society and was married shortly thereafter to a worthy girl. The Brasses, after Sampson Brass had been released from prison, became beggars in and about London. Mrs. Quilp, fortunately released by her dwarfish husband's death, married again and happily. As for the old curiosity shop, it was soon destroyed to make way for a new building. Even Kit could not tell exactly where it had stood.

MANOLIN, a young boy

Critique:

The Old Man and the Sea may very well become one of the true classics of this generation. Certainly, the qualities of Ernest Hemingway's short novel are those which we associate with many great stories of the past: near perfection of form within the limitations of its subject matter, restraint of treatment, regard for the unities of time and place, and evocative simplicity of style. Also, like most great stories, it can be read on more than one level of meaning. On one it is an exciting but tragic adventure story. Sustained by the pride of his calling, the only pride he has left, a broken old fisherman ventures far out into the Gulf Stream and there hooks the biggest marlin ever seen in those waters. Then, alone and exhausted by his struggle to harpoon the giant fish, he is forced into a losing battle with marauding sharks; they leave him nothing but the skeleton of his catch. On another level the book is a fable of the unconquerable spirit of man, a creature capable of snatching spiritual victory from circumstances of disaster and material defeat. On still another it is a parable of religious significance, its theme supported by the writer's unobtrusive handling of Christian symbols and metaphors. Like Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, Hemingway's Cuban fisherman is a character allowing the imagination of his creator to operate simultaneously in two different worlds of meaning and value, the one real and dramatic, the other moral and devotionally symbolic.

The Story:

For eighty-four days old Santiago had not caught a single fish. At first a young boy, Manolin, had shared his bad fortune, but after the fortieth luckless day the boy's father told his son to go in another boat. From that time on Santiago worked alone. Each morning he rowed his skiff out into the Gulf Stream where the big fish were. Each evening he came in empty-handed.

The boy loved the old fisherman and pitied him. If Manolin had no money of his own, he begged or stole to make sure that Santiago had enough to eat and fresh baits for his lines. The old man accepted his kindness with humility that was like a quiet kind of pride. Over their evening meals of rice or black beans they would talk about the fish they had taken in luckier times or about American baseball and the great DiMaggio. At night, alone in his shack, Santiago dreamed of lions on the beaches of Africa, where he had gone on a sailing ship years before. He no longer dreamed of his dead wife.

On the eighty-fifth day Santiago rowed out of the harbor in the cool dark before dawn. After leaving the smell of land behind him, he set his lines. Two of his baits were fresh tunas the boy had given him, as well as sardines to cover his hooks. The lines went straight down into deep dark water.

As the sun rose he saw other boats in toward shore, which was only a low green line on the sea. A hovering man-of-war bird showed him where dolphin were chasing some flying fish, but the school was moving too fast and too far away. The bird circled again. This time Santiago saw tuna leaping in the sunlight. A small one took the hook on his stern line. Hauling the quivering fish aboard, the old man thought it a good omen.

Toward noon a marlin started nibbling at the bait which was one hundred fathoms down. Gently the old man played the fish, a big one, as he knew from the weight on the line. At last he struck to settle the hook. The fish did not surface. Instead, it began to tow the skiff to the northwest. The old man braced himself, the line taut across his shoulders. Although he was alone and no longer strong, he had his skill and knew many tricks. He waited patiently for the fish to tire.

The old man shivered in the cold that came after sunset. When something took one of his remaining baits, he cut the line with his sheath knife. Once the fish lurched suddenly, pulling Santiago forward on his face and cutting his cheek. By dawn his left hand was stiff and cramped. The fish had headed northward; there was no land in sight. Another strong tug on the line sliced Santiago's right hand. Hungry, he cut strips from the tuna and chewed them slowly while he waited for the sun to warm him and ease his cramped fingers.

That morning the fish jumped. Seeing it leap, Santiago knew he had hooked the biggest marlin he had ever seen. Then the fish went under and turned toward the east. Santiago drank sparingly from his water bottle during the hot afternoon. Trying to forget his cut hand and aching back, he remembered the days when men had called him El Campéon and he had wrestled with a giant Negro in the tavern at Cienfuegos. Once an airplane droned overhead on its way to Miami.

Close to nightfall a dolphin took the small hook he had rebaited. He lifted the fish aboard, careful not to jerk the line over his shoulder. After he had rested, he cut fillets from the dolphin and kept also the two flying fish he found in its maw. That night he slept. He awoke to feel the line running through his fingers as the fish jumped. Feeding line slowly, he tried to tire the marlin. After the fish slowed its run, he washed his cut hands in sea water and ate one of the flying fish. At sunrise the marlin began to circle. Faint and dizzy, he worked to bring the big fish nearer with each turn. Almost exhausted, he finally drew his catch alongside and drove in the harpoon. He drank a little water before he lashed the marlin to bow and stern of his skiff. The fish was two feet longer than the boat. No catch like it had ever been seen in Havana harbor. It would make his fortune, he thought, as he hoisted his patched sails and set his course toward the southwest.

An hour later he sighted the first shark. It was a fierce Mako, and it came in fast to slash with raking teeth at the dead marlin. With failing might the old man struck the shark with his harpoon. The Mako rolled and sank, carrying the harpoon with it and leaving the marlin mutilated and bloody. Santiago knew the scent would spread. Watching, he saw two shovel-nosed sharks closing in. He struck at one with his knife lashed to the end of an oar and watched the scavenger sliding down into deep water. The other he killed while it tore at the flesh of the marlin. When the third appeared, he thrust at it with the knife, only to feel the blade snap as the fish rolled. The other sharks came at sunset. At first he tried to club them with the tiller from the skiff, but his hands were raw and bleeding and there were too many in the pack. In the darkness, as he steered toward the faint glow of Havana against the sky, he heard them hitting the carcass again and again. But the old man thought only of his steering and his great tiredness. He had gone out too far and the sharks had beaten him. He knew they would leave him nothing but the stripped skeleton of his great catch.

All lights were out when he sailed into the little harbor and beached his skiff. In the gloom he could just make out the white backbone and the upstanding tail of the fish. He started up the shore with the mast and furled sail of his boat. Once he fell under their weight and lay patiently until he could gather his strength. In his shack he fell on his bed and went to sleep.

There the boy found him later that morning. Meanwhile other fishermen, gathered about the skiff, marveled at the giant marlin, eighteen feet long from nose to tail. When Manolin returned to Santiago's shack with hot coffee, the old man awoke. The boy, he said, could have the spear of his fish. Manolin told him to rest, to make himself fit for the days of fishing they would have together. All that afternoon the old man slept, the boy sitting by his bed. Santiago was dreaming of lions.

OLD MORTALITY

Author: Katherine Anne Porter (1894- )

Type of plot: Social chronicle

Time of plot: 1885-1912

Locale: Texas and New Orleans

First published: 1939

MARIA, aged twelve

MIRANDA, aged eight

THEIR GRANDMOTHER

HARRY, their father

AMY, his dead sister

GABRIEL, her cousin and husband

MISS HONEY, his second wife

EVA PARRINGTON, cousin to Harry and Amy

Critique:

Katherine Anne Porter's reputation rests upon the excellence of her stories and short novels. "Old Mortality" is one of three novelettes from the collection titled Pale Horse, Pale Rider. The material of this work is as compact as that needed for the shorter form of narration, but the list of characters drawn for the reader with precision is longer and the effects are more varied. Miss Porter is said to work from memory; that is, she allows her memories to come together until she has a story in hand. In "Old Mortality," as in other of her stories, she uses her own southern background as a point of departure, suggesting also her own experience in the children's schooling at a convent, and revealing her interest in social causes as represented by Cousin Eva's absorption in and imprisonment for women's suffrage. The child Miranda seems to reflect Miss Porter's own challenge of her family's romantic myth as compared to the less romantic view of things at the present. The novelette is divided into three parts, each with its undertones of irony. The first, carrying the action from 1885-1902, presents the family background. Each of the other two, dated 1904 and 1912, is a fully developed scene showing Miranda's maturing reaction to the family myth.

The Story:

their years because they heard over and over stories drawn from the memories of grownups in their family. It was hard for them to realize that their father, or Aunt Amy, or Cousin Eva had ever been young.

Twice a year their grandmother felt compelled to spend a day in the attic, where she opened old trunks, read letters, looked at dresses, shoes, ribbons, brooches, and feathers. She cried quietly most of the day, but allowed the little girls to come and go and handle the treasures if they did not disturb her grief with questions. Not that they needed to ask questions. All their lives they had heard that their father's sister Amy was the most beautiful girl in the South, the finest rider, the most graceful dancer, the best-loved belle of her day. Their father had told them that Amy's picture did not do her justice. They wondered when they looked at it why older folks always sighed over it. They also wondered, when they looked at the keepsakes in the trunks, why no one else saw how dowdy, faded, and misshapen they were.

Their father looked askance at his chubby, freckle-faced little girls and hoped that some miracle would happen that they might change into slim, beautiful creatures like Amy. When he thanked God that all the women in his family were slim and beautiful, he seemed to forget Great-aunt Keziah in Kentucky, whose husband refused to let her ride his good horses after she achieved two hundred and twenty pounds, or Cousin Eva, whose chinless ugliness was a blot on the family reputation for comeliness.

The little girls felt that Eva, in her teaching of Latin and her speaking for women's suffrage, belonged to their everyday world; but Amy, in her complicated romance with Uncle Gabriel, belonged to the world of poetry. Amy had a weak chest and she had used that as an excuse to keep her second cousin Gabriel dangling for five years. She was never so sick, however, that she could not ride when she wanted to or dance all night.

At one dance Amy disappeared for a while with a man to whom she had once been engaged. Gabriel, ready to fight a duel, insisted that the man had kissed Amy. To prevent the duel as well as to protect his sister's good name, Harry shot at the man and then disappeared into Mexico for a year until the affair blew over. The little girls thought the scandal must have been terrific.

No one could see why Amy still would not marry Gabriel, who was young and handsome and his rich grandfather's apparent heir. When Gabriel quarreled with his grandfather about race horses and the old man cut him off without his expected inheritance, Amy suddenly decided to marry Gabriel. Six weeks later she died mysteriously, romantically.

During the winter Maria and Miranda were immured, as they liked to say, in a convent in New Orleans. The life they lived there was immeasurably dull except for Saturday afternoons during the racing season. Then, if the nuns thought the girls' deportment and scholastic achievements sufficient for the week, someone in the family was likely to come for the girls to take them to the races.

One Saturday their father came all the way from Texas to take them to the races at Crescent City, where their Uncle Gabriel had a horse entered. For propriety's sake they had to bet their dollar on their uncle's hundred-to-one shot. They knew that was no proper bet, but their father insisted on their showing respect for their uncle's horse. Just before the race they met their bleary-eyed Uncle Gabriel for the first time. He said they looked fine but rolled into one would not match up to Amy. As soon as she could, Miranda announced proudly that she thought Uncle Gabriel was a drunkard. His horse came in first. To celebrate, he insisted on taking Harry and the girls to see his second wife, Miss Honey. They found her in a cheap, foul-smelling room. She was unbending, especially when Uncle Gabriel asked her whether she thought the children resembled Amy a little. Horrified that their father took them to the races, she said she would rather see her son dead than hanging around a race track. The children realized that she hated all of them.

When they got back to the convent, Maria and Miranda realized that, although they had each won a hundred dollars which would go into the bank, they had not had even a nut bar to eat.

Eight years later Miranda was on a train going home for Uncle Gabriel's funeral. She sat down next to a very thin old lady who obviously disapproved of her until she asked her name. Then the old lady introduced herself as Cousin Eva Parrington. Cousin Eva had changed very little, Miranda suddenly thought, except that she was out from under her beautiful mother's thumb. Eva had crusaded for women's votes and had gone to jail three times. She hoped Miranda would use her brain a little in some good cause.

Neither Miranda nor Eva had been home for some time. Miranda had married young without her father's approval. Eva had not been back since her mother died. But both felt that they had to come to Uncle Gabriel's funeral, for his death was like the end of a period. His body was coming from Kentucky, where Miss Honey was buried, to Texas to be placed next to Amy's. Eva sniffed that the arrangement was an eternal infidelity laid on top of a lifelong infidelity whose brunt had been borne by Miss Honey.

Eva snapped when she began to talk of the romantic view everyone had held of Amy. There were plenty of people who did not love Amy or think her the most beautiful girl in the South. Eva could not even believe that Amy's tuberculosis had been the romantic illness the family had thought, nor did she think that illness had caused Amy's death. She believed that Amy had committed suicide on her honeymoon, after tormenting Gabriel with jealousy during the few weeks they were married because she was always sweet to everybody.

To Eva the parties which the belles in the old days felt they had to attend were markets for sex, where rivalry and competition were bitter and keen. Her part in them was particularly spoiled because Amy had always advised her to keep her chin up. Eva as an old lady was still bitter about the viciousness of a society that made outcasts of those who had one deficient feature.

The next morning Miranda's father met them at the station. Harry and Eva immediately fell into the easy comradeship of their youth. As they drove to the house, Miranda thought that she had no part in either of their worlds, both fading into the dimness of the past. Having discarded her father's romantic legend and Eva's bitter one, she decided that she would be compelled to find a more vital one of her own.

OLD ST. PAUL'S

Author: William Harrison Ainsworth (1805-1882)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Mid-seventeenth century

Locale: London

First published: 1841

Principal characters:

STEPHEN BLOUNDEL, a London grocer

AMABEL, his daughter

LEONARD HOLT, his apprentice

MAURICE WYVIL, in reality the Earl of Rochester

SIR PAUL PARRAVICIN, a bravo and bully

NIZZA MACASCREE, a beggar's daughter

JUDITH MALMAYNS, a wicked nurse

Critique:

Among the lesser nineteenth-century novelists, Ainsworth seems to merit a special place in our esteem. Although his stories are often melodramatic and lacking in sound literary values, he is a master in his use of setting as a pertinent locale; that is, the action of the novel is inherently dependent upon atmosphere and scene. In this novel his picture of plague-ridden London is excellent, and the effect of fear on the part of the citizens of London creates a compelling atmosphere for his plot. At every climax the plague controls the scene. Like Dickens and other of his Victorian contemporaries, Ainsworth does not hesitate to make full use of sentiment and melodrama.

The Story:

In the year of the great plague, 1665, Stephen Bloundel, a London grocer, gathered his household together and prayed for salvation. The grocer had a daughter, Amabel, a beauty who attracted attention wherever she went. The grocer's apprentice, Leonard Holt, was in love with her. Also reputedly in love with her was Maurice Wyvil, of whom Mr. Bloundel disapproved, and whom Amabel met secretly. That gentleman plotted, with the help of Lydyard, his companion, to dishonor Amabel and so win a wager. Actually, Wyvil and Lydyard were the infamous philanderers, the Earl of Rochester and Sir George Etherege. Their companions were men of low character, Sir Paul Parravicin and Major Pillichody.

Two people who profited by the pestilence were Chowles, a coffin maker, and Judith Malmayns, a nurse who robbed her patients and hid her plunder in a secret niche in St. Faith Cathedral, where her husband Matthew was a sexton.

Dr. Hodges, attending plague-stricken young Stephen Bloundel, identified Amabel's pursuer as the Earl of Rochester, who while pressing his suit with Amabel was also wooing an heiress, Mistress Mallet. To soothe the distraught Amabel, Dr. Hodges urged her to accept Leonard Holt. She promised to marry the apprentice a month after Stephen's disease had passed.

Stephen recovered, and Leonard pressed Amabel to marry him, but the girl could not bring herself to set a date for the wedding. Secretly she longed for Rochester. After failing in one design to kidnap Amabel, the nobleman succeeded in carrying her off willingly to the vaults of St. Paul's, with Leonard in pursuit. In the cathedral Leonard met a blind beggar, Mike Macascree, and his daughter Nizza, a young beauty. Leonard traced Amabel and her captor to Judith Malmayns, who during a search of the cathedral managed to trick Leonard and lock him in a tower. Nizza helped to release him in time to break up the wedding of Amabel and the Earl of Rochester. When Bloundel found his daughter in the cathedral, Leonard received all blame for the mischief.

While Parravicin looked at Nizza with hungry eyes, she was nursing Leonard, who had been attacked by the plague. When the girl tried to prevail upon Judith Malmayns to care for the sick man, the evil woman demanded money. From her bosom Nizza drew a gold piece which Judith seemed to recognize, but Nizza's father said she must not give it away because it had belonged to her dead mother. Parravicin, seeing that Nizza was in love with Leonard, paid Judith to do away with the apprentice.

Bloundel planned to close off his house from the city until the plague had spent itself. In the meantime he allowed no one to enter, and anyone who left would not be readmitted. Leonard had returned to the house but his stay there was short. Seeing Nizza kidnaped by Parravicin, he left the house to save her. Dr. Hodges allowed the apprentice to stay at his home. Leonard eventually found Nizza ill with the plague but otherwise unharmed.

Leonard overheard Rochester plotting with Pillichody and Etherege to kidnap Amabel again. Because the girl was languishing away in the boarded-up house, Dr. Hodges planned to remove her to the country, where fresh air might improve her health. When the Bloundels made plans to have Leonard escort her to an aunt at Ashdown Lodge, a hidden figure overheard all. Fully recovered from the plague, Nizza offered to accompany Amabel to the country. Nizza and Leonard came upon a sick man carrying his dead child to the plague pit. In gratitude toward Leonard for helping him, the man gave him a ring. The dying man seemed to find Nizza's face familiar.

While the two women and Leonard were at Ashdown Lodge, King Charles arrived. Amabel asked him to command Rochester to cease his attentions and King Charles complied. Seeing Nizza, the king asked her to be his mistress, but she was saved when Parravicin entered. When the two girls fled from Ashdown Lodge, King Charles, angered, withdrew his restraining command to Rochester. The girls were followed and kidnaped.

Leonard, after recovering from a second attack of the pestilence, returned to death-ridden London to report to Bloundel the fate of Amabel and Nizza. At St. Paul's he met the man whose child he had helped to bury. The man, whose name was Thirlby, was trying to find Nizza. He also held a strange influence over Judith Malmayns, but he would not tell Leonard why. Thirlby went to Nizza's father, and from the conversation Leonard gathered that Thirlby was Nizza's real father.

At last Leonard traced Nizza through Parravicin and reported to the villain his suspicions about Thirlby. Parravicin seemed greatly agitated. When Leonard went to Nizza, he again found her ill. He told her also about Thirlby.

Thirlby's story was this: he had married Isabella Morley after killing her husband. She bore a son and a daughter, but Thirlby treated the little girl so harshly that Isabella gave her, Nizza, or little Isabella, to Mike Macascree to care for. The son, Thirlby confessed, was Sir Paul Parravicin. Judith Malmayns was Thirlby's half-sister.

Rochester, having abducted Amabel, daily implored her to marry him. Stricken by the plague, he constantly called her name until she, convinced he really loved her, consented to marry him. When he told her, a month later, that he had tricked her and intended to cast her off, the unhappy girl lost her reason. But Judith Malmayns, her nurse, had witnessed the marriage ceremony and knew that it had been performed by a real priest, not a mock priest, as Rochester believed. Thinking to win his favor, she infected Amabel with the plague. Rochester repented during her illness and acknowledged her as his wife. After her death he promptly married Mistress Mallet.

The plague slowly spent itself. Leonard, still suffering shock from Amabel's death, was nursed back to health by Bloundel.

A few months later Leonard became the grocer's partner. When the great fire of London broke out, he thought of a plan to check the progress of the flames. Gaining an audience with King Charles in Whitehall, he proposed that houses nearest to the flames be blown up. The king took Leonard with him to inspect the progress of the fire, and during that journey Leonard earned King Charles' gratitude by saving him from death under a falling building. The fire raged on, destroying even the great cathedral of St. Paul, designed by Inigo Jones. The king promised that a new cathedral would rise on that site, one designed by Christopher Wren.

Leonard was rewarded for his heroism when King Charles dubbed him Baron Argentine and thus elevated him to a station worthy of Isabella, the former Nizza Macascree.

Critique:

Although the text of this play has come down to us in a badly printed quarto, it is quite clear that George Peele, the enfant terrible of English letters in the 1580's and 1590's, produced an engaging stage piece, the tradition of which has survived in the present-day English holiday pantomimes, replete with a sorcerer, a princess in durance vile, the beautiful and ugly daughters, a magic well, and enchantments galore. In the play Peele employed various folklore motifs that were current in his time and with which he was probably familiar in his childhood. The Old Wives' Tale, A Pleasant Conceited Comedy, must have charmed the old as well as the young in Elizabethan England. Milton drew upon the play for his Comus.

The Story:

Antic, Frolic, and Fantastic, three pages, were lost at night in an English forest. There they encountered Clunch, a blacksmith, who took them to his cottage to spend the night in comfort and safety. When Madge, Clunch's wife, offered them food, they refused it; Antic asked for a story instead. Oddly enough, Antic thereupon went to bed with old Clunch; his companions stayed up to hear Madge's story:

Once upon a time, a king had a daughter of great beauty. This daughter was stolen away. The king sent men in search of her until there were no men left in the realm except her brothers. Finally they, too, went in search of their sister. It was a magician disguised as a dragon who had kidnaped her. This magician imprisoned her in a great stone castle. The magician also placed at the crossroad a young man who by enchantment appeared by day as an old man, but who by night was changed into a bear.

At that point in Madge's tale two young men appeared and declared dejectedly that they had arrived in England in search of their sister Delia. They had given alms to an old man whom they encountered at a crossroad. In return for their kindness, the old man repeated a verse for them and told them to say to any inquirer about the rhyme that they had learned it from the white bear of England's wood.

After the brothers had left, the old man told aloud his own story. He had been happily married to a beautiful wife in Thessaly. But Sacrapant, a sorcerer, had fallen in love with her and had enchanted the husband, Erestus, so that by day he appeared to be an old man and by night a bear. His wife Venelia, under the influence of Sacrapant, became a lunatic. Distracted, she ran past the crossroad and was recognized by Senex, as Erestus was called in his enchanted form of an old man.

A farmer named Lampriscus, knowing a bear's fondness for sweets, gave Erestus a pot of honey. Lampriscus disclosed that he was twice a widower; by his first wife he had a beautiful daughter who, in her pride and petulance, was a great burden to him; by his second wife he had another daughter who was ugly and deformed. Erestus directed Lampriscus to send his daughters to the well to drink of the water of life; there they would find their fortunes.

Huanebango, a braggart who claimed that he could overpower sorcerers, and Booby, a peasant, came to the crossroad. Both sought to win the favor of the fair lady enchanted by Sacrapant. Huanebango refused to give alms to Erestus; Booby, however, gave him a piece of cake. Erestus predicted that Huanebango would soon be deaf and that Booby would go blind.

In his study, meanwhile, Sacrapant disclosed that he, the son of a witch, had transformed himself into a dragon and had kidnaped Delia, the daughter of the king. Delia entered the study and sat down to a magic feast with her captor. As the pair dined, the two brothers entered. Delia and Sacrapant fled, but Sacrapant soon returned to overcome the brothers with his magic. After they had been taken to a dungeon in the castle, Sacrapant triumphantly revealed aloud that he could die only by a dead man's hand.

When Eumenides, a wandering knight, came also to the crossroad, Erestus forecast his fortune for him in a rhymed riddle. Eumenides lay down to sleep. Before long he was awakened by an argument between two country fellows and a churchwarden; the churchwarden refused to bury their friend, Jack, who had died a pauper. Eumenides, recalling a stipulation of the riddle, paid the churchwarden all of the money he had so that Jack might be properly buried.

Huanebango and Booby came at length to Sacrapant's stronghold. Huanebango was struck down by a flame; Booby was stricken blind and turned loose to wander. Sacrapant then changed Delia's name to Berecynthia and took her to the fields to supervise the labors of her brothers, who were digging in the enchanted ground. Delia, ignorant of her true identity, failed to recognize her brothers.

In the meantime Zantippa, the proud daughter of Lampriscus, and Celanta, the deformed daughter, went to the well of life. Zantippa broke Celanta's waterpot. At the same time two Furies brought Huanebango, in a trance, to the well. As Zantippa dipped her pot into the well, she beheld a head in the water. She impetuously broke her pot on the head; thunder and lightning followed. Huanebango, deaf by enchantment, awoke from his trance. Unable to hear the strident railings of the beautiful Zantippa, he was smitten with love for her. The two left the well together.

Eumenides, continuing his wanderings, arrived at the well, where he was joined by the ghost of Jack, for whose burial he had given all of his money. The ghost declared its intention to serve him, but Eumenides insisted that the ghost should be his equal and share his worldly wealth. The ghost went ahead to an inn to arrange supper for the destitute Eumenides. As he was eating, Eumenides looked into his purse, which he believed completely empty, and discovered that it was full of money. Having dined, Eumenides, followed by the ghost, turned his steps toward Sacrapant's castle.

At the well, in the meantime, Celanta, with a new pot, had returned in the company of the blinded Booby. The peasant, unable to see her deformity, fell in love with her. Celanta, who was a gentle creature, obeyed the dictates of the head in the well and was thereupon rewarded with a pot of gold.

Eumenides and the ghost approached the castle. The ghost, placing wool in the knight's ears, directed him to sit quietly. When Sacrapant came out of his cell and asked Eumenides' identity, the ghost removed Sacrapant's magic wreath and took away his sword. Shorn of his magic powers, Sacrapant died. At the ghost's direction, Eumenides dug into the hillside and discovered a light enclosed in glass, but he was unable to get to the light. The ghost then gave Eumenides a horn to blow. At the sound of the blast, Venelia appeared, broke the glass, and extinguished the magic light to free everyone from the power of Sacrapant.

Eumenides and Delia pledged their troth. Eumenides sounded the horn again, and Venelia, the two brothers, and Erestus appeared. Now that all were together, the ghost demanded, upon the terms of equality with Eumenides, a half of Delia. Eumenides was reluctant; but, true to his word, he prepared to cut Delia in half with his sword. Convinced of Eumenides' good faith, the ghost withheld the stroke of the sword and left the group. All declared their intention of returning immediately to Thessaly.

Fantastic awoke Madge, for day was breaking. The old woman moved toward the kitchen and declared that breakfast would soon be ready.

Critique:

Harriet Beecher Stowe's son and biographer believed that Oldtown Folks was a novel destined to outlive the period in which it was written. Recent criticism seems likely to confirm that judgment. Overshadowed for decades by the greater fame of Uncle Tom's Cabin, Oldtown

Folks is now recognized for its distinctive qualities as a social and regional chronicle. The novel presents a vivid picture of New England life shortly after the Revolutionary War, with particular emphasis on the changing social life of the times and on the religious movements which followed the collapse of the older Pilgrim-Puritan theocracy. The treatment of character and scene is realistic for the most part, in spite of the inevitable overtones of Victorian sentimentality. There is no plot; the narrative pattern is largely one of quiet reminiscence, as told by Horace Holyoke. Oldtown was in reality the Massachusetts village of Natick, the home of Mrs. Stowe's husband. In writing the novel, she drew heavily upon his recollections of the town and its citizens.

The Story:

Years later Horace Holyoke could remember Oldtown as he had known it when he was a boy, a quiet little village beside a tranquil river in Massachusetts. Surrounded by farmhouses deep in green hollows or high on windy hilltops, Oldtown consisted of one rustic street where stood the chief landmarks of the community. Among these were the meeting house with its classic white spire, the schoolhouse, the academy, a tavern, and the general store which was also the post-office.

As was common in those days, when New England was changing from a Puritan theocracy of little villages to a group of states under a federal government, the minister was still the leading citizen of the town. Mr. Lothrop, descended from generations of ministers, was an Arminian in his views, a sedate, sensible man whose sermons were examples of elegant Addisonian English. His wife, the daughter of an aristocratic family of Boston, had never forsaken the Church of England, and each Easter, Whitsunday, and Christmas she traveled in her coach to Boston to attend services in Christ Church. The people of Oldtown called her, without disrespect, Lady Lothrop.

To Oldtown the famous John Eliot had come as an apostle to the Indians. Three generations later Horace Holyoke's father had arrived in the town to teach in the local academy. There he fell in love with Susy Badger, one of the prettiest of his pupils, and married her. With marriage came responsibilities that dimmed forever his hopes of completing his education at Harvard College. When Horace was a little boy, his father's household was a place of penny-pinching hardships. The mother's beauty faded and the father's health, weakened by his attempts to provide for his family and to continue his studies, broke slowly. Horace was ten and his brother Bill a few years older when their father died of consumption.

Horace grieved as only a small boy can over his father's death. His chief comfort in those dark days came from Sam Lawson, the village handyman and do-nothing. Many people called Sam shiftless. A few pitied him because his wife was a scold. A man of good humor and garrulous tongue, he was never too busy to take small boys on fishing or hunting trips and to tell them stories.

After the funeral Mrs. Holyoke and her sons went to live with her father, Deacon Badger, a leading farmer and miller of Oldtown. He, like Mr. Lothrop, was an Arminian, and a serene, affable man. His wife, on the other hand, was a strict Puritan Calvinist, as fond of theological dispute as she was of cleanliness. Many were the arguments Horace overheard between the two, with scriptural texts flying thick and fast in proof of their contentions. Their unmarried daughters were named Keziah and Lois. Keziah was a romantic-minded woman with a reputation for homeliness throughout the township. Lois was like a chestnut bur, prickly and rough on the outside but soft and smooth within, as her tart tongue and warm-hearted nature proved.

Just as the life of the village revolved around the meeting house, so the center of the Badger household was the spacious, white-sanded kitchen. There the friends of the family gathered—Miss Mehitable Rossiter, daughter of a former minister of the town, Major Broad, Squire Jones, Sam Lawson, and others. There Horace listened to discussions on politics, religion, philosophy, and varied local lore that were to influence him throughout his lifetime. There, too, it was decided that his brother Bill, who gave little promise as a scholar, was to work on the farm with Jacob Badger, his mother's brother, while Horace would be allowed to continue his studies in the village school.

Horace grew into a dreamy, imaginative boy. Sometimes he felt that auras suggestive of good or evil surrounded people whom he met. Often he dreamed of a silent, lonely lad of about his own age. The boy began to fade from Horace's visions, however, after he found a friend in young Harry Percival.

Harry's father was an English officer, the younger son of a landed family, who had brought his wife to America near the end of the Revolutionary War. The wife was a curate's daughter whom the officer had married secretly after their elopement. The husband proved worthless and dissipated, and at last he deserted his wife and two children when his regiment returned to England. With him he took his wife's wedding certificate and left behind a letter denying the legality of their marriage. Friendless and without funds, the wife set out to walk to Boston with Harry and his sister Eglantine. On the way the mother fell sick and died in the house of miserly Caleb Smith, called by his neighbors Old Crab Smith. The farmer decided to keep the boy as a field hand. Eglantine, or Tina, as her brother called her, was taken in by Caleb's sister, Miss Asphyxia. The children were treated so harshly, however, that at last they decided to run away. After a night spent with an old Indian woman in the woods they found a refuge in the abandoned Derch mansion, reported to be haunted, on the outskirts of Oldtown. There Sam Lawson and some neighbors found the children after smoke had been seen coming from the chimney of the old house.

Harry and Tina were befriended by Deacon Badger and his wife. Within a few days it had been decided that Harry was to remain with the Badgers, an arrangement made even more satisfactory by Mrs. Lothrop's promise to provide for the boy's clothing and education. Miss Mehitable Rossiter, whose life had been saddened some years before by the mysterious disappearance of her young half-sister Emily, adopted Tina. From that time on Horace's, Harry's, and Tina's lives were to be closely intertwined.

As a special Easter treat, Mrs. Lothrop arranged to take the children to Boston with her. There they were entertained by Madame Kittery, Mrs. Lothrop's mother, and during their stay they met Ellery Davenport. Ellery, Mrs. Lothrop's cousin, had served in the Continental army and had held several diplomatic posts abroad. He was handsome and clever. A grandson of the great Jonathan Edwards, he had turned away from the church; his preceptors were the French philosophers of the day. Horace heard that his wife was mad.

Madame Kittery, a kindly old woman, took a great interest in Horace and listened sympathetically while he told of his father's death and of his own desire to attend college. Shortly after the party returned to Oldtown he was told that money would be provided so that he and Harry could go to Harvard together. Madame Kittery had become his benefactress.

Over Thanksgiving, Ellery Davenport and Mrs. Lothrop's sister Deborah came to Oldtown for a visit. At a harvest dance at the Badger homestead Ellery paid marked attentions to young Tina. He also promised Miss Mehitable that on his return to France he would look for her lost sister, who was believed to have fled to that country.

Tina became more beautiful as she grew older. When the schoolmaster fell in love with her, and Miss Mehitable's cousin Mordecai, hired as her tutor, also succumbed to her charms, it was finally decided that she, with Horace and Harry, would go to Cloudland, where Jonathan Rossiter, Miss Mehitable's half-brother, was master of the academy. The boys lived with Mr. Rossiter. Tina boarded with the minister, Mr. Avery, whose daughter Esther became the friend and companion of the three newcomers. Esther and Harry soon fell in love. Under Mr. Avery's influence Harry decided to study for the ministry. Horace dreamed of a career that would insure his future with Tina, whom he had loved since childhood.

When Ellery Davenport returned from England, he had important news for Harry. The boy's father was now Sir Harry Percival. Ellery had also secured possession of the stolen marriage certificate, which he gave to Mr. Lothrop for safekeeping.

Horace and Harry entered Harvard as sophomores. Tina, visiting with the Kitterys in Boston or staying with Miss Mehitable in Oldtown, wrote them letters that were playful, almost mocking in tone. Horace began to worry about Ellery Davenport's influence on the girl. A short time later he heard that Ellery's insane wife had died. Then word came that Harry's father had died in England. Harry was now Sir Harry Percival. The two friends returned to Oldtown for the spring vacation, to learn on their arrival that Tina was engaged to marry Ellery. Horace, reflecting wryly on the contrast between his own humble position and the high estate to which his friends had been lifted, concealed with stubborn pride the deep hurt he felt.

Because Ellery was soon to return to the embassy in London, preparations for the wedding were hurried. After the ceremony Ellery and his bride planned to spend a short time, before sailing, in the reconditioned Dench mansion. When they arrived, they found a woman dressed in black waiting for them in the parlor of the old house. The caller was Emily Rossiter, whom Ellery had seduced and taken away from her family years before. Emily, spurning the settlement he had provided for her, had followed him to America. To her horror, Tina learned also that he was the father of the unfortunate woman's child.

The course Tina took was both noble and tragic. In spite of the wrong Ellery had done, both to Emily and to his bride, Tina refused to desert him. Instead, she used the fortune she had inherited from her father to establish Miss Mehitable and her sister in a house near Boston. The child she took with her to England when she went there with Ellery.

After his graduation Harry married Esther Avery and left for England with his bride. At first he planned to return shortly to America, but as time passed it became apparent that his interests lay abroad and that he intended to make his home there. Horace felt that he had been left alone in the world.

Eight years went by before Ellery and Tina returned to make their home near Boston. By that time Tina had grown faded and worn. Horace, a successful lawyer, saw her and her husband frequently; as a sympathetic spectator he watched the course of Ellery's reckless and unprincipled career, which, fed by his ambition, was to bring him close to madness. Ten years after his marriage Ellery was killed in a political duel.

Two more years passed before Horace and Tina were married. Their wedding journey took them to England to see Harry and Esther. Later, as the years came and went softly, Horace and his wife often visited Oldtown and there renewed the familiar associations of earlier days.

Critique:

Having begun Orlando Furioso as a continuation of Matteo Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, Ariosto improved greatly upon his original model by additions of his own and by extensive borrowings from extant chivalric literature. Consisting as it does of many stories and episodes, Ariosto's masterpiece of early Italian literature contains too many incidents and changes of scenes to possess true internal unity. In reality, the poem tells three main stories: the wars of Charlemagne and the invading Saracens, the romantic tale of Orlando's hopeless love for Angelica and his madness, and the love story of Rogero and Bradamant, supposed ancestors of the great house of Este. Orlando Furioso is a Renaissance epic mingling the world of chivalry and the world of fantasy.

The Story:

It happened that in the old days, as Charlemagne and his paladins battled against the Saracens, the great press of their enemies scattered the Christians and drove them back toward Paris. Then Angelica, the damsel whose beauty and deceit had caused so much dissension among her lovers, Christian and Saracen alike, escaped during the confusion and fled into a nearby wood.

As she rode deeper into the forest, her desire being to reach the nearest seaport from which she could take ship to return to her own land of Cathay, she saw walking toward her Rinaldo of France, the lover whom she hated. Straightway she fled from him as fast as she could ride and in her flight came upon Ferrau, a Saracen knight, weary after the battle. While Rinaldo and Ferrau fought for the maid, she rode away. They followed, both upon the Saracen's horse, until they came to a fork in the path, where they parted. A short time later Rinaldo saw his own lost horse, Bayardo, but the animal ran from him in the direction Angelica had taken, the knight in pursuit.

Angelica rode for a day and a night, until at last from weariness she lay down and slept. While she rested, Sacripant, Circassia's king, came riding through the forest. Awaking, Angelica pretended love for him and begged his aid. But before they had traveled far, Rinaldo overtook them. The two knights fought with fury until Sacripant's shield was splintered.

Seeing her champion overthrown, Angelica fled again until she met a white-bearded hermit, a magician, who put a spell upon her, so that she fell down in a deep sleep upon the seashore. There some travelers saw her and carried her by boat to the dread island of Ebuda, where each day a beautiful maiden was sacrificed to a monstrous orc sent by an angry sea god to harry the island. When the day came for Angelica to be the orc's victim, the islanders stripped her of all ornaments except one bracelet before they tied her to a rock on the sands.

The unhappy lovers who would have died for Angelica knew nothing of her plight. But Orlando, paladin of France, dreamed an evil dream as he lay behind the walls of Paris after that city had been besieged by the Saracens. Forgetful of his duties to King Charlemagne, he arose and passed at night through enemy lines to begin his search for Angelica, a quest which would take him into many lands and finally drive him mad.

Meanwhile Bradamant, the maiden knight, Rinaldo's sister, rode through the land in search of Rogero, the gallant Saracen whom she loved. During her travels she met Count Pinabel, who told her that Rogero had been imprisoned, along with many other brave knights, in the enchanted castle of old Atlantes, high in the Pyrenees. But Pinabel proved a treacherous knight intent on killing Bradamant. Leading her to the entrance of a cave, he pushed her headlong into the deep cavern.

Luckily, a tree broke her fall. Regaining consciousness, she found herself in the wizard Merlin's cave. There Melissa, a seeress, foretold a happy life for Bradamant and Rogero and related the history of the noble house they would found. The next day Melissa led Bradamant from the cave after telling the maiden that she could free Rogero with the aid of a magic ring given by Agramant, King of Africa, to Brunello, his faithful dwarf.

Bradamant found Brunello, as Melissa had directed. Armed with the ring, she caused the disenchantment of Rogero and all the other knights whom Atlantes held in his power. Released, the knights tried to capture the flying hippogryph, the old magician's steed. Rogero was successful in the chase, but when he mounted upon its back the creature soared high into the air. Bradamant grieved to see her lover carried skyward from her sight.

The hippogryph flew with Rogero to the realm of Alcina, a sorceress. There he saw Astolpho, a daring English knight, whom Alcina had enchanted. Later he slew Eriphilia, a giantess. Bradamant encountered Melissa again and from her learned that Rogero had yielded to Alcina's evil beauty. Melissa had herself conveyed to that strange land. There she reproved Rogero and gave him a magic ring by which he was able to break Alcina's spell. Mounting the hippogryph, he passed over many lands and came at last to the island of Ebuda, where he saw a beautiful maiden chained to a rock beside the sea.

The damsel was Angelica. She saw him check his flying steed, watched him as he prepared to battle the dreadful orc rising from the waves. Rogero put upon her finger the magic ring to keep her from all harm. Then he blinded the monster with the dazzling brightness of his shield. Leaving Ebuda, they rode away on the flying steed until they came to lesser Britain. By that time Rogero had forgotten Bradamant; he swore he would be Angelica's true knight forever.

But faithless Angelica made herself invisible by means of the magic ring and fled from him. Disconsolate, Rogero prepared to mount the hippogryph but found that the beast had flown back to its master. While he was returning to his own land, he saw Bradamant in the power of a giant. Following that false vision, conjured up by old Atlantes, he was lured to another enchanted palace in which the magician held captive many noble knights and ladies. Atlantes had been Rogero's tutor; he wished to keep the young knight safe from hurt in battle.

At Paris, meanwhile, the Saracens under fierce Rodomont had been defeated by the Christian champions. Rinaldo himself had killed in hand-to-hand combat Dardinello, King of Zumara. While Charlemagne's knights celebrated their victory, two Saracen youths mourned beside the body of Dardinello, their dead lord. One was Cloridan, a brave hunter; the other was Medoro, his brother. That night, like silent angels of death, they killed many Christian warriors to avenge their king. At daybreak they met Prince Zerbino of Scotland and his men. The Scottish knights killed Cloridan and left Medoro for dead upon the field.

There Angelica, journeying under the protection of the magic ring, found him. Taking him to a herdsman's hut nearby, she nursed him until his wounds had healed, for she who had been wooed by the most famous of knights had fallen in love with that young Saracen of humble birth. When they left the hut to continue their travels, Angelica had only the bracelet left from her perilous experience on Ebuda with which to reward the herdsman. She and Medoro finally reached Cathay, and Angelica made him a king in that far land.

In his search for Angelica, Orlando came one day to the herdsman's hut. When the peasant told him the story of Medoro and Angelica, and displayed the bracelet, Orlando, recognizing the jewel, thought his heart would break. That night, in sudden madness, he saddled his horse and rode away. At last he threw away his armor, tore his clothes, and raged naked through the forest. There was great grief when it was known that Orlando, greatest of knights, lived like the wild beasts he fought with his bare hands.

Once more the Saracens besieged Paris, but as good fortune would have it dissension broke out in the attackers' camp between Rodomont and Mandricardo, a prince of Tartary, over Doralice the Spanish princess. Because Doralice chose Mandricardo as her knight, Rodomont left King Agramant's camp and traveled until he met Isabella, a princess of Galicia, who was mourning her dead lover, Zerbino, whom Mandricardo had slain. While drunk, Rodomont killed Isabella. Grief-stricken, he built a bridge across a river near her tomb and there challenged all passing knights in honor of the dead woman. Twice, however, he was overthrown, once by a naked madman, Orlando, and again by Bradamant.

Bradamant fought with Rodomont on the plea of Flordelice, whose husband, Brandimart, had been imprisoned by the Saracen. Defeated, Rodomont promised to release all his Christian prisoners, including Brandimart. Bradamant took Rodomont's horse, Frontino, which had once been Rogero's property, and asked Flordelice to deliver it to Rogero.

For, in the meantime, Rogero had been freed from the enchantment of Atlantes. His deliverer was Astolpho, whom Melissa had released from Alcina's power. By the blast of a magic horn, Astolpho put Atlantes to flight. Then, mounting the wizard's hippogryph, he flew to the land of Prester John. From there he journeyed to the regions of the moon, where St. John showed him many wonders, including some mysterious vials containing the senses lost by poets, lovers, and philosophers. Among the vials Astolpho saw one containing Orlando's lost wits. With that vial he flew down to Nubia, where, after proper ceremonies, he held the vial to Orlando's nose and the madman's senses returned to his head. Orlando and Astolpho led a Nubian army against Biserta and sacked that city.

Rogero, returning to the Saracen camp, quarreled with Mandricardo over the Tartar's right to wear the escutcheon of Trojan Hector, and Rogero killed Mandricardo in single combat. As dissension continued in the Saracen camp, Agramant withdrew his army from the walls of Paris. Then it was decided to settle the war by a battle between champions. Rinaldo was named defender of the Christians. Agramant chose Rogero as his bravest knight. But in the midst of the combat Agramant broke his oath and attacked Charlemagne's knights. Although he had promised Bradamant that he would accept Christianity after the combat, Rogero, seeing the rout of the Saracens, chose to follow his defeated king. After many adventures, separated from his comrades, he was cast away on a desert isle. There a holy man baptized him, and there he lived while Orlando, Oliver, and Brandimart fought with the Saracen kings—Agramant, Gradasso, Sobrino—and overcame them at Lipadusa.

Agramant, Gradasso, and Brandimart were killed in the fight. Old Sobrino survived to turn Christian.

On his return voyage Orlando stopped at the desert isle and rescued Rogero. Great was the rejoicing when the knights learned that Rogero had been baptized. Rinaldo, who was among the paladins, gladly promised his sister to Rogero.

But Bradamant's parents wished her to marry Leo, son of the Emperor Constantine of Greece, and to force her to their will they shut her up in a strong castle. Separated from his love, Rogero decided that Leo should die. On his way to challenge his rival, he joined an army of Bulgarians and fought with them against Constantine's troops. When the Greeks fled, he pursued them until he found himself alone in enemy country. Captured, he was imprisoned by Theodora, the emperor's sister, whose son he had slain. When Leo, a courteous knight, heard what had happened, he rescued Rogero and hid him in his own house.

Word came that Bradamant had vowed to wed only a knight who could withstand her in combat. Leo, unaware of Rogero's true name but impressed by the Saracen's valor, asked him to be the prince's champion. Bradamant and Rogero fought, and Rogero was the victor. Then the sad knight went off into the forest alone. Leo found him there, almost dead from grief. When he learned who the strange knight really was, Leo gave up his own claim to Bradamant's hand and returned with Rogero to Charlemagne's court. There Bradamant and Rogero were reunited.

At a feast to celebrate their betrothal Rodomont appeared to accuse Rogero of apostasy, and Rogero slew the haughty Saracen in single combat. So the Christian knights celebrated the wedding of Rogero and Bradamant with all good-will. There was even greater cause for rejoicing when ambassadors from Bulgaria appeared to announce that the grateful Bulgarians had named gallant Rogero as their king.

Critique:

Orley Farm contains all those elements of plot so dear to Victorian readers—a forged will, a false heir, a woman with a guilty secret, a chivalrous gentleman, romantic young love, a long court trial, expiation, and the spectacle of villainy receiving its deserved reward. The story is lively and complicated. This novel shows Trollope almost at his best—no more than a degree or two below the level of his Barchester series.

The Story:

Sir Joseph Mason was nearing seventy when he married a second wife forty-five years his junior. Having been in turn merchant, alderman, mayor, and knight, he had by that time amassed a large fortune, out of which he purchased Groby Park, a landed estate in Yorkshire. This property he turned over to the son of his first marriage, Joseph Mason, Esq., who under his father's generous provision was able to lead the life of a country gentleman with as much magnificence as his mean, grasping nature would allow. Sir Joseph himself made his home at Orley Farm, a country residence not far from London. Joseph Mason had always been assured that the farm would go to him, as head of the family, at his father's death.

The baronet's second marriage was little more than an old man's attempt to find companionship and comfort in his declining years, and young Lady Mason, a quiet, sensible, clever woman, cheerfully accepted it as such. One son, Lucius, was born to them. Then Sir Joseph died suddenly, and when the time came to prove his will it was discovered that in an attached codicil he had bequeathed Orley Farm to his infant son. Joseph Mason, feeling that he had been deprived of property rightfully his, contested the codicil.

The Orley Farm Case, as it was called, had many complications. The will had been drawn up by Jonathan Usbech, Sir Joseph's attorney, but it, like the codicil, was in Lady Mason's handwriting, old Usbech having suffered from a gouty hand at the time. It had been witnessed by John Kennerby, Sir Joseph's clerk, and by Bridget Bolster, a housemaid. At the trial both swore that they had been called to their master's bedside and there, in the presence of Usbech and Lady

Mason, had signed a document which all assumed had been the codicil. Lady Mason readily admitted that while she had asked nothing for herself she had wanted much for her child, and that before Usbech and Mr. Furnival, a barrister, she had often urged her husband to leave Orley Farm to little Lucius. Old Usbech having died in the meantime, she was unable to have her statement confirmed by him, but Mr. Furnival testified to the truth of her assertion.

The result was that Joseph Mason lost his case. The will and codicil having been upheld, Lady Mason and her son continued to live at Orley Farm and to enjoy its yearly income of eight hundred pounds. Joseph Mason retired to sulk at Groby Park. Miriam Usbech, old Jonathan's daughter, also benefited under the terms of the codicil to the extent of two thousand pounds, an inheritance she lost when she entrusted it to her husband, Samuel Dockwrath, a shady young attorney from the neighboring town of Hamworth. Relations between Usbech's daughter and the mistress of Orley Farm were always friendly. Because of Lady Mason, Dockwrath held at low rental two outlying fields on the estate.

Among the neighbors who had stood by Lady Mason during the trial was Sir Peregrine Orme of The Cleeve. Other members of his household were his daughter-in-law, Mrs. Orme, who was Lady Mason's best friend, and his grandson, namesake, and heir. Young Peregrine Orme and Lucius Mason were the same age. They had little else in common. Peregrine, educated at Harrow and Oxford, heir to a great estate, was a well-meaning but somewhat wild young man whose chief interests were fox hunting and rat-baiting. He was also in love with Madeline Staveloy, lovely daughter of Judge Staveloy of Noningsby. Lucius Mason, after a term at a German university, returned to Orley Farm with the plan of putting into practice methods of scientific farming he had learned abroad.

One of his first acts was to serve notice of his intention to repossess the fields leased to Dockwrath. An unpleasant interview between Lady Mason and the angry attorney followed. Concerned over Dockwrath's vague threats, she went to Sir Peregrine for advice, as she had gone on many occasions during the past twenty years. Sir Peregrine snorted with disgust over Lucius' agricultural theories and announced that he would bring the young man to his senses. Lucius went to dine at The Cleeve but refused to give up his plans. Sir Peregrine decided that the earnest young man was as conceited as he was stubborn.

In the meantime Dockwrath had been busy. Going through his father-in-law's papers, he learned that on the date carried by the codicil Sir Joseph had signed a deed of separation dissolving a business partnership between him and one Mr. Martock. Either two documents had been signed on that day, a possibility which the evidence at the trial made unlikely, or the codicil was a forgery. Armed with this information, Dockwrath went to Groby Park to confer with Joseph Mason. The upshot of that conference was Mason's decision to reopen the Orley Farm Case.

Dockwrath, hoping to advance himself in his profession, begged for an opportunity to handle the case, but the squire, aware of Dockwrath's reputation, told him to take his information to the firm of Round and Crook, reputable London lawyers who would be above suspicion. Mason did promise, however, that Dockwrath would be rewarded if Lady Mason were convicted and Orley Farm returned to its rightful owner. The Hamworth lawyer then went to London and offered his services to Round and Crook. They were willing to use him but only to collect information which might prove useful.

When Miriam Dockwrath carried to Orley Farm an account of her husband's activities, Lady Mason appealed to Sir Peregrine, her good friend, and Mr. Furnival, her attorney, for advice and help. Mr. Furnival, with the passing of time, had changed from a hard-working young barrister into a fashionable attorney with a weakness for port wine and lovely women. Lady Mason was still attractive, and so he comforted her more as a woman than as a client, assuring her that the Orley Farm Case, unappealed at the time, was not likely to be reviewed. Chivalrous Sir Peregrine was stirred to great indignation by what he considered the dastardly conduct of Joseph Mason, whom he had always disliked.

Lucius, hearing the news, was equally indignant and told his mother to leave the matter in his hands. Sir Peregrine and Mr. Furnival had difficulty in restraining him from acting rashly.

Actually, the outcome of the suit was more important to Lucius than he realized. He was in love with Sophia Furnival, daughter of his mother's attorney, but that prudent young woman intended to choose her husband with discretion. Another of her suitors was Adolphus Stavely, son of the distinguished jurist. She could afford to wait for the time being.

Meanwhile Peregrine's wooing of Madeline Stavely had fared badly, for Madeline had no interest in anyone except Felix Graham, a penniless young barrister. The judge, convinced that Graham would make his way in the world, silently approved his daughter's choice, but her mother, eager to see her daughter mistress of The Cleeve, grew impatient with her husband because of his refusal to speak up for young Orme.

There was some delay in determining grounds for a suit. The will having been upheld years before, it was felt that a charge of forgery was impossible after so long a time. Finally Round and Crook decided to prosecute for perjury, charging that in the previous trial Lady Mason had sworn falsely to the execution of the will.

When word came that Lady Mason would have to stand trial, Mrs. Orme invited her to stay at The Cleeve. This invitation, dictated by Sir Peregrine, was intended to show to the county the Ormes' confidence in their neighbor's innocence.

But Sir Peregrine's chivalry did not stop there. At last he offered Lady Mason the protection of his name as well as his house, and she, almost overwhelmed by the prospect of the coming trial, promised to marry him.

Lucius and Peregrine were both opposed to the marriage, although Sir Peregrine reconciled his grandson in part by encouraging that young man in his own unsuccessful suit. Mr. Furnival became less gallant. Lady Mason's conscience, however, would not allow her to accept Sir Peregrine's offer. One night she went to him and confessed that she had forged the codicil in a desperate effort to keep the property for her son. Sir Peregrine, shocked by the news, was still determined to stand by her during the trial.

Mr. Furnival was shrewd. When he heard that his client was not to marry Sir Peregrine after all, he was convinced that the whole story had not been told. Suspecting her possible guilt, he hired the famous Mr. Chaffanbrass and his associate, Mr. Solomon Aram, noted criminal lawyers, to defend Lady Mason at the trial. Felix Graham was to act as a junior counsel for the defense.

The trial lasted for two days and part of another. The heckling attorneys so confused John Kennerby that his testimony was worthless. Bridget Bolster insisted, however, that she had signed only one document on that particular day. Even Mr. Chaffanbrass was unable to break down her story; the most damaging admission she made was that she liked an occasional glass of spirits. But Dockwrath was completely discredited, especially after Mr. Chaffanbrass forced him to admit his revengeful motives and Joseph Mason's promise to reward him for his services. At the end of the second day Lady Mason confessed her guilt to her son. The next morning he was not in court with her when the verdict was announced. Lady Mason was acquitted.

The jury's verdict was legal only, not moral. A few days later Mr. Furnival notified Joseph Mason that Lucius was transferring Orley Farm to his half-brother. Lucius himself was returning to Germany with his mother; later he hoped to become a farmer in Australia. Sir Peregrine went to see Lady Mason in London. Their farewell was gentle and sad on his part, final on hers. Dockwrath sued Joseph Mason to collect payment for his help and was completely ruined in the suit. Sophia Furnival decided that she could never be anything but a sister to Lucius. Madeline Stavelly married her penniless barrister and lived more happily than her mother thought she deserved. Young Peregrine Orme eased his broken heart by shooting lions and elephants in central Africa.

ORONOKO, a Negro prince

IMOINDA, his wife

ABOAN, a friend of Oroonoko

THE KING, Oroonoko's grandfather

Critique:

Oroonoko, Or, The Royal Slave: A True History was the first English novel written on the theme of the Noble Savage. It was followed by such well-known favorites as Robinson Crusoe, Atala, and, in a lesser sense, Uncle Tom's Cabin.

The story, which is also a protest against the institution of slavery, was based on the conception that primitive man was more noble than civilized man, probably because he was nearer the state of original life. To us, the tale may seem a little stilted and unreal, but the plot is dramatic in outline and the atmosphere convincing. The novel provides a good background for the later literature that we know so well. Its author was the first Englishwoman to become a professional writer.

The Story:

In Coromantien, an African kingdom, the ruler was an old man more than one hundred years of age. His grandson, Prince Oroonoko, was the bravest, most loved young man in all the land. When the commanding general was killed in battle, Oroonoko was chosen to take his place, even though the prince was only seventeen years old. After a great victory in battle, Prince Oroonoko presented himself at the court of his grandfather, the King. His noble and martial bearing made him an instant favorite with lords and ladies alike.

Oroonoko also visited Imoinda, the daughter of his dead general, a girl as beautiful and modest as he was handsome and brave, and the two noble young people immediately fell in love. She became his wife, but before the marriage could be consummated Oroonoko made known his plans to his grandfather, the King. But the old man, already possessed of many wives, had heard of the loveliness of Imoinda and wanted her for his own. One day, when Oroonoko was absent, the King sent his veil to Imoinda, a royal command that she was to join his harem. Since it was against the law for even a king to take another man's wife, the old man made her forswear her marriage and acknowledge him as her husband.

When Oroonoko returned and learned of the old man's treachery, he renounced all pleasures in longing for his lost wife. The lovers dared not let the King know their true feelings, for to do so would have meant death or worse for both of them, even though Oroonoko was of the King's own blood. By pretending not to care for his lost Imoinda, Oroonoko was again invited to the royal palace. There, learning from some of the King's women that Imoinda was still a virgin, Oroonoko planned to rescue her. With the help of his friend Aboan and one of the older wives of the King, Oroonoko entered the apartment of Imoinda and took her as his true wife. Spied upon by the King's orders, Oroonoko was apprehended and forced to flee back to his army camp, leaving Imoinda to the mercies of the King. Enraged because he had been betrayed by his own blood, the old man determined to kill the girl and then punish Oroonoko. In order to save her life, Imoinda told the King that Oroonoko had ravished her against her will. Then, declared the King, she must be punished with worse than death; he sold her into slavery.

The King gave up his intent to punish his grandson, for Oroonoko controlled the soldiers and the King feared they might be turned against him. Instead, he took Oroonoko back into his favor after telling the boy that Imoinda had been given an honorable death for her betrayal of the King. Oroonoko, who held no grudge against the King, did not act against him, but for a long time pined for his lost wife. At last his grief grew less and he once more took his place at the royal court.

Soon afterward an English merchant ship came to the port of Coromantien. When her master, well known to Oroonoko, invited the prince and his friends to a party on board, Oroonoko, Aboan, and others gladly accepted the invitation. Once on board, all were seized and made prisoners, and later sold as slaves in Surinam, on the coast of South America. The man who bought Oroonoko, seeing the nobility of his slave, immediately felt great esteem for him. Indeed, except for the fact that he had been bought, Oroonoko was not a slave at all, but rather a friend to his master. In the colony, as in his own homeland, Oroonoko was loved, admired, and respected by all who saw him. His name was changed to Caesar.

In a short time Oroonoko, now known as Caesar, heard of a lovely young girl whom all the Negroes and whites wanted for their own. It was believed, however, that she pined for a lost love. When Oroonoko saw her, he found her to be his wife Imoinda, whom he had thought dead. Reunited with great joy, the lovers were allowed to live together and were promised their freedom and passage to their own country as soon as the Governor arrived to make the arrangements.

But Oroonoko began to fear that he and his wife were never going to be set free, that the promise would not be kept. Imoinda being with child, they feared that they were to be kept until the child was born, another slave. One day, when the masters were gone, Oroonoko tried to persuade the slaves to revolt against their bondage; he promised to lead them to his own country and there give them liberty. Although most of the slaves followed him, they quickly deserted him when they were overtaken by their masters; Oroonoko was left with Imoinda and one man. The Governor, who was with the pursuers, promised Oroonoko that if he would surrender there would be no punishment. Again Oroonoko was betrayed. No sooner had he surrendered than he was seized and tied to a stake. There he was whipped until the flesh fell from his bones. Oroonoko endured his punishment with great courage, but he vowed revenge on his captors even if it meant his death. His own master, still his friend, had also been betrayed into believing the promises made to Oroonoko. He took the sick and feeble man back to his own plantation and nursed him. There he refused to let any but friends come near Oroonoko, and he posted a guard to see that no harm came to the sick man.

Oroonoko, resolved to have his revenge on his tormentors, conceived a grim plan. Fearing that Imoinda would suffer ravishings and then a shameful death, he told her that she must die at his hand so that he would be free to accomplish his revenge. Like a dutiful wife she blessed her husband for his thoughtfulness, and after many caresses and words of love Oroonoko severed her head from her body. Then he lay down beside her and for many days did not eat or drink while he grieved for his beloved.

Found by the side of his dead wife by those who had come to beat him again, he took his knife, cut off his own flesh, and ripped his own bowels, all the while vowing that he would never be whipped a second time. Again friends took him home and there cared for him with love and kindness. Then the Governor tricked his friends once more, and Oroonoko was tied to a stake and whipped publicly. After the beating the executioner cut off his arms and legs, his nose and his ears. So Oroonoko died a cruel and shameful death.

YOUNG JOHN HARMON, alias Handford, alias Rokesmith, a rich man's son

MR. BOFFIN, Old John Harmon's employee and heir

BELLA WILFER, loved by young Harmon

WEGG, a scheming peddler
MR. VENUS, Wegg's compatriot
LIGHTWOOD, a lawyer hired by Mr. Boffin

Critique:

One of Dickens' longest novels, Our Mutual Friend was written during the last years of his life, when his creative powers were on the wane. The numerous subplots, the excessive number of coincidences, the unbelievable trick of a disguise holding good for years, the labored humor—all are faults which the younger Dickens would have made more plausible in his work before it was published. Interesting to some readers is the sympathetic portrait of a Jew, Riah, whose character is obviously an atonement for the prejudices aroused by the villainy of Fagin in Oliver Twist. The most powerful writing in Our Mutual Friend is that which delineates scenes along the Thames, the river serving as a background for scenes in which bodies are found floating in the river and murders are committed. It is the mysterious Thames of nighttime that Dickens here described, not the placid flowing Thames of sunny days and his happier novels.

The Story:

Young John Harmon, returning to England to marry Bella Wilfer, was supposedly murdered soon after he left the ship, and a body discovered later was identified as his. Actually, Harmon had not died, but, fearing for his life, he assumed first one disguise, as Handford, and then another as John Rokesmith.

Under the latter disguise Harmon went to work as secretary to Mr. Boffin, an employee who had inherited all of the elder Harmon's wealth, under the strange terms of the dead man's will, after young John Harmon had been pronounced dead. Living with the Boffins was Bella Wilfer, the young woman whom Harmon was to have married before he was reported dead. Mr. Boffin, who was illiterate, had also another employee, a street peddler named Wegg, who read to Mr. Boffin such books as the latter saw fit.

Mr. and Mrs. Boffin were not at all easy in their new position of wealth. They both felt that the son and disinherited daughter of old Harmon should have enjoyed the fortune which had come to them. So strongly did the old couple feel in this matter that they tried to find a little orphan whom they could raise, in hopes that the boy would be like little John Harmon as they remembered him. They had also taken in Bella Wilfer because she had been engaged to young Harmon, for they wished to give her the advantages she would have had as John Harmon's wife.

Bella Wilfer was not, however, a very likeable young woman. Mercenary in her ways, she repelled Rokesmith's love and declared that her looks and her position with the Boffins made her eligible for a much finer match than a mere secretary to a rich man. Mr. Boffin agreed with her, and after a bitter scene, in which he charged Rokesmith with impudence, he discharged his secretary. Bella changed her attitude, however, when she saw how money and wealth had changed the easy-going Mr. Boffin into a miserly, avaricious old curmudgeon. She refused to stay any longer with the Boffins and returned to the penurious life of her father's home.

Meanwhile Mr. Boffin was having troubles with Wegg, the man who read to him. Mrs. Boffin had established Wegg in a comfortable house in which the Boffins and old Harmon had lived. Inspired by some books about misers which he had been reading to the illiterate Mr. Boffin, Wegg searched diligently for possible items of value that old Harmon might have secreted in his house. While searching, Wegg found a will dated later than that which had given the fortune to Mr. Boffin. The later will provided that only a small portion of the money was to go to Mr. Boffin and that the rest was to be given to the Crown.

Wegg, with the assistance of a friendly taxidermist named Venus, plotted to blackmail Mr. Boffin. They showed him the will, but without allowing him to handle it, and then told him that if he would divide the fortune into three equal parts, one for each of them, they would not make known the existence of the later will. Mr. Boffin was forced to agree.

In the meantime Mr. Boffin had offered a reward to anyone giving information about the murderer of young Harmon and had placed the matter in the hands of Mortimer Lightwood, a lawyer. Lightwood's only clue was Handford, whom he had seen when the body was dragged from the Thames and identified as young Harmon's. For a time Lightwood thought that the murderer might have been a notorious waterside character suspected of killing people, robbing them, and then turning in the bodies to collect rewards for finding the corpses in the river. But Harmon himself, disguised as Rokesmith, secured an affidavit from the informer against the waterman, the affidavit stating that the informant had given false information in order to revenge himself on the waterman for an insult.

After Bella Wilfer returned to her father's home, much chastened upon observing the change his fortune had made in Mr. Boffin, she felt that she now could marry only a man she loved, rather than any man who could provide her with a fortune. When Rokesmith came to see her, apparently penniless, she accepted his suit. Their marriage proved a happy one, for Rokesmith found a job which kept them in modest comfort. Both were happy when their child was born.

One day Lightwood met Rokesmith and Bella on the street and immediately identified Rokesmith as Handford, who had been mysteriously present at the identification of Harmon's body. That evening the police came to arrest Rokesmith, who was then forced to admit his real identity as young Harmon. As it turned out, the corpse identified as Harmon's had really been that of his would-be murderer, who had been killed by thieves. The mistake had occurred because the would-be murderer had put on Harmon's clothes after drugging him.

Harmon had to admit his real identity to his wife, and more besides. He had been struck by Bella's mercenary attitude and had taken the Boffins into his confidence, for Mrs. Boffin had early guessed who he really was. Mr. Boffin had only pretended to become a miser and to hate Rokesmith, for the single purpose of showing Bella the kind of person she might easily become if she continued in her mercenary views. The success of their scheme was proved by her return to her father's home and her subsequent marriage to Rokesmith, whom she had believed to be a poor secretary.

The Boffins, anxious for young Harmon to have the bulk of his father's fortune, had turned over the estate to him; Bella was really the rich woman she had at one time wished to be.

There was still the matter of Wegg and Venus, the two blackmailers who were in possession of old Harmon's later will, which gave the fortune to the Crown. This situation was easily settled. In return for aid in winning a girl he loved, Venus turned evidence for Mr. Boffin and young Harmon. His aid was actually not necessary, for Mr. Boffin himself was in possession of an even later will, which he had kept secret only because of its insulting language in speaking of young Harmon and his sister. The later will also gave the fortune to Mr. Boffin and his wife, but they once again gave the estate to young Harmon and his family. As for Wegg, a servant took him out of the house and dropped him into a wagon loaded with garbage.

MISS MITFORD, the author

LIZZY, favorite child of the village

MAYFLOWER, a greyhound

Critique:

Whimsical and pleasing are these little sketches of life in rural England in the early part of the nineteenth century. They were first published individually and later collected under the title, Our Village. In them there is no plot, little action. There is, instead, only the evidence of a true appreciation of nature and of the author's simple but happy life. The laughter of the children at play, the prancing of the dogs, and the beauty of the violets were to her the real values in life, and in her quiet way she makes them seem important to us.

The Story:

To Miss Mitford, life in a rural English village was to be desired above any other. To know intimately one's neighbors and to watch them live out their daily lives were to her matters of absorbing interest. Each house, whether fine mansion or humble cottage, had its own story; and the inhabitants, elegant or simple, provided a drama as moving as any found on the stage.

There was the retired public official who constantly arranged town festivals because his leisure hung so heavily on his hands; the shoemaker whose toil from morning till night contrasted so sharply with the idleness of his neighbor. There was the partly finished house which was the plaything of a well-to-do man who lived a mile or so away. He was too wise to tinker with his own fine home continually, and so he expended his architectural energies on this village house by constantly changing and remodeling it.

There was also Lizzy, the darling of the village. She was only three years old, but she reigned over all like a queen. She wheedled candy from the shopkeepers, their toys from the other children, and managed all the adults around her, including her parents and teacher. Her great asset was her love for everyone and her sure knowledge that everyone must love her in return. She was Miss Mitford's constant companion on her walks through the village and the countryside. These two had another friend. She was Mayflower, a greyhound of wonderful disposition. The child and the dog were a delight to see as they romped together on the common or along the country roads.

Miss Mitford described and her friends knew the village and the countryside during each season of the year. In January the snow made soft, blurry shapes, pure and white. There was a lovely quietness everywhere, even Mayflower's big pads making no noise. But, as they climbed the hill, the shouting of children broke the stillness. Some boys had made a slide and were flying down it with raucous shouts. The most mischievous of the lot was Jack Rapley, for whom the villagers predicted a sad end. He was Miss Mitford's favorite, however, for he was the best-natured boy of the town.

In March the first primroses bloomed and Miss Mitford and Mayflower set out for a brisk walk. They passed the house of the richest man in the community, a good man who enjoyed his prosperity and shared it with the townfolk. They passed, too, the poorest house in those parts, but one filled with the most love and the happiest children—fourteen of them of all shapes and ages. They passed also Miss Mitford's old home, a magnificent one lost through her father's gambling. Once her heart had been heavy at leaving that place, but now her new roots were so firmly established that she could visit the old house without heartache.

On another day she went hunting violets, but this time she must go alone, for violets had been her mother's favorite flower and she wanted to think of her beloved mother, now dead, in serenity and quiet. She felt sad when she walked past the parish workhouse and saw the old men working in gloomy silence. She saw bean planters stooping long hours in backbreaking labor. All in all, it was at first a dreary excursion. But her heart was joyful when she finally came upon the violets, whole fields of them, and her heart filled with gratitude for the many blessings she enjoyed.

In April, Mayflower acquired two playmates, puppies who accompanied her and Miss Mitford on their walks. The puppies tried to chase a baby lamb, but the animal lay as if dead until Miss Mitford had cornered the dogs. Then it sprang up and ran off to its mother, leaving the pups yapping and jumping with disappointment. Spring was on the way, and the animals were as frisky as the children who ran and played on the common.

On another day one of the pups tackled a gander, and the dog came out of the fray wiser but not victorious. Even Mayflower, usually pompous and dignified when with the other dogs, engaged a hedgehog in play, tossing it and teasing it as a cat would a mouse.

In May flowers bloomed in profusion everywhere, filling the air with a wonderful fragrance. On all the farms were wobbly-legged calves and lambs. Farmers toiled in the fields from morning till night, and the brooks ran full.

flower out to the country to see a cowslip-ball. Cuckoos screamed over them as they gathered the flowers. Lizzy ruined most of hers in her eagerness to help, and several times Mayflower upset the baskets of blossoms. After the balls were made and the three had started for the village, a sudden shower sent them scurrying homeward. Thoroughly soaked, they decided the day's pleasure was worth the wetting. A blazing fire awaiting them at home brought a perfect day to a close.

Each season seemed more lovely than the last. One June day Miss Mitford and a friend visited a mansion fallen into disrepair. Debt had forced the original owners to sell, and the new owner had found the house too costly to keep up. Vines and other foliage had penetrated the crevices and hurried the collapse of the walls. It seemed a convincing example of the power of nature over man. Bees sang in the lime trees, and the odor of honeysuckle and musk roses was everywhere. The loveliness caused the author to compose a sonnet, while her friend sketched the sad beauty of the place with a pencil.

The rest of the summer was cloudy and cold, but in September the sun shone in a cloudless sky. Mayflower rescued a stray dog from his tormentors and forced Miss Mitford to adopt him. He was a part spaniel named Dash, so ugly that he seemed to try to atone for his looks by lavishing love and affection on his new mistress. He was a fine retriever and on their walks found all sorts of treasures which he proudly presented to her. Once they passed the house of Master and Dame Weston. Dame Weston had had her husband in court for beating her, but the true facts were that she was the one who hit her husband often and whined at him constantly. Shortly after this walk poor Dash died of his sudden transition from starvation to overfeeding. So attached was Miss Mitford to Dash that she soon named another dog after him.

In the fall there was nut-gathering under the beauty of the brilliant foliage of the whole countryside. Then the leaves were gone. The crisp, cold days, however, were so invigorating that one could not yearn for the lost beauty of autumn. At last the cycle of the seasons was complete. Soon the snow would fall again.

THE OVERCOAT

AKAKII AKAKIEVICH BASHMACHKIN, a government clerk
PETROVICH, a tailor

A CERTAIN IMPORTANT PERSONAGE, a bureaucrat

Critique:

"We all," said Dostoevski, "came out of 'The Overcoat.'" His pithy statement is revealing in its implications, for Gogol, rather than Pushkin, is the true literary father of nineteenth-century Russian realism. Having worked for a short time as a civil servant, Gogol had no fondness for bureaucratic officialdom, and "The Overcoat" is as much a criticism of the system as his more pointed satires against petty public officials in Dead Souls and The Inspector General. The wretched, ill-paid government clerk in this long tale is Gogol's economic man, and the story of unfortunate Akakii Akakiievich shows the writer's ability to develop a realistic theme without bitterness, to achieve a note of pathos that never lapses into sentimentality. Even without Dostoevski's endorsement, it would still stand as one of the most influential shorter works in the development of Russian fiction.

The Story:

In one of the bureaus of the government there was a clerk named Akakii Akakiievich Bashmachkin. He was a short, pockmarked man with dim, watery eyes and reddish hair beginning to show spots of baldness. His grade in the service was that of perpetual titular councilor, a resounding title for his humble clerkship.

He had been in the bureau for so many years that no one remembered when he had entered it or who had appointed him to the post. Directors and other officials came and went, but Akakii Akakiievich was always to be seen in the same place, in the same position, doing the same work, which was the copying of documents. No one ever treated him with respect. His superiors regarded him with disdain. His fellow clerks made him the butt of their rude jokes and horseplay.

Akakii Akakiievich lived only for his work, without thought for pleasure or his dress. His frock coat was no longer the prescribed green but a faded rusty color. Usually it had sticking to it wisps of hay or thread or bits of litter someone had thrown into the street as he was passing by, for he walked to and from work in complete oblivion of his surroundings. Reaching home, he would gulp his cabbage soup and perhaps a bit of beef, in a hurry to begin transcribing papers he had brought with him from the office. His labors finished, he would go to bed. Such was the life of Akakii

THE OVERCOAT by Nikolai V. Gogol, from THE OVERCOAT, AND OTHER STORIES. Translated by Constance Garnett. By permission of the publishers, Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Copyright, 1923, by Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. Renewed, 1950, by David Garnett.

Akakiievich, satisfied with his pittance of four hundred roubles a year.

But even clerks on four hundred a year must protect themselves against the harsh cold of northern winters. Akakii Akakiievich owned an overcoat so old and threadbare that over the back and shoulders one could see through the material to the torn lining beneath. At last he decided to take it to Petrovich, a tailor who did a large business repairing the garments of petty bureaucrats. Petrovich shook his head over the worn overcoat and announced that it was beyond mending, fit only for footcloths. For one hundred and fifty roubles, he said, he would make Akakii Akakiievich a new overcoat, but he would not touch the old one.

When he left the tailor's shop, the clerk was in a sad predicament. He had no money for an overcoat and little prospect of raising so large a sum. Walking blindly down the street, he failed to notice the sooty chimney sweep who jostled him, blacking one shoulder, or the lime that fell on him from a building under construction. The next Sunday he went to see Petrovich again and begged the tailor to mend his old garment. The tailor surlily refused. Then Akakii Akakiievich realized that he must yield to the inevitable. He knew that Petrovich would do the work for eighty roubles. Half of that amount he could pay with money he had saved, one kopeck at a time, over a period of years. Perhaps in another year he could put aside a like amount by doing without tea and candles at night and by walking as carefully as possible to save his shoe leather. He began that very day to go without the small comforts he had previously allowed himself.

In the next year Akakii Akakiievich had some unexpected luck when he received a holiday bonus of sixty roubles instead of the expected forty which he had already budgeted for other necessities. With the extra twenty roubles and his meager savings he and Petrovich bought the cloth for the new overcoat, good, durable stuff with calico for the lining and catskin for the collar. After some haggling it was decided that Petrovich was to get twelve roubles for his labor.

At last the overcoat was finished. Petrovich delivered it early one morning, and opportunely, for the season of hard frosts had already begun. Akakii Akakiievich wore the garment triumphantly to work. Hearing of his new finery, the other clerks ran into the vestibule to inspect it. Some suggested that the owner ought to give a party to celebrate the event. Akakii Akakiievich hesitated but was saved from embarrassment when a minor official invited the clerks, including Akakii, to drink tea with him that evening.

Wrapped in his warm coat, Akakii Akakiievich started off to the party. It had been years since he had walked out at night and he enjoyed the novelty of seeing the strollers on the streets and looking into lighted shop windows.

The hour was past midnight when he left the party; the streets were deserted. His way took him into a desolate square, with only the flickering light of a police sentry box visible in the distance. Suddenly two strangers confronted him and with threats of violence snatched off his overcoat. When he came to himself, in the snowbank where they had kicked him, the clerk ran to the policeman's box to denounce the thieves. The policeman merely told him to report the theft to the district inspector the next morning. Almost out of his mind with worry, Akakii Akakiievich ran all the way home.

His landlady advised him not to go to the police but to lay the matter before a justice of the peace whom she knew. That official gave him little satisfaction. The next day his fellow clerks took up a collection for him, but the amount was so small that they decided to give him advice instead. They told him to go to a certain important personage who would speed up the efforts of the police. Finally Akakii Akakiievich secured an interview, but the very important person was so outraged by the clerk's unimportance that he never gave the caller an opportunity to explain his errand. Akakii Akakiievich walked sadly home through a blizzard which gave him a quinsy and put him to bed. After several days of delirium, in which he babbled about his lost overcoat and a certain important person, he died. A few days later another clerk sat in his place and did the same work at the bureau.

Before long rumors began to spread through the city that a dead government clerk seeking a stolen overcoat had been seen near Kalinkin Bridge. One night a clerk from the bureau saw him and almost died of fright. After Akakii Akakiievich began stripping overcoats from passersby, the police were ordered to capture the dead man. Once the police came near arresting him, but the ghost vanished so miraculously that thereafter the police were afraid to lay hands on any malefactors, living or dead.

One night, after a sociable evening, a certain important personage was on his way to visit a lady friend about whom his wife knew nothing. As he relaxed comfortably in his sleigh he felt a firm grip on his collar. Turning, he found himself eye to eye with a wan Akakii Akakiievich. In his fright he threw off his overcoat and ordered his coachman to drive him home at once. The ghost of Akakii Akakiievich must have liked the important person's warm greatcoat. From that time on he never molested passersby or snatched away their overcoats again.

Ford Madox Ford was born Ford Madox Hueffer. Disliking his German surname, however, he changed it during World War I. His literary career was varied. A disciple of Henry James, he collaborated with Joseph Conrad, edited The English Review and The Transatlantic Review, and wrote many novels in his own right. Parade's End, his most important work, appeared originally as a tetralogy: Some Do Not (1924), No More Parades (1925), A Man Could Stand Up

(1926), and The Last Post (1928); it was published first as a single unit in 1950. The novel tells the story of a passing era and a vanishing generation. Christopher Tietjens rightly called himself "the last English Tory," for his type had been disappearing from the eighteenth century on. Seeking truth and peace and wanting no part of the pretense and confusion of his generation, he tried to help his fellow men and to live honorably. For those things he was punished by others who could not understand him or the creed he lived by. Parade's End is a work of considerable subtlety and power, told with great simplicity and restraint. A faithful recorder of his own time, the writer has been called England's most neglected novelist.

The Story:

Christopher Tietjens was probably the last real eighteenth-century Tory in the England of pre-World War I. A thoroughly good man, he was so much a gentleman that he would never divorce his wife Sylvia, who was flagrantly unfaithful to him. It was doubtful that the child she bore him was his own, and she had gone off for several weeks with another man, but Christopher held that no gentleman would ever publicly disgrace a woman by divorcing her or even by admitting her infidelities. Sylvia Tietjens hated her husband blindly because she could never break down his reserve. All of her little plots and meannesses were for that one purpose only. She detested the various men she lived with, but she hated Christopher's virtue more.

Christopher's old-fashioned type of virtue extended to his own family background. His oldest brother, Mark, had inherited the estate of Groby and its vast income. Mark lived with a Frenchwoman whom he would probably never marry and who would certainly bear no children, and the estate would one day belong to Christopher. The brothers feared that their father had committed suicide, for Sylvia had schemed to have the old man told that Christopher lived off the earnings of immoral women, had even sold her, his wife, to influential friends. Even though his father might have believed those lies, Christopher thought it a sign that the family was getting soft to have one member commit suicide; consequently, he would not accept one penny of the estate for himself.

Mark then proposed to set Sylvia up at Groby, with arrangements for the estate to go to her son. Even if the boy were not Christopher's, he must be treated as if he were a Tietjen. The plan suited Christopher, who had no interest in anything except protecting his wife's name and his son's future. Knowing that war was imminent, he wanted to gather up the loose ends of his life before he went to be killed.

Christopher was one of the most brilliant men in the government service, but it was strange how his brilliance coupled with his goodness made everyone want to hurt him. His only real friend was Macmaster, a Scotsman and a Whig who was also in the service. Perhaps his friendship was due primarily to the fact that he owed Christopher a great deal of money. Christopher had also lent money to other men who, although they admired him, seemed bent on ruining him.

Christopher often wished to make Valentine Wannop his mistress. Valentine was a young suffragist, the daughter of his father's best friend and a woman novelist whom Christopher admired greatly. Valentine was willing to accept Christopher as her lover, but always they seemed destined to have their plans obstructed by someone bent on hurting Christopher. Although no word of their desire was ever spoken between them, their feelings must have been obvious to others, for everyone believed that Valentine was already Christopher's mistress.

The war began. On the night before his departure for the army Christopher asked Valentine to spend the night with him. She consented, but again they were kept apart. Later they both agreed that it was for the best, as neither seemed made for that sort of thing.

In France, unjustified troubles continued to haunt Christopher. Sylvia was at the bottom of most of them. Because she seemed to think he would soon be killed and out of her reach, she acted as if compelled to hurt him as much as possible while he still lived. His godfather, General Campion, was his highest ranking officer. Convinced by Sylvia that she was an abused wife, the general constantly berated Christopher for his brutality as a husband. He berated him also for getting dirty and mixing with his men and helping them with their personal troubles; it was not fitting for an English officer to get into the dregs of war.

Christopher often thought that he was surrounded by people with troubles. One of his fellow officers, almost insane over an unfaithful wife, often had fits of madness that threatened to destroy company morale. The first in command was a drunken colonel whom Christopher tried to shield, thus getting himself into trouble with General Campion. Once Christopher refused leave to a Canadian because he knew his wife's lover would kill the man if he went home. When the Canadian was killed in battle later on, it preyed on Christopher's mind that he had saved the soldier from one death only to lead him into another. Christopher's good intentions constantly reflected discredit on him.

To his distress, Sylvia went to France to see him. Having accepted at last the fact that she could never upset him emotionally no matter what she did, she was true to her character in her determination to make him return to her in body. Her scheme failed. After she had maneuvered him into her room, one of her former lovers and the drunken colonel opened the door which she had left unlocked for them but which she had forgotten to lock when Christopher went in with her. Christopher was forced to throw out the two men in order to protect his wife's honor. Having decided it was Christopher's fault that his wife wanted to entertain another man, General Campion again berated him.

It seemed to Christopher that the whole war campaign bogged down because of lack of good communications between various parts of the army. To him the failure was symbolic. Life, too, bogged down into beastly messes because of lack of communication between people. The horror of the war to him was not his physical suffering and inconvenience.

It was rather that the conflict was the end of everything that mattered. Believing that England was not prepared either for victory or for defeat, that this was the end of everything that was good no matter who won the battles, he found it almost impossible to remember anything of his old creed or his way of life at home. Away from her, Valentine also seemed unreal to him.

Because of the manner in which Christopher had thrown Sylvia's ex-lover and the drunken colonel out of her bedroom, General Campion sent him to the front. Like the others, General Campion admired and liked Christopher; but, like the others, he could not understand him. Again the only thing to do was to make him suffer.

At last Valentine Wannop received a telephone call from Macmaster's wife, who said that Christopher was home and almost out of his mind. Ready to give up everything to live with him and care for him, Valentine went to him at once. What the story of his crack-up was she did not know or care. The fact that he had never written to her was also of no importance. She intended to carry out her desire to become his mistress, even though she might first become his nurse.

The partial collapse of Christopher's mind had been a long time in the making. At the front he had found himself second in command to hopelessly outnumbered troops under the leadership of the drunken colonel. Finally forced into assuming command, he tried to sustain the shattered morale of his troops. The only thing that kept his mind in balance was a dream of standing on a hilltop in peace and serenity and privacy. Privacy—that was the thing he desired above all else. It seemed to him that the army gave a man no chance to be alone, to keep his life or his thoughts to himself. To his naturally reticent nature the lack of privacy was the worst hardship of all.

When an exploding shell buried Christopher and two of his men under a pile of dirt, he dug out one of the soldiers and carried the other to safety through enemy fire. On his return General Campion sent for him and relieved him of his command because his uniform was not spotless and flawless and because he had been reported away from headquarters. His heroism and disgrace marked the physical end of the war for Christopher.

Back home, in Valentine's company on Armistice Night, he was prepared once more to make her his mistress. As they were about to declare their love they were interrupted by celebrating members of Christopher's old company. His mind fuzzy, he found nothing sad in their being thwarted again or in the obvious hate he saw in the eyes of a wife whose husband's life he had saved in the trenches.

Meanwhile there had been changes at Groby. Mark had married his Frenchwoman, partly to spite Sylvia by making his mistress Lady Tietjens. Sylvia had let the estate to an obnoxious rich American woman and her husband. It was said that Mark, having suffered a stroke just after the Armistice, could not speak or move. The truth was that, partially paralyzed, he had simply withdrawn from the world. Like Christopher, he belonged to another era. Mark believed that the last of the Tietjens were misfits. Truth had given way to confusion and untruth, and the brothers were likely to be swallowed up in this mad new world to which neither belonged. Avoiding the rest of the world, he waited quietly for death. Christopher and Valentine went to live in a cottage close by. Having refused to go back into government service or to accept help from his brother, Christopher had become a dealer in antique furniture.

Sylvia finally decided to divorce Christopher in order to marry General Campion and go with him to India. Although she had given up all hope of ever getting Christopher to notice her again or to be disturbed by her meanness, she had continued her petty attempts to make his life miserable. But when she learned that Valentine was to have a baby, she became afraid that her attacks on Christopher and Valentine would harm the unborn child.

She began to regret also her last and cruelest act against Christopher and Mark. She had persuaded the American woman to cut down the Groby Great Tree, an immense cedar that had guarded the manor house for generations, and for a time she feared the wrath of the brothers because of her deed. Both felt, however, that the Groby Great Tree had symbolized the curse hanging over the family and that its removal might take away part of that curse. When they ignored her spite, she stopped her vicious tricks and prepared to divorce Christopher so that he could marry Valentine. Sylvia hated General Campion too, but she wanted to become a great official's wife and be resplendent in a tiara.

Dying, Mark rationalized his father's death and knew for certain that the old gentleman had not committed suicide but had died as the result of a hunting accident. He realized also that the looks and actions of Sylvia's son proved him to be Christopher's as well, and the rightful heir to Groby. It seemed to Mark that he could at last understand his brother and love him, and he believed truly that all the tales he had heard about Christopher were really lies told by people who could never understand Christopher or even Mark because the Tietjens were not of this century of deceit and confusion and untruth. Before he died, Mark spoke once more. He assured Valentine that Christopher was a good man and asked her to be kind to him.

PARZIVAL

Author: Wolfram von Eschenbach (c. 1170-1220)

Type of plot: Chivalric romance

Time of plot: The Heroic Age

Locale: Western Europe

First published: Thirteenth century manuscript

Principal characters:

GAMURET, Prince of Anjou

PARZIVAL, Gamuret's son

GAWAIN, knight of King Arthur's court

KING ARTHUR

FEIREFIS, Parzival's half-brother

LOHENGRIN, Parzival's son

Critique:

Parzival is the masterpiece of Germany's greatest medieval poet. It was, moreover, the groundwork of the great body of Wagner's operas on knightly themes. Despite its place in German literature and its influence on modern opera, Parzival is little known to English-reading people. Wolfram von Eschenbach's influence on the legends of the Arthurian cycle is also important. The Arthurian legends had a relatively low moral tone prior to their treatment by this poet who, upholding the knightly virtues of fidelity to the plighted word, charity toward man, and a true reverence toward God, lifted the moral tone of the Arthurian romances. Most interesting is the identity of the Grail in Parzival. Here it is not the chalice used at the last supper, as it is in other versions, but a precious stone of supernatural powers.

The Story:

Gamuret, younger son of King Gandein of Anjou, refused to live as a vassal in the kingdom of his older brother, notwithstanding the brother's love for Gamuret. The young man, given gifts of gold by his king-brother, as well as horses and equipment and men-at-arms, left Anjou to seek his fortune across the world. Hoping to find for himself fame and love, Gamuret went first to battle for Baruch at Alexandria; from there he went to the aid of the Moorish Queen Belakane. Belakane had been falsely accused of causing the death of her lover, Eisenhart, and was besieged in her castle by two armies under the command of Friedebrand, King of Scotland and Eisenhart's uncle.

Gamuret, after raising the siege, became the husband of Belakane, who bore him a son named Feirefis. But Gamuret tired of being king of Assagog and Zassamank, and so he journeyed abroad again in search of fame. Passing into Spain, Gamuret sought King Kailet and found him near Kanvoleis. The two entered a tournament sponsored by the Queen of Waleis. Gamuret did valiant deeds and carried off all the honors of that tournament, thereby winning a great deal of fame as the victor.

Two queens who had watched the lists during the tournament fell in love with Gamuret, but Queen Herzeleide won his heart and married him. They loved each other greatly, but once again the call of honor was too great to let Gamuret remain a housed husband. Receiving a summons from Baruch, he went once more to Alexandria. In the fighting there he was treacherously killed and given a great tomb by Baruch. When news of his death reached the land of Waleis, Queen Herzeleide sorrowed greatly, but her sorrow was in part dissipated by the birth of a child by Gamuret. Herzeleide named the boy Parzival.

Parzival was reared by his mother with all tenderness and love. As he grew older he met knights who fared through the world seeking honor. Parzival, stimulated by tales of their deeds, left his homeland in search of King Arthur of Britain. He hoped to become one of Arthur's knights and a member of the order of the Round Table. During his absence his mother, Queen Herzeleide, died. On his way to Arthur's court Parzival took a token from Jeschute and thus aroused the jealous anger of her husband, Orilus. Farther along on his journey he met a woman named Sigune and from her learned of his lineage and his kinship with the house of Anjou. Still later Parzival met the Red Knight and carried that knight's challenge with him to King Arthur. Having been knighted by the king, Parzival set forth again in quest of knightly honor. Finding himself in the land of Graharz, he sought out Gurnemanz, prince of the land, who taught the young knight the courtesy and the ethics of knighthood.

From Graharz, Parzival journeyed to Pelrapar, which he found besieged by enemies. He raised the siege by overthrowing Kingron. After this adventure Parzival fell in love with Queen Kondwiramur, and the two were married. But Parzival, like his father before him, soon tired of the quiet life and parted from his home and queen to seek further adventures.

Parzival journeyed to the land of the Fisher King and became the king's guest. In that land he first beheld the fabulous bleeding spear and all the marvels of the Holy Grail. One morning he awoke to find the castle deserted. Parzival, mocked by a squire, rode away. Later he met Orilus, who had vowed to battle the young knight for taking Jeschute's token. They fought and Parzival was the victor, but he was able to reconcile Orilus to Jeschute once again and sent the couple to find a welcome at the court of King Arthur.

Arthur, meanwhile, had gone in search of the Red Knight, whose challenge Parzival had carried. Journeying in search of King Arthur, Parzival had the misfortune to fall into a love-trance, during which he overthrew Gagramor and took vengeance on Sir Kay. He met Gawain, who took him back again to Arthur's court. There Parzival was inducted into the company of the Round Table.

At Arthur's court both Gawain and Parzival were put to shame by two other knights. When in his anger and despair Parzival set out to seek the Holy Grail and Gawain rode off to Askalon, the whole company of the Round Table was dispersed.

While Parzival sought the Grail, Gawain had many adventures. He joined the knights of King Meljanz of Lys, who sought vengeance on Duke Lippaut. When the fighting was over, Gawain rode to Schamfanzon, where he was committed by the king to the care of his daughter Antikonie. Gawain wooed the maiden and thus aroused the wrath of the people of Schamfanzon. Gawain was aided, however, by the girl and Kingrimursel. After Gawain swore to the king that he would ask Scherules to send back some kinsmen to him, Gawain left, also to search for the Holy Grail.

Parzival, meanwhile, had traveled for many days in doubt and despair. In the forest of Monsalvasch he fought with a knight of the Holy Grail and passed on. Then, on Good Friday, he met a pilgrim knight who told him he should not bear arms during the holy season. The knight bade him seek out Trevrezent, a hermit who showed Parzival how he had sinned in being wrathful with God and indicated to Parzival that he was a nephew to Amfortas, one of the Grail kings. The two parted in sorrow and Parzival resumed his search for the Grail.

Gawain, continuing his adventures, had married Orgeluse. When Gawain decided to battle Gramoflanz, King Arthur and Queen Guinevere agreed to ride to see that famous joust. Before the joust could take place Gawain and Parzival met and did battle, each unknown to his opponent. Gawain was defeated and severely injured by Parzival, who was filled with grief when he learned with whom he had fought. Parzival vowed to take Gawain's place in the combat with Gramoflanz, but the latter refused to do battle with anyone but Gawain himself.

Parzival, released from his vow, longed to return once again to his wife. One morning before dawn he secretly left the camp of King Arthur. On his way back to his wife Parzival met a great pagan warrior who almost vanquished him. After the battle he learned the pagan knight was Feirefis, Parzival's half-brother, the son of Gamuret and Belakane. The two rode back to King Arthur's court, where both were made welcome by the king. In company the half-brothers went into the lists and won many honors together. At a feast of the Round Table Kondrie entered the great hall to announce Parzival's election to the Grail kingdom. Summoned to Monsalvasch, Parzival, his wife, and Lohengrin, Parzival's son, were guided there by Kondrie. Feirefis, although he failed to see the Grail, was baptized and married to Repanse de Schoie. With her he returned to his kingdom, which was held later by his son, Prester John.

PATIENCE

Type of work: Comic opera

Author: W. S. Gilbert (1836-1911)

Type of plot: Humorous satire

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: 1881

Principal characters:

REGINALD BUNTHORNE, a fleshly poet

ARCHIBALD GROSVENOR, an idyllic poet

THE LADY JANE, a rapturous maiden

PATIENCE, a dairymaid

Critique:

One of the greatest favorites of all Gilbert and Sullivan operettas, Patience, Or, Bunthorne's Bride is still performed today almost as frequently as it was in the past. A gentle thrust at romantic love and unintelligible poetry, it found instant popularity in its own day. The libretto is often read simply as a play, and one need only hum the familiar tunes to get the spirit of this amusing tale.

The Story:

At Castle Bunthorne, twenty lovesick maidens pined and wilted for love of Reginald Bunthorne, a fleshly poet. But Reginald loved only Patience, the village milkmaid. Patience did not know what love was and thus did not know that the utmost happiness came from being miserable over unrequited love. The lovesick maidens set her straight, however, by showing her that to be in agony, weeping incessantly, was to be truly happy in love. Patience tried to remind them that just a year ago they had all been in love with Dragoon Guards, but they scorned her for being so ignorant about real love. A year ago they had not known Reginald, the aesthetic poet.

The Dragoon Guards, billeted in the village, saw Reginald approaching, followed by the lovesick maidens, singing and playing love songs directed to the fleshly poet. The maidens ignored their former loves, having eyes only for Reginald. But Reginald himself had eyes only for Patience, the milkmaid. At the insistence of the maidens, he read them his latest poem, into which he had poured his whole soul—as he did three times a day. The maidens swooned in ecstasy at the poetry, but Patience said it was just nonsense, which it was.

Later, alone, Reginald confessed that he was a sham, that he hated poetry and all other forms of aesthetic pleasure. When Patience came upon him, he made the same confession to her, telling her again that he loved only her, not poetry. But Patience knew nothing of the love he spoke of, for she had loved only her great-aunt and that love did not count. After Reginald had left her, one of the maidens told Patience that to love was to feel unselfish passion. Patience, ashamed that she had never been unselfish enough to love, promised that before she went to bed that night she would fall head over heels in love with somebody. In fact, she remembered that when she was a little girl she had liked a little boy of five. Now she was sorry that she had not loved him. It was her duty to love someone. If necessary, she would love a stranger.

Archibald Grosvenor appeared unexpectedly upon the scene. He was an idyllic poet who grieved because he was completely perfect. Since he had no rival on earth in perfection, it was his lot to be loved madly by everyone who saw him. Recognizing Patience, he told her that he was the little boy she had known when he was five. When he asked her to marry him, she refused. He was perfect; therefore she would not be acting unselfishly in loving him. If he had only one small imperfection, she said, she could marry him in good conscience. Candor forced him to admit that such was not the case. Patience told him, however, that he could love her even if she could not return his love, for she had faults. Grosvenor agreed, and they sadly parted.

Reginald Bunthorne prepared to raffle himself to the rapturous maidens, but before they could draw for him Patience entered and begged his forgiveness for not loving him sooner. Certainly to love such a creature would be unselfish; she would do her duty. As they left together, the lovesick maidens turned back to the Dragoon Guards, prepared to fall in love with them once more.

But before their embraces were over, Grosvenor entered, and the fickle maidens left the Guards to follow Grosvenor. They loved him madly. All deserted Reginald but Lady Jane, one of the unattractive older girls. She hoped her faithfulness would be rewarded, but she knew her beauty was too far gone ever to lure Reginald away from Patience.

Grosvenor would not stop loving Patience in order to love the rapturous maidens. He pitied them for not being able to receive his love and was annoyed by their attentions. They had followed him since Monday, with no half-holiday on Saturday. Then he read them one of his poems. It told of a little girl who put mice in the clock and vivisected her best doll and of a little boy who punched his little sisters' heads and put hot pennies down their backs. The maidens nearly swooned with admiration of his lyric beauty.

Patience continued to love Reginald, even though she found the matter difficult. He had no good habits and was not attractive, but it was her duty to love him and she did, shunning the perfect Grosvenor who loved her. None of the rapturous maidens except plain Lady Jane still loved Reginald, the others having taken their allegiance to Grosvenor. Reginald, resentful because the other maidens had forsaken him, decided to change his character; he would be as insipid as Grosvenor. Lady Jane promised her help.

The Dragoon Guards returned to the maidens, dressed as foppishly as even Grosvenor could dress. They acted insipidly and stupidly, and the lovesick maidens were impressed by this proof of their devotion. Reginald also became a changed man. He was mild and kind, even handsome. He told Grosvenor that he must change, that he had too long had the devotion that once was Reginald's. On the threat of a curse from Reginald, Grosvenor changed his nature and became a cad, admitting that he had long wished for a reasonable pretext for getting rid of his perfection.

When Patience saw that Reginald was now perfect and Grosvenor was not, she was happy, for she could now unselfishly love Grosvenor. The lovesick maidens, seeing Grosvenor forsake aestheticism, knew that since he was perfect he must be right. They, too, gave up the arts and returned to the Dragoon Guards. The Duke of Dunstable, a Dragoon officer, took plain Lady Jane, leaving the now perfect Reginald quite alone, without a bride.

THE PATRIOT

Author: Antonio Fogazzaro (1842-1911)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: Italy

First published: 1896

Principal characters:

DON FRANCO MAIRONI, the patriot

THE MARCHESA ORSOLA, his grandmother

LUISA RIGEX, his wife

PIERO RIBERA, Luisa's uncle

Critique:

The Patriot is the first of three related novels telling the story of the troubled times when Italy strove to throw off the Austrian yoke and become a free, united country. Actually the story is more concerned with the struggle of two people to find themselves than with the spirit of patriotism which the title implies. Antonio Fogazzaro, one of the foremost Italian writers of the last century, was a novelist whose books have gained a prominent place in world literature.

The Story:

The Marchesa Orsola was determined that Don Franco Maironi, her grandson, should marry a woman of birth and money, but that young man was in love with Luisa Rigey, a gentle girl of the neighborhood who had neither wealth nor position. Because the marchesa had forbidden him to see Luisa, her mother had tried to please the powerful old lady by keeping the young people apart. Then, when the mother knew that she was dying, she was so anxious to see her daughter settled that she gave her permission for a secret marriage.

His marriage meant that Franco would be cut off without a cent, for the marchesa controlled the Maironi fortune and was not one to relent once her mind was made up. But the young people would be supported by Luisa's uncle, Piero Ribera, a government engineer. He had supported his sister and her daughter for many years and considered it a privilege to do so. Franco himself was an imaginative youth who had never worked and seemed unlikely ever to do so. Although he had studied law in order to be free of his grandmother's power, he spent most of his time playing the piano and composing poetry.

At the time the provinces that would one day be Italy were trying to throw off the yoke of Austrian power. There had been several minor revolutions, but each one had been put down and the patriots imprisoned or killed. At last other European countries were becoming interested in the struggle for Italian independence, and they were willing to help the rebels. Franco was one of the patriots. His grandmother was a staunch supporter of Austria. That circumstance made his position doubly dangerous. Spies were everywhere, and if he defied his grandmother in his marriage she would be his personal enemy as well as his political one.

Franco loved Luisa too much to let those problems deter him, however, and so they were secretly wed. Before many hours had passed the marchesa learned of the wedding, for she was so powerful that people willingly brought her all the news. She immediately disowned Franco, refused even to acknowledge that he existed. But what the old lady did not know was that a friend of the family had called Franco to him and showed him a letter from his grandfather, the marchesa's dead husband. The letter contained also a will which reflected on the morals of his wife, questioned the paternity of his son, Franco's father, and left his fortune to Franco. Since the will was a duplicate copy, the friend felt sure that the marchesa had knowingly concealed the original, thus cheating Franco of his rightful fortune. But Franco, although stunned, refused to use the information against his grandmother and did not even want Luisa to learn of the letter.

Life was not easy for the young couple, but they were sustained by their love and by Uncle Piero's small allowance. Meanwhile the police were becoming more active, and once Franco was arrested. Uncle Piero was also suspected. Because there was no proof of treason, no action was taken other than to warn Franco and other patriots to avoid any suspicious activities.

A baby girl born to Franco and Luisa became the joy of their lives, and they spent all of their time with her. But there was one serious question between them concerning the baby. Luisa was not a believer in God. Franco, a devout Catholic, feared that she would try to influence the child. Luisa loved her husband too much, however, to go against his wishes. She took the baby to mass and in other ways tried to please her husband in training the child, although she herself gave only lip service to any religious function.

Through the ill will of the marchesa, Uncle Piero was finally dismissed from his government position. With no income, Franco was forced to seek work. Since it was becoming increasingly unsafe for him to stay where he was constantly watched, he went to a distant province. From there he sent home as much money as possible for the support of his family, which now included Uncle Piero, and for their future journey to join him when the proper time arrived.

Before he left, Luisa had learned of the concealed will and begged Franco to make it public so that his grandmother would get justice for her sin. She did not want the money and would gladly have given it all away, but she felt that Franco's grandmother should be punished for the trouble she had caused. Franco could not agree with her, and they parted under strained relations.

During his absence Luisa began to see God as Franco had wished she might, for through her love for the baby she turned at last to a faith in which everyone loves his brother, even his enemy. Although she still could not accept all the teachings of the Church, she wrote Franco that she hoped someday to have a belief as great as his. But she still desired revenge against the marchesa who had made them suffer so greatly. Finally she secured a copy of the will and approached the old lady to warn her of the knowledge she now possessed. Interrupted by a cry, she ran to find that her baby had wandered off and drowned. Luisa, almost out of her mind with grief, did not want the child even to be buried. Although Franco did not blame her when he returned, Luisa felt that she had killed the baby by leaving her alone in order to seek out the marchesa. As a result, she turned even more violently against God and blamed Him for taking her baby as punishment for the sins of adults like herself and the marchesa.

The marchesa, even though she fought against her own conscience, secretly felt guilty of the sin of the child's death. Fearing that she might soon die, she repented of her sins and called Franco to her. But she had not changed entirely, for instead of asking his forgiveness she offered to forgive him for disobeying her. When she told him that she was making him the sole heir in her will, Franco still spurned the money. He wanted only peace with the grandmother who had reared him. Since the police were again seeking him, he soon had to flee from his home once more. His grandmother, repentant, helped him to escape.

Three years passed before Luisa and Uncle Piero could join Franco. Luisa had no feeling for her husband or for anyone else now that her baby was dead. Franco would soon join the army of patriots who would fight against Austria. Otherwise she would not have gone to him in answer to his pleas. But as the time drew near for them to part, her old love for him returned, and she went to him in passion and in humility. When Franco left her, she carried in her body the seed of a new life, symbol of a happier existence than the one Uncle Piero left peacefully after seeing his family once more united in love and in faith.

Critique:

Peder Victorious, a sequel to Rølvaag's Giants in the Earth, carries on the saga of pioneer life twenty years after the time of the first novel. Since Rølvaag himself was a Norwegian transplanted to America, he wrote authoritatively of Beret's reluctance to give over all her Norwegian customs and to follow blindly the American ones of her children and neighbors. Particularly, she resisted giving up her own language, for that seemed a real sin to her. On the other hand, having come to this country as a young man, Rølvaag also knew the forces working on the young people to become Americanized as quickly as possible. Hence, this novel is a sympathetic picture of the Holm family. If it does not have the power of Giants in the Earth, the reason may lie in the fact that the struggle in this novel is not for survival in a new land, but merely one of adaptation to a new society.

The Story:

While Peder Holm was growing up, he lived in three rooms. In one, where he lived everything in English, there was a magic touch. In the second, where he lived everything in Norwegian, things were more difficult. In the third room, only he and God could come. Before he was born, his mother had dedicated him to God, who had become a very real person to the boy.

As he grew up, however, he was not always sure that God could be the kind of being that his mother and the Reverend Mr. Gabrielsen talked about. Peder had been taught that God was love, and yet He was blamed for the death of Per Hansa, his father, the destruction of the crops, and the bleakness of the land. To Peder such calamities could not be reconciled with his God of love; he read his Bible assiduously in an attempt to straighten out his thoughts.

The Reverend Mr. Gabrielsen was sure that Peder would be the right one, after seminary, to minister to the Norwegian settlement. It was true that the preacher expected English to supplant Norwegian as the language there in the next twenty years, but that was all right. Peder's English was fluent, though still tinged with a Nordland accent.

The whole community was in a fever of change. After a long argument in church about disciplining a girl whose shame had caused her to hang herself, one group broke off and established a second church. There were already two schools, one strictly Norwegian and one to which the Irish came as well. The next problem would be the division of the territory before it entered the Union. Such affairs aroused the people nearly to fighting pitch. Meetings called pro and con were sources of fine entertainment for everybody within riding distance.

Beret wanted everything Norwegian kept intact; she even tried to keep the children speaking Norwegian to her at home, though that was hard after all the children had been in school a few years. Particularly, she wanted Peder kept secure for the ministry; that desire was hard for her to insure because she could not understand him when he spoke English at school and church affairs. Since his voice was fine and loud, he spoke often and entered into every kind of entertainment. He might become a minister, but he was certainly going to have a lot of fun beforehand. As for that, he found a great deal of entertainment and satisfaction right on the farm.

After a political meeting at the school-house, a meeting which Beret and her whole family attended and at which Peder recited Lincoln's Gettysburg Address in English, his teacher spoke at length to Beret about letting him speak English all the time, that he might lose his Norwegian accent. Beret was so disturbed that she spoke to her husband's picture that night. Although he seemed to smile at her for her anxiety, she decided that Peder should go to the school which only Norwegians attended.

The change of schools did not help much. Beret asked a widowed friend about moving both their families back to Norway, but Sorine questioned the wisdom of taking their children into a strange land. Beret could not understand what Sorine could be talking about. Weren't their children Norwegian? Sorine told her that their children were American.

One thing helped Beret to keep her mind off her troubles. She could plan for the farm. Everyone in the settlement admitted that she was prosperous. Soon she had a windmill and a fine big barn for both horses and cows. She never knew quite how she did that job; usually she felt overcome by her problems and tried some solution out of desperation. Always her solutions seemed the right ones.

With her farm going so well, Beret liked to give the minister donations for the missions. Her generosity made her feel better until the Reverend Mr. Gabrielsen did something which annoyed her exceedingly and at which he could not help but laugh. Just before Peder was to be confirmed, the preacher asked him to read at meeting a part of the Bible in English. Beret objected to that when she talked to the Reverend Mr. Gabrielsen, but she was incensed sometime later when he asked the blessing in English in her own house. Still, she wanted Peder to be a minister.

Peder was beginning to have ideas of his own. In the first place, he began to resent being kept at home, away from dances and parties. The Irish were great for parties and Peder liked a great many of those people, especially the Dohenys. Finally he began to go out at night without telling his mother where he was going. He could not escape her knowing that he did go, however, because she stayed awake each night until he came in. Then she began to hear rumors about which he would give her no satisfaction. Soon the minister heard that Peder was running around with girls. He begged Peder to go off to the seminary immediately. Peder refused.

Instead, he began to rehearse for a play, the first to be put on in the settlement. He was the hero and Susie Doheny, the heroine. To him the lines in the play became real and Susie his true love. He was happier than he had ever been, singing all day, and tireless at his work. When the minister heard about the play, he came to Beret and begged her to get Peder out of that kind of temptation. Beret thought it was up to the minister himself to restrain Peder. She was all confused. Perhaps Peder was going astray, but lately he had been kinder than he had ever been before. She questioned him and seemed relieved when she heard that some of her old friends were also in the cast.

By the time the next rehearsal came around, she could not resist finding out what she could. She went through the fields until she could see into the schoolhouse. There she saw Peder with Susie in his arms—Susie, that Irishier.

Beret crept into the shadows until the players left. Her mind went blank. Then she moved around a little, picking up small sticks which she piled close to the school. A heavy rain came up and blew so hard that she could not get those sticks to burn, and she crept home. She was so tired then that she merely looked at her husband's picture and fell on her bed. She must have dreamed, for, hearing a noise, she looked around and there was Per Hansa standing by her bed, telling her to let Peder have that girl of his that he was so fond of.

The next day Peder thought Beret seemed preoccupied. It was a shock and then a delight to him to hear her say they must hurry to Doheny's to arrange for his and Susie's wedding.

Critique:

The background of Pelle the Conqueror is the struggle between the workers and employers during the rise of the labor movement in Denmark in the last half of the nineteenth century, but at no time does the social criticism completely envelop the biographical narrative. Obviously the narrative was written to reveal the struggles of the times. However, the purely human interest in the growth of a young man from the poorest kind of background is always paramount. The author's love for the common people and their problems is perhaps best illustrated, not in the background of social criticism but in the insight with which sketches and incidents of life among the common folk are depicted. The many digressions from the main story are entertaining rather than boring because of the sympathy and warmheartedness with which these digressions present the customs and experiences of people in whom Nexö was interested.

The Story:

Among a shipload of migrant workers from Sweden to the Danish island of Bornholm, in the spring of 1877, were Lasse Karlsson, a Swedish farmhand who was old before his time, and his eight-year-old son, Pelle. Like other Swedes who went to Bornholm, Lasse Karlsson was enticed from his homeland by the relatively high wages paid on the Danish island.

Lasse and his son were hired to look after cattle on a large farm on the island. Their life there was neither pleasant nor unpleasant. The farm was a dreary one. The owner, leaving the management of the place to a bailiff, drank heavily and sought after women. Pelle's greatest happiness lay in getting out to look after the cattle in the common pastures. After a time he found a playmate in Rud Pihl, the natural son of the farmer, who lived in a shack with his mother near the edge of the farm. For the elder Karlsson, life was not easy; he was old and weak, and the rest of the laborers made him the butt of all their jokes. Even so, the man and his son stayed at Stone Farm for several years; it was easier to remain there than it was to look for a new location.

The second winter found Pelle in school, for the authorities insisted that he attend. Though he was nine years old, he had had no formal education. In addition, he was the lone Swede among more than twenty Danish children. Gradually, however, Pelle made a place for himself, even becoming a leader among his school-mates.

After two more years, Pelle was confirmed. In the eyes of everyone, he was now able to take care of himself. The boy, realizing that his father was content, decided to leave the farm by himself. Early one morning he set his face toward the little town that was the chief city of the island. While trudging along the road, Pelle met a farmer who gave him a ride into town. Pelle confided to him that he was on his way to look for work. The farmer, who had known Pelle some time, introduced him to a shoemaker who accepted Pelle as an apprentice.

Master Andres was an easy master, but even so the apprenticeship was not easy. The journeyman under whom Pelle worked was a grouchy person who taunted Pelle for his rural upbringing. As the six years of Pelle's apprenticeship passed, he was not sure what he would do afterward. He saw that many shoemakers had no work and that machine-made shoes were slowly taking the place of the handmade variety.

In the last year of his apprenticeship Master Andres died and the business was sold. Rather than finish out his time with a new master, Pelle ran away from the shop. For several months he simply drifted, picking up odds and ends of work of any kind. The only thing which saved him from becoming a ne'er-do-well was the friendship of Marie Nielsen, a dancer. She kept him seeking work, patched up his clothes, and bolstered his self-esteem so that he did not become a mere tramp, until one day a traveling shoemaker named Sort asked Pelle to join him for a time. The two traveled about the country and were highly successful. One day they met Lasse, Pelle's father, who had just been evicted from the farm he had purchased during Pelle's apprenticeship. The sight of his father, broken and miserable, convinced Pelle that he ought to leave Bornholm for Copenhagen, where he hoped to make his fortune.

In Copenhagen, Pelle soon found work, but the pay was slight. Finally he joined a newly-organized trade union. He quickly became interested in the activity of the union and became a leader in the labor movement. As such he met many people, among them Ellen Stolpe, the daughter of a leader in the stonemasons' union. Pelle fell in love with her, and she returned his love. They were married on the day that Pelle became the president of the shoemakers' union.

After his marriage Pelle lost interest in the union; he spent as much time as possible with his wife and, as they were born, his two children. But a very bad winter came along, when all the workmen were extremely hard pressed by lack of work. The hardships which he and other workingmen suffered aroused Pelle once again to work with the union. His private life, too, was miserable, for he discovered that his wife had turned prostitute in order to bring home money to keep the little family fed and sheltered. As soon as he discovered what his wife had done, Pelle left her.

The workmen were successful in a general strike against their employers, but Pelle, who was recognized as a ringleader, was thrown into prison on charges of having been a counterfeiter; the police had discovered in his house a block of wood that was a crude plate for a banknote. Pelle had made it just for something to do while unemployed. For six years Pelle languished in prison. When he came out, he became reconciled with his wife. He also discovered that the lot of the workingmen had become considerably better during his period of imprisonment, although in his own trade machinery had taken the place of the shoemaker-craftsman. Pelle took a job in a factory which specialized in metal fabrications. He left the job, although he had become a salaried employee, when the management tried to use him as a strikebreaker.

Pelle was out of work for quite a time. He again picked up odd jobs wherever he could find them, spent a great deal of time in a public library reading everything he could find about the labor movement, and suggested ways of improving the lot of the workingmen. He became a friend of the librarian, Mr. Brun, and the two of them started a coöperative shoe factory. They were highly successful with their experiment, even though rival companies tried to resist them. They prospered to the point that they opened up their own leather factory and bought a large tract of land on which to build model homes for their employees.

Pelle was now convinced that it was by such peaceful measures that the lot of workmen was to be made better. He, who had been a firebrand earlier in life, addressed meetings of workingmen. Always he urged workers to take constitutional means to make their laboring conditions and wages better, rather than to use the more combative and costly means of the strike.

PELLÉAS AND MÉLISANDE

Type of plot: Symbolic tragedy

Time of plot: The Middle Ages

Locale: Allemonde

First presented: 1893; first published: 1892

Principal characters:

ARKËL, King of Allemonde

GENEVÈVE, mother of Pélleás and Golaud

PÉLLÉAS, and

GOLAUD, grandsons of Arkël

MÉLISANDE, Golaud's wife

LITTLE YNIOLD, son of Golaud by a former marriage

Critique:

Pelléas and Mélisande, a symbolic retelling of Dante's story of Paolo and Francesca, is a play of both atmosphere and character, with the gloomy castle in the woods creating a mood that acts upon the elfin Mélisande. It is also the most successful of Maeterlinck's full-length dramas in which he turned from realism to a full play of his anti-naturalistic imagination. Maeterlinck led a crusade against realism in the theater and was acclaimed in Europe until about 1910, when his popularity began to wane. It is perhaps ironic that Pelléas and Mélisande is now better known for Claude Debussy's opera of the same name than for the stage version.

The Story:

Golaud, grandson of Arkël, became lost while hunting, and as he wandered through the forest he came upon Mélisande weeping beside a spring. She too was lost, her beautiful clothes torn by the briars and her golden crown fallen into the spring. She was like a little girl when she wept. Golaud tried to comfort her. Although she would not let him touch her or even reach for her crown, which he could have retrieved easily, she followed him out of the forest.

Afraid of Arkël, who wanted his grandson to marry the daughter of an enemy in order to bring peace to the land, Golaud wrote his half-brother Pelléas that he had married Mélisande and wished to bring her home if Arkël would forgive him. He would wait near the castle for the signal Pelléas would give him if Golaud and Mélisande might enter. Their mother Geneviève got permission from Arkël, who was now too old to resist fate. Pelléas wanted to visit a dying friend before Mélisande came, but Arkël persuaded him to wait to see how his own sick father progressed before he went away.

Pelléas took Mélisande to see Blind Man's Spring, a delightfully cool place on a stifling day. Pelléas realized that Golaud had found Mélisande beside a spring. As he asked her about that meeting, Mélisande, playing with her wedding ring, let it fall into the water. As the ring fell, the clock in the castle grounds struck twelve.

Golaud had been hunting. When the clock struck twelve, his horse bolted and ran into a tree, throwing Golaud off. He was recovering from his accident when Mélisande came to tell him that she wanted to go away because the castle was too gloomy. He noticed that her ring was gone. She said that she had lost it in the grotto by the sea while picking up shells for Little Yniold. Golaud sent her back immediately to find the ring before the tide came in.

Pelléas took Mélisande to the grotto so that she would be able to describe the place where she claimed to have lost Golaud's wedding ring.

Whenever Golaud was away, Pelléas spent as much time as he could with Mélisande. Usually Little Yniold was with them. One night the little boy, unable to sleep, cried because he said Mélisande would go away. To entertain him, Pelléas took him to the window to see the swans chasing the dogs. Little Yniold saw his father crossing the courtyard and ran downstairs to meet him. Coming into the room, Little Yniold noticed that both Pelléas and Mélisande had been crying.

On another night Mélisande was leaning from a tower while she combed her beautiful, long hair. Pelléas, coming into the courtyard below, entwined his hands in her hair and praised her beauty. When Golaud came by shortly afterward, Pelléas could not let go of Mélisande's hair. Golaud scolded them for playing at night like children.

On certain days the castle had a smell of death. Golaud, convinced that an underground lake in one of the crypts beneath the castle was responsible for the smell, led Pelléas down into the crypts the next morning to see the lake and smell the overpowering scent of death there. As Golaud swung the lantern around, Pélleas would have fallen into the lake if Golaud had not caught his arm.

When the half-brothers came out on the terrace, Golaud told Pélleas that Mélisande was young and impressionable and that she must be treated more circum-spectly than Pélleas had treated her the night before, because she was with child.

Golaud tried to find out from Yniold how Pélleas and Mélisande acted when the child was with them, what they said, and what they did. When he could not get the child to answer any of his questions satisfactorily, he lifted him so that the boy could look through the window of the room in which Pélleas and Mélisande were standing. Even then he could not learn from Yniold anything that Pélleas and Mélisande were doing.

A short time later the father of Pélleas was so much better that the prince decided to start on his delayed journey the next day. He asked Mélisande to meet him that night near Blind Man's Spring.

Arkël told Mélisande that happiness ought to enter the castle now that Pélleas' father had recovered. He wondered why she changed from a joyous creature when she entered the castle to the unhappy one she now seemed to be. Although Mélisande disclaimed being unhappy, Arkël sensed her sadness. Golaud, coming to look for his sword, raved at Mélisande and dragged her behind him on her knees until Arkël intervened.

That night Mélisande went to meet Pélleas. As they made love in the shadows Pélleas felt that the stars were falling. When they went into the moonlight, their shadows stretched the length of the garden. Pélleas thought that Mélisande's beauty was unearthly, as if she were about to die. As the gates clanged shut, they realized that they were locked out of the castle for the night. Suddenly Mélisande saw Golaud. Knowing they could not flee from his sword, Mélisande and Pélleas kissed desperately. When Golaud struck Pélleas at the brink of the fountain, Pélleas fell. Golaud pursued Mélisande into the darkness.

An old servant found Mélisande and Golaud at the gates early the next morning. Mélisande had a slight cut under her breast, but not enough to harm a bird. She was delivered of a tiny, premature daughter. Golaud had tried to kill himself without success.

Golaud dragged himself to Mélisande's room, where Arkël and the physician were attending her. The physician tried to convince Golaud that Mélisande was not dying of the sword wound, that Mélisande had been born without reason to die, and she was dying without reason. Golaud would not be convinced. He felt that he had killed both Pélleas and Mélisande without cause, that they were both children and kissed simply as children do. But he was not sure.

When Mélisande awoke, she seemed to have forgotten her hurt and Golaud's pursuit, and she thought her husband had grown old. Hoping to hear her confess to a forbidden love for Pélleas, Golaud asked the physician and Arkël to go down the corridor for a moment and leave him alone with her. But when he questioned her, Mélisande innocently exclaimed that she and Pélleas were never guilty. She asked where Pélleas was. Because Golaud begged her to speak the truth at the moment of death, she asked who was to die. She could not answer his questions any better than Little Yniold had done when Golaud lifted him to the window to spy upon Pélleas and Mélisande.

Arkël showed Mélisande her tiny daughter. Mélisande pitied the child because she looked sad. While Mélisande was looking at the baby, a group of women servants came into the room. Mélisande stretched out her arms and then lay as if weeping in her sleep. Suddenly the servants knelt. The physician looked at Mélisande and saw that she was dead.

dred years, the main story tells of the people who lived at Juvik and Haaberg from 1800 until 1918. The scene is the district of Namdal, north of Trondheim, where Olav Duun was born and where he grew up. A family saga of the region, comparable to the old Icelandic family histories such as the Sturlunga Saga, the novel follows the old Norse tales in tone and narrative technique. Duun's methods were matter of fact, lighted by a great deal of local color, superstitions, customs, crafts, set against a realistic background. The characters who people the novel also resemble the heroic figures of the old epics, for they trace their line of descent from ancestors who figured in tales of heroic and even superhuman deeds. The language used by Duun was the landsmaal, the language of the common people of Norway, as opposed to the riksmaal, the more commonly used literary language of Ibsen, Ham-sun, and others.

The Story:

The first Juviking was Per, a crofter from the south. After a fight with his landlord he bought the Juvik farm along the fjord. Later his landlord's daughter went to live with him but they never married.

Little was known about their sons. In the third generation the owner of the farm was nicknamed Bear Anders because he had killed a great black beast with an ax. His son was Big Per, so strong that he once saved horse, sledge, and rider from sinking through the ice. After the rescue the man gave Per his daughter for a wife. One of the last of the old-time Juvikings was Greedy Per, a rich miser who stole other men's nets. In his old age he had a change of heart and gave back what he had taken. Everyone called him a hero, for it took more courage to return stolen goods in daylight than it did to take them after dark.

Two generations later, at the end of the eighteenth century, there was a single son, Per Anders Juvika. Taking a fancy to a girl he saw at a fair, he went to her father and frightened the man so badly that he gave Per his daughter and a handsome dowry. For his wife Ane, Per Anders built a two-story house with a plank floor in every room. They had two boys, Jens and Per, and three daughters, Ane, Aasel, and Beret. Ane and Aasel married and went off to other farms. Beret never married. Jens, wild and reckless like the old Juvikings, was also single, but gentle Per had an industrious wife, Valborg, whom his father had picked out for him. Even though they were grown men, Jens and Per stayed at home, ruled by old Per Anders, and worked the farm.

One night in December, 1800, neighbors saw a strange light over Juvik, an omen of disaster. Per Anders laughed at the superstitions of his womenfolk. On Lucy Long Night he decided to visit his married daughters. Ane he found living poorly on the great farm at Haaberg, for her husband was dead and she was childless. Aasel and her husband Mikkal lived on a tenant farm. Great workers, they had more abundance than Ane, even in the matter of children.

It was dark when Per Anders started to row home. Because of wind and high waves on the fjord he was exhausted by the time he reached his own boathouse. There his sons, worried by his long absence, found him. Worn out by exposure and fatigue, he lasted until after the Christmas season and then died peacefully. When the smoke of his burning bedstraw blew back into the house, signifying another death, both Ane and Beret believed that the mother would soon follow. Beret died after a short illness, to Ane's relief. Her own respite was brief, however, for she died six weeks later.

The farm suffered the next year, for Jens and young Per could seldom agree. A thief began to rob the storehouse. One night the brothers hunted the man into the sea and he drowned. Jens made light of the affair, but Per, the thief's death heavy on his conscience, grew more unhappy at Juvik. After Jens had been tricked into marrying a maidservant, Per took his share of the inheritance in money and bought Ane's farm at Haaberg. Jens, going from bad to worse, finally deserted the farm and went to sea. Aasel and Mikal went to live at Juvik.

Per worked hard on his land before he hurt himself while lifting stones. He grew fretful and superstitious during the last months of his life, and Valborg feared that the heroic blood was going from the Juvik veins. But young Anders, who would inherit Haaberg, had cleverness and strength. At Per's death the fourteen-year-old boy assumed responsibility as head of the house. All the neighbors and servants saw that he would be a better man than his father.

Anders was in his early twenties when Valborg died, leaving him in charge of Haaberg and Petter, his younger brother. Petter was a sly one, always in trouble; people said he was like his uncle Jens. Anders' reckless Juviking blood showed only in his courtship of Massi Liness. With Ola Engdal, his rival, he risked his life in many foolhardy deeds, the agreement being that if either perished the survivor was to have Massi. When Massi settled matters by accepting Ola, Anders defiantly married Solvi, a girl of Lapp blood, and took her to live in the fine new house he had built. Before long there were many misfortunes in the district. The Engdal children died. Ola injured his leg and it became infected. Wolves killed whole herds of sheep. Because Haaberg alone continued to prosper, the neighbors began to call Solvi a witch and blamed their troubles on Lapp sorcery. At last Anders yielded to their superstitious beliefs and told Solvi to go back to her father. While she was rowing up the fjord, Petter started a rock slide which fell from a cliff upon her boat, killing her and her child. Having wished Solvi dead, Anders brooded much after her death. His hair turned gray.

Left widowed and childless, Massi went to Anders and asked him to marry her. Their children were Per, Gjartru, Aasel, Jens, Beret, and Ola. Meanwhile Petter had grown more dissipated and spiteful. Anders finally bought him a little place at Rönningan, where he settled with Kjersti, Massi's foster daughter. Later Anders tried to help his brother by hiring him to paint the parish church and lead the spire. Petter used cheap materials and did poor work. When Anders threatened to expose him, the rascal burned the church.

Young Per married Marja Leinland and brought his bride to Haaberg. Gjartru was in love with Hall Grönset, who was lost at sea. There was gossip in the neighborhood when Petter Liness, Per's friend, drowned and his family suspected Per of having in his possession a wallet containing Petter's savings. Petter had entrusted the money to Per but had asked him to give it secretly to Kjersti Rönningan. Anders, grieved and angered by Per's stubborn silence, feared that his son would be forced also to foster Kjersti's child by Petter.

Anders had hoped to make Per sheriff of the district, but that plan fell through. Then Massi became sick and died. Jens tried to set himself up as a trader but failed in his undertaking. Aasel had gone to live with old Ane, her great-aunt, at Paalsness.

Anders' eyesight began to fail. One day he tried to treat himself with hot tar and went completely blind. Ane died, leaving Aasel without the inheritance she had promised the girl. Jens became ill with typhus but recovered. Per, who had nursed his brother, caught the disease and died. Aasel married Kristen Folden, who bought Haaberg when Anders needed money to pay Jens' debts, and Jens went off to seek his fortune in America. Young Ola, not much good for anything else, planned to become a clerk. Gjartru finally married Johan Arnesen; they kept a store at Segelsund. Blind and old, Anders thought a great deal about his younger days and the sorrows of his life. Believing that families ran their courses like waves, he hoped that Aasel's children or Gjartru's would redeem the fortunes of the Juvikings.

Aasel at Haaberg and Gjartru at Segelsund, both strong-willed, ambitious women, became rivals. Gjartru, hoping to see her husband grow rich in trade, was always urging him into schemes for making money. Aasel put her faith in the land; under Folden's management Haaberg became prosperous once more. Blind Anders, over seventy, approved of all his daughter and son-in-law had done on the farm, and he thought of his grandson Peder as one of the true Juviking line.

Peder was courting Andrea Ween, daughter of the veterinarian. Ola Haaberg, the parish clerk, was also courting her, but in a spiritless way. Mina Arnesen, Peder's cousin, was engaged to Arthur Ween, Andrea's brother. Peder had previously been in love with Kjerstina, one of his distant cousins at Juvik; the girl was with child by him. Ambitious for her son's future, Aasel went to the girl and told a tale which caused Kjerstina to give up her claim on Peder. A short time later Andrea threw over Ola and accepted Peder.

The double wedding was celebrated at Haaberg, where for three days and nights the guests danced and feasted. An unexpected guest at the wedding was Jens Haaberg, who had made money in America. Petter, old Anders' worthless brother, was still up to his foolish pranks. When he dressed up as a ghost to frighten some of the guests, blind Anders rushed out to confront the spirit, stumbled, and fell dead. The celebration would have ended anyway, for Arnesen had received word that his speculations had failed and he was ruined.

Arnesen and Gjartru asked Jens to lend them money. He refused, but offered to pay their passage back to America with him. They went, leaving Segelsund to Mina and her husband. Peder, taken ill during the wedding celebration, died soon afterward of galloping consumption. Ineffectual Ola Haaberg reflected bitterly that the great man of the Juvikings was still to come.

Even in boyhood Odin Setran gave promise of being that man. The son of Elen Haaberg and Otte Setran, a joiner who had worked on the farm where Elen went as housekeeper after her brother's death, he was born out of wedlock, for by that time Otte had gone to America. When Elen married Iver Vennestad, they sent Odin to live with Bendek Kjelvik and his wife Gurianna. Kjelvik was a wonderful place to young Odin, with the happenings of every day almost like the fairy tales Bendek told at night. Bendek was a poacher as well as a herdsman, a secret he tried to keep from the boy. One day, urged on by some playmates, Odin took his foster father's gun and accidentally killed an old ram. When he repeated what the other boys had said about Bendek and his gun, the old man thought Odin was mocking him, and he drove the boy out of his house on Christmas night. Odin went sadly back to Vennestad.

In the meantime Otte Setran had returned from America. He asked for Odin, but the boy looked on his father as a stranger. Then Bendek, sick and sorry for his hasty deed, begged Odin to return to Kjelvik. He stayed with the old couple until Bendek died. There he also met Lauris, a boy of the Kjelvik kin, who was to become his best friend and worst enemy. After he started to school he met for the first time his cousin Astri, daughter of Peder and Andrea, and old Aasel, his grandmother.

Odin, disliking his stepfather, was unhappy at Vennestad, but after a time he was able to hold his own against Iver's bullying, so that the man began to respect him. Becoming involved in several escapades with Lauris, Odin greatly distressed his ailing mother, and it was decided that he should go to live with his father. First, however, he wanted to attend a fair across the fjord. When he went to Segelsund to borrow a boat, Fru Mina asked him to take as his passenger a young girl named Ingri Arnesen. A storm came up and the children were almost drowned, but at last they reached shore safely. That was Odin's first meeting with his future wife.

Odin became friendly with his Haaberg kin. After his mother died of the same disease which had killed her brother and her sister Marjane, widowed Aasel asked him to live on the farm. He and Astri fell in love, but when Otte Setran began to court Astri's mother the young people realized that their love would be a sin if their parents were to marry. Odin engaged in coastwise trading with Lauris for a time. Astri married Arne Finne, a childhood sweetheart dying of tuberculosis. Otte and Andrea married and moved to town. After her husband's death Astri married Lauris. By that time Odin knew that his friend was unscrupulous and ambitious, but he held his tongue.

Old Aasel died hoping that Haaberg would be sold and the house converted into a home for the poor, but Astri and her husband as well as the rest of the parish were opposed. Only Iver Vennestad backed Odin when he presented the plan at his grandmother's funeral ale.

At the funeral he met Ingri again.

Odin, married to Ingri, did become the leading man of the parish. Through his efforts the poorhouse had been established at Vennestad and a community herring factory built. Lauris, jealous of his success, took advantage of a labor dispute at the factory to make himself chairman of the board. Odin, not greatly concerned, continued to work for the good of the community, but he resolved to fight back when Lauris and Engelbert Olsen, a leader of the workmen, tried to discredit him through gossip about Ingri's father, who had served a sentence for forgery. Like his ancestor, he hunted Olsen into the sea and forced the man to leave the district.

Ola Haaberg committed suicide, leaving proof that Lauris had cheated Aasel of a large sum of money. At last Odin decided that for the good of the community Lauris should die. Using Astri's illness during the great influenza epidemic as an excuse, he forced his enemy to cross the fjord with him during a storm. But when the boat capsized and Odin had the chance to do away with Lauris, he failed to do so. Instead, he attempted to keep afloat on the oars while Lauris clung to the more stable keel. A fishing boat rescued Lauris. Odin's body was washed ashore days later. The guests at the funeral ale thought that they saw his great generosity and courage reflected in his young sons, Anders and Per.

PEPITA JIMENEZ

Author: Juan Valera (Juan Valera y Alcalá Galiano, 1824-1905)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: c. 1870

Locale: Andalusia, Spain

First published: 1874

Principal characters:

LUIS DE VARGAS, a student for the priesthood

DON PEDRO DE VARGAS, his father

PEPITA JIMENEZ, a young widow

ANTOÑONA, her housekeeper and duenna

COUNT DE GENAZAHAR, a designing nobleman

Critique:

Valera, educated in both religion and law, became a diplomat at twenty-three. At the age of forty-six he started to put on paper his thoughts about philosophy and religion, and he ended with a story which began the renaissance of the Spanish novel in the nineteenth century. Pepita Jimenez shows Valera's ability to write clearly, with polished phrases and beauty of style. Even if he could not write convincing dialogue or keep his philosophizing from slowing the flow of the narrative, his character analyses and descriptions make this novel a notable work. The psychological pattern of the story, told with a minimum of external action, is one to which his epistolary method is well suited. The thesis is that a priest is born and not made. In a foreword the writer claimed that he took the story from papers that fell into his hands at the death of the Dean of the Cathedral of —. The original letters were in three divisions: "Letters from my nephew," "Chronicles," and "Letters from my brother."

The Story:

On March 22, four days after returning to his home in Andalusia, Luis de Vargas wrote the first of his letters to his uncle and favorite professor at the seminary. He reported that his father intended to fatten him up during his vacation, to have him ready to return in the fall to finish his training for the priesthood. He mentioned in passing that his father was courting a young and attractive widow, Pepita Jimenez, twenty years old to his father's fifty-five. Pepita had been married for only a short time to an eighty-year-old money-lender named Gumerindo. Though Luis was not eager to see his father married again, he promised his uncle not to judge Pepita before he knew her.

His next letter, dated six days later, reported that he was already tired of the little town and anxious to get back to school. In the meantime he had met Pepita. Having decided that she paid too much attention to the body and not enough to the spirit, he could not understand why the local vicar held so high an opinion of her. He hoped, however, that she would have a good effect on his somewhat unsettled father.

In his next letter Luis continued to criticize Pepita for her coquetry toward his father. He tried to forgive her vanity about her pretty hands by remarking that Saint Teresa had exhibited the same fault. In closing, he apologized for not at once fleeing the life that seemed to be making a materialist of him, but his father had begged him to stay on a while longer.

In a letter dated April 14, Luis expressed concern over Pepita's diabolic power, shown by the manner in which she charmed both his father and the vicar, and made him write more about her than about others in the town.

Meanwhile his time was so occupied that it was May 4 before he wrote again to describe a picnic his father had given for Pepita. Luis had ridden a mule. While the others rode or played games, he stayed behind to chat with the vicar and an old lady, an experience more boring than he had believed possible. But when he took a walk and came upon Pepita alone, he could not understand his strange excitement. She reproved him for being too serious for his age and remarked that only very old people like the vicar traveled on muleback. That night Luis told his father that he wanted to learn to ride a horse.

In later letters he described his embarrassment during evening gatherings at Pepita's house, where he always felt out of place. But he did enjoy his riding lessons and the thrill of riding past her balcony on the day his father decided he could ride well enough to do so. He later confessed to his uncle that he was disturbed in his feelings over Pepita and as a result he had stopped going to her house. He thought that he would be wise to return to the seminary at once.

He was still more perplexed when Antoñona, Pepita's housekeeper, scolded him for making her mistress unhappy. When Luis called to apologize and explain, the sight of tears in Pepita's eyes upset him, and before he knew it he kissed her. Certain that he must leave as soon as possible, he told his father that he intended to depart on June 25, immediately after the Midsummer Eve celebration. He ended his letter with assurances that his uncle would be seeing him within a week.

Five days after Luis' last letter Pepita summoned the vicar to her house. She wanted to confess that she no longer loved Don Pedro because she had fallen in love with his son. Convinced that Luis loved her also, though without knowing it, she intended to keep him from carrying out his plans to become a priest. The scandalized vicar ordered her to remain engaged to the father and let Luis go away as he had planned. Pepita promised. But no one could force Antoñona to keep such a promise. She determined to take a hand in the situation.

In the Vargas household, meanwhile, Don Pedro worried about his moping son and at last urged the boy's gay young cousin, Currito, to take Luis in hand. Luis went with his cousin to the casino, where the Count de Genazahar was among the gamblers. Having borrowed five thousand pesetas from Gumersindo, he had tried, after the old man's death, to cancel the debt by marrying Pepita. Her curt refusal had made him hate her. At the casino that night Luis overheard some of his slighting remarks about the young widow.

Antoñona went to see Luis again and accused him of behaving discourteously toward her mistress. Luis protested that he, too, was unhappy but that it was his duty to return to the seminary. Because Antoñona insisted that he must first set things right with Pepita, he promised to go to her house at ten that night. The streets would be full of Midsummer Eve revelers and no one would notice him.

After Antoñona's departure he regretted his promise, but it had been given and he went. His talk with Pepita was long and difficult. Each made self-accusations. At last, sobbing, Pepita ran to her bedroom. Luis followed her. When he came out, he was convinced that he was not among the men of whom priests are made. On his way home, seeing Count Genazahar in the casino, he stopped. Declaring that he no longer wore his religious robe, he announced that he had come to beat the count at cards.

During a long run of luck he won all the count's money. When Count Genazahar wished to continue, Luis insultingly answered his promise to pay later by reminding him that he had failed to pay his debt to Gumersindo's widow. The count challenged him to a duel and called for sabers. The fight was brief and bloody and both men were wounded. Currito and a friend took Luis home to his worried father.

Alone with Don Pedro, Luis tried to confess that he had become his father's rival for Pepita's affections. Don Pedro merely laughed, and from his pocket he took two letters. One from his brother in the seminary said that he felt Luis had no calling for the priesthood and would do better to remain at home. The other was Don Pedro's answer. Having realized that Pepita's affection had shifted to Luis, he would be happy in watching their happiness. He invited his brother the dean to come and marry the young lovers.

The dean refused the invitation, but a month later, after Luis' wounds had healed, the village vicar married them. Don Pedro gave a splendid reception. Although it was the local custom to serenade with cowbells anyone marrying a second time, the town thought so highly of Luis and his bride that they were allowed to steal away without an embarrassing celebration.

The count, recovering after five months in bed, paid part of his debt and arranged to pay the remainder. After the birth of their son, Luis and Pepita took a trip abroad. For many years they and their farms prospered and all went well with them.

PERICLES, PRINCE OF TYRE

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Hellenistic period

Locale: Eastern Mediterranean Sea and its littorals

First presented: c. 1607

Principal characters:

PERICLES, Prince of Tyre

THAISA, his wife

MARINA, their daughter

CLEON, governor of Tarsus

DIONYZA, his wife

LYSIMACHUS, governor of Mytilene

ANTIOCHUS, King of Antioch

Critique:

By scholarly consensus, only the last three acts of Pericles, Prince of Tyre are said to be by Shakespeare. Therefore, it would appear that Shakespeare merely finished a play that someone else had been commissioned to write. The plot is taken from Twine's Pattern of Painful Adventures and Gower's Confessio Amantis, in which Apollonius—Pericles in the Shakespearean play—is involved in the hairbreadth escapes, the endless travels, and the miraculous reunions so typical of Hellenistic romances. Patience and goodness are rewarded; villainy receives its deserved punishment; and an infinity of vicissitudes are forgotten as the principals are tearfully reunited.

The Story:

In Syria, King Antiochus' wife died in giving birth to a daughter. When the child grew to lovely womanhood, King Antiochus conceived an unnatural passion for her. Her beauty attracted suitors to Antioch from far and wide, but King Antiochus, reluctant to give up his daughter, posed a riddle to each suitor. If the riddle went unanswered, the suitor was executed. Many men, hoping to win the princess, lost their lives in this way.

Prince Pericles of Tyre, went to An-tiocch to seek the hand of the beautiful princess. Having declared that he would willingly risk his life for the hand of the king's daughter, he read the riddle, the solution of which disclosed an incestuous relationship between King Antiochus and his daughter. Pericles understood but hesitated, prudently, to reveal his knowledge. Pressed by King Antiochus, he hinted that he had fathomed the riddle. King Antiochus, unnerved and determined to kill Pericles, invited the young prince to stay at the court for forty days, in which time he could decide whether he would forthrightly give the solution to the riddle. But Pericles, convinced that his life was in great danger, fled. King Antiochus sent agents after him with orders to kill the prince on sight.

Pericles, back in Tyre, was fearful that King Antiochus would ravage his city in an attempt to take his life. After consulting with his lords, he decided that he could save Tyre by going on a journey to last until King Antiochus died. Thaliard, a Syrian lord who had come to Tyre to take Pericles' life, learned of Pericles' departure and returned to Antioch to report the prince's intention.

Meanwhile, in the remote Greek province of Tarsus, Cleon, the governor, and his wife Dionyza grieved because there was famine in the land. As they despaired, it was reported that a fleet of ships stood off the coast. Cleon was sure that Tarsus was about to be invaded. Actually, the ships were those of Pericles, who had come to Tarsus with grain to succor the starving populace. Cleon welcomed the Tyrians, and his people invoked the Greek gods to protect their saviors from all harm.

Pericles received word from Tyre that King Antiochus' agents were relentlessly pursuing him, so that he was no longer safe in Tarsus. He thereupon took leave of Cleon and set sail. On the high seas the Tyrians met disaster in a storm; the fleet was lost; Pericles was the only survivor. Washed ashore in Greece, he was helped by simple fishermen. Fortunately, too, the fishermen took Pericles' suit of armor from the sea. With the help of the fishermen, Pericles went to Pentapolis, the court of King Simonides.

There a tournament was held to honor the birthday of Thaisa, the lovely daughter of King Simonides. Among the gallant knights he met, Pericles presented a wretched sight in his rusted armor. Even so, he defeated all antagonists and was crowned king of the tournament by Thaisa. At the banquet following the tourney Pericles, reminded of his own father's splendid court, lapsed into melancholy. Seeing his dejection, King Simonides drank a toast to him and asked him who he was. He disclosed that he was Pericles of Tyre, a castaway. His modesty and courteous deportment made an excellent impression on King Simonides and Thaisa.

Meanwhile, in Antioch, King Antiochus and his daughter, riding together in a chariot, were struck dead by a bolt of lightning. In Tyre, Pericles had been given up for dead, and the lords proposed that Helicanus, Pericles' deputy, take the crown. The old lord, confident that his prince was still alive, directed them to spend a year in search of Pericles.

In Pentapolis, Thaisa, having lost her heart to Pericles, tricked her suitors into leaving by reporting that she would remain a maid for another year. Then she and Pericles were married.

A short time before Thaisa was to give birth to a child, Pericles was told that King Antiochus was dead and that Helicanus had been importuned to take the crown of Tyre. Free to go home, Pericles, with Thaisa and Lychorida, a nurse, took ship for Tyre. During the voyage the ship was overtaken by storms. Thaisa, seemingly dead after giving birth to a daughter, was placed in a watertight casket which was thrown into the raging sea. Pericles, fearful for the safety of his child, directed the seamen to take the ship into Tarsus, which was not far off.

The casket containing Thaisa having drifted ashore in Ephesus, the body was taken to Cerimon, a skilled physician. Cerimon, suspecting that Thaisa was not really dead, discovered by his skill that she was actually quite alive.

Pericles, having reached Tarsus safely, remained there a year, at the end of which time he declared that Tyre had need of him. Placing little Marina, as he had named his daughter, in the care of Cleon and Dionyza, he set out for Tyre.

In the meantime Thaisa, believing that her husband and child had been lost at sea, took the veil of a votaress to the goddess Diana.

Years passed, while Pericles ruled in Tyre. As Marina grew, it was clear that she was superior in every respect to her companion, the daughter of Cleon and Dionyza. When Marina's nurse Lychorida died, Dionyza, jealous of the daughter of Pericles, plotted to have Marina's life, and she commissioned a servant to take Marina to a deserted place on the coast and kill her. As the servant threatened to take the girl's life, pirates frightened away the servant and took Marina aboard their ship. Taking her to Mytilene, they sold her to a brothel owner.

In Tarsus, meanwhile, Dionyza persuaded the horrified Cleon that for their own safety against the rage of Pericles they must mourn the loss of Marina and erect a monument in her memory. When Pericles, accompanied by old Helicanus, went to Tarsus to reclaim his daughter, his grief on seeing the monument was so great that he exchanged his royal robes for rags, vowed never again to wash himself or to cut his hair, and left Tarsus.

In Mytilene, in the meantime, Marina confounded both the owners of the brothel and the customers by preaching the heavenly virtues instead of deporting herself wantonly. Lysimachus, the governor of Mytilene, went in disguise to the brothel. When Marina was brought to him, he quickly discerned her gentle birth, gave her gold, and assured her that she would soon be freed from her vile bondage. Alarmed, the bawd put Marina in the hands of the doorkeeper. Marina shamed him, gave him gold, and persuaded him to place her as a teacher of the gentle arts. The money she earned by teaching singing, dancing, and needlework she gave to her owner, the bawd.

When Pericles, now a distracted wanderer, came to Mytilene, Lysimachus took a barge out to the Tyrian ship, but he was told that Pericles, grieved by the loss of both wife and daughter, would not speak to anyone. A Mytilene lord suggested that Marina, famous for her graciousness and charm, be brought. Marina came and revealed to Pericles that she knew a grief similar to his, for she had lost her father and mother. It soon became apparent to bewildered Pericles that his daughter stood before him. Rejoicing, he put aside his rags and dressed in regal robes. The goddess Diana then put him into a deep sleep, in which she directed him in a dream to go to Ephesus and to tell in the temple of Diana the loss of his wife.

Pericles hastened to Ephesus, where, in the temple, he revealed his identity to the votaries in attendance. Thaisa, overhearing him, fainted. Cerimon, who was also present, disclosed to Pericles that the votaress who had fainted was his wife. Pericles and Thaisa were joyfully reunited. Since Thaisa's father had died, Pericles proclaimed that he and Thaisa would reign in Pentapolis and that Lysimachus and Marina, as man and wife, would rule over Tyre. When the people of Tarsus learned of the evil done by Cleon and Dionyza, they burned the governor and his family alive in their palace.

THE PERSIANS

Author: Aeschylus (525-456 B.C.)

Type of plot: Historical tragedy

Time of plot: 480 B.C.

Locale: Susa, capital of Persia

First presented: 472 B.C.

Principal characters:

XERXES, King of Persia

ATOSSA, his mother

PERSIAN ELDERS

THE GHOST OF DARIUS, Xerxes' father

Critique:

The Persians can hardly be called a tragedy in the classical Greek sense; rather, it is a glorification, by indirection, of the invincible Greeks. It might possibly be said that the tragic hero of this play is

Persia itself, for its presumption in attacking indomitable Greece; certainly the individual catastrophe of Xerxes would have aroused neither pity nor terror in the Greek audience. Glorification of Greece is achieved obliquely in The Persians through a plot concerned wholly with the Persian reaction to Xerxes' defeat at Salamis. According to tradition, Aeschylus was a soldier at Salamis; if this tradition be true, then his magnificent description of this decisive engagement is invaluable for its authenticity.

The Story:

Xerxes, son of the late King Darius of Persia, was a man of overwhelming ambition, who, eager to add more countries to his tremendous empire, had led a great army against the Greek states. During his absence he had left only the Persian elders to maintain authority in Susa, his capital. The old men waited apprehensively for some word of the invasion forces, and their fears grew as time passed and no message came from Xerxes. They lamented that the land had been emptied of the young men who had marched valiantly to war, leaving their wives and mothers to wait anxiously for their return.

Atossa, widow of Darius and mother of Xerxes, was also filled with vague fears. One night she saw in a dream two women, one in Persian dress, the other in Greek robes, and both tall and beautiful. When they began to quarrel, King Xerxes appeared and yoked them to his chariot. The woman in Asian costume submitted meekly enough, but the other broke the reins, overturned the chariot, and threw young Xerxes to the ground. Then in her dream Darius came and, seeing his son on the ground, tore his robes with grief. Later, awakening, Atossa went to pray for her son's safety. While she was sacrificing before the altar, she saw an eagle pursued and plucked by a hawk. To her these visions seemed to portend catastrophe for the Persians.

The elders, after hearing her story, advised her to pray to the gods and to beg great Darius, from the realm of the dead, to intercede to bring success to the Persian expedition. Atossa, her thoughts far across the sea with her son, asked the elders where Athens was. The elders told her that it was in Attica, in Greece, and that the citizens of Athens were a free people who derived great strength from their freedom. Their words did little to reassure the troubled mother.

A messenger arrived and announced that the Persian host had been defeated in a great battle fought at Salamis, but that Xerxes, to Atossa's relief, had been spared. His news threw the elders into sad confusion. Atossa told them that men must learn to bear the sorrows put upon them by the gods. Quieted, the elders listened while the messenger related the story of the defeat.

At Salamis more than twelve hundred Persian ships had been arrayed against three hundred and ten vessels of the Greeks. The defenders, however, proved themselves craftier than their enemies. Deceitfully, a Greek from the Athenian fleet informed Xerxes that at nightfall the far-outnumbered Greek ships would leave their battle stations and fly, under cover of darkness, to escape the impending sea fight. Xerxes immediately gave orders that his fleet was to close in about the bay of Salamis and to be on the alert that night to prevent the escape of the Athenian vessels. But the wily Greeks kept their places in the bay. When morning came, the light showed the Persian ships crowded so closely into the outlet of the bay that they were unable to maneuver. The Greeks thereupon moved against the Persians and destroyed them.

Meanwhile, the messenger continued, Xerxes had sent troops to the island of Salamis, where he planned to cut off all Greeks who sought refuge on land. But the Greeks, having destroyed the Persian fleet, put their own soldiers ashore. In the fierce fighting that followed, the Persians, unable to escape by water, were slain. Seeing his great army scattered and killed, Xerxes ordered the survivors to retreat. As the Persians, now without ships, marched overland through hostile Greek territory, many of them perished of hardships or were slain by enraged men of the lands through which they traveled.

The elders of Susa bewailed the terrible misfortune brought upon Persia by the king's desire to avenge his father, who had been defeated years before by the Greeks at Marathon.

Having heard the story of her son's defeat, Atossa retired to make offerings to the gods and to pray for the warriors who had lost their lives in the war with Athens. In mourning, she invoked the spirit of Darius, for whom she and the old men had great need at this most depressing time.

The shade of Darius appeared and asked what dire event had occurred in Persia to make necessary his summons from the lower regions. The elders were struck speechless with fear and respect by his august appearance, but Atossa bravely confronted the ghost of her dead husband and told him that Persia had met disaster, not by plague or by internal strife, but by defeat at the hands of the Athenians.

Darius was shocked to hear of the losses Xerxes had suffered and to learn the ambitious scope of his enterprise. He lamented his son's god-offending pride in bridging the sacred Hellespont and in gambling away all the manpower and wealth of Persia upon the success of his ill-fated expedition. Atossa tried to defend Xerxes by saying that he had been influenced by evil advisers. Darius reminded his listeners that he and his forebears had never jeopardized the welfare of the country to such an extent.

In despair, the old men asked Darius how Persia could redeem her great defeat. The dead king replied that the Persians must never again attack Greece, for the gods unquestionably favored those free people. He urged the elders to teach the Persian youths to restrain all god-provoking pride, and he advised Atossa to welcome Xerxes and to comfort him on his return. With these words the shade of Darius disappeared into his tomb.

Xerxes returned, sorrowing that he had not perished on the field of battle. Filled with remorse at the catastrophe he had brought upon his people, he blamed only himself for his defeat. The old men sang a dirge, asking what had befallen various great Persian warriors. Xerxes replied that some had drowned in the sea battle and that others had been slaughtered on the beach. Many, he said, were killed and buried without final rites.

Xerxes, in the deepest despair, joined the elders in their grief. But even though his greatest ambition had been dashed, he praised the bravery and virtues of the Greeks whom he had tried in vain to conquer.

Loved by adults as much as by children, Peter Pan portrays the joys of perpetual childhood. Even in a realistic age few can resist the mischievous Peter and his followers, for in him adults can live again those carefree days filled with dreams and unending joys. The special magic of James Barrie was his ability to make dreams real, and for that reason his charming, whimsical play marks the high point of pure fantasy in the modern theater. The play has had a successful stage history, with many famous names listed in its cast. Barrie later retold the story in his novel, Peter and Wendy (1906).

The Story:

In the nursery of the Darling home, a dog was the Nana. Perhaps that was one reason there was so much joy there. Nana bathed the three children and gave them their suppers and in all ways watched over them. One night Mrs. Darling, on Nana's night off, sat with the children as they slept. Drowsing, she was awakened by a slight draught from the window, and looking around she saw a strange boy in the room. As she screamed, Nana returned home and made a lunge for the intruder, but the boy leaped out of the window, leaving only his shadow behind. He had been accompanied also by a ball of light, but it too had escaped. Mrs. Darling rolled up the shadow and put it in a drawer. She thought that the boy would come back for it one night soon and thus could be caught.

Mr. Darling considered the affair a little silly, his thoughts being more concerned with getting a different nurse for the children. Believing that the dog Nana was getting too much authority in the house, Mr. Darling dragged her out of the house and locked her up.

When the Darlings went out that night, they left only a maid to look in on the children occasionally. After the lights were out and the children asleep, the intruder returned. The boy was Peter Pan. With him was the fairy, Tinker Bell, the ball of light. Peter found his shadow after searching in all the drawers, but in his excitement he shut Tink in one of the dressers. Peter could not get his shadow to stick to him again, and the noise he made in trying awakened Wendy, the daughter of the household. Peter told Wendy that he had run away the day he was born because he heard his parents talking about all the things he would do when he was a man, and he went to live with the fairies so that he would never have to grow up. Suddenly he remembered Tink, whom he looked for until he found her in the dresser. Tink, a ball of light no bigger than a fist, was so small that Wendy could hardly see her. She was not a very polite fairy, for she called Wendy horrible names.

Peter told Wendy, the only girl of the three children and instantly his favorite, that he and Tink lived in Never Land with the lost boys, children who fell out of their prams and were never found again. He had come to Wendy's house to listen to her mother tell stories to the others. Peter, begging Wendy and her brothers to go back to Never Land with him, promised to teach them to fly. The idea was too much for the children to resist. After a little practice they all flew out the window, barely escaping the Darlings and Nana, who had broken her chain to warn them of the danger to the children.

In Never Land the lost boys were guarded against the mean pirates, led by Captain Hook, by the Indians and their chief and princess. It was Hook's greatest desire to capture Peter Pan, for Peter had torn his arm off and fed it to a crocodile. The crocodile had so liked the taste of the arm that he followed Hook everywhere, waiting for the rest of him. But the crocodile had, unhappily, also swallowed a clock, and its ticking warned Hook of his approach.

To this queer land Wendy and her brothers flew with Peter Pan. The lost boys, seeing Wendy first, thought her a giant bird and shot her with a bow and arrow. Jealous Tink had suggested the deed. But when Peter arrived he saw that Wendy was only stunned, and after banishing Tink for a week he told the others that he had brought Wendy to them. They promptly built her a house and asked her to be their mother. Wendy thought so many children a great responsibility, but she quickly assumed her duties by telling them stories and putting them to bed.

Jealous, the pirates planned to steal Wendy and make her their mother; the other children they would force to walk the plank. But Peter overheard their plan and saved the children and Wendy. He himself escaped by sailing out to sea in a bird's nest.

Wendy and her brothers, beginning to worry about their parents, thought that they should return home. The lost boys, delighted at the thought of a real grown-up mother, eagerly accepted Wendy's invitation to come live with her and her brothers and parents. Peter refused to go, for he wanted always to be a little boy and have fun. But he sent Tink to show them the way.

The Pirates had learned of the proposed journey, and as the children ascended from Never Land Hook and his men seized them and bound them fast, all but Peter. When Peter found that Hook had all his friends, he vowed to get revenge on the pirate, once and for all.

On the pirate ship the children prepared to walk the plank. They were all taken on the deck and paraded before Wendy, who was tied to the mast. Unknown to the pirates, however, Peter was also on board, and by tricks and false voices he led first one pirate and then another to his death. These strange happenings were too much for Hook. When he knocked the seat from under Peter and then saw the boy calmly sitting on air, the pirate threw himself overboard, into the waiting jaws of the patient crocodile.

Meanwhile, in the nursery of the Darling home, Mrs. Darling and Nana waited hopelessly for the children. They had left the window open so that their loved ones might get back easily should they ever return. Peter and Tink flew ahead of the other children and closed the window so that Wendy and the others would think they were not wanted. But Peter did not know how to get out of a door, and thus he was forced to fly out the window again, leaving it open behind him. Wendy and her brothers flew in and slipped into their beds. Mrs. Darling and Nana were overcome with joy when they found their darlings safe again.

The lost boys, adopted by Wendy's family, had great fun romping with her father. Peter returned and tried to get Wendy to fly away with him, but she refused to leave her parents again. She did go once each year to clean his house for him, but each time she saw him a little less clearly. Once or twice she tried to get him to see her as something more than a mother, but Peter did not know what she meant. Then came the day when Wendy could no longer fly without a broomstick to help her. Peter, watching her, sadly wished he could understand all she said. He picked up his pipes and played softly, perhaps too softly to awaken humans in a grown-up world.

PETER SIMPLE

Author: Frederick Marryat (1792-1848)

Type of plot: Adventure romance

First published: 1834

LORD PRIVILEGE, Peter's rascally uncle
CAPTAIN HAWKINS, Lord Privilege's illegitimate son

Critique:

Captain Marryat's novels of the sea are part of a long line extending from those of Smollett in the eighteenth century to those of C. S. Forester in the twentieth, and, like the latter, Marryat laid his in the period of the Napoleonic wars, in which the author himself saw service as an officer of the British Navy. It is unfortunate that Marryat's novels have descended from the reputation of adult fiction to become, in reputation, books for adolescents. The novels, redolent of sea lore, the traditions of the British Navy, and the Napoleonic wars deserve a better fate than that to which they have been committed, for about the turn of the century they were replaced as standard juveniles by works of such authors as Robert Louis Stevenson. Marryat's books richly deserve a renewed reputation among adult readers of fiction. In particular, Peter Simple, one of his best novels, deserves that renewal of interest.

The Story:

Peter Simple was the younger son of the younger son of Lord Privilege, an English viscount. Because there was apparently no chance of the lad's inheriting any money, he was sent to sea at the age of fifteen as a midshipman so that he could earn a living for himself.

Coming from a country home, Peter knew almost nothing of the world, but fortunately for him he served at first under a very gentlemanly captain. He was also befriended by an older midshipman, Terence O'Brien. During his first days aboard the Diomedé, a British man-of-war, Peter was hazed by his fellow midshipmen because he seemed at times as simple as his surname, but under the tutelage of the crew in general, and O'Brien in particular, he soon learned to become a good sailor. Before many months had passed he became fairly proficient in seagoing matters and earned the approval of his officers.

At every opportunity Peter went where there was trouble and excitement. Having no fears, he got into tight places several times, but serious trouble did not occur until he stowed away in a boat which was sent ashore to spike a gun battery on the French coast. French infantry surprised the raiding party, and Peter and his friend O'Brien were captured; they had remained behind to finish the spiking of the guns while the rest of the sailors made their escape.

Peter having been wounded in the escapade, the colonel of the regiment and his young daughter nursed him back to health before he was sent to prison. The daughter, Celeste O'Brien, was devoted in her attentions to Peter, even though he was an enemy. After his recovery, Peter and his friend O'Brien, who was no relation to the French colonel, were sent to a prison at Givet. Although that military prison was the stoutest in France, they finally made their escape, thanks to O'Brien's ingenuity, and crossed France in two sets of disguises. At first O'Brien dressed as a policeman and escorted Peter as his prisoner. When that ruse was discovered, they disguised themselves as traveling performers. As they passed through one town they accidentally met Celeste O'Brien and the colonel, who not only kept their secret but gave them a purseful of money. After some difficulty the two fugitives made their way to England. Peter's grandfather, Lord Privilege, invited the boy to visit him. Several deaths had occurred in the family, and Peter was now third in line for the title, after his father and uncle, and the latter had no legal male heir. Thanks to his grandfather's assistance, O'Brien was commissioned a lieutenant. The two were assigned to a frigate and went on a cruise to the West Indies.

During the second cruise word came to Peter that his uncle was very unhappy over the grandfather's patronage and help for the young man, but Peter, busy at sea, paid little attention to the news. At last, his sea duty ended, Peter returned to England. There he studied for examinations which would lead to his own commission as a lieutenant. He almost failed to pass, however, because he appeared at his examination dressed in a very unmilitary fashion. He was excused, however, when the military examiners learned that his appearance was the result of saving a soldier from drowning.

Thanks to a deception passed upon his now senile grandfather, Peter was given his commission. While Peter was still home on leave, the old man died. When his will was read, it was discovered that Peter and his father had not been left any money, because of the interference of Peter's rascally uncle, who now succeeded to the title or Lord Privilege. The shock made Peter's father partially insane. Peter was forced to return immediately to duty.

On his third tour of duty Peter was separated from his friend O'Brien, who now commanded a ship of his own. Peter's new captain was a man named Hawkins, who was, as it turned out, the illegitimate son of Peter's uncle. At his father's request, Captain Hawkins made life miserable for Peter. Lord Privilege wanted to discredit Peter because he had discovered that his uncle, anxious to keep the family fortune for his own children, had replaced his fourth daughter with a male infant at the time of her birth. The uncle, fearful lest Peter's investigations bring the truth to light, hoped to discredit Peter so that any charges the young man might bring against him would be scornfully rejected.

When the troublesome voyage was over and Peter's ship was back in an English port, Captain Hawkins had Peter court-martialed on a series of counts, and Peter was relieved of his duties, although the court-martial board sympathized with him. Peter was not sorry. Having learned of his father's death, he wished to help his sister. On his way home across England Peter was robbed and taken ill. Lord Privilege went to get him, and while Peter was still delirious the uncle had him committed to Bedlam asylum.

For twenty months Peter was an inmate in the asylum. One day Celeste O'Brien and her father happened to visit the place and recognized him, and with the help of an English nobleman they had him released. Peter immediately started a suit against his uncle for false imprisonment. While the suit was pending, his friend O'Brien arrived back in England, bringing with him the wife of the soldier whose life Peter had saved years before. The woman, it turned out, was the mother of the child whom Peter's uncle had substituted for his own daughter.

A short time later Lord Privilege was exclaiming to his lawyer that he hated his nephew and wished to see him dead. At that moment the uncle's substitute son fell from a window and was killed. The shock of the event was so great that the uncle had a fit of apoplexy from which he never recovered. Within a matter of hours he too died. The title then passed to Peter, along with a large fortune and vast estates.

Peter's happiness at his good luck was increased when he and his friend O'Brien found Peter's sister Ellen a few days later. She, left penniless at her father's death, had gone through great troubles and when found had become a singer on the stage.

A few weeks later Peter, firmly entrenched in his new title and fortune, married Celeste O'Brien, the girl who had befriended him on several occasions.

Peter's sister married his friend O'Brien, who had been made a baronet for his outstanding services as a naval officer. They lived quietly thereafter, satisfied to exchange family life for the rigors of the service.

PHILASTER

Authors: Francis Beaumont (1584?-1616) and John Fletcher (1579-1625)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: The romantic past

Locale: Sicily

First presented: 1610

Principal characters:

PHILASTER, heir to the crown of Sicily

THE KING OF SICILY, a usurper

ARETHUSA, his daughter

PHARAMOND, a pompous Spanish prince

DION, a Sicilian lord

EUPHRASIA, his daughter, disguised as page, Bellario

Critique:

Philaster, Or, Love Lies A-Bleeding was the first successful production, if not actually the first collaboration, resulting from the happy association of Beaumont and Fletcher. The play is pure romance. It is believed by scholars that this play was written for the most part by Beaumont, but echoes of Shakespearean themes and rich imagery would tend to substantiate the participation of Fletcher, who served his dramatic apprenticeship under the master. The drama passed from popular favor because Restoration audiences did not favor Philaster. Modern readers feel that Euphrasia deserved a better fate than she received. Yet Philaster remains a beautiful and pathetic play, soundly constructed and admirable in style—a masterpiece of its period.

The Story:

The King of Calabria had usurped the crown of Sicily from Prince Philaster's father, now dead. Because the Sicilian people loved their young prince, however, the king did not dare imprison him or harm him in any way. Meanwhile the king planned to marry his daughter Arethusa to Pharamond, a Spanish prince, who would thereby become heir to both thrones. Pharamond proved to be a pompous, conceited man. When Philaster, who was quite free and outspoken in his manners, told Pharamond that he could marry Arethusa and ultimately become king only over Philaster's dead body, the king admonished Philaster to restrain himself. Philaster, acting strangely, declared that he would restrain himself only when he was better treated; he believed that he was suddenly possessed by the spirit of his late father. Philaster was promised aid by the loyal Lord Dion and by two noble gentlemen, Cleremont and Thrasilene.

At an audience with the Princess Arethusa, Philaster could not believe his ears when he heard Arethusa profess deep love for him, and he declared his love for her in return. In order to avoid detection under the suspicious eyes of the court, he promised to send Arethusa his servant to act as their messenger. When Pharamond entered Arethusa's apartment, Philaster departed with words of scorn for the boastful Spanish prince. Later he had difficulty in persuading his servant, Bellario—actually Euphrasia, daughter of Lord Dion, in disguise—to enter Arethusa's service.

At court, meanwhile, Pharamond attempted the virtue of Galatea, a court lady who led him on but refused to yield to his base suggestions. Later he made an assignation with Megra, a court lady of easy virtue. Galatea, having overheard the conversation between Pharamond and Megra, reported the prince's dissolute ways to Arethusa.

That night the king, told about Pharamond's conduct, discovered Megra in the prince's apartment. Pharamond was in disgrace. Megra, however, managed to extricate herself to some extent by insinuating that Arethusa was as wicked as she and that Bellario was more than a mere servant to Arethusa. The princess, unfortunately, had made much of Bellario because the page had been a gift from Philaster. The king, who had not even heard of Bellario's existence, was confounded by Megra's suggestions of evil.

Megra's story convinced even Philaster's friends that Arethusa was unfaithful to the prince, but when they told Philaster what had happened he refused to believe them. Nevertheless, his trust in Arethusa was shaken. When Bellario delivered a letter from Arethusa to Philaster, who was still in doubt, the disguised girl innocently damned herself by speaking in praise of Arethusa and by describing Arethusa's virtuous affection for the page. Philaster accused Bellario of perfidy and, overcome with the passion of jealousy, threatened to take the page's life. At Bellario's sincere protestations of innocence, Philaster, although still not convinced, spared his servant.

Meanwhile the king had ordered Arethusa to discharge her young page. When Philaster found Arethusa depressed over Bellario's dismissal, he revealed his suspicions and declared that he would give up his claim to the throne and become a hermit. The wretched Arethusa, knowing that she was guiltless, could do nothing to prevent the departure of Philaster.

Philaster went to a nearby forest and there wandered about disconsolately. At the same time the king and the court entered the forest to hunt. During the chase Arethusa disappeared. The hunters found her riderless horse but no trace of the princess. Bellario, having been banished from the court, had also gone into the forest. Encountering Philaster, the page was brusquely ordered away. In another part of the forest Arethusa, stunned by recent events and without direction in her wandering, sat down to rest and suddenly fainted. Bellario appeared in time to revive her, only to be told by Arethusa that efforts to help her in her distress were wasted; the princess was prepared to die.

Philaster in his own wanderings came upon the pair. Thinking that their meeting had been planned, and that Bellario and Arethusa were lovers, he told the page to take his wretched life. When Bellario disregarded his order, Philaster angrily dismissed the page and then, assuming the role of an agent of justice, attempted to kill Arethusa. He only wounded her, however, in his attempt. A peasant then came upon the scene of violence. In the fight that followed, Philaster was seriously wounded. The young prince fled when he heard horsemen approaching.

When Pharamond, Lord Dion, and others of the hunting party arrived to find Arethusa wounded, they immediately went in search of her attacker. In his flight Philaster, hurt and bleeding, came upon Bellario asleep. Distractedly, Philaster wounded the page before collapsing from loss of blood. Faithful Bellario administered gently to Philaster and convinced the prince that he had made a mistake in his belief that Arethusa had been unfaithful to him. Hearing Philaster's pursuers, they fled. Bellario was captured, but not before the page had led them away from the prince. In order further to protect the fugitive, Bellario confessed to the attack on Arethusa. When Philaster overheard this confession, he came out of hiding to defend Bellario. The king ordered that both be imprisoned, but Arethusa, somewhat recovered from her hurt, prevailed upon her father to give her the custody over the prince and the page.

In prison Philaster, about to be executed, and Arethusa, his guard, pledged their troth. The king disavowed his daughter when he learned of the marriage. Meanwhile the people of Sicily, aroused by Philaster's imprisonment and impending execution, seized Pharamond and threatened total revolt. The king, fearful for his safety and at last repentant for his usurpation of the throne, promised to restore the crown of Sicily and to approve Arethusa's marriage to Philaster, if the prince would only calm the enraged citizens. The people returned quietly to their homes when Philaster assured them that he was now quite free and that he was their new ruler.

The king, still not satisfied with the relationship between Arethusa and Bellario, commanded that Bellario be tortured in order that he might learn the truth. Philaster protested vehemently against the order. As the king's servants prepared to strip Bellario for the ordeal, the page revealed that she was, in reality, Euphrasia, daughter of Lord Dion. Having loved Philaster from childhood and despairing, because of a difference in rank, of ever marrying him, she had allowed everyone to think that she had gone overseas on a pilgrimage. Instead, she had disguised herself as a boy and had taken service with Philaster in order to be near him. Philaster and Arethusa, moved by Euphrasia's devotion, made her a lady in waiting to the queen.

PHORMIO

Author: Terence (Publius Terentius Afer, c. 190-159 B.C.)

Type of plot: Comedy of intrigue

Time of plot: Second century B.C.

Locale: Athens

First presented: 161 B.C.

Principal characters:

CHREMES, a rich gentleman of Athens

DEMIPHO, Chremes' rather miserly brother

ANTIPHO, Demipho's son

PHAEDRIA, Chremes' son

GETA, a slave

PHORMIO, a parasite

NAUSISTRATA, Chremes' wife

Critique:

Phormio, a tricky parasite and one of the most fascinating rogues in all literature, is the chief character in this play by Terence. It is he who engineers all the solutions to the problems involved in the comedy and sees to it that each young man is permitted to have the woman of his choice. Phormio's plotting, acting as he does on behalf of two young men, involves a double plot, with many attending complexities. But complex as the plot becomes, especially when a mistaken identity theme is also introduced, the play is not confusing. As in other dramas by Terence, there are no digressions; each part of the play is closely knit into the structure and furthers the development of both plots. In addition, the comedy is even more restrained than that of earlier comedies by Terence. Never slapstick, the humor of this play should be sufficient to please even the most sophisticated modern audiences.

The Story:

Demipho and Chremes, two wealthy Athenian brothers, left the city on journeys and entrusted the welfare of their two sons to Geta, a slave belonging to Demipho. For a time Antipho and Phaedria, two young men of exemplary habits, gave the slave little trouble. When both fell in love, however, before their fathers returned, Geta's troubles began. His sympathy for Antipho and Phaedria caused him to help both of them in their amours, but he realized only too well that both fathers would be angry when they learned what had happened.

Phaedria, the son of Chremes, had fallen in love with a lovely young harp player owned by a trader named Dorio, who refused to part with the girl for less than thirty minae. Unable to raise the money, Phaedria was at his wits' end. His cousin Antipho had fallen in love with a young Athenian girl of a good but penniless family.

Antipho had already married the girl, even though he knew that his father, who was something of a miser, would be furious to learn that his son had married a girl who brought no dowry. Geta, in an effort to smooth out the problem, had contacted a parasite named Phormio. Phormio, a lawyer, had brought suit against Antipho under an Athenian law that made it mandatory for an unprovided-for girl to be married to her nearest relative. Antipho did not contest the suit, and so he had the excuse that he had been forced by the court to marry the young woman.

Shortly after the wedding, the two older men returned. As soon as he learned what had happened, Demipho ordered his son to give up his wife. Antipho and Geta again called upon Phormio for assistance. Phormio warned the old man that he would be unable to avoid keeping the girl, even though Demipho claimed that the girl was not actually a relative. Phormio contended that the girl was a relative, the daughter of Demipho's kinsman, Stilpo, who had lived in Lemnos. Demipho said he never had a relative by that name.

In the meantime Phaedria tried desperately to raise the thirty minae that would purchase his beloved harpist from Dorio. Dorio had given him three days to find the money. Then Phaedria learned from a slave that a sea captain, about to sail, wanted to purchase the girl and that Dorio, anxious to make a sale, had promised to sell the girl to him. Phaedria appealed to Dorio, but with no success. Dorio would promise only to hold off the sale of the slave girl until the following morning.

After seeing Phormio, Demipho went to his brother Chremes and talked over the situation with him. They finally agreed that the only answer to the problem of Antipho's wife was to send her away with a sum of money. Chremes agreed to have his wife, Nausistrata, tell the girl that she was to be separated from her husband. While they were planning, Geta went to Phormio once again.

Phormio hatched out a plan to satisfy everyone and make some money for himself. He offered to marry Antipho's cast-off wife, if he were given a large sum of money. With part of that money he expected to have a good time, and with the rest, which he was to turn over to Phaedria, that young man was to purchase his beloved harpist. Geta presented the first part of Phormio's plan to the brothers, who readily acquiesced, even though Demipho hated to see Phormio receive payment for marrying the girl.

After the arrangements had been made, Chremes was horrified to learn that the girl he was advising his brother to cast off was his own daughter by a second wife whom he had married in Lemnos. Even worse was the fact that his Athenian wife, Nausistrata, did not know of the other marriage. Chremes took his brother into his confidence and told him what had happened. They both agreed to let the marriage stand, and Chremes offered to add a dowry to the girl.

The only difficulty, as the old men saw it, was how to redeem their money from Phormio, who no longer needed to marry the girl. Phormio, having given part of the money to Phaedria, was unwilling to return that part of the money which was to have been his for his trouble.

While the old men were hunting for Phormio, he was in conversation with Antipho. Geta went to them with the news that Antipho's uncle was also his father-in-law and that Antipho's troubles were at an end. Asked where he had learned this fact, Geta replied that he had overheard a conversation between Chremes and a servant. The information made both Antipho and Phormio happy, Antipho because he would be able to keep his wife, Phormio because he had information to use in keeping the money he had received from Chremes and Demipho.

When Chremes and Demipho confronted Phormio, he refused to give back the money, and in answer to their threats he replied that if they tried to bring a suit against him he would tell Nausistrata about Chremes' affair in Lemnos and the true identity of Antipho's wife. During the argument the brothers laid hands on Phormio. Phormio, infuriated by their treatment of him, called out to Nausistrata. When she came out of the house, Phormio told her about Chremes' other wife. She was somewhat mollified, however, when she realized that the other woman was dead and that she would have something to hold over her husband's head.

Seeing that Nausistrata had been converted to his side, Phormio told them also that he had given thirty minae to Phaedria so that he might purchase the harpist from Dorio. Chremes began to protest, but Nausistrata silenced him with the statement that it was no worse for the son to have such a mistress than for the father to have two wives. Nausistrata, pleased at the turn events had taken—for her son had his beloved and her rival was dead—asked Phormio if there were anything she could do for him. Fun-loving Phormio said that he would be vastly pleased, and her husband much exasperated, if she would ask the lawyer to dinner. Nausistrata, proud of her newly-found power over her husband, agreed.

PIERRE

Author: Herman Melville (1819-1891)

Type of plot: Philosophical tragedy

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: New York

First published: 1852

Principal characters:

PIERRE GLENDINNING, a wealthy, cultivated young man

MRS. GLENDINNING, his mother

LUCY TARTAN, his fiancée

ISABEL, his illegitimate half-sister

GLEN STANLY, his cousin

DELLY ULVER, a farm girl

Critique:

Pierre, Or, The Ambiguities, the seventh novel published by Herman Melville, is probably the least read of his works because of obscure and at times confused symbolism which repels the reader who prefers less philosophical and tortuous fiction. Scholars have declared that Pierre was an experiment on Melville's part, an attempt to turn away from the materials of his earlier volumes: the sea, the romantic islands of the Pacific, and man's struggles against fate. Yet Melville, as he had in his earlier volumes, used materials from his own experience. Many of the incidents and much of the background of this novel reflect Melville's life and experiences of members of his family. Those incidents and that background are woven together with fiction, however, as the author had woven fact and fiction in his greatest novel, Moby Dick. This novel, like Moby Dick, was very probably an attempt to prove himself something more than the fabulous author of Typee, a man who had lived among the cannibals.

The Story:

Pierre Glendinning was a young man who lived amid luxury and ease, the heir to vast estates that formed the larger portion of two counties in New York State. His time was taken up with outdoor recreation, reading, and the courting of beautiful and well-to-do Lucy Tartan, a girl of whom Pierre's mother approved completely. Mrs. Glendinning, who was jealous of her influence over her son, saw nothing to fear in quiet, unaggressive Lucy Tartan.

One evening, however, a strange incident occurred when Mrs. Glendinning and Pierre visited a sewing bee in a nearby home. One of the girls who was there shrieked and fainted when she saw Pierre. The incident bothered the young man, but he was totally unprepared for a note which he received from the girl a short time later. In the note she requested that Pierre visit her in the evening at the farm where she was employed. Pierre, disturbed by the mystery involved, went to the farm and discovered that the girl, Isabel, was his half-sister, the illegitimate child of his father and a young Frenchwoman. Pierre resolved immediately to acknowledge Isabel as his sister, but the question of how to accomplish the acknowledgment was a weighty one.

At first Pierre intended to tell his mother of his discovery, but his mother's attitude toward Delly Ulver, a farm girl who had been born an illegitimate child, warned Pierre that he could expect no sympathetic understanding from Mrs. Glendinning. He next thought of approaching his minister for help with his problem, but the discovery that the minister followed his mother's opinion caused Pierre to fall back on his own thinking. He realized also that his mother could not bear to have it proved that her husband had been an adulterer, nor could he bring himself to dishonor his father's name. The only road which seemed open to Pierre was to acknowledge Isabel as his wife rather than his sister.

When Pierre told his mother that he had been married secretly, she ordered him to leave the house immediately. Disowned and cast forth from his mother's affections, he also told Lucy Tartan that he had married another girl. His story threw Lucy into an almost fatal illness.

Having been disowned by his family, Pierre took Isabel from her home at the farm and went to New York City. They were accompanied by Delly Ulver, whom Pierre had decided to help. Although he had announced that he and Isabel had been married, Pierre and his half-sister had entered into no such union; the announcement was only a means to permit them to live together. In New York City they found life barren and difficult, for Pierre had only a small supply of money. He had hoped to find a haven for himself and the two girls with his wealthy cousin, Glen Stanly, but the cousin refused to recognize Pierre and had him thrown out of his home.

Forced to rely upon his own resources, Pierre resolved to become an author. He had, he thought, acquired quite a reputation by publishing some short poems and some essays in various periodicals. He also thought he had great talent, sufficient, at least, to enable him to write a philosophical work. After much difficulty he managed to find a publisher who agreed to take his unwritten novel and to advance him enough money to live. For months Pierre, struggling to write his great work, lived in three miserable, unheated rooms in a vast tenement, along with Isabel and Delly Ulver, who acted in the capacity of servant to them both.

One day word came to Pierre that his mother had died just a few weeks after he had left for New York City; her heir was Pierre's cousin, Glen Stanly. The news made Pierre very bitter, particularly when he discovered that his cousin was a suitor for the hand of Lucy Tartan, whom Pierre still loved dearly. Despite the feeling of utter helplessness which the news created in his mind, Pierre kept at work upon his book. Because he was unable to keep Isabel from realizing that she was not alone in his affections, the girl became jealous and disliked the fact that another woman could claim his attentions and love. Her attachment for Pierre went much deeper than ordinary love for a brother by a sister.

Some time later Pierre received a letter from Lucy. She had rebuffed Glen Stanly's suit, and she wrote to tell Pierre that he alone had her affections. She told Pierre that, even though he was married, she wished to travel to New York City to live near him. Pierre could not prevent her from joining his household, although he lied to Isabel and told her that Lucy was his cousin. Lucy arrived the next day. As she entered the tenement where Pierre lived, her brother and Glen Stanly tried to take her away by force. Pierre interfered on her behalf, and the two men had to leave without the girl.

Lucy, listening only to the promptings of her heart, refused to leave Pierre, even though he told her that Isabel was his wife. Having brought along her painting materials, she intended to support herself as a painter of portraits. Isabel disliked the idea of a third woman in the home, but she was powerless to turn Lucy out. The two women lived in a state of distrustful and watchful truce.

Glen Stanly and Lucy's brother, not wishing to see Lucy remain near Pierre, sent him a letter of premeditated insults in hopes of provoking him. Angered by their message, Pierre found two pistols in the apartment of a friend and set out to find Stanly and Lucy's brother. He encountered them on a crowded street. When they met, Stanly lashed at Pierre with a whip, whereupon Pierre drew his pistols and killed his cousin. The police immediately seized Pierre and took him to prison.

In prison, Pierre had no hope of life. Nor did he care to live, for he felt that fate had been too cruel to him. One evening Isabel and Lucy were allowed to visit him for a few hours. When Isabel revealed that she was Pierre's sister, the shock of her announcement killed Lucy immediately. Pierre, driven mad by her death, seized a vial of poison which he knew Isabel carried in her bosom. He drank a portion of the poison, and Isabel emptied the vial of the remainder.

A short time later Lucy's brother came looking for her, still hoping to rescue her from Pierre's influence. When the turnkey opened the cell door, Pierre was already dead, lying close to Lucy. Isabel still had sufficient life to say that no one had known the real Pierre. Then she too died, completing the tragedy of their ambiguous relationships.

AUNE, a foreman shipbuilder

Critique:

The Pillars of Society is a play concerned only with everyday realities, and it is one of the few plays by Ibsen in which the plot is more important than the characters. At times the plot is cumbersome, for so many characters are required to tell the story that the cast becomes unwieldy. The plot is almost too mechanical in arrangement and solution. Conscience triumphs almost automatically, just in time to bring the play to a close. But there are touches of Ibsen's genius throughout, and these justify a technique less perfect than that which we expect from a master dramatist.

The Story:

Consul Bernick was the unquestioned leader of the town, with his wealth and influence extending into every enterprise. He owned the large shipyard which was the source of most of the townspeople's income, and he had successfully fought the project of building a seacoast railway. But he had introduced machines into the yards, and Aune, his foreman, was stirring up the workmen because the machines meant the loss of jobs. Bernick, not wishing to have his authority questioned, threatened Aune with loss of his job if he did not stop his speaking and writing against the machines.

There was only one breath of scandal about Consul Bernick, and that concerned his wife's family. Many years before Johan Tønnesen, her brother, had been seen leaving the rear window of the house of Mrs. Dorf, a married woman. Later Johan left town and went to America. It was said that before he left he stole the strongbox containing Bernick's mother's fortune. What made the matter worse was that Mrs. Bernick's stepsister, Lona Hessel, had followed her younger stepbrother to America and had been like a mother to him. Only Bernick's standing in the town prevented his ruin, and he had made it clear to his wife that her family was a disgrace to him.

Mrs. Dorf's husband deserted her and their daughter. When Mrs. Dorf died soon afterward, Bernick's sister Martha took the child into their home. The girl, Dina, was a constant annoyance to Bernick. Not only did she have a disgraceful background, but she talked constantly about exercising her own free will and acting independently of his desires. Dr. Rörlund, the schoolmaster, loved Dina, but he would not marry her or let anyone know his attachment because he was afraid of the town's feelings about her. His beautiful words about goodness and kindness concealed his moral cowardice. He promised that when he could improve her position they would be married.

In the meantime Bernick had changed his mind about allowing a railroad to come to the community. Formerly the proposed road would have competed with his shipping. Now he realized that a spur line through the town would bring timber and minerals to his shipyard. The railroad would be a good thing for the town because it was a good thing for Bernick. He was aiding the town, a pillar of society.

There was constant trouble at the shipyard. The American owners of a ship he was repairing had cabled him to get her under way immediately, although the ship was so rotted that it would require several weeks to make her safe. Bernick was torn between the profits to be gained by getting her afloat at once and the conscience that kept him from sending her crew to certain death.

He grew even more disturbed because Lona and Johan had returned from America and the town had revived the old gossip. Many tried to ignore the pair, but Lona refused to be ignored. She felt no disgrace, nor did Johan.

Johan and Dina were at once drawn to each other, and she begged him to take her back to America so that she could be free and independent. Bernick and his wife would not hear of this plan, but for quite different reasons. Mrs. Bernick still felt her brother's disgrace. Bernick, however, knew that Johan was blameless. It had been Bernick, not Johan, who had been forced to flee the married woman's house. Johan had taken the blame because he had no great reputation to save and he was anxious to leave the town and strike out for himself. What he did not know was that Bernick had spread the story about the theft of his mother's money.

Johan, thinking that the town would soon have forgotten a boyish escapade with another man's wife, renewed his promise not to tell that it was Bernick who had been involved. He told Bernick that Lona knew the true story but that she would not reveal the secret. Johan was grateful to Martha, Bernick's sister, for caring for Dina. Martha had refused several offers of marriage in order to care for the younger girl who had been so disgracefully orphaned.

Johan learned also that Martha had not married because she had always loved him and had waited for him to return. Martha told Johan that her brother's strict moral principles had made him condemn Johan and try to turn her against him. Johan was puzzled, for he thought Bernick had been grateful to him for assuming Bernick's own guilt. Johan could not understand his brother-in-law's attitude.

Lona, too, forgave Bernick for his past acts, even his jilting of her in favor of her rich stepsister. Bernick told her why he had acted as he did. His mother's business had been in great danger, and he had needed money to avoid bankruptcy. For that reason he had renounced Lona, whom he loved, for her wealthier relative. For the same reason he had spread the story that Johan had taken old Mrs. Bernick's money. In reality, there had been no money at all; had the town learned the truth, it would have meant ruin for Bernick. Bernick completely justified himself by saying that as the pillar of the town he had been forced to act deceitfully and maliciously.

Lona begged him to tell the truth at last, to keep his life from being built on a lie. Bernick said that the cost was too great; he could not lose his money and his position. In addition, the railway project would fail if a whisper of scandal were heard. The railway was to make Bernick a millionaire.

While he struggled with his conscience over this problem, repair of the American ship still confronted him. He forced Aune to get her ready to sail in two days, even though her unseaworthiness meant death for her crew. At the same time he laid plans to pretend that it was Aune who had failed to take proper time and precautions to make the vessel safe. Then he would stop the sailing and take credit for losing his profit rather than risk the lives of the sailors. He needed public acclaim, for soon the town would learn that he had bought up all the land through which the railroad would run. It would be hard to convince the townspeople that they would benefit from his wealth.

To make matters worse, Johan became difficult. He had not known about the story of the theft, but he would forgive the lie if Bernick would now tell the truth. Johan wanted to marry Dina, but his name must first be cleared. Bernick refused the pleas of both Johan and Lona, lest he be ruined. He would not release Johan from his promise of secrecy. Lona would not tell the true story because she still loved Bernick. Besides, she thought he himself should tell the truth so that he would be whole again. When Johan, planning to leave on the American ship, vowed to return in two months and to tell the truth at that time, Bernick decided to allow the ship to sail. If it sank, he would be free of Johan forever.

On the night of the sailing Bernick arranged for a celebration in his honor for the purpose of getting the citizens into the proper frame of mind before they learned that he had bought property along the railroad route. Shortly before the celebration he learned that his son Olaf had stowed away on the unseaworthy ship. He tried to call it back, but it was already out to sea. Then he was told that Johan had taken Dina with him to America, but that they had sailed on a different ship. He would lose his son and gain nothing.

He was overjoyed when he learned that his wife had found the boy on board and brought him home before the ship sailed. Word came also that Aune stopped the sailing of the ship and brought her back to the harbor. Bernick, saved from the evil of his deeds, stood up before the townspeople and confessed that he and not Johan had been the guilty man. He promised also that he would share the profits from the railroad. Lona was happy. She told Bernick that at last he had found the real pillars of society—truth and freedom. Only on them could society build a firm foundation.

THE PIRATES OF PENZANCE

Type of work: Comic opera

Author: W. S. Gilbert (1836-1911)

Type of plot: Humorous romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: 1879

Principal characters.

MAJOR GENERAL STANLEY, of the British Army

RICHARD, the pirate king

FREDERIC, the pirate apprentice

MABEL,

EDITH,

KATE, and

ISABEL, General Stanley's daughters

RUTH, a pirate maid of all work

Critique:

The Pirates of Penzance, Or, The Slave of Duty is another entertaining and perennially popular operetta by the team of Gilbert and Sullivan. The hero was such a noble lad that he killed and plundered with the pirates because it was his duty. Altogether delightful, this libretto is one of the favorites of light opera lovers throughout the world.

The Story:

Frederic, the pirate apprentice, had reached his twenty-first birthday, and at midnight he would be free of his indenture. The pirate king announced that Frederic would then become a full-fledged member of the band. But Frederic said that he had served them only because he was a slave to duty; now he was going to leave the pirates. Astounded, the king asked for reasons. Frederic would not tell, but Ruth, the pirate maid of all work, confessed that she had been Frederic's nurse when he was a baby. She had been told to apprentice him to a pilot, but being hard of hearing she had thought the word was pirate. Afraid to reveal her mistake, she too had joined the pirates to look after her charge.

Frederic also announced that when he left the pirates he was going to do his best to exterminate the whole band. Individually, he loved them all, but as a crew of pirates they must be done away with. The pirates agreed that they were such unsuccessful pirates that they could not blame him for leaving. Frederic told them why they were such poor pirates. When they reminded him that he would still be one of them for half an hour, he felt that it was his duty to give them the benefit of his knowledge. The trouble was that they were too kindly. They would never attack a weaker party and were always beaten by a stronger one. Then, too, if any captive said he was an orphan, he was set free; the pirates themselves had all been orphans. Word about the soft-hearted pirates had spread, and now everyone who was captured declared himself an orphan. The pirates knew that Frederic was right, but they hated to be grim and merciless.

Asked what Ruth would do when he left their band, Frederic said he would take her with him. He wondered if she was attractive. Ruth declared that she was, but since he had had no opportunity to see another female face, Frederic could not be sure. The king assured him that she was still a fine-appearing woman, but when Frederic tried to give her to the king, he would not have her.

Ruth had him almost convinced that she was a fair woman when Frederic saw approaching a bevy of beautiful maidens. Ruth, realizing that her cause was lost, admitted that she had deceived him; she was forty-seven. Frederic cast her aside.

Frederic hid himself as the girls approached, but he felt that he ought to reveal himself again as the girls, believing themselves alone, prepared for a swim. When they heard his story, they were filled with pity for his plight and admiration for his handsome figure. From a sense of duty, one of the sisters, called Mabel, accepted his affection. Her sisters, Kate, Edith, and Isabel, wondered whether her sense of duty would have been so strong had Frederic been less handsome.

Frederic warned the other girls about the pirates. Before they could escape, however, the band, led by their king, appeared and seized them. At the same time their father, Major General Stanley, appeared in search of his daughters. He bragged of his great knowledge—he knew everything but military skill. As soon as he learned something of military tactics he would be the greatest general ever. When the pirates told him they were going to marry his daughters, the general, much to their sorrow, begged them not to take his lovely girls from him because he was an orphan. Unhappily the pirates gave up their prizes; they could not harm an orphan.

Later, at his home, a ruin which he had purchased complete with ancestors, the general grieved because he had lied to the pirates. He knew that his falsehood about being an orphan would haunt him and his ancestors, the newly purchased ones. Frederic consoled him by telling him that the lie was justified to save his daughters from the pirates. At midnight he, Frederic, would lead the police who would capture the outlaw band. He must wait until then because he was still one of them.

When the police entered, the girls praised them for going so nobly to their deaths. The police, not cheered by the praise, agreed that theirs would be a noble death. At midnight Frederic prepared to lead them to the pirate hide-out. At that moment the pirate king and Ruth appeared, laughing at a joke they had just discovered. Frederic had been born on February twenty-ninth in leap year. Thus he was not twenty-one but only five years old. His apprenticeship would not be up until 1940. Frederic, thinking that he looked more than five, also laughed at that paradox.

And, since Frederic was again one of the pirate band, he felt it his duty to tell the pirates that Major General Stanley was not an orphan, that he had lied. The pirates went at once to capture the villain and to torture him for his falsehood. A struggle took place between the pirates and the police. The pirates won, but when the police challenged them to surrender in the name of Queen Victoria, the pirates yielded, for they loved their queen. But before the police could take them away, Ruth entered and told all assembled that the pirates were really noblemen gone wrong. Then the general forgave them their youthful fling and sent them back to their ranks, giving them his daughters for their brides.

THE PLAGUE

Author: Albert Camus (1913-1960)

Type of plot: Impressionistic realism

Time of plot: The 1940's

Locale: Oran, Algeria

First published: 1947

Principal characters:

DR. BERNARD R. RIEUX, a young physician

JEAN TARROU, a traveler

COTTARD, a fugitive

JOSEPH GRAND, a clerk

RAYMOND RAMBERT, a journalist

FATHER PANELOUX, a priest

Critique:

Camus in this novel exhibits those traits so frequently attributed to him: classical clarity, independence, and logic. The Plague has been very well received here and abroad; in fact, it has been called the best novel to come out of post-war Europe. In structure the work is compact, covering only the duration of the plague. The characters are projected with insight. But characters and plague alike are subordinated to a search for meanings. From the frightful course of events Rieux finds an answer to the eternal question, Why are we here?

The Story:

For a few days Dr. Bernard Rieux gave little thought to the strange behavior of the rats in Oran. One morning he found three on his landing, each animal lying inert with a rosette of fresh blood spreading from the nostrils. The concierge grumbled about the strange happening, but Rieux was a busy doctor and just then he had personal cares.

Madame Rieux was going away from Oran. She suffered from a lingering illness and Rieux thought that a sanatorium in a different town might do her some good. His mother was to keep house for him while his wife was absent. Rambert, a persistent journalist, cut into his time. The newsman wanted to do a story for his metropolitan paper on living conditions among the workers in Oran. Rieux refused to help him, for he knew an honest report would be censored.

Day by day the number of dead rats increased in the city. After a time truckloads were carried away each morning. People stepped on the furry dead bodies whenever they walked in the dark. Rieux's first case of fever was the concierge who had grumbled about having to clean up the rats on the stair landing. He had a high temperature and painful swellings. Rieux was apprehensive. By telephoning around he learned that his colleagues had similar cases.

The prefect was averse to taking any drastic action because he did not want to alarm the population. Only one doctor was sure the sickness was bubonic plague; the others reserved judgment. When the deaths rose to thirty a day, however, even officialdom was worried. Soon a telegram came instructing the prefect to take drastic measures, and the news became widespread; Oran was in the grip of the plague.

Rieux had been called to Cottard's apartment by Grand, a clerk and former patient. Grand had cut down Cottard just in time to prevent his suicide by hanging. Cottard could give no satisfactory reason for his attempt to kill himself. Rieux was interested in him; he seemed rather an eccentric person.

Grand was another strange man. He had for many years been a temporary clerk, overlooked in his minor post, whom succeeding bureaucrats kept on without investigating his status. Grand was too timid to call attention to the injustice of his position. Each evening he worked hard on his manuscript and seemed to derive much solace from it. Rieux was surprised when he saw the work. Grand in all those years had only the beginning sentence of his novel finished, and he was still revising it. He had once been married to Jeanne, but she had left him.

Tarrou was an engaging fellow, a political agitator who had been concerned with governmental upheavals over the whole continent. He kept a meticulous diary in which he told of the ravages and sorrows of the plague. One of his neighbors was an old man who each morning called the neighborhood cats to him and shredded paper for them to play with. Then, when all the cats were around him, he would spit on them with great accuracy. After the plague grew worse, the city authorities killed all cats and dogs to check possible agents of infection. The old man, deprived of his cats as targets, stayed indoors, disconsolate.

As the blazing summer sun dried the town, a film of dust settled over everything. The papers were meticulous in reporting the deaths by weeks. When the weekly total, however, passed the nine hundred mark, the press reported only daily tolls. Armed sentinels were posted to permit no one to enter or leave the town. Letters were forbidden. Since the telephone lines could not accommodate the increased traffic, the only communication with the outside was by telegraph. Occasionally Rieux had an unsatisfactory wire from his wife.

The disposal of the dead bodies presented a problem. The little cemetery was soon filled, but the authorities made a little more room by cremating the remains in the older graves. At last two pits were dug in an adjoining field, one for men and one for women. When those pits were filled, a greater pit was dug and no further effort was made to separate the sexes. The corpses were simply dropped in and covered with quicklime and a thin layer of earth. Discarded streetcars were used to transport the dead to the cemetery.

Rieux was in charge of one of the new wards at the infirmary. There was little he could do, however, for the serum from Paris was not effective. He observed what precautions he could, and to ease pain he lanced the distended buboes. Most of the patients died. Castel, an older physician, was working on a new serum.

Father Paneloux preached a sermon on the plague in which he called Oran's pestilence a retribution. M. Othon, the judge, had a son under Rieux's care by the time Castel's new serum was ready. The serum did the boy little good; although he did show unexpected resistance, he died a painful death. Father Paneloux, who had been watching as a lay helper, knew the boy was not evil; he could no longer think of the plague as a retribution. His next sermon was confused. He seemed to be saying that man must submit to God's will in all things. For the priest this view meant rejection of medical aid. When he himself caught the fever, he submitted to Rieux's treatment, but only because he had to. Father Paneloux died a bewildered man.

Rambert, because he was not a citizen of Oran, tried his best to escape. Convinced that there was no legal means of leaving the city, he planned to leave with some illicit smugglers. Then the spirit of the plague affected him. He voluntarily stayed to help Rieux and the sanitation teams, for he realized that only in fighting a common evil could he find spiritual comfort.

Tarrou had left home early because his father was a prosecutor; the thought of the wretched criminals condemned to death because of his father's zeal horrified him. After he had been an agitator for years he finally realized that the workings of politics often resulted in similar executions. He had fled to Oran just before the plague started. There he found an answer to his problem in organizing and directing sanitary workers.

Cottard seemed content with plague conditions. Wanted for an old crime, he felt safe from pursuit during the quarantine. When the plague eased a little, two officers came for him but he escaped. He was recaptured in a street gun fight.

Grand caught the fever but miraculously recovered to work again on his manuscript. Tarrou, also infected, died in Rieux' house. As the colder weather of January came, the plague ended. Rieux heard by telegram that his wife had died.

The streets became crowded again as lovers, husbands, and wives were reunited. Rieux dispassionately observed the masses of humanity. He had learned that human contact is important for every one. For himself, he was content to help man fight against disease and pain.

THE PLAIN DEALER

Author: William Wycherley (1640?-1716)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: London

First presented: c. 1674

Principal characters:

CAPTAIN MANLY, a misanthropic gentleman in the king's service

FREEMAN, Manly's lieutenant

OLIVIA, Manly's mistress

VERNISH, Manly's only trusted friend

WIDOW BLACKACRE, a rich widow gulled by Freeman

FIDELIA, Manly's page, an heiress in disguise

Critique:

In Wycherley's own time The Plain Dealer was regarded as his best play. It is, at any rate, an important, if sardonic, account of the times when Holland and England were at war during the reign of Charles II. Manly, the plain dealer in all situations, displays as much bitterness as the misanthropes of Molière's drama and the plays of Marston and others in the earlier seventeenth century. The picture of contemporary life, complete with scenes showing Westminster Hall, book-seller's stalls, eating houses, and private homes, is anything but enticing. The people, except for Manly and his page, are portrayed as evil, grasping, litigious, and belligerent characters or, like the two sailors, as simpletons incapable of a thought of their own. Yet the social message of the play is not oppressive, for Wycherley also employed a tricky plot, brilliant dialogue, and realistic stage business.

The Story:

The plain dealer, Captain Manly, returned to London after his ship had been sunk in a battle with the Dutch. He sought another ship because he disliked the hypocrisy of the age and wished to be away from the sycophancy of court and social life. Among the acquaintances who called at his quarters in London was Lord Plausible, who attempted to persuade the captain to seek his ship through influential people instead of waiting for an assignment to be made. Manly demonstrated his love of plain dealing by showing Lord Plausible the door.

After Lord Plausible's departure Manly instructed the two sailors who served him not to admit anyone to his lodgings except his ship's lieutenant, Freeman. When Freeman came, he and Manly discussed the relative merits of plain dealing and hypocrisy. Freeman held that no one could have a successful career without being hypocritical, but he could not convince Manly that such a policy was better than telling the truth at all costs.

While they talked, Widow Blackacre broke past the sailors and entered Manly's rooms. Manly made her welcome because she was a cousin of his fiancée, Olivia. The widow, who was of an extremely litigious nature, wanted Manly to appear on her behalf at a court hearing the following day. She warned Manly that if he did not appear she would have him subpoenaed. Freeman, well aware that the widow had a great deal of money, started a courtship for her hand. The widow, who had a son Jerry, almost Freeman's age, ridiculed the idea because she wanted to manage her own affairs and could not do so if she were married.

Manly then went to seek information about Olivia, whom he had entrusted with most of his fortune while he was at sea.

Meanwhile Olivia had heard of Manly's arrival in London. She was none too anxious to see him because she had kept his fortune for her own and had married Vernish, the only man Manly trusted and called his friend. Olivia pretended to be a plain dealer like Manly. When visited by her cousin Eliza, Lord Plausible, and others, she belabored them for their hypocrisy, saying they spoke only ill of people in their absence but praised the same persons to their faces. Her cousin reminded her that her comments about people were much worse, and that she did not go out in company often enough to have an opportunity to say anything good about people to their faces.

Olivia, going on to speak plainly about Captain Manly, revealed that she did not love him and wished to be rid of his attentions. No one present knew as yet of her secret marriage to Vernish. In the meantime Manly had entered her apartment unnoticed. After the others left Manly and Olivia had words, and Manly told Olivia that he detested her. Freeman and Manly's page reminded him to recover his money and jewels from Olivia, and so Manly went back to request them. Olivia then announced to all three that she was married but did not say to whom. She told Manly that she could not return the money because her husband had it.

Olivia, noticing Manly's page, became infatuated and told Manly to send the young page as messenger if they were to have any further dealings. As Manly left, Widow Blackacre, accompanied by her son, entered, and Freeman once more began his suit for her hand. When she repulsed him, he decided to use law instead of ordinary courtship to gain his ends.

The following morning Manly, Freeman, and the page appeared at Westminster Hall as witnesses in Widow Blackacre's lawsuit. While away from Freeman for a time, Manly instructed his page to go to Olivia and arrange an assignment for him, for Manly had decided to get revenge by making her unknown husband a cuckold. That was a bitter errand for the page, who was actually a young woman in disguise. She had some time before fallen in love with Manly and had disguised herself as a boy in order to be near him.

At the court session Freeman found Widow Blackacre's son and befriended him by giving him some money. The boy told Freeman that his mother refused to let him have any money until he came of age. Learning that the boy had not yet appointed a guardian for himself, Freeman persuaded the boy to name him as guardian, an act which put Widow Blackacre's money into his hands instead of the widow's. In addition, Freeman had the boy leave all the widow's legal documents in his care.

Manly, returning to his lodgings, was informed by his page that she had succeeded in getting an assignation with Olivia; Manly could substitute himself for the page in the darkness. When Manly heard the comments Olivia had made about him, he became even more furious and eager to have revenge. A little later Widow Blackacre arrived, hoping to find Freeman and her son. When she confronted them, they told her that she was helpless, since they had her documents and Freeman had been appointed the boy's guardian. The widow threatened then to prove that her son was illegitimate and so could not inherit her husband's estate.

That evening the page went to Olivia's home. When Vernish appeared, the page escaped without being discovered, only to return later with Manly after Olivia had sent her husband away. Manly, refusing to seduce Olivia, left. The page, trapped when Vernish returned unexpectedly, escaped by disclosing herself to Vernish as a woman, incapable of cuckolding him. Vernish's attempt to ravish her was foiled by the entrance of his wife.

The page, escaping through a window, returned to Manly. Later Manly and Vernish met. Manly was not yet aware that Vernish was Olivia's husband, and Vernish was unaware that Manly was trying to seduce Olivia. Because they still trusted one another as the best of friends, Manly told Vernish he had been intimate with Olivia before her marriage, a fact which made Vernish all the more certain she had cuckolded him after marriage. The page, entering during the conversation, took Manly aside and told him another assignation with Olivia had been set for that evening. When they parted, Vernish told himself that he would pretend to leave town and thus trap the unknown man who was seducing Olivia.

In the meantime Freeman and some bailiffs overheard Widow Blackacre plan with some court hangers-on to prove that her son was born out of wedlock. Rather than marry Freeman and lose control of her estate, the widow finally granted an allowance to the boy and an annuity to Freeman. The lieutenant was satisfied; the money was all he wanted.

That evening Manly and the page went to Olivia's apartment. There Manly overcame Vernish in a duel. Olivia, in shame, tried to escape with the jewels and money, but Manly took them from her. In the scuffle the page's wig came off, disclosing her as a woman. Manly, impressed by her faithfulness and beauty, immediately asked her to marry him. She, on her part, told Manly she was Fidelia, heiress to a large fortune. They planned to begin a new life in the West Indies.

Critique:

Sean O'Casey's bitter childhood and early manhood accounted for his adherence to the Marxist idea of class war. He believed that the Irish would have to reckon with the problem of Irish poverty before they could ever hope to win independence. It is with this problem of some poor people caught in the midst of the famous Easter Rebellion of 1916 that O'Casey deals in The Plough and the Stars. Here the desperate situation of a group of tenement dwellers overshadows the dream of national independence. The Covey seems always to give O'Casey's own views on humanity versus nationality. The play was the cause of a patriotic riot when it was first produced by the Abbey Theatre in Dublin.

The Story:

Fluther Good had put a new lock on the Clitheroes' door when Mrs. Gogan brought in a hatbox, just delivered for Nora Clitheroe. Mrs. Gogan was convinced that Nora was putting on airs and buying too many new clothes to hold on to her husband.

Nora's Uncle Peter Flynn drifted in and out, getting ready his uniform of the Irish National Foresters. Peter had a chip on his shoulder which all the tenement dwellers took turns knocking off. He was an ineffectual man and he knew it.

When the Covey, Nora's cousin, came in, telling them that he had been laid off from work because the boys had mobilized for a demonstration for independence, he aroused both Peter and Fluther. The Covey was less inclined to follow the flag of the Plough and the Stars than to go ahead with his work.

Peter and the Covey were arguing away when Nora came home and quieted them, declaring that there was small hope of ever making them respectable. She was pleased with the way Fluther had put on the lock, but Bessie Burgess, a vigorous but rather coarse woman, scornfully berated Nora for treating her neighbors shamefully, not trusting them. As Fluther broke up the women's wrangling, Jack Clitheroe came home and sent Bessie away. He told Nora that he would speak to Bessie when she was sober again.

Jack was despondent because the Citizen Army was to meet that night. He had lost the rank of captain to Ned Brennan and, sulking, had refused to attend meetings. Wanting to be a leader, he did not have strength of leadership. Nora tried to get his mind off the meeting by making love to him. They were interrupted by the new Captain Brennan with a dispatch from the general telling Jack where to report. Jack did not understand why he was to report until Brennan told him that the boys had given him the title of Commandant, word of which had been in a letter Nora had never delivered. Disturbed because Nora had withheld the letter, Jack went off to the meeting with Brennan.

Mollser Gogan, a child in the last stages of tuberculosis, asked Nora if she might stay with her, since everyone else had gone to the demonstration.

Fluther and Peter, overwhelmed by the oratory of the speakers at the demonstration, repaired to a bar to pour in more courage. Even in the public house, the voice of the speaker followed them, urging bloodshed and war. Bessie and Mrs. Gogan were engaged in a verbal battle when they entered. Bessie, drunk, was ready for a hair-pulling, but the barman sent both women away. Peter was left holding Mrs. Gogan's baby, for she had forgotten the child when she was piloted out of the bar. He hurried out to find her.

Fluther, though he had intended to give up drinking before the meeting, decided the time had come for all the liquor he could hold, and he was generous enough to stand treat, even to the Covey and Rosie, a prostitute. Fluther and the Covey got into an argument on the labor movement and the barman had to separate them. Rosie and Fluther left when Jack, Brennan, and other officers, their eyes shining with excitement, came in for a drink before moving off with the Citizen Army.

The next day Mollser was so much weaker that Mrs. Gogan put her out in the sun in front of the house; they could hear shooting in the distance. Looking for Jack, Nora and Fluther had spent the night going to all the barricades without finding him. When they came back to the house, Nora was leaning heavily on Fluther. Bessie shouted down curses from her window. The Covey sighed that the fight would do the poor people no good.

Bessie brought Mollser a mug of milk when she came downstairs. The men began to gamble to keep their minds off the shooting, but they stopped when Bessie reappeared, laden down with booty, to say that looting had begun in the shops. Fluther and the Covey went off immediately. The guns scared Mollser so much that Bessie took her into the house. Even timid Peter started to follow Bessie and Mrs. Gogan when they set out with a baby carriage to hold their loot, but the sound of the big guns again stopped him. He was envious, however, when he saw the Covey, then Bessie and Mrs. Gogan, return with piles of loot.

Brennan and Jack stopped at the steps to let a wounded comrade rest. It was with difficulty that Jack got away from Nora, who had run down to him when she heard his voice. When the two officers finally took their man away, Nora was ready to faint.

Fluther came back with a jug of whiskey. Roaring drunk, he was too fuddled to go out for a doctor for Mollser, who was suddenly very sick. Bessie, praying when she heard the guns, went off toward the shooting to find a doctor.

A few days later the rebellion was still going on. Mollser had died, and Nora had had a stillborn baby. Both bodies were in the same coffin in Bessie's room, the only room in the tenement that seemed safe from the shooting. Fluther, the Covey, and Peter, having taken refuge there, played cards to while away the time.

Nora was on the verge of insanity. Bessie had stayed up with her for three nights and was herself almost dead for sleep. Each time Bessie sat in the chair in front of the fireplace for a nap, Nora would wake up. Once, when Nora got up, Brennan, in civilian clothes, was in the room telling the men how Jack had died. Nora did not recognize him. Brennan wanted to stay with the others; he said there was nowhere to go any more. Corporal Stoddart, an English soldier, came in to escort the coffin out of the house. Mrs. Gogan was the only one allowed to go with it. As she was thanking Fluther for making the funeral arrangements, the soldier heard a sniper nearby shoot another English soldier. The English, trying to find the sniper, were rounding up all the men in the district, and so Fluther, the Covey, Peter, and Brennan were forced to go with the corporal to spend the night in the Protestant church.

Bessie had again fallen asleep. Nora got up to prepare tea for Jack. As she stood at the window looking for him, the soldiers below shouted for her to go away. Bessie, awakened, tried to pull her back, but Nora struggled so hard that Bessie fell back against the window frame as she pushed Nora. Two shots, fired quickly, struck Bessie. She was dead before Mrs. Gogan came home.

Two English soldiers, investigating the room for snipers, found the mistake they had made in killing Bessie. They calmly poured themselves cups of tea while Mrs. Gogan took Nora downstairs to put her into Mollser's bed.

THE PLUMED SERPENT

Author: D. H. Lawrence (1885-1930)

Type of plot: Symbolic romance

Time of plot: Twentieth century

Locale: Mexico

First published: 1926

Principal characters:

KATE LESLIE, an Irishwoman

DON RAMÓN CARRASCO, a Spanish-Indian scholar and the reincarnated Quetzalcoatl

GENERAL CIPRIANO VIEDMA, the reincarnated Huitzilopochtli, god of war

DOÑA CARLOTA, Don Ramón's first wife

TERESA, his second wife

OWEN RHYS, Kate Leslie's cousin

Critique:

D. H. Lawrence was a writer driven by deep, personal need in his search for values that would redeem his vision of a disordered modern world and a brittle, crumbling civilization. The Plumed Serpent, the impressive novel of his later period, is the result of his American pilgrimage. Brilliantly colored in style and symbolic in theme, it is his tortured confession of faith in an atavistic mysticism which would restore to contemporary man the primitive virtues of potency and blood unity. In this novel the symbols of quest and discovery are the gods of ancient Mexico, Quetzalcoatl and Huitzilopochtli, whom Don Ramón Carrasco and General Cipriano Viedma attempt to revive as living deities. These dark gods of the primitive spirit alone can revitalize the earth, for Christianity had failed to do so: this is Lawrence's message. Kate Leslie, involved in the efforts of the two Mexicans, is a woman bred in a tradition dominated by industrial and mechanical controls, but her submission is inevitable when she finds herself in a strange world of masculine domination, symbolized by the Indian drum and the dance as expressions of that ancient, instinctive life which civilization has almost destroyed. The Plumed Serpent, a tremendous fable of sexual, political, and religious rebirth, is a stirring and disturbing book, a great, even though imperfect, work of the creative imagination.

The Story:

Kate Leslie was the widow of an Irish patriot. Restless after her husband's death, she had gone to Mexico with Owen Rhys, her American cousin. But Mexico oppressed her. Dark and secretive, the arid land weighed upon her spirit like a sense of doom. She saw it as a country of poverty, brutality, and bloodshed.

Owen and one of his friends took her to a bullfight. It was a distressing experience, for to her that ritual of death was like modern Mexico, vulgar and cruel, without mystery or passion. At last, unable to endure the spectacle and the reek of warm blood, she announced that she was returning alone to the hotel. A down-pour of rain began as she was leaving the arena and she was forced to wait in the exit tunnel with a crowd whose speech and gestures filled her with alarm. She was rescued from her predicament by a small, authoritative man in uniform who introduced himself as General Cipriano Viedma. A full-blooded Indian, he was impassive and withdrawn, yet vitally alert. While they talked, waiting for the automobile he had summoned to take Kate to her hotel, she felt unaccountably drawn to him.

The next day Mrs. Norris, widow of a former English ambassador, invited Kate and Owen to her house for tea. The general and his friend, Don Ramón Carrasco, were among the guests. Don Ramón was a landowner and a distinguished scholar. There were reports of a strange happening near his estate at Sayula. A naked man was supposed to have risen from the Lake of Sayula and told the villagers that Quetzalcoatl and the old gods of Mexico were soon to return to earth. Don Ramón had promised an investigation. The story appealed to Kate's Celtic imagination; she wanted to go to Sayula and see the lake from which the Aztec gods were to be reborn.

Kate and Owen dined with Ramón before his return to Sayula. The guests talked about Mexican politics and the happening at the lake. One impassioned young man declared that only a great miracle, like the return of Quetzalcoatl, could save Mexico. Cipriano seldom spoke but sat, his eyes black and unfathomable, looking from Kate to his host. After dinner he and Kate walked in the garden. In the darkness she felt that he was a man of strange, almost primitive potency and impulses.

When Owen returned to the United States, Kate decided to go to Sayula for a time. There she found an old Spanish house that pleased her. With the house went a servant, Juana, and her two sons and two daughters. Liking the house and its surroundings, Kate rented it for an indefinite stay.

The people of Sayula were restless, filled with a spirit Kate had not seen elsewhere in Mexico. One night she heard drums beating in the village plaza. Men naked to the waist were distributing leaflets printed with a hymn to Quetzalcoatl. Later the peons began to dance to the savage, insistent rhythms of the drums. In the torchlight the dance looked like a ritual out of old, almost forgotten times, a ritual men remembered in their blood rather than in their minds. Some said that Don Ramón was behind the new cult of Quetzalcoatl that was springing up.

Several weeks after Kate arrived in Sayula, Don Ramón and his wife, Doña Carlota, came to call. Doña Carlota was devoutly pious and eager to be friendly. When Kate visited Jamiltepec, Don Ramón's hacienda, she found soldiers guarding the gates. A drum was beating in the patio. Doña Carlota, hating the sound, told Kate that she was afraid because her husband was involved in the business of Quetzalcoatl. He wished to become a god, she confided, the reincarnation of the Plumed Serpent that the Aztecs had worshipped. Cipriano arrived at the hacienda for supper. That night there was a dance in the patio. Don Ramón promised that the reborn gods would bring new life to the country. The rains began, ending the hot, dry season.

Doña Carlota, refusing to witness her husband's heresies, as she called them, returned to Mexico City. Meanwhile the work of the Men of Quetzalcoatl continued. During one of his visits Cipriano asked Kate to marry him, but she put him off. Don Ramón continued to write and publish his hymns to Quetzalcoatl. Cipriano's soldiers distributed them. After he had been denounced by the clergy Don Ramón had the holy images removed from the church at Sayula and burned.

One day a group of his political and religious enemies, disguised as bandits, attacked Jamiltepec and tried to assassinate Don Ramón. Kate, who happened to be at the hacienda when the raiders appeared, killed one of the attackers and saved Don Ramón's life after he had been seriously wounded. Afterward she stayed much to herself, afraid of her own disturbed emotions. But she was being drawn slowly toward the dark, powerful forces of primitive awareness and power that she found in Don Ramón and Cipriano. The general now believed himself the living Huitzilopochtli, god of war. Fascinated and repelled, Kate yielded at last to his masculine dominance. Don Ramón married them with pagan rites and she became Malintzi, bride of the red-knifed god of battles.

When Don Ramón reopened the church, which he had converted into a sanctuary of the old Aztec gods, Doña Carlota appeared to protest against his blasphemy. Overcome by hysteria and fear of his implacable will, she suffered a stroke and died a short time later. Meanwhile Cipriano had been spreading the new doctrines among his soldiers. On an appointed night he was declared the living Huitzilopochtli, god of the knife, and in the rites of his assumption he sacrificed three of the prisoners captured after the attack on Don Ramón some weeks before.

Don Ramón married again. His bride was Teresa, daughter of a dead landowner of Jalisco. Watching Teresa's passive, female submission to her husband, Kate began to fear the dark potency, the upsurge of blood with which Don Ramón and Cipriano were arousing all Mexico. Men wearing the white and blue serapes of Quetzalcoatl and the red and black serapes of Huitzilopochtli were seen everywhere. When the Church excommunicated the leaders, revolt broke out. The President of Mexico declared the Church outlawed, and the faith of Quetzalcoatl became the official religion of the republic. Kate viewed these happenings with a sense of horror. Because the pride and strength of the old gods seemed to menace her spirit and her womanhood, she decided to return to Ireland.

But in the end she could not go. Cipriano with his black, impassive eyes and dark maleness was stronger than her European sensibility and her woman's will. Afraid of his violence but awed by the strength of a spirit stronger than her own, she felt wanted but not needed. The need, she realized, was her own, not Cipriano's. He had revealed to her the deep, dark, hot life of the senses and the blood, and she was trapped in his primitive world. She could never escape.

PLUTUS

Author: Aristophanes (c. 448-385 B.C.)

Type of plot: Satiric comedy

Time of plot: Fifth century B.C.

Locale: Athens

First presented: 388 B.C.

Principal characters:

CHREMYLUS, a poor, but honest farmer

CARIO, his servant

BLEPSIDEMUS, his friend

PLUTUS, the god of wealth

Critique:

Plutus is a dramatized moral fable marked by a debate on the advantages of poverty against the advantages of wealth, by delightfully irreverent humanizing of gods; and by pungent satire on ill-gotten wealth and ingratitude. The utter nonsense which takes place in the temple of Asclepius is a high point in the comedy.

The Story:

Chremylus, a Greek farmer, went to the temple of Apollo in Athens. There he asked the oracle how his son might attain affluence without having to resort to knavery. The oracle directed him to follow the first man he encountered on his emerging from the temple and to take the stranger home with him.

The first man Chremylus saw was a blind beggar, whom he followed impatiently. At first the beggar refused to reveal his identity to Chremylus, but when Cario, Chremylus' servant, threatened to push the blind man over a cliff, he fearfully revealed that he was Plutus, the god of riches, blinded by Zeus when he told the god that he would favor only good men. Zeus did not want Plutus to discriminate among men. The unhappy Plutus declared to Chremylus that had he his sight back again he would favor only the good and shun the wicked.

When Chremylus offered to restore his sight to him, Plutus expressed fear of the wrath of Zeus. But Chremylus declared that if Plutus had his sight back, even for a moment, Zeus would be superseded, because the dispensation of all wealth, upon which Zeus was dependent for his authority, would be in the power of Plutus, even money paid for sacrifices offered up to Zeus. Indeed, it would then be Plutus, according to Chremylus, not Zeus, who would be all things to all men. Plutus was delighted to hear these words.

Chremylus, after sending Cario to summon the neighboring farmers, ushered Plutus into his house. When Cario told the farmers that Plutus was at Chremylus' house and that he would lift them out of their poverty, they were delirious with joy. Chremylus, welcoming them, noticed that his friend Blepsidemus was skeptical of Cario's report; he suspected that Chremylus had stolen a treasure. Chremylus declared that Plutus was truly in his house and that all good and deserving people would soon be rich. Even Blepsidemus was convinced, and he agreed that it was essential to restore to Plutus his eyesight.

As Chremylus prepared to take Plutus to the Temple of Asclepius, there to have his sight restored, the goddess of poverty, a hideous old woman, appeared and objected to the prospect of being cast out of Chremylus' house after having lived with him for many years. Blepsidemus and Chremylus were terrified at the sight of her. But Chremylus quickly regained his composure and engaged the goddess in a debate over which deity, the god of riches or of poverty, was more beneficial to mankind. Chremylus declared that with Plutus once again able to see, those who deserved it would receive money. Thus society would be benefited. The goddess of poverty answered that progress would come to a halt because Plutus would distribute money equally. The pair then argued the difference between beggary and poverty; the goddess maintained that men who entertained her were brave, alert, and strong, while those who entertained Plutus were soft, fat, and cowardly. She declared that men were virtuous when she was their guest, but were corrupted when Plutus was their guest. Chremylus was not convinced by her arguments.

The goddess, having been defeated, departed in sorrow and anger. Chremylus now took Plutus to the temple of Asclepius, the god of healing. He observed every detail of the ritual and laid Plutus on a couch. A priest told them to sleep. Plutus' eyes were wiped with a cloth; then a purple mantle was placed over his head. At a signal from Asclepius, two serpents came forth from the sanctuary and slithered under the mantle. In a short time, Plutus, his sight restored, arose from the couch.

Now, those people who had got their wealth by unfair means looked with fear upon Plutus, but the poor rejoiced at their new good fortune. Plutus was happy; he vowed to correct all of the mistakes he had made when he was blind. Chremylus was rewarded with great wealth for his service to the god.

While Plutus was a guest in the house of Chremylus, a just man came to petition the god. He had helped his friends when they were in need, but they had not responded in kind when he himself had become indigent. The man became wealthy again through the power of Plutus. He offered an old cloak and a worn-out pair of sandals as tribute to the god.

Soon afterward an informer came to the house and complained that he had been ruined by the change wrought in Plutus. Cario stripped the informer of his fine coat and bedecked him in the just man's threadbare cloak.

An old woman, presuming to be a young one, came to see the god. She was distressed because her young lover, who had flattered her in order to get money from her, had deserted her now that Plutus had made him independent. The youth appeared with a wreath to give to Plutus in appreciation.

Hermes, the messenger of the gods, appeared and reported that Zeus and the other gods were furious because men no longer made oblations to them. He declared that he himself was actually starving since there were no more offerings in the form of cakes or figs or honey, and he urged Cario to succor him. Cario condescended to retain Hermes to preside at the games which Plutus surely would sponsor.

A priest of Zeus came and complained of hunger; when everyone was rich, there were no more offerings to the gods. Chremylus, calling attention to the fact that Plutus had now taken the place of Zeus in human fortunes, hinted that the priest of Zeus would do well to become the priest of Plutus. Zeus having been deposed, Plutus was installed as the supreme god.

POOR PEOPLE

Author: Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevski (1821-1881)

Type of plot: Impressionistic realism

Time of plot: First half of nineteenth century

Locale: St. Petersburg, Russia

First published: 1846

Principal characters:

MAKAR DIEVUSHKIN, a destitute government clerk

BARBARA DOBROSELOVA, his friend

POKROVSKI, a young tutor

THE ELDER POKROVSKI, the tutor's father

BWIKOV, a wealthy landowner

Critique:

Poor People, Dostoevski's first published work, appeared serially in 1846 in a literary periodical, Recueil de Saint Petersbourg. In this work, Dostoevski established a theme, the miseries of Russia's downtrodden masses, from which he never wandered far during his literary career. In Poor People, however, one can detect a sly humor that never appeared again in his work. Indeed, the already somewhat morbid and sick artist could hardly have seen anything but black despair in life after his sojourn in Siberia, where he was sent in 1849 for revolutionary political activities. Dostoevski's ruthless and unexpected manipulation of his characters' motives and personalities is foreshadowed in Makar's farewell letter to Barbara, in which Dostoevski has Makar admit that he had not been entirely sincere in his friendship with her.

The Story:

Makar Dievushkin, an impoverished government clerk, lived in an alcove in a rooming-house kitchen. Even though his accommodations were unpleasant, he consoled himself that he could see from his window the windows of Barbara Dobroselova, an unhappy young woman whom he supported in her shabby rooms across the street. Makar and Barbara corresponded; occasionally they walked together when Barbara felt well. Makar, poor but honorable, maintained the gravest dignity in his relationship and in his correspondence with Barbara. In their poverty and loneliness, each had warm sympathy and understanding for the other.

Among the boarders was a public relations man of literary pretensions, whose style Makar greatly admired. He was also interested in a former government clerk, Goshkov, and his family of four. Goshkov had lost his job through a legal suit; he was deeply in debt to the homely, shrewish landlady.

Across the street, Barbara's cousin Sasha appeared for the purpose of resolving a difference which had long existed between the cousins. Sasha questioned Barbara's acceptance of Makar's bounty.

Meanwhile Makar sent gifts to Barbara and became poorer with each passing day. He pawned his uniform and, in his poverty, became the butt of jokes. Barbara, protesting somewhat weakly his sacrifices for her, sent him, in return, her life's story, which she had written.

Barbara was the daughter of the steward of a prince in the province of Tula. Her family moved to St. Petersburg when she was twelve. She did not like the city and she detested the boarding school she attended. When Barbara was fourteen, her father died, debt-ridden. Her mother was consumptive. Creditors took all their possessions, and Barbara and her mother moved to the house of a distant relative, Anna Thedorovna, whose source of income was a mystery to them. There Barbara, with her cousin Sasha, an orphan, was tutored by a sick young student, Pokrovski, who was intelligent but irritable. The young girls teased Pokrovski remorselessly. Barbara, however, soon regretted her behavior and vowed to redeem herself in his eyes.

Pokrovski was visited from time to time by his father, a wizened, obsequious little man who worshiped his son. Because the old man was inquisitive and talkative, Pokrovski had limited the number of his visits to two a week. Old Pokrovski would do anything for his son.

Barbara outgrew the tutoring, but she still had not redeemed herself with Pokrovski. Bent upon wide reading, she sneaked into his room and accidentally upset his bookshelf. Pokrovski entered, and while the pair were replacing the books they realized that they were in love.

As Pokrovski's birthday approached, Barbara joined forces with the elder Pokrovski to buy the young tutor the works of Pushkin; they would give the set to him together. At the birthday party Barbara magnanimously let the doting old father give the books to his son. Pokrovski died soon afterward. Grief apparently weakened the old man's mind. He took his son's books and, following the funeral procession on foot, dropped a pathetic trail of books in the mud of the streets leading to the cemetery. Barbara had stopped writing her life story at the point where her mother was dying of tuberculosis.

The friendship between Makar and Barbara continued. Barbara became concerned with Makar's indulgences, which he could not afford, in her behalf; she urged him to get himself a decent uniform.

At the rooming house Makar, utterly destitute, felt deep pity for Goshkov in his poverty. He sent Barbara a volume of the writings of the public relations man; Barbara declared the book was trash. When the possibility of her becoming a governess in a wealthy household presented itself to Barbara, Makar, in spite of his own poverty, proudly told her that he could continue to care for her.

Hearing that Barbara had been insulted by an importunate suitor, Makar got drunk and was brought home by the police. In desperation he borrowed money everywhere, even from Barbara. His penury seemed to affect his mind. Meanwhile the friendship between the two had become the source of laughter to the other boarders. Makar even suspected the public relations man of maliciously gossiping in civil service circles about his having been brought home by the police. He feared for his reputation, all that he had left. Barbara invited him to come live with her and her cook, Thedora; she urged him to stop borrowing and to stop copying the public relations man's style in his letters.

A lecherous old man, sent by Anna Theodorovna, called on Barbara. After Barbara and Thedora got rid of him, Barbara, in alarm, told Makar that she would have to move immediately. Lack of money, however, prevented her removal. Because he could offer no security, Makar was refused a loan by a rich usurer. Everything went wrong; Makar's position at the rooming house became impossible. Barbara burned her hand and could not sew for a living. She sent Makar money, which he spent on drink. But even in his abject condition Makar gave coins to Goshkov that he might feed his family.

Makar made a mistake in his official work and was ordered before his superior, who was so affected at the sight of Makar's wretched person that he gave the poor clerk one hundred roubles and took his hand. These gestures saved Makar physically and morally. He regained his self-respect and faced life with a new vigor. All went well at the office and at the rooming house.

Bwikov, a wealthy landowner who had once courted Barbara and had deserted her in her misfortune, came to St. Petersburg and offered her money, which she refused.

Goshkov, meanwhile, was officially absolved of guilt in a case involving misappropriation of funds and was awarded substantial damages. Moved deeply by his freedom and solvency, the man broke in mind and body and died of shock.

Bwikov returned to Barbara and offered marriage to atone for his desertion. He planned to take her to his country estate for her health. After much debate Barbara and Makar agreed that she must marry Bwikov. Makar could not help remarking, however, that Bwikov would probably be happier married to a certain merchant's daughter in Moscow.

Barbara, preparing excitedly for a magnificent wedding, employed Makar to run countless petty errands for her. Makar planned to move into Barbara's rooms and to retain Thedora as his cook. It saddened him to think of Barbara's leaving him, of her going to the steppes to become the lady of a great estate. In a last letter he implored her to stay but admitted that his passionate turns of phrase were to some extent only a literary exercise.

THE POT OF GOLD

Author: Titus Maccius Plautus (c. 254-184 B.C.)

Type of plot: Comedy

Time of plot: Second century B.C.

Locale: Athens

First presented: c. 195 B.C.

Principal characters:

EUCLIO, a miser

MEGADORUS, Euclio's rich neighbor, who wished to marry Euclio's daughter

EUNOMIA, Megadorus' sister

LYCONIDES, Eunomia's son, in love with Euclio's daughter

STAPHYLA, a slave belonging to Euclio

Critique:

Although the miser is unusual in Roman comedy, Plautus was not the first dramatist to use such a character, and he had as his models the older Greek dramatists who had made use of various kinds of misers in their plays. Menander, for instance, wrote three or possibly four plays which might have been Plautus' source or inspiration for his The Pot of Gold. Dating the Plautine play is difficult. Internal evidence indicates that the violation of Euclio's daughter occurred in August and that the play was produced for the Megalensian games, which were first held in 194 B.C. Like most Plautine comedies, this play had considerable influence on European drama. In the seventeenth century, versions by Ben Jonson, Molière, Thomas Shadwell, and Hooft appeared. Fielding's The Miser, written in the eighteenth century, also was based in part on this Plautine comedy.

The Story:

The grandfather of Euclio, an Athenian miser, had entrusted a pot of gold to his household deity after burying the pot within the hearth. The god, angered in turn at the grandfather, the father, and Euclio himself, had kept the secret of the treasure from all, until finally the daughter of Euclio had endeared herself to the god. In an effort to help the girl, the deity then showed Euclio where the gold was hidden, so that the miser, by using the money as a dowry, might marry his daughter to Lyconides, the young man who had seduced her.

Euclio, miserly and distrustful by nature, was thrown into a feverish excitement by the discovery of the gold. He feared that someone would learn of its existence and either steal or gull it from him. After carefully hiding the gold in his house once more, he was afraid that even his old female slave, Staphyla, might learn of its whereabouts. Staphyla, in her turn, was worried by her master's strange behavior and by the fact that her young mistress was pregnant.

Meanwhile Megadorus, a wealthy neighbor and uncle of Lyconides, planned to marry Euclio's daughter, and he enlisted the aid of his sister Eunomia in his suit. Megadorus said that he was so pleased with the girl's character that he would marry her, contrary to the Athenian custom, without a dowry.

Seeing Euclio in the street, Megadorus went out to ask the old miser for his daughter's hand. Euclio, distrustful because of his new-found gold, thought Megadorus was actually plotting to take the gold from him. But Megadorus assured him that all he wanted was to marry the girl, with or without a dowry; he even offered to pay the expenses of the wedding. Upon these terms Euclio agreed to marry his daughter to Megadorus. After Megadorus left, however, Euclio could not convince himself that the prospective bridegroom was not after the pot of gold.

Euclio informed Staphyla of the proposed marriage, which was to take place the same day. Staphyla, knowing that when Euclio's daughter was married she could not conceal her pregnancy, immediately began to worry about her mistress. Staphyla had little time to worry, however, for very shortly a caterer, bringing cooks, entertainers, and food, arrived at Euclio's house to prepare the wedding feast. The caterer had been hired by Megadorus, as he had promised.

Returning from the market place with some incense and flowers to place on the altar of his household god, Euclio was horrified to see all the strangers bustling about his house, for he immediately thought they were seeking his pot of gold and would steal it from him. Euclio first drove all the caterer's people from the house in a fury and then removed his pot of gold from its hiding place. After he had removed it from the house he told them to return to their work.

Euclio decided to take the gold and hide it in the nearby temple of Faith. On the way he met Megadorus, who asked Euclio to join him in drinking a bottle or two of wine. Euclio refused, suspecting that Megadorus wanted to get him drunk and then steal the pot of gold. Going on to the temple of Faith, Euclio hid the money. Although he did not know it, a slave belonging to Lyconides, the young man who had violated Euclio's daughter, observed where the money was placed. The slave took the money from its hiding place, but Euclio, rushing back to see if it was still safe, prevented the theft.

In an effort to find a safe hiding place for his gold, Euclio took it to the grove of Silvanus. The slave, anxious to please his master and repay Euclio for a beating, watched where Euclio hid the gold in the grove.

In the meantime, Lyconides, having learned of Megadorus' plans to marry Euclio's daughter, went to Eunomia, his mother, and told her that he himself wanted to marry the girl. Pressed by Eunomia for his reasons, Lyconides revealed that he had violated the girl while he was drunk and wished to make amends by marrying her. Even as they spoke, the excitement in Euclio's house among the women told Eunomia and Lyconides that the baby had been born to Euclio's daughter. Eunomia then agreed to help her son marry the girl.

Lyconides went to Euclio to tell of his guilt in violating the miser's daughter. He found Euclio greatly upset, for the miser had just discovered the theft of his gold from Silvanus' grove. Lyconides believed that Euclio was angry with him because he had fathered the daughter's child. Euclio, on the other hand, thought that the crime to which Lyconides was confessing was the theft of the gold. Finally the young man convinced Euclio that he had not stolen the miser's gold. He then told Euclio about his violation of the girl and the birth of the child. Megadorus, in the meantime, had renounced the girl. Euclio, who had looked forward to the marriage of his daughter and the rich Megadorus, felt that he was utterly betrayed by the world.

After Euclio and Lyconides parted, the slave appeared and told Lyconides about the pot of gold he had stolen. Lyconides insisted that the slave bring the gold to him. After a lengthy argument the slave reluctantly obeyed; he hated to think that the gold would be returned to miserly Euclio.

When the slave brought the gold to Lyconides, the young man went to the house of Euclio and returned the treasure. The miser, glad to have the pot of gold once more in his hands, was so happy that he readily agreed to a marriage between his daughter and Lyconides, in spite of the fact that Lyconides had violated the girl and caused her to bear a child out of wedlock.

Strangely enough, after the wedding Euclio had a change of heart and gave the entire pot of gold to the newly wedded couple.

FATHER MONTEZ, a fugitive priest

MARCÍA, the mother of his child

FATHER JOSÉ, a renegade priest

A LIEUTENANT OF POLICE

A POOR MESTIZO

Critique:

This novel reflects the author's interest in Mexico and his experience as a resident of that country. It is not surprising that he should write a sympathetic novel about the persecution of priests in Mexico, since Greene himself is a convert and his serious novels are in keeping with Catholic idiom and doctrine. In this book he deals, as usual, with the psychology of the individual. The Power and the Glory was published in the United States in 1940 under the title The Labyrinthine Ways. It proved unpopular. A new edition, with the original title restored, has increased the body of readers familiar with the novel. In particular, Greene is a master of suspense.

The Story:

In a particular Mexican state the Church had been outlawed and the priests driven underground by the threat of being shot. After several months, word went out from the governor's office that there was still one priest, Father Montez, who was moving from village to village carrying on the work of the Church by administering the sacraments and saying masses. A young lieutenant of police, an ardent revolutionist and an anti-clerical, persuaded his chief to let him search for the priest who, as the authorities saw it, was guilty of treason.

Two photographs were pasted up together in the police station. One was the picture of an American bank robber who had killed several police officers in Texas; the other was that of the priest. No one noticed the irony, least of all the young lieutenant, who was far more interested in arresting the clergyman. While the officer was receiving permission to make a search for Father Montez, the priest was already in the village, having come there in order to get aboard a boat that would take him to the city of Vera Cruz and safety.

Before Father Montez could board the boat word came to him that an Indian woman was dying several miles inland. True to his calling, the priest mounted a mule and set out to administer the last rites to the dying woman, even though he realized that he might not find another ship to carry him to safety. There was one other priest in the vicinity, Father José. But Father José had been cowardly enough to renounce the Church, even to the point of taking a wife, a shrewish old woman. The authorities paid no attention to him at all, for they felt, and rightly so, that the priest who had renounced his vows was a detriment and a shame to the Church.

After completing his mission, Father Montez came back to the coast, where he spent the night in a banana warehouse. The English manager on the plantation allowed him to hide there.

The following day, hoping to find refuge from the police and from the revolutionary party of Red Shirts, he set out on muleback for the interior. As he traveled, he thought of his own past and of himself as a poor example of the priesthood. For Father Montez was a whiskey priest, a cleric who would do almost anything for a drink of spirits. In addition, he had in a moment of weakness fathered a child by a woman in an inland village. Thinking himself a weak man and a poor priest, he was still determined to carry on the work of the Church as long as he could, not because he wanted to be a martyr but because he knew nothing else to do.

After twelve hours of travel he reached the village where his one-time mistress and his child lived. The woman took him in overnight, and the following morning he said a mass for the villagers. Before he could escape the police entered the village. Marcía claimed him as her husband, and his child, a little grown girl of seven, named him as her father. In that manner, because of his earlier sins, he escaped. Meanwhile the police had decided on a new tactic in uncovering the fugitive. As they passed through each village they took a hostage. When a certain length of time had passed without the apprehension of Father Montez, a hostage was shot. In that manner the lieutenant of police in charge of the hunt hoped to persuade the people to betray their priest.

After the police had left the village without discovering him, Father Montez mounted his mule and went on his way. He traveled northward in an effort to escape the police and, if possible, to make his way temporarily into another state.

Some hours after leaving the village, Father Montez met with a mestizo who fell in with him. Before long the half-breed discovered that Father Montez was the priest for whom the police were searching. He promised that he, a good Catholic, would not betray the secret, but Father Montez was afraid that the promised reward of seven hundred pesos would be too much of a temptation for the poor man.

When they reached a town, however, it was Father Montez' own weakness which put him into the hands of the police. He had to have some liquor, the sale of which was against the law. He managed to buy some illegally, but his possession of the contraband was discovered by one of the revolutionary Red Shirts, who raised a cry after him. Tracked down by a posse, the priest was caught and placed in jail. Fortunately, he was not recognized by the police, but since he had no money he was kept in jail to work out the fine.

The lieutenant of police who was searching feverishly for him unexpectedly did Father Montez a good turn. Seeing the ragged old man working about the jail, the lieutenant stopped to talk with him. The priest claimed to be a vagrant who had no home of his own.

The lieutenant, feeling sorry for the old fellow, released him and gave him a present of five pesos. Leaving town, Father Montez started out across the country to find a place of temporary safety. After traveling for some time, he met an Indian woman who could speak only a few words of Spanish. She managed to make him understand that something was wrong with her child. He went with her and found that the baby had been shot; his immediate guess was that the American bandit had done the deed.

After performing rites over the child, Father Montez continued his flight. He eventually made his way into the next state, where he was given sanctuary by a German plantation owner. After resting a few days, he planned to go to a city and there present his problems to his bishop. Before he could leave, however, he was found by the mestizo, who said that the American bandit, a Catholic, was dying and needed the priest. Father Montez answered the call, even though he was sure he was being led into a trap. The bandit was really dying, but he lay in the state from which Father Montez had just escaped. With him was a party of police, waiting for the priest's appearance in order to arrest him.

Immediately after the bandit's death the police closed in and Father Montez was captured. Taken back to the capital of the state and tried for treason, he was found guilty and sentenced to be shot. The lieutenant of police, who felt sorry in a way for the old priest, tried to persuade the renegade Father José to hear Father Montez' last confession, but Father José, who feared the authorities, refused. Father Montez was led out and shot without the benefit of the Church's grace. Yet the lieutenant of police had not succeeded in removing the Church's influence; in the evening of the day on which Father Montez died another priest made his way, in secret, into the town where the execution had taken place.

THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER

Author: Mark Twain (Samuel L. Clemens, 1835-1910)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1882

Principal characters:

TOM CANTY, a London street beggar

JOHN CANTY, his father

EDWARD, Prince of Wales

MILES HENDON, a disinherited knight

HUGH HENDON, his brother

HUGO, a thief

Critique:

In many ways, The Prince and the Pauper is a companion piece to A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court. Both are historical satires; both deplore the lack of democracy and cleanliness of early England; both scrutinize the past from a viewpoint of modern morality. Lastly, both exhibit humor derived from ludicrous situations. In its compactness and relative brevity The Prince and the Pauper is in some ways superior to A Connecticut Yankee. But the denouement of the novel is disappointing. It is as if the fantasy got away from the author and overwhelmed him. The outstanding quality of this novel is the beloved simplicity of the prince himself, his unswerving tenacity to his royal training throughout all his difficulties, and his final act of clemency.

The Story:

On the same day, in London, Tom Canty and the Prince of Wales were born, the first unwanted and the second long awaited. While the prince, Edward Tudor, lay robed in silks, Tom Canty wallowed in the filth of Offal Court.

Tom's father forced him to beg during the day and he beat the boy at night; but Tom had private dreams of his own. Pretending that he was a prince, he gathered his ragtaggle court of street urchins around him. One day, hoping to see Prince Edward of England, he invaded the royal precincts, but when he tried to approach the prince he was cuffed by a guard and ordered away. Edward, witnessing the incident, protected Tom and took the young beggar into the palace. There, in the privacy of Edward's chamber, Tom confessed his longing to be a prince. When the two boys exchanged garments they discovered that they were identical in appearance. Unrecognized as the real prince and mistaken for the beggar boy, Edward was promptly thrown into the streets of London, where he wandered helplessly, mocked by people whom he approached with pleas that they pay homage to him as their rightful prince.

Meanwhile, in the palace, it was thought that the prince had gone mad because he could recall none of the royal matters which he was supposed to know. King Henry issued an edict that no one should discuss the royal lapse of memory, and the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth mercifully tried to aid their supposed brother, who by that time was too frightened to confess that he was Tom Canty, a beggar dressed in the prince's clothing.

King Henry VIII, sick in bed, had given the Great Seal of the kingdom to Prince Edward for safekeeping. When Henry demanded the return of his seal, Tom reported that he did not know where it was.

While the Prince of Wales, a homeless waif, wandered the streets under the crowd's mocking raillery, King Henry died. Edward was found by John Canty, Tom's father, and brought to Offal Court; but during the wild celebration of Tom's ascension to the throne Edward escaped from John Canty. Again tormented by skeptical crowds who laughed at his protests that he was now King of England, Edward was rescued by Miles Hendon, the disinherited son of a baronet. Thinking Edward was mad, Miles pitied the little waif and pretended to pay him the homage due to a monarch.

Miles had loved a girl named Edith, who was coveted by Miles' brother Hugh. By trickery, Hugh had gained his father's confidence and Miles was turned away from home. Edward declared that Miles had suffered unjustly and promised the adventurer any boon he might ask. Recalling the story of De Courcy, who, given a similar opportunity by King John, requested that he and all his descendants might be permitted to wear hats in the presence of the King of England, Miles wisely asked that he be permitted to sit down in Edward's presence, for the young king had been ordering Miles about like any other personal servant.

In the role of King of England, Tom was slowly learning to conduct himself royally. Regarded by his attendants as mad, he was able to display his lack of training, and his failure to recall events familiar to Edward, with no calamitous results. At the same time his gradual improvement offered hope that his derangement was only temporary.

John Canty lured Edward away from Miles' protection and took the boy to Southwark, there to join a pack of thieves. Still vainly declaring himself king, Edward was again the center of ridicule. One of the thieves, Hugo, undertook to teach Edward the tricks of his trade. Making his escape, Edward wandered to a farmhouse where a kind woman, pitying the poor, insane beggar boy who declared himself King of England, fed him. Edward wandered on to the hut of a hermit who accepted naively Edward's claim to royalty. In turn, the hermit revealed to Edward that he was an archangel; the hermit was really mad. While Edward slept, the hermit brooded over the wrongs done him by King Henry. Believing Edward really to be the king, and planning to murder him, the hermit managed to tie up the boy while he slept. John Canty and Hugo, following the trail of the escaped waif, rescued him and forced him to rejoin the band of rogues. Again he was compelled to aid Hugo in his dishonest trade. At last Miles found the boy and saved him.

Miles was on his way back to Hendon Hall to claim his heritage and Edith for a wife. Arriving at their destination, they learned that Miles' father was dead and Hugh, married to Edith, was master of Hendon Hall. Only five of the old servants were still living, and all of them, in addition to Hugh and Edith, pretended not to recognize Miles. Denounced as a pretender, Miles was sentenced to the stocks, where the abuse showered upon him by the mob so enraged Edward that he protested loudly. When the guards decided to whip the boy, Miles offered to bear the flogging instead. Grateful to his friend, Edward dubbed Miles an earl, but the imprisoned man sorrowed at the boy's display of insanity. Upon Miles' release from the stocks the two set out for London, where they arrived on the day before the coronation of King Edward VI.

In regal splendor, enjoying the adulation of his subjects, Tom Canty rode through the streets of London toward Westminster Abbey. There, just as the crown was about to be set on his head, a voice rang out demanding that the ceremony cease, and the real king, clothed in rags, stepped forth. As the guards moved to seize the troublemaker, Tom, recognizing Edward, ordered them to halt. The Lord Protector solved the mystery by asking the ragged king to locate the Great Seal that had been lost since King Henry's death. Edward, after much dramatic hesitation, managed to remember the exact location of the Seal. Tom admitted that he had innocently used it to crack nuts.

When Miles was brought before the rightful King Edward, he exercised his privilege of sitting in the king's presence. At first he had doubted that the waif was really the king, but when Edward ordered his outraged guards to permit that disrespectful act, Miles knew that his young friend had not been insane after all. Furthermore, Edward confirmed Miles' title of earl. Hugh was stripped of his titles and land. Later he died, whereupon Miles married Edith, whose earlier refusal to acknowledge his identity had been the result of Hugh's threat to kill his brother.

Tom returned to Offal Court with Edward's promise that he and his family would be honored for the rest of their lives. Edward righted many wrongs he had encountered during his adventures. John Canty, whom he wanted to hang, was never heard from again.

THE PRINCESS OF CLÈVES

Author: Madame Marie de Lafayette (1634-1693)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: France

First published: 1678

Principal characters:

THE PRINCESS DE CLÈVES, née Chartres, a beautiful young noblewoman

THE PRINCE DE CLÈVES, her husband

THE DUKE DE NEMOURS, in love with the princess

THE VIDAME DE CHARTRES, uncle of the princess

THE QUEEN DAUPHINE, Mary, Queen of Scots, friend of the princess

Critique:

Because The Princess of Clèves is superior to any of the other romances written by Madame de Lafayette, some literary historians and critics have hesitated to credit her with the authorship of a book so simple in outline but elegant in detail. There seems no reason to doubt the authenticity of the work, however, if we remember that during its composition the novel was discussed and criticized by the brilliant men and women who attended the salon over which Madame de Lafayette presided. These included the Duke de Rochefoucauld, Madame de Sévigné, Huet, the royal tutor, Segrais, the poet, Cardinal de Retz, and many others. The writer undoubtedly profited by the suggestions and advice of her friends. Certainly, out of their personal memories of an earlier time, they aided in reconstructing the historical background and details of the book. More important, this early novel defined areas of experience which later writers have charted more completely. The careful analyses of emotion, the atmosphere of intrigue, the conflict between duty and desire, and the subjective portrayal of character, as presented here, have made the romance one of the landmarks of French literature. The influence of the book can be traced through two distinct literary trends: the psychological novel and the roman à clef, which presents real people and events under a thin fictional disguise.

The Story:

The court of Henri II of France was filled with many intrigues, as much of the heart as of anything else. The court itself was divided into several groups. One group was partial to the queen, who was at odds with Henri II because he chose to be guided in his personal life and in his government by Diane de Poitiers, the Duchess de Valentinois, who had been his father's mistress and was now a grandmother in her own right. A second group was that which surrounded the Duchess de Valentinois. A third group was that which had as its center Princess Mary, wife of the dauphin, the beautiful and brilliant young woman who was also Queen of Scotland.

Into this scene of rivalry came Madame de Chartres, with her very beautiful daughter, to be married to a nobleman with rank as high as possible; Madame de Chartres hoped even for a prince of the blood. Unfortunately for the mother's hopes, the intrigues of the court kept her from arranging a match so brilliant or advantageous. A marriage with either M. de Monpensier, the Chevalier de Guise, or the Prince de Clèves seemed the best that could be made, and there were obstacles to a marriage with either of those, as Mme. de Chartres discovered. Each of the groups at the court was afraid that such a marriage would upset the status of the powers as they stood.

Finally the arrangements were made for a marriage to the Prince de Clèves. The gentleman was perturbed, however, by the attitude of his bride. He loved her greatly, and she seemed to love him dutifully but without the abandon he wished for. He tried to be satisfied when she told him that she would do her best to love him, but that she felt no real passion for him or any man. The marriage was celebrated in grand style, and a fine dinner party, attended by the king and queen, was given at the Louvre.

For many months no one at the court, where extramarital attachments were the rule rather than the exception, dared to say anything about the young wife. Thanks to her mother's solicitude and her own lack of passion where men were concerned, the Princess de Clèves kept a spotless reputation. Her mother, who soon was on her deathbed, knew from various conferences the princess had had with her—unusual conferences for a married woman to have with her mother, for in reality they were confessions—that the princess had no inclinations to stray from her marital vows.

One evening, however, there was a court ball given in honor of one of the king's daughters, whose marriage was impending. A late arrival at the ball was the Duke de Nemours, the handsomest, most gallant courtier in France. At his entrance the Princess de Clèves who had never seen the duke before, was ordered by the king to dance with him.

In spite of the fact that Queen Elizabeth of England had taken an interest in the Duke de Nemours and had expressed the wish that the young man would visit her court, he remained where he could be near the Princess de Clèves. Even the repeated requests of the French king, who saw in de Nemours a possible consort for Queen Elizabeth, could not remove the duke from her side. Meanwhile the Princess de Clèves did everything she could to conceal her love for the duke from everyone, even from her lover himself. She was determined to remain a faithful and dutiful wife.

One day, while the princess and the duke were in the apartments of the Queen Dauphine, the princess saw de Nemours steal a miniature portrait of herself. Although she had ample opportunity, the princess said nothing to stop him from taking her picture. Some time later the duke was injured by a horse in a tournament, and several people noted the look of distress on the face of the Princess de Clèves. The court was beginning to realize that love was blossoming between the two.

As soon as she realized what was happening in her heart, the Princess de Clèves went to her husband and asked him to take her away from Paris for a time. They went to an estate in the country. While they were there, the princess confessed to her husband that she was falling in love with someone. Admiring her candor, he promised to help her overcome the passion. Although she refused to name the man she loved, the Prince de Clèves guessed that it was one of three men, a trio which included the Duke de Nemours. But he had no proof.

Although neither knew it, while the princess was confessing her love, the Duke de Nemours was hiding so close to them that he could overhear what was said.

Months went by, and gradually, despite her efforts to keep away from him, the princess indicated to her husband that the Duke de Nemours was the man she loved. The prince was torn by jealousy, but his wife's confession and her obvious efforts to curb her love prevented him from taking any action in the matter. His only recourse was to accuse her at intervals of not being fair to him in loving another.

The strain becoming too much for the Princess de Clèves, she asked her husband's permission to retire to a country estate near Paris. He yielded graciously but sent one of his own retainers to make sure of her conduct while she was away. The retainer returned to report that twice, at night, the Duke de Nemours had entered the garden where the princess was; the retainer did not know, and so could not report, that his mistress had refused to see the man who loved her.

After the retainer had made his report, the prince fell ill of a fever. When the princess returned, she was unable to convince him that she had not been unfaithful, even though he wanted to believe her. Rather than stand in the way of her happiness, he languished and died.

Some months after her husband's death the Duke de Nemours prevailed upon the princess' uncle, the Vidame de Chartres, to intercede for him with the princess. The uncle did, even to arranging for an interview between the two. At that time the princess told the duke that, in spite of her love for him, she could never marry him. Soon afterward she entered a convent for a time. Later she retired to an estate some distance from Paris. Shortly after her arrival at the country estate she fell ill and died within a matter of days.

VARIOUS CITIZENS OF THE THIRD REICH

Critique:

The Private Life of the Master Race, an exposé of the Nazi regime, is composed of seventeen scenes or one-act plays taken from a longer work, The Fears and Miseries of the Third Reich. The scenes form a pageant of the first five years of Hitler's reign. In the usual sense these scenes do not make a play, for there are no characters who appear in more than one scene; the unity of the work is maintained only by the historical sequence and by a fragmentary narration. Brecht here aims at an epic drama, and he does achieve by documentary presentation a vivid sweep in time. He is highly regarded as a poet. The worth of the play lies in the poetry and in the cumulative details of a reign of terror under National Socialism.

The Story:

During the first years of the Nazi regime, techniques for suppressing opposition were rapidly perfected. One object of suppression was any radio capable of receiving broadcasts from Russia. The Nazis relied on the German distrust of Communism to aid in harsh enforcement of the law. Soon neighbors were betraying neighbors. Sets were confiscated and the owners beaten.

In Berlin, in 1933, a storm trooper came to visit his sweetheart who was a maid in a wealthy home. While she was feeding him in the kitchen, the cook's brother came in with a tube to repair the family radio. Since the brother, a common worker, did not give the Heil Hitler greeting plainly enough, the trooper put on a demonstration to show the Nazi power. He pretended to explain the current methods of exposure by staging a scene at the welfare office. He was the more anxious to scare the worker because he had drunk the Nazi's beer.

The trooper, ostensibly in mufti, pretended that he was in a welfare line discussing the things wrong in Germany. The worker answered him by imitating the common complaints heard from non-Nazis. Simulating camaraderie, the trooper clapped the worker on the shoulder. On arriving at the office, the man would be closely interrogated, for there was a chalk cross on his shoulder. The trooper had drawn the cross on his hand and transferred it to the worker's shoulder with a friendly pat. After that bit of dramatizing the worker left abruptly.

In the concentration camps the Socialists, the Communists, and the non-political liberals realized too late that they should have been united before Hitler came to power. Now they were impotent. In the factories there were broadcasts by happy workers who had been carefully coached in what they were to say. In private homes a member of the family would be returned in a zinc box; the official explanation was always that death had come from natural causes.

By 1935 even the scientists were afraid. Spied on by their Nazi employees, they were often handicapped in their laboratories by the prohibition against correspondence with foreign scientists. It was forbidden even to mention the name of Einstein, for he was a Jew.

In Frankfort a Jewish wife was packing. Her husband was a prominent physician and an Aryan. She had stood her racial stigma as long as she dared, but now their friends were beginning to cut them socially. Carefully tending to her wifely duties, she telephoned to friends, asking them to look after things in her absence. After she had finished calling, she prudently burned the notebook containing the telephone numbers. Then she began rehearsing the speech she would make to her husband.

She would be brave. She would go to Amsterdam for a few weeks until the persecution died down. Really, the only reason she was leaving was to relieve her husband from embarrassment. As she went through the carefully thought-out speech, her husband came in. At once she broke down. The husband pretended to believe that she would be gone only a short while, and when things were better he would come to Amsterdam for her. He would like a few days outside of Germany himself. Surely the Nazis could not for long shackle the intellectuals.

Even the judges were confused. They had come to the point where they gave decisions the way the party wanted them, but sometimes it was difficult to know just what the party desired. In Augsburg three storm troopers broke into a store run by a Jew and took some valuable jewelry after wounding the Jew. To the judge the case looked like a simple one; the Jew had offered great provocation; the storm troopers had acted rightly in defending the honor of the party. But after talking with the prosecutor the judge was not sure how he should decide.

There was race pollution mixed in the case. The Jewish store manager had a nineteen-year-old daughter about whom there had been rumors. The father also had an Aryan partner who had access to party headquarters. The owner of the building had changed his testimony. Perhaps the case was clear cut; the judge would decide against the storm troopers, for German justice was honorable even for Jews.

But the inspector in the case confused him again. He said the prosecutor was inducing the judge to give the wrong decision because he wanted the judge's post for himself. The harassed judge asked an older colleague for advice, but the other man could give him little help. With a heavy heart the judge prepared to go into his courtroom, where ribald storm troopers occupied every seat.

Perhaps one of the most effective devices of the regime was to teach the children in the youth organizations to inform on their parents.

In 1936 a man who had been released from a concentration camp came to call on a man and a wife with whom he had worked in the resistance movement. The couple were afraid to take him into their confidence again, for the pressure in the concentration camps was great. The meeting was an embarrassing one. The couple tried not to notice the released man's shrunken hand with the missing fingers, and he in turn pretended not to notice their lack of confidence in him.

As food became scarcer in the stores, the waiting lines were longer in the mornings. Butter was sacrificed to cannons and prices rose beyond the ability of the people to pay. The store owners themselves led a precarious existence, for they never knew when they would be arrested for infractions of rules. A butcher, who had been a Nazi before 1933, forced his son to join the storm troopers, but his loyalty did him little good. When he refused to put cardboard hams in his window, the Nazis began to persecute him. In despair the butcher hanged himself in his shop window over a card which announced to the world that he had voted for Hitler.

There were faint signs of resistance to the all-powerful regime. Farmers were supposed to hand over their grain to the government and buy feed at a fixed price. Here and there, however, a farmer would take the precaution of having his wife and children stand guard. While they watched he would feed grain to his hungry pigs.

In Lübeck, in 1937, a fisherman lay dying. He had argued long hours with his storm trooper son over Hitler's evident determination to start a war. Now as the dying man talked with his pastor he dared to mention the life to come. The son left his father's bedside without speaking. The pastor had referred to the Sermon on the Mount; no good Nazi could be taken in by Jewish superstition.

In Hamburg, in 1938, just after the union with Austria, a small group discussed ways and means of getting out an opposition leaflet. Such a project was almost impossible. A woman in the group read a letter from an executed father to his small son, a letter in which the father declared that his hard fate would not have been in vain if his son remained true to the common people.

VICTOR PRYNNE, her husband

Critique:

One of the most popular of the plays of Noel Coward, Private Lives is sophisticated high comedy at its best, a story of misadventures created by an exchange of husbands and wives. Originally performed by Coward himself and the late Gertrude Lawrence, it won immediate success. There is little plot, but the brilliant dialogue and unconventionality of theme more than sustain the play and place it among the best brittle farces of the modern stage.

The Story:

Sibyl Chase loved being married. She was as much in love with the idea of being a bride as she was with her husband Elyot, perhaps more so. On her honeymoon night Sibyl went into raptures over Elyot, but she did not forget, or let him forget, that she knew he had loved his first wife Amanda madly. She was certain that their breakup had been Amanda's fault, that she had been a mean-tempered and probably a wanton woman. When Sibyl told him that she knew how to handle a husband, how to make him happy, Elyot feared that she meant she knew how to manage a husband. He was a trifle disturbed.

Unknown at first to the Chases, Amanda was honeymooning at the same hotel with her new husband, Victor Prynn. Victor had much the same ideas about marriage as Sibyl had. He would take care of Amanda, make her forget that dreadful brute to whom she had been married. The fact that Amanda never asked to be taken care of was unimportant. Victor would teach her to be a suitable wife.

When Amanda and Elyot saw each other again, each wanted to move out of the hotel before their respective mates knew about the presence of the other couple. But Sibyl and Victor were not accustomed to making abrupt changes without reason, and so they refused to leave. Thus Amanda and Elyot thought they were not responsible when they talked together again and found that they still loved each other passionately after five years of separation. Recalling their happy times together, each tried for a time to avoid the issue uppermost in their hearts and minds. At last Elyot broke the polite conversation by saying that he still loved Amanda. They fell into each other's arms.

Amanda tried for a time to make them consider Sibyl and Victor, but Elyot easily convinced her that those two would suffer more if they all lived a lie. After making their plans to go to Paris, Amanda left without telling her husband, Elyot without telling his wife.

Because they had fought so violently and so often in their married days, Amanda made Elyot promise that whenever they started to bicker they would use a password and each keep quiet for two minutes. In Amanda's flat in Paris they were often forced into quick use of the magic password, for they were torn equally between love and hate. Amanda's conscience bothered her a little, but Elyot could easily soothe that nagging little voice with love, logic, or a flippant remark. Sorry that they had wasted five years of separation after their divorce, they agreed to marry each other again as soon as Sibyl and Victor would divorce them. Elyot was annoyed when he learned that Amanda had spent those five years in having little affairs with various men, but he saw no reason for her being annoyed at his own transgressions.

Their quarrels occurred over nonsensical things for the most part. At the root was often Amanda's concern for the moral questions involved in their past and present relationship. When Elyot brushed these aside with worldly and flippant comment, Amanda came back to him more passionately than before.

The last explosion occurred as a result of Amanda's mention of another man of whom Elyot had always been jealous. Without knowing quite how the quarrel got out of hand, they found themselves throwing things at each other and slapping each other viciously. The magic password failed to work during their quarrel. As each slammed into a different bedroom, neither was aware that Sibyl and Victor had come into the room at the height of the rumpus and settled themselves quietly on the sofa.

The next morning Sibyl and Victor had a very sensible discussion concerning the situation they had found the night before. Sibyl wept copiously, not so much from sorrow as from custom; it was the right thing for an injured wife to do. Each blamed the other's mate for the sordid scene in Amanda's apartment. When Amanda and Elyot joined them, they were very polite with each other and with Sibyl and Victor. At first the situation was like a cozy morning call for coffee. When Amanda and Elyot admitted that they were sorry, that it was all a mess and a mistake, Sibyl and Victor agreed that the culprits were not contrite enough. Elyot, in particular, seemed crass about the whole thing, particularly to Victor, who wanted to thrash him. But Elyot could see no use in heroics; he honestly admitted that his flippancy was only an attempt to cover real embarrassment.

At the beginning of the unpleasant scene Amanda and Elyot had refused to speak to each other, but as Sibyl and Victor continued to do the proper thing, mouthing little platitudes about morals and the sanctity of marriage, Elyot winked at Amanda. While the injured spouses made and reversed plans for divorces, the sinners paid less and less attention. At last Sibyl and Victor began to quarrel, each accusing the other of weakness in still loving such a wicked and worldly person as Amanda or Elyot. When Sibyl gave Victor a resounding slap, he in turn shook her soundly. In the midst of the quarrel Amanda and Elyot picked up their suitcases and tiptoed out the door together.

This work, sometimes called a novel, is a kind of biography of the reflections of a thoughtful, literate man. It is held together by the person of Henry Ryecroft, but there is little structure for the book as a whole. Rather, the episodes and sketches give Ryecroft's views on the widest variety of subjects from Xenophon to berries. The character of Ryecroft himself is revealed with scrupulous minuteness. Essentially a withdrawn humanist, he is gentle and remote but aware of his England.

The Story:

For many years Henry Ryecroft had toiled unceasingly at all kinds of writing. He did straight hack work, translating, and editing. At first he knew the bitterest of poverty, but at long intervals a book appeared under his name and at last he gained a somewhat less precarious livelihood. At rare intervals some modest affluence enabled him to take a short trip abroad. By the time he was fifty his health was failing; his wife had been dead for years, and his married daughter had a home of her own.

By a stroke of luck he inherited a legacy from an acquaintance, a sufficient income for his modest needs. He lost no time in leasing for twenty years a cottage in rural Devon and in bidding goodbye to his writing. In Devon he settled down contentedly with a quiet housekeeper. After his death his private papers, written during his few years in Devon, were arranged by a friend and published.

It was spring. For more than a week Ryecroft had done no writing. His house was perfect, with just enough room, a completely rustic setting, an interminable quiet. His housekeeper, who rarely spoke more than a word or two at a time, kept the house shining and cheerful. Ryecroft walked about the countryside in the pleasant weather. He was no botanist, but before long he knew the names of most of the common plants he saw.

One day he came upon a boy crying bitterly. The child had been given sixpence and sent to repay a debt, but he had lost the money and for hours he had been weeping in the wood. He did not fear his parents' wrath; rather, he was aware of how much a sixpence meant to them. Ryecroft gave him a sixpence. Not long before he could not have afforded such a sum.

Ryecroft remembered the many years when he was bound to the pavements of London. He lived in a mean room, ate irregularly, begrudged time away from his hack writing. The beds he slept in so soundly would now seem an abomination. He had been young in those days, but not for anything, not even for a regained youth, would he go through those lean years again.

Ryecroft had always purchased books, even when he was poor. Once he got a complete Gibbon at a bargain and carried it home in two trips. To look at booksellers' windows and at advertisements one might think that the English were literary or at least book lovers. But the daily newspaper was a better measuring rod. It was devoted to horse racing, scandal, war, and threats of war; books got very little space.

In the summer Ryecroft sat reading one day in his garden. A chance breeze carried a perfume that reminded him of his boyhood. His wise father had seen to it that his family was seldom in crowds. In those days it was still possible to find spots along the English coast where crowds were unknown, and the Ryecrofts always spent tranquil vacations at the seaside. It always seemed that their keenest pleasure came on the trip home when the train stopped at their station.

At one period of his life Ryecroft, with little respect for the Sabbath, had reserved his best satire for the day of sanctified rest. Now Sunday had become the culmination of a quiet week; its deeper quiet made a perfect day. The housekeeper, doing only necessary work, went to church twice. Surely it did her good. Ryecroft arose later than usual and dressed in different clothes. While the housekeeper was gone, he looked into rooms he seldom saw during the week. In London Sunday had always meant cacophonous church bells. When he was a boy, Sunday had been the day he was permitted to look at expensive adult books.

One thing about contemporary England was the decline of taste in food. Faddists vaunted the delights of vegetarianism, but lentils were a poor foreign substitute for good, honest English meat. Ryecroft had even met a man who boasted of eating only apples for breakfast.

A friend, a successful author, came to visit for two days. The friend, working only two or three hours a day, made two thousand pounds a year. He and Ryecroft, poor scriveners together in London, had never dreamed that they both should know prosperous times. His friend's visit recalled London more sharply; the only things he really missed in the metropolis were concerts and picture galleries.

In autumn Ryecroft was busy learning to distinguish the hawkweeds. He had no notion of a scientific classification; common names were more fitting. At dusk, as he was walking past a farmhouse, he saw the doctor's rig at the gate. After he had passed by he turned back to see the chimney silhouetted in the sunset afterglow. The scene was irresistible; he hurried home to read Tristram Shandy again after twenty years. Such impulses came fairly often. One morning he awoke an hour early, in great impatience to read the correspondence of Goethe and Schiller.

The triumph of Darwinism and the spread of positivism had many consequences. Agnosticism was an early result, too reasonable to last. Oriental magic, Buddhism, hypnotism were all the rage for a while, as psychical phenomena and telepathy were now, but Ryecroft was equally indifferent to esoteric fads and to the discoveries of Marconi and Edison. Boasts about triumphs of human knowledge were childish. He agreed somewhat with Spinoza, who said that the free man thinks of death only rarely, although he was not free in Spinoza's sense. Thinking of death very often, he found the stoics a comfort.

During his first winter in Devon, Ryecroft tried to keep a wood fire. Now he had a comfortable coal grate. A storm recalled the days when he would gladly have tramped far in the wind and rain, but such an exploit would kill him now. His room seemed the most comfortable in all England. Comfortable also because he was able to spend money, he sent fifty pounds to an indigent friend and passed a pleasant hour thinking of his friend's delight at the windfall.

In those days it was the fashion to condemn the English kitchen. Cooks were called gross and unimaginative, but Ryecroft believed that English cooking was the best in the world. The beef tasted like beef, and the mutton was decidedly mutton. Rather than being a nation with one sauce, only England knew the virtues of meat gravy. However, English cooking had been better before the oven became the cook's friend and refuge; a spitted joint was incomparably better than a modern oven roast.

The strength of England probably came from two sources. First there had been Puritanism, which set moral standards. Also, the English read the Old Testament; they were the chosen people. Perhaps the last thirty years had seen the decline of conventional religion and the growth of materialism. The old prudishness, however, had given way to new strength.

THE PROFESSOR

Author: Charlotte Brontë (1816-1855)

Type of plot: Psychological romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Belgium and England

First published: 1857

Principal characters:

WILLIAM CRIMSWORTH, the narrator, a young teacher
EDWARD CRIMSWORTH, his brother
MR. HUNSDEN, a wealthy mill owner
M. PELET, master of a boys' school
Mlle. ZORAÏDE REUTER, mistress of a girls' school
Mlle. FRANCES EVANS HENRI, a student

Critique:

The Professor, Charlotte Brontë's first completed novel, was not published until after her death. Simplified in plot and free from the atmosphere of mysticism and mystery contained in Villette, The Professor reads like an early study for that later novel. The story of an English teacher who seeks fortune in Europe, the book presents a rather touching love story and deals with certain problems which seem to have disturbed the young author: Catholicism, marriage, continental culture. The brief picture of Hunsden suggests an embryonic Rochester, and the characterization of Zoraïde Reuter is quite well drawn. Much of the material in this novel was drawn from Charlotte Brontë's own experience; the location of the girls' school in Brussels, for example, is that of the institution attended by the Brontë sisters in 1842.

The Story:

Orphaned in infancy, William Crimsworth had been meagerly supported by his mother's brothers, Lord Tynedale and the Hon. John Seacombe. William's brother Edward, ten years his senior, had taken over his deceased father's mill and prospered.

Upon his graduation from Eton, William, refusing to accept further aid from the uncles who had treated his mother so coldly, asked his brother for employment. When he arrived at Bigben Close, where the mill was located, Edward censured his young brother for having submitted to Tynedale and Seacombe for so many years. Edward was harsh and cold in speech and act, and his pretty young wife, although inclined at first toward warmth, began to treat William in much the same way. Edward hired William as a clerk at ninety pounds a year and requested that the young man live away from Crimsworth Hall.

A grudging brother and a harsh master, Edward invited William to his house only once, along with some other mill workers, to attend a party. That evening William met Mr. Hunsden, a flippant, wealthy mill owner who, judging Edward a false brother and a tyrant, publicly denounced him. As a result Edward furiously dismissed William. Hearing of William's decision to go to the continent, Mr. Hunsden gave him a letter of introduction to a Mr. Brown in Brussels.

When William presented his letter, Mr. Brown suggested teaching as a possible career. Through his influence William became a teacher of English and Latin in the pension of M. Pelet. Next door to M. Pelet's day school was a seminary for girls headed by Mlle. Reuter. Shortly afterward Mlle. Reuter asked William to give lessons to her girls during part of each week.

Having met Madame Reuter, a gross and droll woman, William was surprised to find her daughter, Zoraïde Reuter, young and charming. Teaching young ladies, William discovered, was not the same as teaching young boys. Made-moiselles Eulalie, Hortense, and Caroline proved to be haughtily disdainful but at the same time coquettish. M. Pelet, taking deep interest in William's personal relationships at Mlle. Reuter's school, questioned him about his impressions of Mlle. Reuter and the three young coquettes of the classroom.

William admired Mlle. Reuter. When he made a weak attempt at flirtation, she did not discourage him. But one night he overheard M. Pelet and Mlle. Reuter talking in the park about their forthcoming marriage, which M. Pelet wished to hasten and she wished to delay. M. Pelet then accused her of encouraging William, who was obviously in love with her, and he described the affair as ludicrous, since she was ten years William's senior. Mlle. Reuter, laughing pleasantly at M. Pelet's disclosure, denied interest in William.

Although William knew M. Pelet to be insincere in his friendship, he did not reveal his knowledge. He did, however, attempt to overcome his attraction toward Mlle. Reuter. William sensed that she was trying to regain his favor when she appealed to him to treat kindly a new pupil, Mlle. Frances Henri, who was also a teacher at the seminary. William, not disposed to please Mlle. Reuter, harshly criticized Frances on her first appearance. Later he was surprised at the girl's fine accent in reading English, and his interest turned from Mlle. Reuter to Frances, who was an enigma to him. Once, taking time for private and encouraging discourse with his apt pupil, he found that the schoolmistress had been eavesdropping. William learned that the girl's mother had been English, that she had been reared by an aunt, and that she was trying to educate herself in the hope of teaching French in England, where her present profession as a teacher of sewing would not be a stigma upon her dignity if she were also a teacher of language.

William, watching Frances grow in poise and wit, made special efforts to encourage her, until Mlle. Reuter warned him that he gave Frances too much of his time. The directress seemed to hover over him constantly in an attempt to recapture his affections; but he found her deceitful, artful, cruel. After she abruptly dismissed Frances from the seminary, she innocently pleaded that she did not know the young woman's address.

Frances returned to the seminary to find William, but the directress kept them from meeting. Instead, William received a note of thanks from his pupil and twenty francs in payment for his teaching. William gave Mlle. Reuter notice that he intended to quit the seminary.

After a month's futile search for Frances he accidentally came upon her mourning over the grave of her father. When it began to rain, Frances took William to her rooms, where the pair drank tea and read from an English book. Frances was earning a living by lace mending. She could not seek another position as a teacher because she feared that Mlle. Reuter would not give her satisfactory references. Bitterly resenting Mlle. Reuter's treachery, William took his leave. He managed to return the twenty francs before he departed.

Drawn to William by his coolness, Mlle. Reuter had repulsed M. Pelet with hints that she favored the English schoolmaster. After William's resignation, perceiving that she had overplayed her hand, she returned her favor to M. Pelet. Smirking with victory, he informed William of his forthcoming marriage. William, deciding that the school would be intolerable with Mme. Pelet under the same roof, resigned his position.

Frances wrote that she had been employed by a Mrs. D. to teach in an English school in Brussels. Along with this communication came a letter from Hunsden announcing his arrival. Hunsden, after berating William for his failure to forge ahead, casually announced that Edward's mill had failed. He had sold Crimsworth Hall and abused his wife until she left him, but he had managed to renew his credit, start another business, and regain his wife. William's one concern over the matter was the whereabouts of his mother's portrait, which had hung in Crimsworth Hall. The next morning William received from Hunsden, as a gift, the missing portrait.

Within a few weeks William was fortunate enough to be appointed professor of English in a college in Brussels. Cheered by the promise of his new position, William went to Frances, whom he had not seen since the night he had met her in the cemetery, and asked her to marry him. She accepted on the condition that she retain her teaching post. Although William's income was large enough for both, she pleaded that she did not wish to marry him merely to be supported.

William and Frances were married. Within a few months Mrs. Crimsworth proposed that she elevate her position by starting a school, and William agreed to her plan.

When they had been married ten years, a period in which Frances' school flourished and a son had been born, the Crimsworths went to England to live. They settled near Hunsden, who during the years that followed became their close friend. Young Victor Crimsworth, reflecting in character many of the attributes of each parent, grew up in the atmosphere of a tranquil and loving home.

THE PROFESSOR'S HOUSE

Author: Willa Cather (1876-1947)

Type of plot: Psychological realism

Time of plot: A few years after World War I

Locale: Hamilton, a Midwestern university town

First published: 1925

Principal characters:

GODFREY ST. PETER, a middle-aged teacher and historian

LILLIAN ST. PETER, his wife

ROSAMOND, and

KATHLEEN, their daughters

LOUIE MARCELLUS, Rosamond's husband

SCOTT MCGREGOR, Kathleen's husband

TOM OUTLAND, a former student at Hamilton

AUGUSTA, a seamstress

Critique:

Although Willa Cather uses a minimum of lively incident in The Professor's House, the novel is intricate in both its character portrayal and its plot structure. Godfrey St. Peter is one of the author's most sensitive and sympathetic creations, and it is the mirror of his nostalgic but discerning mind which reflects the tensions of shifting relationships in the St. Peter family. The story does not move in straightforward fashion; flashbacks and indirect revelation of past events are used to throw light on a baffling and complicated personal problem. There is little surface drama in what happens to Godfrey St. Peter, but his inward struggle is unfolded with uncommon directness and illumination.

The Story:

The Oxford prize for history brought Professor Godfrey St. Peter not only a certain international reputation but also the sum of five thousand pounds. The five thousand pounds, in turn, built the St. Peter family a new house, into which the Professor had been frankly reluctant to move.

For half a lifetime the attic of the old house had been his favorite spot—it was there that he had done his best writing, with his daughters' dress forms for his only company—and it was in this workroom that Augusta, the family sewing-woman, found him when she came to transfer the dress forms to the new house. To her astonishment, the Professor declared quizzically that she could not have them; he intended to retain the old house in order to preserve his workroom intact, and everything must be left as it was.

Nevertheless, the new house made its own claims. That same evening found the Professor host at a small dinner party for a visiting Englishman. The Professor's daughters and their husbands were present, and during dinner the conversation turned to the new country house being built by Rosamond and Louie. Louie explained to the visitor why the name Outland had been selected for the estate. Tom Outland had been a brilliant scientific student at Hamilton, as well as The Professor's protégé. Before being killed in the war, he had been engaged to Rosamond. His will had left everything to her, including control of his revolutionary invention, the Outland vacuum. Later, Louie Marcellus himself had married Rosamond and successfully marketed Tom's invention. The new house, Louie concluded, would serve in some measure as a memorial to Outland.

Louie's lack of reserve visibly irritated the McGregors, and the Professor himself maintained a cool silence. The next morning his wife took him to task for it. Lillian had been fiercely jealous of her husband's interest in Tom Outland. The Professor found himself reflecting that people who fall in love, and who go on being in love, always meet with something which suddenly or gradually makes a difference. Oddly enough, in the case of Lillian and her husband, it had seemed to be his pupil, Tom Outland.

More and more the Professor sought the refuge of his study in the old house, where he could insulate himself against increasing family strain. Even here, however, interruptions came. Once it was Rosamond, self-conscious about accepting all the benefits of the Outland invention. Her father refused to share her good fortune but suggested that she aid cancer-ridden Professor Crane, who had collaborated with Tom in his experiments. Rosamond stiffened immediately, for outside the family she recognized no obligations.

Soon there was more evidence that the family was drifting apart. Kathleen confessed to her father her violent reaction to Rosamond's arrogance. It became known that Louie, attempting to join the Arts and Letters Club, had been blackballed by his brother-in-law. The Professor was distressed by the rift between his daughters, both of whom he loved, although he had a special affection for Kathleen.

Louie Marcellus' real fondness for the St. Peters was demonstrated when the time came for the Professor to fill a lecture date in Chicago. He and Rosamond, paying all bills, took them to Chicago, installed them in a luxurious hotel suite, and tempted them with diversions. During a performance of Mignon, Lillian, softened by memories aroused by the opera, confirmed the Professor's impression that her resentment of Tom Outland had affected their marriage.

Louie's next plan was even more elaborate: he and Rosamond would take the Professor and Lillian to France for the summer. The Professor loved France, but he recognized the futility of trying to compromise his and Louie's ideas of a European vacation. He begged off, pleading the pressure of work, and eventually the others departed without him.

The Professor moved back into the old house and luxuriated in independence. He decided to edit for publication Tom Outland's youthful diary, and constantly he turned over in his mind the events in Tom's dramatic history.

Years before, Tom had appeared on the Professor's doorstep as a sunburned young man who was obviously unaccustomed to the ways of society. Tom wanted to go to college, although his only previous instruction had come from a priest in New Mexico. Interested and curious, the Professor saw to it that Tom had a chance to make up his deficiencies and enter the university. The St. Peter house became the boy's second home, and the little girls were endlessly fascinated by his tales of the Southwest. To them he confided that his parents had died during their wagon journey westward and that he had been adopted by a kindly worker on the Sante Fé Railroad.

Tom's diary was chiefly concerned with his strangest boyhood adventure. To regain his strength after an attack of pneumonia, he became a herd rider on the summer range. With him went his closest friend, Roddie Blake. On the range Tom and Roddie were challenged by the nearness of the mysterious Blue Mesa, hitherto unclimbed and unexplored. They saved their wages and made plans; when their job was finished, they set out to conquer Blue Mesa.

They made a striking discovery. In the remote canyons of the mesa were Indian rock villages, undisturbed for three hundred years and in a miraculous state of preservation. This gift of history stirred Tom to a strong decision. His find should be presented to his country; the relics must not be exploited for profit. With Roddie's consent he took six hundred dollars, boarded a train, and left for Washington.

Weeks later he returned, worn out by red tape and indifference, only to learn that Roddie had finally weakened and sold the Indian treasures to a foreign scientist.

In a climax of bitterness he quarreled with Roddie. A year later he walked into the Professor's garden.

Recalling Tom Outland had always brought the Professor a kind of second youth. Tom was the kind of person the Professor had started out to be—vigorous, unspoiled, ambitious. Marrying Lillian had brought happiness, none the less real for having now faded; but it had chained him, he felt, and diverted the true course of his life. Now, reviewing the past, the Professor suddenly felt tired and old. At the news that the travelers would soon return, he thought he could not again assume a family role that had become meaningless.

When Augusta came for the keys to reopen the new house, she found the Professor lying unconscious on the floor of his den. Its one window had blown shut, and the unvented gas stove had done the rest. Augusta sent for the doctor, and the Professor was revived. He found that his temporary release from consciousness had cleared his mind. He was not only ready to face his family, but he was ready to face himself and a problem that came too late for him to flee.

THE PROMISED LAND

Type of work: Novel

DR. HASSING, a physician

Critique:

Pontoppidan's novel reflects the class distinctions and the division between town and country folk in nineteenth-century Denmark, at a time when the peasants were struggling for a greater voice in the affairs of that country. As in the case of so many European novels dealing with social problems, the characterization, the plot, and the happenings are secondary to the social meaning and the tone of the work. As a result, the characters are types rather than individuals, and in a plot subordinate to theme the happenings are not skillfully tied together. Quite obviously these items were relatively unimportant to the author; he was intent upon giving a picture of the struggle between the People's Party and the Conservatives, and the effects of that struggle on individuals. Sympathetic to the less-favored group, Pontoppidan, like so many problem novelists, told only one side of the story; one result is that his upper-class characters, like those of the American novelist Theodore Dreiser, are often overdrawn.

The Story:

Emanuel Hansted, son of a wealthy Copenhagen family, and a minister, had left his home city years before to take over a pastorate in the country. Somewhat of a reformer, he had become addicted to the socialism rife in Europe in the second half of the nineteenth century, and to prove his fellowship with the peasants whom he served he had married a peasant girl and undertaken to farm the land on which the rectory was situated.

As the years passed Hansted's wife, Hansine, presented him with three children; his land, however, repaid him only with debts. Although he tried experiment after experiment, Emanuel's fields did not produce enough to support his family. Stubbornly, Emanuel refused to acknowledge that he was no farmer; he even continued to refuse any payment from his parishioners and gave away the money he received for the benefit of the poor.

In spite of his sacrifices, despite his never-flagging efforts to share their lives, and his ties with them through marriage, the peasants did not accept him as one of themselves. The fact that he had come among them as an outlander was too strong for them to forget, even in the times of stress that came when the newly-formed People's Party of Denmark, representing chiefly the peasantry, was trying to control the government, in order to provide for the education of the masses and to improve the lot of the common people generally.

To the casual eye Emanuel might have seemed a peasant, for he had nothing to do with the few gentry who lived in the vicinity. He even distrusted the doctor, whom he had to call in occasionally to treat a member of his family. Indeed, Emanuel summoned Doctor Hassing only when an emergency existed. As for his family, Emanuel had put his father and his sister entirely out of his mind; only his wife and children, who tied him to the peasantry, were acknowledged as kin.

One summer all of nature and mankind seemed determined to show that Emanuel was a misfit in the rural area he had adopted. His crops were even poorer than usual. He had borrowed the seed he put into the ground, and, after it was in, nature refused to send the weather he needed to produce successful yields in the fields. In Copenhagen the Conservative Party gained in strength and defeated the People's Party, first in small items, then in large. As the peasants lost their political power, the people of Emanuel's parish began to look upon him as one who belonged on the other side.

As if that were not enough, Emanuel's oldest child, a son, began to suffer from an ear inflammation that had gone untended for two years. At last, upon Hansine's insistence, Emanuel sent for Dr. Hassing. The physician could not believe that Emanuel had permitted the child's health to fall into such a dangerous state; Emanuel, on his part, could not understand that the child was really ill. Failing to follow the doctor's advice, he treated his son as if he were well and healthy. Because of his father's failure to face reality, the boy died.

Before long Emanuel and Hansine began to drift apart, for their son's death had erected a barrier between them that had been years in the making. Hansine felt that her husband really was unhappy, and she believed that he actually wanted to escape from the dismal, unappreciative rural parish.

Quite by chance, while out walking alone to prepare his Sunday sermon, Emanuel came upon Dr. Hassing and a small party of picnickers. Prevailed upon to join the group, he found among them Miss Tonnesen, his former fiancée from Copenhagen. Emanuel walked back to Dr. Hassing's home with the picnickers and, because it was growing dark, remained for supper. The genteel conversation, the quiet wealth of the home, the very food on the table, the music after supper—all of these things reminded Emanuel of what he had lost when he had refused Miss Tonnesen's love, rejected the family warmth of his parents' home, and turned instead toward the simple, rude life of the peasants. In the days following he ridiculed the people with whom he had spent a few hours, but Hansine saw that he was merely trying to convince himself that he had chosen the 'right path in his life's work.

A few weeks later Miss Tonnesen, who had gone out into the rural area to prove to herself that her former suitor had sunk beneath her, visited the rectory. Her father had been the former rector of the parish; under his care the rectory had been a place of beauty, both within and without. His daughter, seeing it for the first time in many years, was amazed to see how Emanuel had let it fall into disrepair. Only a few of the rooms, equipped with the barest of essentials, were in use. The gardens and lawns were overgrown; even the outbuildings and fields had been years without proper care. Miss Tonnesen could scarcely believe that the man she had loved could have permitted the grounds in his charge, and himself as well, to slip into the state in which she found them.

Miss Tonnesen's visit bothered Hansine. She saw in the other woman all that her husband had given up when he had married her instead of a woman from his own social class. Even Hansine's children asked if they could go to Copenhagen to visit the beautiful lady. Emanuel himself realized that Miss Tonnesen represented something he had lost, but could still regain. He became dissatisfied with the peasantry, and they quickly sensed his unrest. His farm workers left him when, angry because the rains ruined any chance he had of harvesting a crop of rye, he abused them for their laziness.

The climax came when the director of the district high school, a man who as head of the institution had done much for the peasants, died. Everyone in the region went to the funeral. After it was over a political meeting formed of its own accord. Emanuel, when asked to address the meeting, spoke out against the sloth and narrow prejudices of the peasants. As he spoke, murmurings arose; he finally had to stop speaking when the crowd began to shout insults and ridicule. As he slowly left the meeting, he could hear a new speaker declaring that the pastor should return to his own people.

He met Hansine at the edge of the crowd; slowly they started home. On the way back Hansine told Emanuel that he ought to return to Copenhagen and she to her former life. He sadly agreed. The children, it was decided, would go with their father. To Emanuel's delight, his father and sister wrote him to return as soon as possible. As a result, one morning he and his remaining two children climbed into a carriage and drove away, while Hansine turned to walk to her parents' cottage.

Critique:

Always a defender of the integrity of the monarchy, Dumas here presents a lively picture of court intrigue and royal passion. As a mystery story this novel presents not one loose thread or irrelevant detail. As historical fiction it attempts to describe the person of Marie Antoinette as a woman of extreme charm, intelligence, and honor. Count Cagliostro, a character in several romances by Dumas, is again in this book a sinister and mysterious figure motivating the action.

The Story:

The Countess Jeanne de La Motte Valois, a descendant of the fallen royal house of Valois, aspired to return to favor in the court of Louis XVI. Suffering extreme poverty, she was honored by a visit from the queen, who gave her money and promised her assistance.

The queen was always a victim of intrigues by her enemies. Even on the night when she had, with the assistance of Andrée de Taverny, made a charitable visit to the Countess de La Motte, one of her enemies had whispered into the king's ear that her majesty had gone on a nocturnal mission of doubtful purpose. Her honesty and proud demeanor put the king to shame, however, and as a conciliatory gesture he offered her a fabulously expensive necklace, which she refused on the grounds that France needed a new battleship more than the queen needed jewels.

Andrée's brother, Philippe de Taverny, was favored by Marie Antoinette for his courtesy and grace. He promptly fell in love with her. At a court reception Philippe was thwarted in his love by perceiv-ing that Count de Charny had won the queen's favor. It was Andrée's fate to have fallen in love with de Charny also, and she watched with jealousy the queen's innocent flirtation.

While Jeanne de La Motte was plotting to gain entrance to the royal court, Cardinal de Rohan, disliked by the queen because of his former disapproval of her marriage to King Louis, was also hoping to win a place at court. These two hopefuls, combining talents, agreed to aid one another in their ambitious projects.

Count Cagliostro, a mystic and a malicious conspirator against the nobility of France, plotted to create a public scandal about the queen. To aid him he produced an unknown girl, Oliva, whose amazing resemblance to Marie Antoinette deceived even the queen's closest friends. First Count Cagliostro sent Oliva to the salon of M. Mesmer, where she exploited her emotions publicly, drawing attention to herself. Her witnesses mistook her for the queen. Next Count Cagliostro brought the girl to a masquerade ball attended by many of the nobility in disguise, but an affair beneath the dignity of the queen. Again it was said that Marie Antoinette had appeared in public in a most ungracious manner. At the salon and at the ball Jeanne de La Motte had seen the woman who was not really the queen at all. Cardinal de Rohan had been with Jeanne at the ball. Jeanne had perceived that he loved Marie Antoinette, whose disdain for him was well-known.

Widespread gossip about her conduct reached the queen, who, anxious to belie her accusers, brought Jeanne to the king and asked her to assure the monarch that the queen had not degraded herself in the salon of M. Mesmer. The king loyally asserted that he needed no assurance from an outsider that his queen did not lie. But the gossip about Marie Antoinette's presence at the masquerade ball was not so easily explained away. The queen denied having been there; Jeanne claimed that she had seen her. Others were called as witnesses. Both Philippe and de Charny said that they had recognized her when her mask dropped off. King Louis came to the queen's rescue by vowing that he had been with her in her apartment on the night of the ball.

Jeanne, guided by her intuition, knew that the queen coveted the beautiful necklace that the king had wanted to purchase for her from the jewelers, Boehmer and Bossange. When Jeanne assured de Rohan that the queen would be pleased to own the necklace, he, hoping to buy her royal favor, arranged to purchase it by delivering a down payment of five hundred thousand francs. Jeanne, at Versailles, promptly told Marie Antoinette of de Rohan's generous intention. Her reaction was to assume responsibility for the payment of the necklace herself; as queen, she could not accept so generous a favor from a subject. When de Rohan brought the necklace to her, she graciously dismissed the old enmity between them. Unfortunately, King Louis chose that time to be frugal and refused to grant the queen the sum of money she desired. With timely malice Count Cagliostro collected from de Rohan an old debt of five hundred thousand francs. Hearing of the transaction from Jeanne, the queen ordered her to take the necklace back to Boehmer and Bossange.

But Jeanne had her own plans. She forged a note from the jewelers to the queen acknowledging receipt of the necklace. Next she forged a note from the queen to the jewelers promising to pay the balance due them within three months. Meanwhile Jeanne kept the jewels. To safeguard her theft, she had to prevent de Rohan, who assumed that the queen had kept the necklace, from meeting Marie Antoinette. He had been told by the deceived jewelers that the queen would pay for the necklace.

Count Cagliostro assisted Jeanne in her plan by taking Oliva to live in a house close to that of Jeanne. When the two women met, Jeanne knew at once she was facing the woman who had compromised the queen by her conduct at M. Mesmer's salon and at the ball. She escorted Oliva to the park on three successive nights, and there de Rohan courted the woman he mistook for Marie Antoinette. De Charny, witnessing the amorous meeting, thought that he saw the queen. Angry and grieved, he reproached Marie Antoinette for her conduct. Again she realized that someone had been impersonating her.

When the day of payment for the necklace arrived, the jewelers petitioned the queen for their money. After an exchange of angry words, Marie Antoinette and the jewelers realized that they had been duped and that their respective notes were forgeries.

The scandal broke. De Rohan, believing that the queen was his mistress but wishing to conceal the fact for his own protection, still assumed that the queen would pay for the jewels. The jewelers thought that he would pay for them. The public thought that the queen retained the necklace so that de Rohan, for love of her, would be forced to pay, or that the king, to avert scandal, would satisfy the jewelers.

When de Charny came to offer the queen his money, she declared her intention to prove her innocence, and she placed de Charny in hiding while she conducted an interview with de Rohan. When the deceived cardinal discreetly hinted at their secret love affair, the queen, outraged, sent for the king. De Rohan had no proof of his accusation. Still believing that he had possessed the queen and that she had kept the necklace, he was sentenced to the Bastille.

De Charny emerged from hiding to throw himself at the queen's feet just as the king returned. To explain de Charny's supplicating position, Marie Antoinette had to invent a lie. She said that he was begging for permission to marry Andrée de Taverney, who had entered a convent.

Brought before the queen, Jeanne de La Motte refused to divulge any enlightening evidence and followed de Rohan to the Bastille. Jeanne knew, however, that she controlled the situation. If pressed too hard, she could intimate that the queen and de Rohan had a reason for charging her with the theft of the necklace. Then the police discovered Oliva. Seeing her, the queen understood the intrigue that had been worked against her, but Jeanne was still able to connive and to lie about her association with Oliva so that, in the end, no one was convinced of the queen's innocence. The public, believing Marie Antoinette guilty of adultery and theft, assumed that the person known as Oliva had been invented to conceal the queen's guilt.

After the trial, Cardinal de Rohan and Count Cagliostro, also arrested, were freed. Jeanne de La Motte was publicly branded. The queen was still suspected of being involved in a scandal. No one in the palace realized all involved in the affair were themselves on the threshold of the Bastille and that the Revolution was impending.

ESTHER ROOT, his second wife

Raintree County is a long novel, panoramic in scope. The story deals with the events of a single day, but by a series of flashbacks it encompasses almost half a century of American history and life. Through the story pass statesmen, soldiers, prostitutes, gamblers, shoddy politicians, simple people of the soil, all fused into the picture that is America. Here are the men and women of the new Republic, struggling through greed, lust, and war to produce the freedom that had been promised one hundred years before.

The Story:

July 4, 1892: That was the day Raintree County, Indiana, had been waiting for. Her most illustrious son, Senator Garwood B. Jones, would make the main address of the day, introduced by his old friend, John Wickliff Shawnessy, teacher. And as John Shawnessy awoke on the morning of that fateful day, his life began to pass before his eyes. It was a fitful picture—events and people crossed each other without regard to time. Some of the pictures were symbolic, some real. But through them all John Shawnessy searched for the meaning of his life. Somewhere was the key to the secret of his existence. During the day he visited the graveyard, studied an old atlas of the county, talked with old friends. Pieced together, the events of that day told the story of John Wickliff Shawnessy, teacher.

Johnny's father was a preacher, a doctor, a teetotaler. His mother was a gentle woman whom he loved more than he was aware of. Johnny's childhood and adolescence were spent like those of most youths in Raintree County, in playing, working, and dreaming of greatness to come. Two people stood out above all others in those days. One was Garwood B. Jones, the other, Nell Gaither. Garwood, showing signs of becoming a politician, was a smooth talker, a shrewd judge of character, a man without principles. Nell was the girl Johnny had loved since he was old enough to know such feelings. She was a combination of lady and hoyden.

Life in Raintree County was brightened by the appearance of Professor Jerusalem Webster Stiles, who established an academy of higher learning. The "Perfessor," as he was affectionately called, was a cynic and a fraud. His training of the young men was devoted slightly to Greek and Latin and heavily to methods of seducing desirable women. His caustic tongue and vivid history drew young men like a magnet.

On the day he had his graduation picture taken, Johnny met Susanna Drake, a southern girl of wealth and sensuous beauty, but questionable reputation. She was an orphan, lately moved to the village from New Orleans to occupy a house she had inherited. She spoke boldly to Johnny and filled him with desire. Although he desired Susanna's beauty, his heart remained true to Nell.

A picnic was held on graduation night. Nell went with Garwood, who escorted her most of the time, but she and Johnny slipped off together and confessed that they loved each other. In Paradise Lake the two went swimming, nude. Johnny never knew what might have happened next, for they were forced back to decency by the yells of their comrades. It seems that the "Perfessor" and the minister's wife had run off together, and a posse with a rope was hunting the scoundrel. They found the woman at home—the elopers had missed their train—and Johnny later helped the "Perfessor" to escape. Many years were to pass before the man and the boy met again.

On July Fourth of that same year, Johnny found himself again at Paradise Lake, this time with Susanna. As he yielded to his desire and possessed the girl, he knew that it was Nell he really loved.

Susanna returned to New Orleans. In October, Johnny received a letter saying she was coming back to him, pregnant. By the time Susanna arrived, Johnny had made his peace with himself and decided to marry her, although he still loved Nell. Even when Susanna confessed on the night before the wedding that she was not pregnant but only loved him so much that she must marry him, Johnny forgave her.

After the wedding Johnny and Susanna spent a long honeymoon in the South. The year was 1859 and war was fast approaching. Johnny was anti-slavery and Susanna violently pro-South. She seemed to be driven by some mad obsession about Negroes. In New Orleans, Johnny learned a little of her history. Her father had loved a slave and had installed the woman in his house, giving her equality with his insane wife. All three had died in a fire, but it was rumored that the husband and slave had been shot first, locked in an embrace.

Home again, Susanna gave birth to a baby who soon became the greatest joy of his father. Susanna grew more and more withdrawn, alternately spitting out hate and melting in passion. She was driven by desperation, for what Johnny could only suspect. In one last frenzy, she set fire to their house and burned the baby to death. She was rescued, her mind completely gone, and Johnny sent her back to her people to be cared for. He knew at last what he had long suspected. Susanna was the daughter of the slave woman, reared as his own by her father because he loved the Negro woman above all else. Susanna had also known, but she had fought against the knowledge. Unable to escape it, she had tried to expiate the sin through fire, as her father's wife had done.

Johnny enlisted in the war and lived through many bloody campaigns. He ceased to be John Shawnessy, a human being, and became only John Shawnessy, a soldier. He was wounded, reported dead, present at the theater when Lincoln was shot. None of these events really touched Johnny. His soul was back in Raintree County, rooted in the soil of his homeland.

After the war he spent two years in New York with the "Perfessor," now a newspaperman. Johnny had planned through the war years to get his marriage annulled and return home to marry Nell. But he found that Nell had married Garwood after Johnny's reported death and had died in childbirth. There was nothing now to keep him in Raintree County. But New York provided nothing substantial to his life, and when he was called home by his mother's death, he put his roots down for good. He taught school and became the local philosopher. Susanna, he learned, had escaped her relatives; she was believed dead. On the strength of that information, Johnny married a former pupil, Esther Root. Esther's father, considering Johnny an atheist and a bigamist, would not give his consent. The couple eloped, and Mr. Root would never again receive his daughter. The years were good to Johnny and Esther. They had a fine family and a respected place in the community. There were people, however, who considered John Shawnessy evil and plotted to expose him to the world.

On the night of July 4, 1892, after the departure of Senator Garwood B. Jones, a delegation from the revival meeting accused Johnny and a local widow of immorality. But the "Perfessor," back to cover the celebration, showed the crowd instead that it was the minister, leader of the posse, who had seduced one of his flock. The "Perfessor" thought it a huge joke that he who had once been run out of town by a preacher could now turn the tables after so many years.

The day having ended, John Shawnessy walked the deserted streets of this village in Raintree County. He was thinking of the yesterdays and tomorrows that are America.

RALPH ROISTER DOISTER

Type of work: Drama

Author: Nicholas Udall (1505-1556)

Type of plot: Farce

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: England

First presented: c. 1553

Principal characters:

RALPH ROISTER DOISTER, a well-to-do, cowardly braggart

MATHEW MERYGREEKE, Roister Doister's hanger-on

DAME CHRISTIAN CUSTANCE, a well-to-do widow

GAWIN GOODLUCK, Dame Custance's fiancé

SYM SURESBY, Gawin Goodluck's friend

Critique:

This drama is one of the early English plays acted by schoolboys and patterned after the Roman drama popular in the schools at the time. Neither the plot nor the characters demanded much subtlety from the youthful actors who originally played it. The humor is broad and the language at times very earthy. Some scenes are truly slapstick, as the scene in which grown men armed with swords are routed by a widow and her servants armed only with household utensils. Some of the characters in the play are modeled on the stock figures of Roman drama, and some are not. Merygreeke is quickly recognizable as the parasite of Roman drama, and Roister Doister himself is found to be the braggart so typical of classical comedy. Dame Christian, on the other hand, is an English addition to the drama, in her way a sixteenth-century version of Chaucer's Wife of Bath. Her humor can, in fact, be traced to the broad comedy of early mystery plays, as presented in the Towneley Cycle.

The Story:

Mathew Merygreeke, a gay young rascal who likened himself to the grasshopper of the fable, had often had fun and money at the expense of Ralph Roister Doister, a well-to-do, doltish young man who bragged long and loud of his bravery but failed to act anything but the coward when called to action.

In addition, Ralph Roister Doister imagined himself in love with every woman he met, and he swore each time he fell in love that he could not live without the woman who had most lately caught his eye. One day, meeting Merygreeke on the street, he asserted that he was now madly in love with Dame Christian Custance, a widow reported to be wealthy. She had captivated Roister Doister when he saw her at supper.

Merygreeke, anxious to please the man he constantly gulled, agreed to help Roister Doister pursue his suit. He assured the foolish braggart that the widow was certain to accept him and that Roister Doister ought really to try to marry someone of higher station and greater fortune.

Merygreeke went for musicians to serenade Dame Custance, while Roister Doister waited in front of the widow's home. As he waited, three of the widow's servant women came from the house and talked and sang. When they noticed Roister Doister, he came up, talked to them, and tried to kiss them. After talking with them for a time, Roister Doister gave them a love letter to deliver to their mistress. He boasted that he had written it himself.

Given the letter by her serving-woman, Dame Custance was furious. She reminded her servants that she was an honorable woman, affianced to Gawin Goodluck, who had been for some months on a sea voyage. Dame Custance refused to break the seal of the letter, much less read it.

Meanwhile, to further his suit, Roister Doister sent his servant to the widow's house with some love gifts, a ring and a token in a cloth. The young servant, after some trouble, convinced the widow's serving-women to take the gifts to their mistress, even though she had been angry at receiving the letter.

Handed the gifts, the widow became even angrier, lectured her servants on their conduct, and finally sent a boy to find the man who had delivered the gifts to her house.

Merygreeke, after many a laugh over what happened during Roister Doister's suit, finally went to Dame Custance and revealed his scheme for gulling Roister Doister. The widow said she would never marry such a doltish man, but agreed to join in the fun at the braggart's expense. She went so far as to read the letter he had written to her and said she would make a reply.

Rejoining Roister Doister, Merygreeke listened to the suitor's woeful tale and then told him in outrageous terms that the widow had refused his suit, called him vile names, and accused him of cowardice. Roister Doister immediately vowed that he would assault the widow's house with intent to kill her in combat, along with all her servants. Over Merygreeke's protests, Roister Doister set out to get his men together. Merygreeke laughed and waited, knowing that the cowardly braggart would never carry out his vow.

When they arrived at the widow's house, Merygreeke offered Roister Doister an excuse for not leading the assault. Instead, the braggart began once more to woo the widow with music and song. He sent Merygreeke to call the widow from her house.

Dame Custance went out to Roister Doister and repeated her refusal of his foolish proposal. Then she read his letter aloud, and by rephrasing it and repunctuating it she made the letter as insulting as Roister Doister had meant it to be loving. The result thoroughly confused the suitor, who vowed it was not the letter he had sent to her. After she left, Roister Doister sent for the scrivener who had actually written the letter for him. The scrivener took the letter, read it aright, and convinced Roister Doister that someone had tricked him.

In the meantime Sym Suresby, friend of the widow's fiancé, arrived to tell Dame Custance that her affianced suitor, Gawin Goodluck, had returned from his voyage and would be with her shortly. Suresby saw and heard enough of the conversation between the widow and Roister Doister to think that the widow was unfaithful to Goodluck. He went off, leaving the widow furious at the tomfoolery of Roister Doister. When she chased Roister Doister off, he again vowed to have revenge on the widow and her servants. Gathering his men, he approached her house a second time.

The widow, meanwhile, had gone to a trusted friend to enlist his support in getting rid of the troublesome Roister Doister, who threatened to ruin her approaching marriage to Goodluck. The friend consented to aid her. They also enlisted Merygreeke, who agreed to help them and at the same time pull more tricks at the expense of Roister Doister.

The foolish suitor and his men were routed by the widow with household utensils used as weapons. Having proved himself a coward as well as a fool, Roister Doister renounced his suit for the widow's hand. When Goodluck appeared soon afterward, Dame Custance was able to assure him that the reports he had had from Sym Suresby were muddled and that she had never broken her vows to him. She did, however, berate Suresby for not making certain of the truth before repeating what he had heard.

Merygreeke returned on behalf of Roister Doister and asked forgiveness of the widow and Goodluck. When he promised them that they should have much fun at Roister Doister's expense if they would but agree, they assented heartily and invited Merygreeke and Roister Doister to have dinner with them that very day.

THE RAPE OF LUCRECE

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Tragedy

Time of plot: 500 B.C.

Locale: Ancient Rome

First published: 1594

Principal characters:

COLLATINE, a Roman general

LUCRECE, his wife

TARQUIN, Collatine's friend and son of the Roman king

Critique:

The story of Tarquin's violation of Lucrece is an ancient Roman legend which has been presented in many versions other than in this poem by Shakespeare. Because the Elizabethans were especially fond of this legend, Shakespeare had numerous sources upon which to draw. Compared with his other writings, this poem is far more conventionally Elizabethan, yet its passages of great emotion and its consistently beautiful poetry rank it above other interpretations of the story known in his day.

The Story:

At Ardea, where the Romans were fighting, two Roman leaders, Tarquin and Collatine, spoke together one evening. Collatine, in the course of the conversation, described his beautiful young wife Lucrece in such glowing terms that Tarquin's passions were aroused. The next morning Tarquin left the Roman host and journeyed to Collatium, where he was welcomed by the unsuspecting Lucrece as one of her husband's friends. As he told her many tales of Collatine's prowess on the battlefield, Tarquin looked admiringly at Lucrece and decided that she was indeed the most beautiful woman in Rome.

In the night, while the others of the household were asleep, Tarquin lay restless. Caught between desire for Lucrece and dread of being discovered, to the consequent loss of his honor, he wandered aimlessly about his chamber. On the one hand there was his position as a military man who should not be the slave of his emotions; on the other hand was his overwhelming desire.

But what dreadful consequences might be the result of his lustful deed! His disgrace would never be forgotten. Perhaps his own face would show the mark of his crimes and the advertisement linger on even after death.

He thought for a moment that he might try to woo Lucrece but decided that such a course would be to no avail. Since she was already married, she was not mistress of her own desires. Again he considered the possible consequences of his deed.

At last emotion conquered reason. As Tarquin made his way to Lucrece's chamber all sorts of petty annoyances deterred him. The locks on the doors had to be forced; the threshold beneath the door grated under his footstep; the wind threatened to blow out his torch; he pricked his finger on a needle. Tarquin ignored these omens of disaster. In fact, he misconstrued them as forms of trial which only made his prize more worth winning.

When he reached the chamber door, Tarquin began to pray for success. Realizing, however, that heaven would not countenance his sin, he declared that Love and Fortune would henceforth be his gods. Entering the room, he gazed at Lucrece in sleep. When he reached forward to touch her breast, she awoke with a cry of fear. He told her that her beauty had captured his heart and that she must submit to his will.

First he threatened Lucrece with force, telling her that if she refused to submit to him he would not only kill her but also dishonor her name. His intention was to murder one of her slaves, place him in her arms, and then swear that he killed them because he had seen Lucrece embracing the man. But, if she yielded, he promised to keep the whole affair secret. Lucrece began to weep and plead with Tarquin. For the sake of her hospitality, her husband's friendship, Tarquin's position as a warrior, he must pity her and refrain from this deed. Her tears serving only to increase his lust, Tarquin smothered her cries with the bed linen while he raped her.

Shame-ridden, he stole away, leaving Lucrece desolate. She, horrified and revolted, tore her nails and hoped the dawn would never come. In a desperate fury, she railed against the night; its darkness and secrecy that had ruined her. She was afraid of the day, for surely her sin would be revealed. Still worse, through her fall, Collatine would be forever shamed. It was Opportunity that was at fault, she claimed, working for the wicked and against the innocent. Time, the hand-maiden of ugly Night, was hand-in-hand with Opportunity. But Time could work for Lucrece now. She implored Time to bring misery and pain to Tarquin. Exhausted from her emotional tirade, Lucrece fell back on her pillow. She longed for a suicide weapon; death alone could save her soul.

As the dawn broke she began to consider her death. Not until she had told Collatine the complete details of her fall would she take the step, however, for Collatine must revenge her on Tarquin.

Lucrece called her maid and asked for pen and paper. Writing to Collatine, she asked him to return immediately. When she gave the messenger the letter, she imagined that he knew of her sin, for he gave her a sly, side glance. Surely everyone must know by now, she thought. Her grief took new channels. Studying a picture of the fall of Troy, she tried to find the face showing greatest grief. Hecuba, who gazed mournfully at Priam in his dying moments, seemed the saddest. Lucrece grieved for those who died in the Trojan War, all because one man could not control his lust. Enraged, she tore the painting with her nails.

Collatine, returning home, found Lucrece robed in black. With weeping and lamentations she told him of her shame, but without naming her violator. After she had finished, Collatine, driven half-mad by rage and grief, demanded the name of the traitor. Before revealing it, Lucrece drew promises from the assembled soldiers that the loss of her honor would be avenged. Then, naming Tarquin, she drew a knife from her bosom and stabbed herself.

Heartbroken, Collatine cried that he would kill himself as well, but Brutus, his friend, stepped forward and argued that woe was no cure for woe; it was better to revenge Lucrece. The soldiers left the palace to carry the bleeding body of Lucrece through Rome. The indignant citizens banished Tarquin and all his family.

RAVENSHOE

Author: Henry Kingsley (1830-1876)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1862

Principal characters:

CHARLES RAVENSHOE, of the old House of Ravenshoe

FATHER MACKWORTH, a resident priest

WILLIAM HORTON, a groom, friend of Charles

ADELAIDE SUMMERS, a vain girl

MARY CORBY, ward of the Ravenshoes

CUTHBERT, older brother of Charles

LORD SALTIRE, an atheist and dandy

Critique:

This very long novel is slow in pace, and to some modern tastes Kingsley may seem arch with his interminable asides and his painful foreshadowing. In summary form the novel attempts to cover several centuries in the story of an English family, but the bulk of the book is concerned with the affairs of one generation; rather than a panorama of a family, Kingsley gives the adventures of one son. Divested of its paraphernalia, the tale is a lively one in the Regency tradition. The malevolent priest is perhaps the outstanding character.

The Story:

The House of Ravenshoe had long been a bastion of Catholicism in England, and the Church of Rome had for generations assigned a resident priest to the household. Densil Ravenshoe, when he reached manhood, showed a rebellious spirit by going off to London and consorting with Lord Saltire, a notorious atheist. After he had been imprisoned for his debts, his father sent the resident priest to bail him out.

For a while Densil was reconciled to priestly rule, but the new Father Mackworth had his difficulties with him. Densil at last married a Protestant woman, to the consternation of the Church. Five years went by and Densil had no children. Father Mackworth was thinking of asking for another assignment, but he was eavesdropping one evening and what he heard caused him to stay on at Ravenshoe. Cuthbert, Densil's first son, was born, and the priest had the satisfaction of baptizing him in the true faith.

Five years later a second son, Charles, was born. Densil's wife died in childbirth, and shortly the terrible truth came out: Densil had promised to bring up his second son as a Protestant. Charles was given to a nurse, Norah, wife of James Horton, the gamekeeper. She had a boy, William, just a week older than Charles, and she gladly accepted her new charge. Father Mackworth, resolved that a Protestant should never own Ravenshoe, made his plans early.

Charles was a cheerful lad, well liked by all. When he was ten, he went to visit at Ranford, the estate of the Ascots, who were related to the Ravenshoes. Charles was immediately accepted by his Protestant relations; Cuthbert had never been able to win their love. At Ranford Charles met beautiful, imperious Adelaide Summers, a ward of Lady Ascot, and promptly fell in love with her. Another new friend was the famous Lord Saltire, who became fond of the boy.

There was a great storm at Ravenshoe. In the bay a ship went down, split on a rock. Only a few were saved, among them Mary Corby, the daughter of the captain. She was a lovely girl who was accepted as one of the family. She soon fell in love with Charles.

At Oxford, Charles had two intimate friends, Lord Welter, his cousin from Ranford, and John Marston, a scholar. Marston was a good influence over Charles but Welter was a brutal, arrogant bully. Unfortunately Charles followed Welter's habits of drinking, brawling, and gaming. After a wild night of carousing, both Charles and Welter were sent down from the university. To delay his homecoming, Charles stopped off for a visit at Ranford. Lord Saltire helped him make his peace with his father. During his visit he became engaged to Adelaide.

Charles spent several months of enforced vacation at Ravenshoe. During that time Welter and Marston both came to see him. Marston proposed to Mary but she refused him. This period was marred by Father Mackworth, who seemed to Charles an evil genius. Ellen Horton, William's younger sister, ran away because of some trouble which seemed to be connected with Father Mackworth. At the beginning of the next term Charles went back to Oxford.

His stay was brief, for he was recalled by the death of his father. Father Mackworth was in possession of a ruinous secret which Cuthbert offered to buy for ten thousand pounds. Father Mackworth refused money, but to keep Charles from inheriting Ravenshoe he revealed that Norah had switched babies long ago; Charles was really her own son, and William Horton, the groom, was a Ravenshoe. William, a Catholic, became second in line to own Ravenshoe. Distracted, Charles rushed to Ranford to see Adelaide, only to learn that she had run away with Welter.

Calling himself Charles Horton, he took service with Lieutenant Hornby. As a servant he learned that Ellen, his own sister, had been Welter's mistress; now she was a maid in the same household with Adelaide, Welter's new mistress. Welter and Adelaide lived by gambling. Charles had an interview with Welter, who excused his villainy by saying that he had not known that Ellen was Charles' sister. In reality, Charles was well rid of the scheming Adelaide. After seeing Mary, who had become a governess, from a distance, Charles enlisted in the army to fight against the Russians.

The Ascot family, heavily in debt, had put all their hopes on a horse they had entered in the Derby. In a desperate attempt to recoup his fortunes, Lord Ascot substituted a less famous jockey and bet against his own horse. The Ascot entry won and the family was ruined. At his father's death, Welter became Lord Ascot. Although he had married Adelaide by that time, society ignored her.

In the Crimea, Charles took part in the famous charge of the Six Hundred at Balaklava. Hornby was killed and Charles was wounded. Invalided home, he took service again as a groom under an officer with whom he had served. He hoped to remain and eventually to find his sister Ellen. His health remained poor.

When William made a trip to Sevastopol to look for Charles, a lying soldier had convinced him that Charles was dead. When he heard the news, Lord Saltire made a new will, bequeathing a large sum to Mary but leaving the bulk of his fortune to Welter and Adelaide.

Thinking themselves at last secure, Welter and his wife began to move freely in society. One night, to his horror, Welter recognized Charles in a tavern. Adelaide wanted Welter to keep still, but her husband, conscience-stricken, informed Lord Saltire, who prepared to make a new will immediately. But the great lord died before morning.

Charles was nursed back to health at Ranford after an operation to heal his war wound. When he returned to Ravenshoe, he was a guest of William, now in control of the estate since Cuthbert's death by drowning. But Lady Ascot had started a chain of inquiries which threatened Father Mackworth's design. Finally paralyzed after a stroke, he summoned Ellen, now a nun, and through a wedding certificate in her keeping the truth came out. James Horton, father of Charles and Ellen, had always been looked upon as the illegitimate son of Densil's father, Petre Ravenshoe. But Petre had really married James' mother, and so Charles was the true heir of Ravenshoe after all. Father Mackworth had at one time possessed the marriage certificate, but Ellen had stolen it when she ran away. Her return with the certificate provided proof of Father Mackworth's duplicity.

Ellen returned to her nursing duties; Father Mackworth died after begging forgiveness of the heir he had dispossessed. Charles, the Protestant owner of Ravenshoe, made ample provision for his good friend William and the two were married in a double ceremony, Charles to the faithful Mary and William to his childhood sweetheart. At the celebration Welter acknowledged that Lord Saltire's estate really belonged to Charles. Adelaide had become a permanent invalid after a riding accident; hence they would never have children. In reparation, Welter had willed his entire fortune to Charles.

THE RECRUITING OFFICER

Author: George Farquhar (1678-1707)

Type of plot: Comedy of intrigue

Time of plot: Early eighteenth century

Locale: Shrewsbury, England

First presented: 1706

Principal characters:

CAPTAIN PLUME, the recruiting officer, a gay blade

SYLVIA BALANCE, Captain Plume's fiancée

MR. WORTHY, Captain Plume's friend
MELINDA, Mr. Worthy's fiancée and cousin of Sylvia Balance JUSTICE BALANCE, Sylvia's father
ROSE, the pretty young daughter of a farmer
SERGEANT KITE, Captain Plume's aide

Critique:

This is not Farquhar's best-known play—that honor goes to The Beaux' Stratagem—but it is superior to many of the other Restoration comedies. Perhaps the most richly comic soldier in English drama is to be found here in Sergeant Kite, who doubles as a fortune-teller and a pander for his master. It is a long step from the Miles Gloriosus of the Plautine comedy, through Captain Bobadil of Ben Jonson's comedy, to this grandly comic figure. In this play the reader is taken from London to Shrewsbury, a welcome change in comedies of this period, most of which were laid in London. In moving his scene from London, Farquhar followed the example of Thomas Shadwell, the poet and playwright who succeeded John Dryden as Poet Laureate. Indeed, the reader is constantly reminded of similarities of incident and tone between the plays of Shadwell and Farquhar. There is less of the elegant tone in this play, however, for it rather leans to the sentiment of later eighteenth-century drama.

The Story:

Captain Plume, commander of a company of grenadiers, and his aide, Sergeant Kite, went to Shrewsbury to enlist a number of recruits for Captain Plume's command. They went to Shrewsbury because of success in gaining recruits in that city some months before, and because of Captain Plume's amorous successes at the same time. Upon the arrival of the pair they were greeted with the news that a young woman who had just given birth to a child had named Captain Plume as the father. At the captain's request, Sergeant Kite married the woman and went on record as the father of the child. This was not the first time he had done as much for the captain;

he had accumulated a list of six wives in the same manner.

Captain Plume also found his good friend, Mr. Worthy, at Shrewsbury. Mr. Worthy had been a happy-go-lucky chap, much like Captain Plume, until his fiancée had inherited a fortune. The girl, Melinda, had taken on airs after becoming a rich woman, and she proceeded to make life miserable for Worthy. His latest grievance was that another officer on recruiting duty, one Captain Brazen, had apparently become a successful rival for Melinda's hand and fortune. Captain Plume asked Worthy about Sylvia Balance, whom the captain loved but could not marry because his life was too uncertain and he had too little money. Worthy told Captain Plume that Sylvia Balance still thought very well of him.

While Worthy and Captain Plume talked, Melinda and Sylvia were having a conversation of their own, in which Sylvia told her cousin that she was determined that the captain should not leave Shrewsbury alone. The two women quarreled, and after Sylvia's departure Melinda wrote a letter to Sylvia's father telling him that Captain Plume intended to dishonor Sylvia.

That evening Captain Plume had dinner with Sylvia and her father, Justice Balance, who considered the captain a fine match for his daughter. During the evening news came from Germany by mail that Justice Balance's son and heir had died. Immediately the attitude of Justice Balance toward Captain Plume changed, for he did not like to think of the captain as the husband of his daughter if she were to have all his fortune. Calling Sylvia into private conference, he told her of the change in his attitude. Although the girl was very much in love with the captain, she promised that she would not marry without her father's consent. Captain Plume left the house without learning what had happened. A short time after his departure Melinda's spiteful letter to Sylvia's father arrived. In order to get her away from the captain, Justice Balance immediately sent Sylvia by coach to one of his country estates.

Both Worthy and Captain Plume interpreted Sylvia's departure erroneously. They thought that she believed herself too good for the captain after she had inherited a fortune of two thousand pounds a year. The captain, claiming that he would get along as well without her, proceeded to go about his business of recruiting. While doing so he met a farmer's pretty young daughter, named Rose. Rose and he immediately fancied one another, and the captain went so far as to give his half-promise that he would make the girl his wife. In return, she helped him to add almost a dozen more recruits to his company. These included her own brother and her former sweetheart.

One day Sylvia, disguised in some of her brother's clothes, returned to Shrewsbury, where she met the two recruiting officers, Captain Plume and Captain Brazen, in the company of Melinda. When she told them that she was Mr. Willful, a young man of good family who wished to enlist, they both bid for the new recruit, who finally agreed to join Captain Plume's company. The captain was so pleased with young Mr. Willful that he proffered his friendship, even though the recruit was to be an enlisted man in the company.

Saying that he would be censured for entering the army voluntarily, the recruit asked Captain Plume to have him impressed into service by the provisions of the acts of Parliament. The captain agreed to do so. To help her deception, and also to test the direction of Captain Plume's affections, Sylvia in her disguise pretended to be in love with Rose.

The fiancée of Worthy, meanwhile, had been to see a fortune-teller who was really Sergeant Kite in disguise. The fortune-teller told Melinda that she would die unmarried if she let a man who was to call on her at ten o'clock the following morning leave the country. He had also managed to secure a copy of her handwriting, which he showed her in an attempt to make her think the devil was his helper. Melinda was so impressed that she promised herself to follow the fortune-teller's advice.

Justice Balance decided that the best way to keep his daughter's honor and fortune from falling into the hands of Captain Plume was to provide the officer with the soldiers he needed and to draft them according to the provision made by Parliament. In order to do so, the justice opened his court and had the bailiff bring in a number of men who were eligible for the draft. Among the men was Sylvia in her disguise as Mr. Willful. She had been accused, as a man, of having taken Rose as a common-law wife. In the courtroom Mr. Willful behaved impudently, and the justice decided to punish the brash young man by sending him off as a private in Captain Plume's company of gendarmes. Thus Sylvia tricked her father into sending her away with the captain. In fact, the justice ordered Captain Plume not to discharge Mr. Willful for any reason.

After the hearing Justice Balance went to his home, where he learned that his daughter, dressed in her deceased brother's clothes, had disappeared from his country estate. The justice immediately realized that he had been tricked, that the Mr. Willful whom he had sent off with Captain Plume was really Sylvia. He also thought that Captain Plume had been a party to the deception. When the captain called at the justice's home a short time later, it was soon apparent that he knew nothing of the scheme, for he agreed to discharge the new soldier at Justice Balance's request.

Mr. Willful was called in and unmasked as Sylvia. Then the father, realizing how much his daughter loved the captain, gave them permission to marry. Immediately thereafter Worthy and Melinda arrived to say that they had also reached an agreement and were to be married shortly. Melinda also apologized for the spiteful letter she had sent to Justice Balance. Captain Plume, pleased over the prospect of a handsome fortune coming to him with his wife, announced that he was retiring from the army. He turned over all the recruits he had enlisted to Captain Brazen, who had been unsuccessful in finding any men for his company.

REDBURN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Herman Melville (1819-1891)

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: New York, the Atlantic Ocean, and England

First published: 1849

Principal characters:

WELLINGBOROUGH REDBURN, a young lad on his first voyage

CAPTAIN RIGA, master of the Highlander

HARRY BOLTON, a young English prodigal

Critique:

Redburn, like much of Herman Melville's work, was based on his own life. The background of the Redburn family is very similar to that of the Melville family after the father's death. The trip on a merchant vessel is clearly based on a similar round trip to Liverpool which Melville himself had made while still in his teens. The incident of the guidebook, for instance, and the guidebook itself, are taken directly from Melville's own experience. Again, like other of Melville's books, Redburn is authentic in its treatment of sailors and sea life. Melville saw seafaring life through the eyes of a common sailor who learned his trade the hard way and wrote his novel from the seaman's point of view. Also, we find in Redburn the beginnings of the philosophical elements that made Moby Dick, Melville's masterpiece, one of the great novels of all time.

The Story:

Wellingborough Redburn's father had died, leaving the mother and children poorly provided for, even though the father had been a highly successful merchant and at one time a wealthy man.

When Redburn was in his middle teens, he decided to take some of the burden off his mother by going to sea. Given an old gun and a hunting jacket by an older brother, young Redburn left his home along the Hudson River and went to New York to seek a berth on a ship.

A college friend of his older brother aided Redburn in finding a berth on a ship bound for Liverpool. Unfortunately the friend had emphasized the fact that Redburn came from a good family and had wealthy relatives; consequently, Captain Riga, master of the Highlander, was able to hire the young lad for three dollars a month. Having spent all his money, and unable to get an advance on his wages, Redburn had to pawn his gun for a shirt and cap to wear aboard ship.

During his first few days out of port Redburn thought that he had made a dreadful mistake in going to sea. His fellow sailors jeered at him as a greenhorn; he made many silly mistakes; he became violently seasick; and he discovered that he did not even have a spoon with which to take his portion of the food from the pots and pans in which it was sent to the forecastle. Most horrifying of all was the suicide of a sailor who dived over the side of the ship in a fit of delirium tremens.

As the thirty-day cruise to Liverpool from New York wore on, Redburn learned how to make himself useful and comfortable aboard the ship. When he went aloft alone to release the topmost sails, he earned a little respect from his fellow seamen, although they never did, throughout the voyage, let him forget that he was still a "green hand" and had signed on as a "boy." Redburn found the sea fascinating in many ways; he also found it terrifying, as when the Highlander passed a derelict schooner on which three corpses were still bound to the railing.

For Redburn one of the liveliest incidents of the voyage was the discovery of a little stowaway on board the Highlander. The small boy had been on board the vessel some months before, when the father had been a sailor signed on for a trip from Liverpool to New York. The father had since died, and the boy had stowed himself away in an effort to return to England. Everyone on the ship, including the usually irascible Captain Riga, took a liking to the homesick stow-away and made much of him.

Redburn had little in common with his fellow crew members, most of whom were rough fellows many years older than he. Through them, however, he received an education quite different from that which he had learned in school. At first he tried to talk about church and good books to them, but he soon discovered that such conversation only irritated them into more than their usual profanity and obscenity. Redburn thought they were not really very bad men; they had never had the chance to be good men. Most of all, he disliked them because they looked upon anyone who could not follow the seaman's trade as a fool.

A long, low skyline in the distance was Redburn's first glimpse of Ireland. He met his first true European when an Irish fisherman hailed the Highlander and asked for a line. When he had hauled fifteen or so fathoms of the line into his boat, the Irishman cut the line, laughed, and sailed away. Even though the rope was not Redburn's, he, boylike, felt that the man had played a scurvy trick.

When the Highlander arrived at Liverpool, Redburn decided that the English city was not a great deal different from New York. Sailors and ships, he found, were the same in one place as in another, with a few notable exceptions. His trips into the city, away from the waterfront, and excursions into the Lancashire countryside convinced him that he, as an alien, was not welcome. People distrusted him because of his ragged clothing, and he had no money to purchase a new outfit, even though Captain Riga had advanced him three dollars, one month's pay, upon the ship's arrival in port.

Redburn's greatest disappointment came when he tried to use for his excursions an old guidebook he had brought from his father's library. The guidebook, almost half a century old, was no longer reliable, for streets and structures it mentioned were no longer in existence. Redburn felt that the whole world must have changed since his father's time; he saw in the unreliable guidebook a hint that as the years passed the habits and ideals of youth had to be charted anew. Each generation, he learned, had to make its own guidebook through the world.

While in Liverpool, Redburn met Harry Bolton, a young Englishman of good family but a prodigal son. Bolton said that he had shipped on two voyages to the East Indies; now he wanted to emigrate to America. With Redburn's help Harry Bolton was enrolled as a "boy" on the Highlander for its return trip to New York. The two boys, traveling on Bolton's money, made a quick excursion to London before the ship sailed, but they were back in Liverpool within forty-eight hours. Redburn saw little of England beyond the port where he had arrived.

On the return trip to America the ship carried a load of Irish emigrants. Redburn quickly felt sorry for them but at the same time superior to the miserable wretches crowded between decks. The steerage passengers suffered a great deal during the voyage. Their quarters were cramped at best, and during heavy weather they could not remain on deck. For cooking they had a stove placed on one of the hatches, one stove for five hundred people. Worst of all, an epidemic of fever broke out, killing many of the emigrants and one of the sailors.

Bolton had a miserable trip, and Redburn was sorry for him, too. The English boy had lied in saying he had been at sea before. Because he could not bear to go aloft in the rigging, he, in place of Redburn, became the butt of all the jokes and horseplay that the crew devised.

After the ship reached America, however, the voyage seemed to both Redburn and Bolton to have been a good one. They discovered that they really hated to leave the vessel which had been home to them for several weeks. But their nostalgia for the vessel was soon dissipated by Captain Riga. The captain dismissed Redburn without any pay because the lad had left his duties for one day while the ship was at Liverpool. The captain even told Redburn that he owed the ship money for tools he had dropped into the sea. Bolton was given a dollar and a half for his work; the pittance made him so angry he threw it back on the captain's desk. The two boys then left the ship, glad to be back on land once more.

THE RELAPSE

Type of work: Drama

Author: Sir John Vanbrugh (1664-1726)

Type of plot: Social satire

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: England

First presented: 1696

Principal characters:

SIR NOVELTY FASHION, LORD FOPPINGTON, a London fop

YOUNG FASHION, his brother

LOVELESS, a gentleman

AMANDA, his wife

WORTHY, a gentleman of the town

SIR TUNBELLY CLUMSEY, a country squire

MISS HOYDEN, Sir Tunbelly's daughter

COUPLER, a matchmaker

BERINTHIA, a comely widow

Critique:

The Relapse, Or, Virtue in Danger was written as a sequel to Colley Cibber's Love's Last Shift because in Vanbrugh's opinion the latter play did not present an accurate picture of human nature. Lord Foppington is Cibber's Sir Novelty Fashion elevated to the peerage. The Relapse was a huge success, and for more than fifty years it held the London stage, sometimes running in more than one theater at a time. Historically, the play is important because it helped to break up the formulas followed in the artificial comedy of manners. Vanbrugh has been accused of irreligion, which is probably not wholly true, and of licentiousness, which is probably accurate.

The Story:

In the country Loveless and Amanda led a quiet life after a stormy period of marriage troubles. Because Loveless had to go to London rather frequently and because she had reason to doubt his fidelity, Amanda was apprehensive. But Loveless assured her he was temptation-proof; going to London provided a test of his reform.

Young Fashion and his servant Lory called on Sir Novelty Fashion, the new Lord Foppington, young Fashion's elder brother. Lord Foppington had recently bought a title. Since he was the eldest son, he had plenty of money, although he spent too much as it was. Young Fashion, on the contrary, was destitute. He was minded to join the army as a last resort, but at Lory's suggestion he resolved to humble himself to ask the new lord to pay his debts. But Lord Foppington was busy with the tailor and the shoemaker and hardly spared his brother a word. Although Lord Foppington was on the point of going out, he did invite his brother to stay and have a home dinner by himself.

Angered by his brother's attitude, young Fashion determined on revenge. Coupler, a matchmaker who providentially came in, had a plan. Coupler had arranged a marriage between Lord Foppington and Miss Hoyden, wealthy daughter of Sir Tunbely Clumsey. Lord Foppington was to pay the matchmaker two thousand pounds, but he was afraid the new lord would evade the money agreement. It was decided that young Fashion was to go to Sir Tunbely's house and, pretending to be his brother, marry Miss Hoyden. Coupler, in turn, was to receive a fee of five thousand pounds. Young Fashion agreed to the plan, after a hard time fighting off Coupler's amorous advances.

Loveless and Amanda were installed in their London lodgings and Loveless had already been to the theater. In a confidential mood he told his wife of seeing a beautiful woman in the audience, a woman so handsome he had been unable to keep his eyes off her. Amanda was alarmed, but he told her he admired the woman only in an aesthetic way. Berinthia, Amanda's widowed friend, came to call. To Loveless' surprise, she was the woman he had admired in the theater. Because he pretended to be indifferent to Berinthia's charms, Amanda invited her to stay with them while they were in London.

Lord Foppington also came to call and was quite smitten with Amanda's beauty. Resolving to make a conquest at once, he drew her aside and declared his love. Amanda slapped his face. Loveless, seeing the fracas, wounded Lord Foppington with his sword. Although the wound was not serious, the surgeon pretended that it was, in order to increase his fee. As Lord Foppington was being carried out, Worthy entered and was also attracted by Amanda's charms. After the men had all left, Berinthia had a long talk with Amanda about men and love.

Young Fashion determined to make one more attempt before taking revenge on his brother. Once again he told Lord Foppington of his debts and asked for money to settle them. Lord Foppington refused haughtily, and in the ensuing quarrel young Fashion tried to fight a duel with his brother. Lord Foppington contemptuously refused to fight and left. Resolved to do his worst, young Fashion set out for Coupler's house.

Loveless made love to Berinthia and finally seized her. He left, however, when they were interrupted by Worthy's arrival. Worthy was in love with Amanda. Because Berinthia had once been his mistress, he asked her help in his suit. Berinthia's plan was to let Amanda become jealous of her erring husband; in her anger she would be an easier prey. When Amanda returned, Berinthia told her that Loveless was pursuing a strange woman.

Armed with a letter from Coupler, young Fashion called at Sir Tunbely's house. When he knocked, Sir Tunbely quickly locked Miss Hoyden in her room with her old nurse and sent armed peasants to the gate. Young Fashion was cordially received, however, when he explained that he was Lord Foppington. Miss Hoyden, ripely nubile, was all atwitter.

Although the nurse was supposed to be a chaperone, she was an indulgent one, and she allowed young Fashion to talk privately with Miss Hoyden. Sir Tunbelly wanted to defer the wedding for a while to allow time to invite the guests, but young Fashion did not dare wait so long. For a small bribe, since Miss Hoyden was more than willing, the nurse made arrangements for Bull, the chaplain, to marry them secretly in the morning. And, since they were to be married so soon, she saw no harm in their staying together that night. The following morning the complaisant Bull performed the ceremony.

When Berinthia and Amanda again discussed the subject of love, Berinthia skillfully played on Amanda's doubts of Loveless' fidelity. According to plan, Worthy then arrived to say that Loveless would be out until very late, and that while waiting for Loveless he would play cards with the ladies. Artful Berinthia withdrew to her chamber and left Worthy and Amanda alone. In her bedroom, meanwhile, Berinthia received the erring Loveless. Putting out the candles, he seized Berinthia and dragged her into the closet. She shouted for help, but she was careful to scream very softly.

Lord Foppington arrived at Sir Tunbelly's house to claim his bride. Taken for an impostor, he was set upon and bound, and young Fashion declared he had never seen the man before. A neighbor identified Foppington, however, and young Fashion fled precipitately. Miss Hoyden decided to keep still about her marriage to young Fashion and to marry again, this time the real Lord Foppington.

Back in London, Coupler showed young Fashion a letter. Lord Foppington had married Miss Hoyden but would wait until they returned to Lord Foppington's own bed to consummate the marriage. Young Fashion had to wait until the couple came to town to regain his Miss Hoyden. Fortunately, the parson of Fat-goose Living had just died and young Fashion had the disposition of the post. By promising the living to Bull, young Fashion persuaded him that he should tell the truth about the secret marriage.

Meanwhile Berinthia, trying to arouse Amanda's jealousy to the point where she would accept Worthy as a lover, arranged to have Amanda present at a masquerade. Loveless was there in the company of Berinthia, who was masked. Convinced that her husband had a mistress, Amanda received Worthy in her home, but in spite of his best efforts she retained her virtue.

Lord Foppington invited the whole company to come and honor his new bride. Young Fashion appeared also and declared that Miss Hoyden was married to him. Sir Tunbelly was thunderstruck and Lord Foppington was contemptuous of his younger brother's story. True to their agreement, the nurse and Bull backed him up. When it was learned that young Fashion was Lord Foppington's brother, Sir Tunbelly withdrew his opposition and accepted his son-in-law. Lord Foppington met the new turn of events as gracefully as he could. Miss Hoyden, having learned that her first husband was Lord Foppington's brother, had no complaint to make, just so long as she was married to someone.

Critique:

Remembrance Rock, a first novel published when its writer was 70, is a work almost as sprawling and formless as the land it celebrates. The pattern is simple: three stories dealing with the settling of Plymouth, the American Revolution, and the Civil War, set between a prologue and an epilogue which have for background Washington in the years of World War II. Imperfect as a novel, the book is nevertheless a great American document, presenting in human terms and in the idiom of Sandburg's "swift and furious people" the growth of the American dream through more than three centuries of our national history. Remembrance Rock has been called a saga, a chronicle, a sermon, a collection of Chaucerian tales, a miscellany on folk themes; and it is all of these. By means of fable, paean, symbol, and style that ranges from the grave, proud language of Bunyan and Defoe to the downright slangy and boisterous, Sandburg has projected a poet-historian's testament of American life. The result is a narrative as passionate and affirmative as the tough and mystic eloquence of his poetry. Unity of theme is provided by characters recurring in the major episodes and by the symbolic reappearances of a bronze plaque bearing an inscription of Roger Bacon's Four Stumbling Blocks to Truth: 1) The influence of fragile or unworthy authority. 2) Custom. 3) The imperfection of undisciplined senses. 4) Concealment of ignorance by ostentation of seeming wisdom.

The Stories:

The rock stood in the cedar-shaded garden of former Supreme Court Justice Orville Brand Windom, a giant boulder about which he had scattered earth from Plymouth, Valley Forge, Gettysburg, the Argonne. The justice was old, with a deep and brooding concern for the American land, its history, its people. Some of his ideas he spoke to the world in a radio broadcast he made in 1944. Others he recorded in three chronicles of the living past that his grandson, Captain Raymond Windom, veteran of Okinawa, found in a locked box after the old man's death. These tales, like the antique bronze plaque inscribed with Roger Bacon's Four Stumbling Blocks to Truth, were Justice

Red-haired Oliver Ball Windrow, the woodcarver, had on one side of his face the look of a poet and dreamer, on the other a countenance of wrath and storm. A seeker and questioner, he loved Mary Windling, a girl only half his age and a member of the Separatist congregation that worshipped secretly at Scrooby, and for her he made a small plaque of bronze, on which he inscribed Roger Bacon's Four Stumbling Blocks to Truth, to wear on a silver cord around her neck.

Mary liked his sudden whims and strange humors, but in the end she married a young workman named John Spong. This happened in 1608, just before the Scrooby congregation escaped to Holland. For twelve years Mary Spong and her husband lived in Leyden. Infrequent news came from England. Windrow had wed Matilda Bracken, the devoted mute who kept his house. Then, in 1620, he and his two daughters died of smallpox. Mary's sadness for her old friend was lessened by promises and fears surrounding plans of the Puritans to try their fortunes in the new world.

The Spongs and their daughter Remember were passengers aboard the Mayflower when it sailed. Little Remember had only one memory of Plymouth. One day, while she was playing on the wharf, some boys began to torment her. Another boy came with an ax handle and beat them off. She forgot to ask his name.

Mary Spong, dying during that first terrible winter in the wilderness, gave her daughter the tarnished keepsake Windrow had made years before. Remember grew up in Plymouth, a cluster of houses between forest and sea, and those gaunt years of hardship and toil helped to shape her strong body, her resolute will, her sober decorum that hid deep passions. Her father grew grim and silent as time passed. He disliked Orton Wingate, a sojourner in Plymouth, a man whose face showed peace and calm on one side, turmoil on the other. But Wingate was Remember's friend and came to sit with her from time to time. She knew without his saying that she could have had him for her husband. Restless, uncertain of her own mind, she waited.

Sometimes she rebelled against the harsh Puritan laws, as when she concealed Hode Latch, a convicted drunkard for whom constables were searching, and then she was afraid that she was damned. Perhaps Peter Ladd sensed that wild streak in her when he came courting. He was a young seaman who drifted into Plymouth, steadied himself for a while, and then fell once more into dissolute ways. When Remember refused him, he went away to make his fortune in the slave trade. Two years later he was drowned in a wreck off the Virginia capes.

Roger Williams, free-thinking preacher, lived in Plymouth for a time. Several years later he was shaking the colonies with his liberal beliefs and teachings. A new age was beginning when Williams, a fugitive, built his own town beside Narragansett Bay, but Remember Spong could not know how far-reaching were to be his challenges to usages of authority and custom. She feared him most because he revealed the rebel in herself. For that reason she was of two minds about Resolved Wayfare, a newcomer to the colony in 1638. Wayfare had crossed the ocean to learn for himself the meaning of Roger Williams' message. He was also the boy, grown to manhood, who had defended Remember on the Plymouth wharf.

After he saved John Spong's life during a blizzard, Remember nursed the young man back to health. During that time there was a battle of wills between them. He wanted her to go with him to Providence, but she, like her father, held that the teachings of Roger Williams were of Satan. Although Wingate's wisdom and the cruel lashing of an unmarried mother finally convinced her of the folly and blindness of custom, she could not quite make up her mind to go with Wayfare on his journey. Yet she walked with him some distance into the forest, and before they parted she gave him the bronze keepsake she had from her mother. Knowing that they would meet again, they vowed to be true as long as grass would grow or water flow. That was the solemn promise between them.

In March, 1775, Ordway Winshore, master printer, left Philadelphia to visit his sons in New York and Boston. Below rusty hair, his face on one side promised peace, on the other wrath and doom—a face half serious, half comic, making him a man easy to confide in. Among his fellow travelers were two young British lieutenants, Francis and George Frame. During a tavern halt Francis Frame broke his hand by striking a blacksmith who had cursed King George. The Philadelphia printer felt that the war was beginning.

Winshore spent two days in New York with Locke, his younger son, a typesetter for Henry Tozzer, printer of Independence leaflets. Locke reported that his brother Robert was deep in the activities of Massachusetts patriots. He also hinted at Robert's romance with a dressmaker's assistant.

Another passenger in the coach to Boston was Marintha Wilming, to whom George Frame paid marked attention. Winshore liked her, not knowing, however, that she was the girl his older son loved.

Not far from Boston, Robert Winshore helped some Sons of Liberty to tar and feather Hobart Reggs, a prosperous Tory who had informed on a British deserter. Sapphira, Reggs' daughter, accidentally saw his face during the tarring.

Boston, Winshore found, was a seething, sullen city filled with British troops, Tories, Rebels, and neutrals. At the dress shop where Marintha Wilming worked there was much talk of Ann Elwood, an innocent young girl who had been tricked into a false marriage by a Grenadier sergeant. Winshore met Marintha—Mim—again in Robert's company and visited the house where she lived with her aunt. He also encountered Isaiah Thomas, printer of the Massachusetts Spy and Robert's employer, and in Henry Knox's bookstore he met Mary Burton, whom he, a widower, was to marry a short time later. One day, at the dress shop, Sapphira Reggs recognized Robert. When Lieutenant George Frame attempted to arrest him at the home of Mim's aunt, Robert escaped. Fleeing, he lost the old bronze plaque which had come to him from a great-granduncle and which he wore on a chain under his shirt.

Robert was with the Minute Men when the British marched on Lexington. Darius, Mim's brother, was killed in the fighting, and Lieutenant George Frame was crippled for life. Robert ventured into Boston to tell Mim of her brother's death, but the girl, distracted by his news and George Frame's injuries, declared that she wanted to forget him and his rebel violence.

Locke became a military courier. In Philadelphia, Winshore and his new wife read Paine's Common Sense. Robert and Oates Elwood, Ann's brother, marched with Benedict Arnold toward Quebec until they became ill with fever and were forced to turn back. The British evacuated Boston. Robert was invalided home. Locke and Elwood, carrying messages from General Greene to General Washington, spent a night with the Winshores in Philadelphia. Robert was there, a messenger at the Continental Congress. There was no time for Locke to tell his family that he had secretly married Ann Elwood. The next night, while riding to New York, Locke was shot by British scouts. Mim Wilming, working in a Philadelphia dress shop, delivered the shroud for his burial. Meeting Robert for the first time since the fighting at Lexington, she told him that she believed at last in the patriots' cause.

The years moved ahead with dates and names—July 4, 1776, and the Unanimous Declaration, Christmas night and Trenton, Valley Forge. Near Morristown, Ann Winshore gave birth to a son named after his dead father. Mim, nursing the sick and wounded at Bethlehem, became ill with putrid fever. Ordway Winshore drove through the British lines in Quaker clothes to take her back to his house and nurse her there. When word came that Robert had died at Valley Forge, she showed his father the plaque she had found after Robert's flight from arrest. Winshore told her it was hers to keep.

Summer came, and with it the British left Philadelphia. The Winshores hung out the flag which had been hidden under Mim's mattress during her illness. One day Oates Elwood arrived with his sister and her baby. Mim told Winshore that his grandson, born in 1777, the Year of the Three Gallows, would see many dawns. He was the future.

Omri Winwold had been many things—tavern chore-boy, mill worker, lawyer's clerk, gambler. He was a man of easy manners but deep reserves, his brick-dust beard covering a face peacefully calm on one side, seamed with turmoil on the other. The person who understood him best was a distant cousin, Brooksany Wimble, whose husband Joel was an abolitionist harness-maker in Arpa, New York.

For years Omri had dreamed of a farm in Illinois, and in 1836 he headed west by wagon with his wife Bee and their infant son, Andrew Marvel. Near Arpa, where he stopped to say goodbye to the Wimbles, he deserted his sluttish wife, taking the child with him, after she had behaved shamelessly with a bachelor mover. The Wimbles knew nothing of his plans, but they believed that he had continued his journey west.

All America seemed moving westward by highway and canal. Millicent Wimble was a baby in arms when her parents went with a large party of neighbors to found the antislavery community of New Era, Illinois. Her childish nickname, Mibs, stuck, even after she grew into a beautiful young woman with a will of her own. She had two admirers. One was Hornsby Meadows, instructor at New Era College and a crusading abolitionist. The other was Danny Hilton, a farmer and contractor. She went to church and to antislavery lectures with Hornsby, to dances and the Lincoln-Douglas debate in nearby Galesburg with Danny, but she would have neither. Hornsby finally married Fidelia Englehart, a village teacher. Danny went to Chicago. Then, in 1859, Rodney Wayman and his friend Nack Doss rode into New Era. Wayman was a cattle buyer from Atlas, Illinois. A Southerner, he had been a banjo player in a traveling minstrel show, a miner in California. Mibs married him without her parents' consent two weeks later.

In Pike County, meanwhile, Omri Winwold had prospered. Taking a gambler's chance on a charge of bigamy, he had married Sarah Prindle, a neighbor's daughter. After her death he married her sister, Anne Moore, a widow. By 1857 his roomy farmhouse held eight children, from Andrew Marvel, who was twenty-two, to Robert, who was seven—a good muster, Omri felt, after his unsettled early years. In 1852, during a business trip to St. Louis, he ran into Bee again and also met her husband, Henry Flack. The husband never knew the truth about Omri and Bee. After Bee ran away to San Francisco and Anne Winwold died, Omri and Flack, both lonely, became close friends. When Rodney Wayman brought his bride home to Atlas, and Mibs and Omri had established their kinship, letters passed once more between Omri and Brooksany.

Storm clouds were gathering. John Brown raided Harper's Ferry. Clayborn Joel Wayman was born a few months before Lincoln was elected. Rodney was buying horses in Texas with Nack Doss when the war began. Both became captains in the Confederate Army. Doss was killed in a raid in Mississippi. Captured at Chickamauga, Rod was sent to the military prison at Camp Morton. Omri's boys who were old enough joined up. Rodney Wayman, Junior, was born that first year of the war, but his father never had word of him; he had escaped from Camp Morton and rejoined the troops. Joel Wimble, commissioned in the commissary service, was furloughed home and lay dying in New Era. Brooksany died a few days after her husband. Going through their things, Mibs found in a trunk an ancient bronze plaque with Roger Bacon's Four Stumbling Blocks to Truth inscribed on it in antique script. She hung the keepsake around her neck, under her dress.

At Fredericksburg, Rod was again wounded and taken prisoner. While he lay in a barn hospital, Colonel Hornsby Meadows died on the floor next to him. Rod lived in the filth and stench of Johnson's Island until Mibs came to get him, an exchanged prisoner. One night they went to have supper with Omri, and Rod lost some of his deep bitterness when he saw the younger Winwolds maimed and crippled in the war. Andrew Marvel, brevetted brigadier general, lacked an arm. Milton was paralyzed by a bullet in his spine. Holliday, starved in a prison camp, was dead.

The fighting ended, but deeper grief hung over the land when Lincoln's body was brought back to Springfield for burial. Mibs felt, however, that their days of storm and travail were almost over. Across the wide land the arch of union, strength, and love still held firm.

Captain Raymond Windom and his wife knew that they, too, had seen years of crisis and destiny. To them it seemed only fitting that other earths, symbols of hardship and storm and stars coming after the storm, should be buried at the base of Remembrance Rock—gravel from Anzio, sand from Utah Beach in Normandy, black volcanic ash from Okinawa.

Critique:

For those readers who prefer the analysis of "a slice of life," this novel is the Goncourt brothers' best work of fiction. In it the authors have presented a detailed and careful study of a middle-class French family during the middle of the nineteenth century. The younger people are products of their parents' later lives, for we are told that older generation was one which had originally believed in the revolutionary movements of the late eighteenth century but had in mature years become conservative owners of property. Perhaps nowhere in literature has the lingering death of a victim of any disease been as carefully delineated as has the death of Renée Mauperin, whose slow and sad departure from this life consumes at least a fourth of the chapters of the novel and is, to the sensitive reader, almost excruciating.

The Story:

Renée Mauperin's father had served under the first Napoleon and had battled for the liberal forces until he had become a husband and father, with the responsibilities that such a position had forced upon him. After acquiring a family he had ceased being a scholar and political figure, in favor of the more financially reliable career of sugar refiner. His wife was a very proper woman, one who wished to see her children married well and respectably, that she might enjoy her old age in satisfaction of a job well done.

The children of the Mauperins, at least the oldest two, were model children, so well disciplined and quiet that they failed to excite the interest of their father. Renée, the third child, born late in his life, was Mauperin's favorite. Renée was a lively youngster from the beginning, a lover of horses and action, a vivacious creature who was demonstrative in her affection, and an artistic but spirited personality. While these qualities endeared her to her father, they made her the bane of her mother's existence. The oldest daughter had dutifully married and become the respectable Madame Davarande, but Renée, who had already dismissed summarily a dozen suitors of good family and fortune, showed no inclination to accept any who came seeking her hand.

Almost as great a worry to Madame Mauperin was her son, on whom she doted. Henri Mauperin was a political economist and a lawyer; he was also a cold and calculating fellow, though his mother, in her excessive love for him, failed to realize just how selfish he was. She thought that he had never given a thought to marriage and chided him for his lack of interest. She felt that at the age of thirty he should have settled down.

Not knowing his plans, Madame Mauperin arranged to have him often in the company of Naomi Bourjot. Naomi was the only daughter of a very rich family known to the Mauperins for many years. The only difficulty lay in convincing her father that Henri, who had no title, was a suitable match for his daughter. Henri himself had seen that such was to be the great difficulty, and he had undertaken to gain the aid of Madame Bourjot in his suit. His method of securing her aid was to become her lover.

Through the medium of an amateur theatrical, Naomi, Renée, and Henri were placed in one another's company, although Naomi had to be forced into the venture by her mother. Madame Bourjot realized that Henri wanted to marry her daughter, but she had no idea that he was in love with the girl. It was only Henri's portrayal of Naomi's lover on the stage that revealed the true state of his affections. Rather than lose him altogether, Madame Bourjot, as Henri had anticipated, resolved to help him win her daughter and the family fortune, although tearful and bitter scenes preceded that decision. Through the efforts of his wife, Naomi's father reluctantly consented to the marriage if Henri Mauperin could gain the government's permission to add "de Villacourt" to his name.

In the meantime Naomi had discovered that Henri and her mother had been lovers. Although she loved Henri, she was dismayed by what she had learned. Even so, because of her parents, she had to go through with the marriage. Naomi's only consolation was to tell what she knew to Renée, who was horrified to learn of her brother's actions. When she confronted him with the story, he made no attempt to deny the facts; all he did was tell her curtly and angrily that the affair was none of her business.

A short time later, when, superficially, the antagonism between Renée and her brother had been smoothed over, she accompanied him to the government offices where he received permission to make the addition to his name. While she was waiting for him, she overheard two clerks saying that the real de Villacourt family had not really died out and that one member, a man, was still alive; the clerks even mentioned the address. Her knowledge gave Renée an opportunity for revenge, although she had no idea what might happen if she put her plan into action. What she did was to take a copy of the newspaper announcing that the title "de Villacourt" was to be given to Henri Mauperin and send it to the real de Villacourt, a villainous lout who immediately planned to kill the upstart who dared to appropriate his title.

The real de Villacourt journeyed to Paris and learned that, penniless as he was, he had no legal means to regain his title. Then he went to the apartment of Henri Mauperin and attempted to beat the young man. Henri, no coward, immediately challenged the man to a duel. The arrangements were made by Monsieur Denoisel, a friend of the Mauperin family for many years. He also served as Henri's second in the affair. Henri shot de Villacourt and thought the duel was over, but the man was not fatally wounded. Calling Henri back, he shot and killed him. To Denoisel was given the unhappy duty of reporting to all concerned Henri's untimely death. The one who seemed to take the news hardest was Renée. No one expected her to make so much of her brother's death, since they had never been close.

One day, in a conversation, Denoisel remarked that someone had sent the newspaper clipping to de Villacourt. Renée, fearful that she had been discovered as the author of her brother's death, had a heart attack. For many months she lay ill, apparently with no desire to live. Even the realization, after many weeks, that she had not revealed her guilt made no difference in her recovery. Her father called in the best specialists he could find, but they only remarked that some terrible shock had caused her condition. When told that she had recently lost a brother, they said that his death was probably not the real cause of her illness.

In spite of all efforts on her behalf, Renée Mauperin wasted away and finally died. Nor was the tragedy of the Mauperins yet finished. They lost their third child, Madame Davarande, a few months afterward, when she died in childbirth. Childless and alone, the elder Mauperins traveled abroad, hoping thereby to ease their grief and loneliness.

THE RETURN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Walter de la Mare (1873-1956)

Type of plot: Fantasy

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1910

Principal characters:

ARTHUR LAWFORD, a middle-aged Englishman

SHEILA, his wife

ALICE, their teen-age daughter

THE REVEREND BETHANY, a rector

HERBERT HERBERT, a bookish recluse

GRISSEL HERBERT, his sister

Critique:

As a literary apprentice, Walter de la Mare took himself into a world of fancy, in an effort to escape the dull world about him. He became a master in writing fiction and poetry that carry his readers into a no-man's land of knowledge somewhere between the real and the unreal. He took this area consciously, believing that it is modern man's one hope of escaping from excessive realism. This novel, written early in his career, is a splendid example of de la Mare's use of the imaginative experience as a reality more profound than the ordinary, unimaginative variety. De la Mare has been severely criticized for not indulging himself in a more prevalent temper, that of literary realism, but his own forte has been recognized by a sufficient number of discriminating adult readers and by a sympathetic government, which gave him a pension in 1908 because of his contributions to serious literature.

The Story:

Late one September evening Arthur Lawford, who was recovering from an attack of influenza, was walking in an ancient churchyard. There he found the grave of a man named Nicholas Sabathier, who had killed himself in 1739. Suddenly tired, Lawford stopped to rest and fell asleep. When he awoke, he felt very strange and quite recovered from his illness. Indeed, he felt so well that he practically ran home.

Going up to his room to dress for dinner, Lawford lit a candle and prepared to shave. He stopped in horror when he saw that his whole physical being had changed; he was now lean-faced and dark, an entirely different person. The only thing that could have happened, he thought, was that his nap in the churchyard had changed him into someone else, perhaps the occupant of the grave, Sabathier. Still thankful that he retained his own mind, Lawford tried to think what to do. As he stood undecided, his wife came to call him to dinner. When she came into the room, she was horrified and refused at first to believe the person she saw was her husband.

The Lawfords called in the rector, the Reverend Bethany, who was also horrified. He was willing to believe, however, that something had happened to Lawford and that the person he saw was no impostor. The three decided to wait until a week had passed before doing anything drastic.

Sheila Lawford refused to stay with her husband at night; he seemed too much a stranger to her in his new shape. She tried to get him to remain in his room, but he found it necessary to go out in the evening. On one of his rambles at dusk he met an old woman who had been a schoolfriend of his mother's. She failed to recognize him in his new shape, even though he prompted her by telling her where she had known his mother. She did say he looked somewhat like the late Mrs. Lawford.

On another of his rambles, this time back to the same churchyard, Lawford met a strange man named Herbert Herbert. They talked over the grave of Nicholas Sabathier, and Lawford hinted at his own history. Herbert seemed interested and asked Lawford to come to tea the following day. When they shook hands to part, light fell on Lawford's face for the first time. As it did, Herbert gave an obvious start.

When Lawford went to tea the next day, Herbert told him that his was the face of Nicholas Sabathier, whose picture was in a book Herbert owned. The book also contained an autobiography of Sabathier which revealed him as a man very fond of women. Tea was served by Grisel Herbert, the host's sister. Seeing the look of fear on Lawford's face when he left, she ran after him with the book her brother had mentioned. The two went for a walk, during which Lawford felt that he wrestled with an alien spirit and won out over it.

Alice, Arthur's daughter, returned home from school. When she accidentally met her father, the shock caused her to faint. Her mother tried to make her believe it was someone else, a doctor. Alice went to her father in secret and told him that she knew him and hoped all would turn out well in the end. Sheila, after several arguments with her changed husband, finally decided to go away for a few days, leaving Lawford alone in the big house to wrestle with his problem. Although he hoped to throw off the spirit that had taken possession of him, he feared that it might conquer him entirely.

Lonely after his wife had gone, Lawford turned to the Herberts, of whom neither the rector nor anyone else had previously heard. He spent several days and nights with his new friends. Lawford felt that he was getting better, that he was conquering whatever had taken hold of him. Grisel seemed especially helpful.

One night Lawford went back to the house alone. There he had fearful dreams and once again had a spiritual battle with something he could not name. The following day he went to see the Herberts, who took him on a picnic. They walked many miles until, as they came over a hill, Lawford saw a village. The village awakened strange memories in him, horrible memories. He turned to Grisel and told her that she knew what memories they were; she made no denial.

The next day Grisel and Lawford went out together for a long walk, during which they revealed their mutual feeling that they had come to love each other, as they felt, in another life. It seemed as if through them Nicholas Sabathier and a woman he loved were talking to one another. At last Grisel told Lawford that he was pursuing a dream that could never reach reality. They returned to the Herberts' house, where Grisel told her brother, who seemed not in the least surprised, that Nicholas Sabathier had come to say goodbye for a while. They made their farewells. Lawford, somewhat returning to himself, remarked that he had never appreciated life before his strange adventure.

Lawford went back to his own house. It was locked. Going in quietly, he listened to a conversation between his wife and some friends she had entrusted with the secret of his change. The friends, in spite of what her eyes had seen, and which one of them had also seen, plus the picture and account of Sabathier, which Sheila had found in the house, refused to believe what had happened. They advised her to have him placed in an asylum as mad or else into prison as an impostor. Lawford, standing in the hall, overheard the whole conversation. When they left, he remained, still silent, in the house.

That evening was the eve of St. Michael and All Angels, the same night on which Nicholas Sabathier had killed himself in 1739. As he sat in the quiet house, Lawford felt himself returning to his original condition. Unexpectedly, he was visited by the old lady whom he had met on his walk, the woman who had known his mother at school. She had come to see him in order to assure herself that the man she had met was not Lawford. This evening she immediately recognized him as her schoolfriend's son, with almost no resemblance to the stranger who had accosted her. When she left, she made some ambiguous remarks which left Lawford wondering if she had not, in some fashion, learned more than she revealed. At any rate, he decided that he was sufficiently himself once more to write to his wife and let her know of the change. He sat down to write, but because of what he had overheard earlier in the evening he was unable to put into words what he wanted to say. Fatigued, he fell asleep over the table.

As Lawford slept, the rector came into the room, recognized him as his own parishioner again, and sat down to watch over the sleeping man. Before long the rector was also sound asleep.

REYNARD THE FOX

Type of work: Folk tale

Author: Unknown

Type of plot: Fable

Time of plot: Tenth century

Locale: Germany

First transcribed: Twelfth century

Principal characters:

REYNARD, the fox

NOBLE, the lion, King of Beasts

ISEGRIM, the wolf

TIBERT, the cat

BRUIN, the bear

OTHER ANIMALS AND BIRDS

Critique:

Second in popularity only to the fables of Aesop is the old Germanic tale of Reynard the Fox. Originally a folk comedy, it became through the ages a subtle satire on the customs and institutions of the Middle Ages, indeed on all ages. Here we see that cunning always conquers force, that one who lives by his wits will never suffer. We grudgingly admire the villainous hero even while we hope that he will get his just punishment. The fable is undoubtedly of Oriental origin, passing into the Germanic folk tradition early in the Middle Ages. The earliest extant version is that of Heinrich der Glîchesære in the twelfth century. Goethe gave the tale its best-known form in his Reineke Fuchs.

The Story:

When Noble, the great Lion-king, held court during the Feast of the Pentecost, all the animals told the king of their grievances against Reynard the Fox. The list of sins and crimes was almost as long as the list of animals present. First to complain was Isegrim the wolf, whose children had been made blind by the crafty fox. Panther told how Reynard had promised the hare that he would teach him his prayers, but when the hare had stood in front of Reynard as he was instructed, Reynard had grabbed him by the throat and tried to kill him. To Chanticleer the cock Reynard had gone disguised as a monk, saying that he would never eat flesh again. But when Chanticleer relaxed his vigilance over his flock and believed the villain, Reynard had grabbed his children and eaten them.

So the complaints went on, with only Tibert the cat and Grimbard the brock speaking in Reynard's defense. These two reminded the king of the crimes committed by the complainers, but the king was stern; Reynard must be brought to court to answer for his sins. Bruin the bear was sent to bring the culprit in. Bruin was strong and brave, and he promised the king that he would not be fooled by Reynard's knavery or flattering tongue.

When Bruin arrived at Reynard's castle and delivered the king's message, Reynard welcomed the bear and promised to accompany him back to court. In fact, Reynard said that he wished they were already at court, for he had abstained from meat and eaten so much of a new food, called honeycombs, that his stomach was swollen and uncomfortable. Bruin fell into the trap and begged to be taken to the store of honey. Reynard pretended to be reluctant to delay their trip to court, but at last he agreed to show Bruin the honey. The wily fox led Bruin into a trap in some tree trunks, where the poor bear was set upon by humans and beaten unmercifully. He escaped with his life and sadly made his way back to court, mocked by the taunts of his betrayer.

Enraged at the insult to his personal messenger, the king sent Tibert the cat to tell Reynard to surrender himself at once, under penalty of death. But Tibert fared no better. He was tricked into jumping into a net trap by the promise of a feast on mice and rats. He too escaped and returned to the court, no longer a defender of the traitorous Reynard. The next time the king sent Grim-bard the brock to bring the fox in. He too was warmly received by Reynard and his wife, and he too received Reynard's promise to accompany him to court. This time the evil fox actually kept his promise, confessing all his sins to the brock as they journeyed.

At court, Reynard was confronted by all his accusers. One by one they told of his horrible crimes against them. Reynard defended himself against them all, saying that he was a loyal and true subject of the king and the object of many lies and deceptions. The king, unmoved, sentenced Reynard to death. On the gallows, the fox confessed his sins, saying that he was the more guilty because he did not steal from want since money and jewels he had in great plenty. Hearing Reynard speak of his treasure, the greedy king wanted it for himself, and he asked Reynard where the jewels were hidden. The fox said that he would gladly tell him the hiding place, for the treasure had been stolen in order to save the king's life. Crafty Reynard told a slippery story about a treasure which the other animals were going to use to depose the king and make Bruin the ruler in his place. In order to save the life of his sovereign, Reynard had stolen the treasure from the traitors and now had it in his possession. The foolish king, believing the smooth liar, ordered Reynard released from the gallows and made a favorite at court. Bruin the bear and Isegrim the wolf were arrested for high treason.

Reynard said that he himself could not show the king the treasure because he had to make a pilgrimage to Rome to ask the pope to remove a curse from him. For his journey he was given the skin of the bear and the shoes of the wolf, leaving those two fellows in terrible pain. The king then put his mail around Reynard's neck and a staff in his hand and sent him on his way. Kyward the hare and Bellin the ram accompanied Reynard on the pilgrimage. They stopped at the fox's castle to bid his wife goodbye, and there Reynard tricked the hare, killed him, and ate all but the head. That he sent back to the king by the ram, that stupid animal thinking he was carrying a letter for the monarch. The king was so furious that he gave the ram and all his lineage to the wolf and the bear to atone for the king's misjudgment of them.

Again complaints against the fox poured into the king's ear. At last he determined to lay siege to Reynard's castle until the culprit was captured. This time there would be no mercy. But Grim-bard the brock hurried to the castle and warned Reynard of the plot. The crafty fellow went immediately to the court to plead his case before the king.

On the way he again confessed to the brock that he was guilty of many sins, but he made them seem mild in comparison with those of the animals now accusing him. To the king also he confessed that he had sinned, but he denied the worst of the crimes laid to his doing. His plea was that he would not have surrendered voluntarily had he been so guilty. His words were so moving that most of his accusers kept silent, fearing that the king would again believe Reynard and punish those who would condemn him. Only the wolf and the bear held fast to their accusations. With the help of his aunt, the ape, Reynard once more excused himself in the king's eyes and made the monarch believe that it was the injured who were the guilty. Again Reynard talked of lost jewels of great value, jewels which he would search for and present to the king.

Only Isegrim the wolf would not accept Reynard's lies. He challenged the fox to a fight. Reynard would have been hard put to fight with the wolf except that Isegrim's feet were still sore from Reynard's taking of his shoes some time before. Also, the ape shaved off Reynard's fur and covered him with oil so that the wolf could not get hold of him. Even so, Isegrim would have defeated him had he not listened to Reynard's oily promises of all the rewards Isegrim would receive were he to let Reynard go. At last the king stopped the fight and ordered all the animals to a great feast. There he forgave Reynard all his sins after taking the scamp's promise that he would commit no more crimes against his fellow animals. The king made Reynard high bailiff of the country, thus setting him above all the others. From that time on the mighty of the forest would bow to the cunning of the weak.

RICHARD THE SECOND

HENRY BOLINGBROKE, Duke of Hereford, son of John of Gaunt

DUKE OF AUMERLE, son of the Duke of York

THOMAS MOWBRAY, Duke of Norfolk

EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND, supporter of Bolingbroke

Critique:

One of Shakespeare's best-known historical plays, The Tragedy of King Richard the Second is his first truly independent work in this form. Its concentration on blank verse reveals the influence of Marlowe, but the character of Richard himself clearly indicates the course the playwright will follow in creating his later tragedies of character. Revealing, as it does, Shakespeare's patriotic feelings, this play is among his most eloquent and contains many lines frequently quoted.

The Story:

During the reign of Richard II, two young dukes, Henry Bolingbroke and Thomas Mowbray, quarreled bitterly; and in the end the king summoned them into his presence to settle their differences publicly. Although Bolingbroke was the oldest son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, and therefore a cousin of the king, Richard was perfectly fair in his interview with the two men and showed neither any favoritism.

Bolingbroke accused Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, of mismanaging military funds and of helping to plot the murder of the dead Duke of Gloucester, another of the king's uncles. All these charges Mowbray forcefully denied. At last Richard decided that to settle the dispute the men should have a trial by combat at Coventry, and the court adjourned there to witness the tournament.

Richard, ever nervous and suspicious, grew uneasy as the contest began. Suddenly, just after the beginning trumpet sounded, the king declared that the combat should not take place. Instead, calling the two men to him, he banished them from the country. Bolingbroke was to be exiled for six years and Mowbray for the rest of his life. At the same time Richard exacted promises from them that they would never plot against him. Still persistent in his accusations, Bolingbroke tried to persuade Mowbray to plead guilty, before he left England, to the charges against him. Mowbray, refusing to do so, warned Richard against the cleverness of Bolingbroke.

Not long after his son had been banished, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, became ill and sent for Richard to receive his dying advice. Although the Duke of York pointed out that giving advice to Richard was too often a waste of time, John of Gaunt felt that perhaps a dying man would be heeded while a living one would not. From his deathbed he criticized Richard's extravagance, for mis-handling of public funds had almost impoverished the nation. John of Gaunt warned Richard also that the kingdom would suffer for his selfishness.

Richard paid no attention to his uncle's advice. After the death of John of Gaunt, the king seized his lands and wealth to use for capital in backing his Irish wars. His uncle, the aged Duke of York, attempted to dissuade the king from these moves because of Bolingbroke's anger and influence among the people. York's fears were soon confirmed. Bolingbroke, hearing that his father's lands had been seized by the king's officers, used the information as an excuse to terminate his period of banishment. Gathering about him troops and supplies, he landed in the north of England. There other unruly lords, the Earl of Northumberland and his son, Henry Percy, known as Hotspur, Lord Ross, and Lord Willoughby joined him.

Richard, heedless of all warnings, had set off for Ireland to pursue his foreign war. He left his tottering kingdom in the hands of the weak Duke of York, who was no match for the wily Bolingbroke. When the exiled traitor reached Gloucestershire, the Duke of York visited him at his camp. Caught between loyalty to Richard and his despair over the bankrupt state of the country, York finally yielded his troops to Bolingbroke. Richard, returning to England and expecting to find an army of Welshmen under his command, learned that they, after hearing false reports of his death, had gone over to Bolingbroke. Moreover, the strong men of his court, the Earl of Wiltshire, Bushy, and Green, had all been executed.

Destitute of friends and without an army, the sorrowing Richard took refuge in Flint Castle, where Bolingbroke went pretending to pay homage to the king. Making his usurped titles and estates his excuse, Bolingbroke took Richard prisoner and carried him to London. There Richard broke completely, showing little interest in anything, philosophizing constantly on his own downfall. Brought before Bolingbroke and the cruel and unfeeling Earl of Northumberland, Richard was forced to abdicate his throne and sign papers confessing his political crimes. Bolingbroke, assuming royal authority, ordered Richard imprisoned in the Tower of London.

During a quarrel among the young dukes of the court, the Bishop of Carlisle announced that Mowbray had made a name for himself while fighting in the Holy Land, had then retired to Venice, and had died there. When Bolingbroke affected great concern over that news, the Bishop of Carlisle turned on him and denounced him for his part in depriving Richard of the throne. Nevertheless, Bolingbroke, armed with numerous legal documents he had collected to prove his rights, ascended the throne. Richard predicted to the Earl of Northumberland that Bolingbroke would soon distrust his old aide because the nobleman had had practice in unseating a king. Soon afterward Richard was sent to the dungeons at Pomfret Castle and his queen was banished to France.

At the Duke of York's palace the aging duke sorrowfully related to his duchess the details of the coronation procession of Henry IV. When the duke discovered, however, that his son Aumerle and other loyal followers of Richard were planning to assassinate Henry IV at Oxford, York immediately started for the palace to warn the new monarch. The duchess, frantic because of her son's danger, advised him to reach the palace ahead of his father, reveal his treachery to the king, and ask the royal pardon. She herself finally pleaded for her son before the king and won Aumerle's release.

Having punished the conspirators, Henry IV grew uneasy at the prospect of other treasonable activities, for while Richard lived there was always danger that he might be restored to power. Henry IV, plotting the death of the deposed monarch, suggested casually to Sir Pierce Exton, a faithful servant and courtier, that he murder Richard at Pomfret.

There in his dungeon Richard quarreled with his keeper, according to Exton's plan, and in the struggle that ensued the knight drew his sword and struck down his unhappy prisoner. He then placed Richard's body in a coffin, carried it to Windsor Castle, and there presented it to Henry IV. Distressed over the news of mounting insurrection in the country, King Henry pretended innocence of the murder of Richard and vowed to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to atone for the death of his fallen cousin.

Critique:

The Tragedy of King Richard the Third is the last in the series of history plays which Shakespeare wrote depicting the strife between the Houses of York and Lancaster. Like Richard the Second, this play is patterned after the work of Marlowe with great emphasis on blank verse rather than on prose and songs. A tragedy of blood, Richard the Third is full of the traditional violence and murder, yet it manages to evoke a surprising amount of sympathy for its hero-villain, especially in the last scenes of the drama.

The Story:

After the conclusion of the wars between the Houses of York and Lancaster, Edward IV was firmly established on the throne once again. Before long, however, his treacherous brother Richard, the hunchbacked Duke of Gloucester, resumed his own plans for gaining the throne. Craftily he removed one obstacle in his path when he turned the king's hatred against the third brother, the Duke of Clarence. Telling the king of an ancient prophecy that his issue would be disinherited by one of the royal line whose name began with the letter G, Richard directed suspicion against the Duke of Clarence, whose name was George. Immediately Clarence was arrested and taken to the Tower. Richard, pretending sympathy, advised him that the jealousy and hatred of Queen Elizabeth were responsible for his imprisonment. After promising every aid in helping his brother to secure his freedom, Richard, as false in word as he was cruel in deed, gave orders that Clarence be stabbed in his cell and his body placed in a barrel of malmsey wine.

Hoping to insure his position more definitely, Richard then made plans to marry Lady Anne, widow of Prince Edward, son of the murdered Henry VI. The young Prince of Wales had also been slain by Richard and his brothers after the battles had ended; Lady Anne and Queen Margaret, Henry's widow, were the only remaining members of the once powerful House of Lancaster still living in England. Intercepting Lady Anne at the funeral procession of Henry VI, Richard attempted to woo her. In spite of her hatred and fear of her husband's murderer, she was finally persuaded to accept an engagement ring when Richard insisted that it was for love of her that he had murdered the Prince of Wales.

Richard went to the court, where Edward IV lay ill. There he affected great sorrow and indignation over the news of the death of Clarence, thus endearing himself to Lord Hastings and the Duke of Buckingham who were friends of Clarence. Insinuating that Queen Elizabeth and her followers had turned the wrath of the king against Clarence and thus brought about his death, Richard managed to convince everyone except Queen Margaret, who knew well what had really happened. Openly accusing him, she attempted to warn Buckingham and the others against Richard, but they ignored her.

Edward IV, meanwhile, ailing and depressed, tried to make peace among the enemy factions in his realm, but before this end could be accomplished he died. His son, Prince Edward, was sent for from Ludlow to take his father's place. At the same time Richard imprisoned Lord Grey, Lord Rivers, and Lord Vaughan, followers and relatives of the queen, and subsequently had them executed.

Queen Elizabeth, frightened, sought refuge for herself and her second son, the young Duke of York, with the Archbishop of Canterbury. Richard, upon hearing of the queen's action, pretended much concern over the welfare of his brother's children and set himself up as their guardian. Managing to remove young York from the care of his mother, he had him placed in the Tower, along with Prince Edward. He announced that they were under his protection and that they would remain there only until Prince Edward had been crowned.

Learning from Sir William Catesby, a court toady, that Lord Hastings was a loyal adherent of the young prince, Richard contrived to remove the influential nobleman from the court. He summoned Hastings to a meeting called supposedly to discuss plans for the coronation of the new king. Although Lord Stanley warned Hastings that ill luck awaited him if he went to the meeting, the trusting nobleman paid no attention but kept his appointment with Richard in the Tower. There, in a trumped-up scene, Richard accused Hastings of treason and ordered his immediate execution. Then Richard and Buckingham dressed themselves in rusty old armor and pretended to the lord mayor that Hastings had been plotting against them; the lord mayor was convinced by their false protestations that the execution was justified.

Richard, with Buckingham, plotted to seize the throne for himself. Buckingham, speaking in the Guildhall of the great immorality of the late King Edward, hinted that both the king and his children were illegitimate. Shocked, a citizens' committee headed by the lord mayor approached Richard and begged him to accept the crown. They found him, well coached by Buckingham, in the company of two priests, with a prayer book in his hand. So impressed were they with his seeming piety, that they repeated their offer after he had hypocritically refused it. Pretending great reluctance, Richard finally accepted, after being urged by Buckingham, the lord mayor, and Catesby. Immediate plans for the coronation were made.

Lady Anne, interrupted during a visit to the Tower with Queen Elizabeth and the old Duchess of York, was ordered to Westminster to be crowned Richard's queen. The three women heard with horror that Richard had ascended the throne, and they were all the more suspicious of him because they had been refused entrance to see the young princes. Fearing the worst, they sorrowed among themselves and saw only doom for the nation.

Soon after his coronation Richard suggested to Buckingham that the two princes must be killed. When Buckingham balked at the order, Richard refused to consider his request for elevation to the earldom of Hereford. Proceeding alone to secure the safety of his position, he hired Sir James Tyrrel, a discontented nobleman, to smother the children in their sleep. Then, to make his position still more secure, Richard planned to marry Elizabeth of York, his own niece and daughter of the deceased Edward IV. Spreading the news that Queen Anne was mortally ill, he had her secretly murdered. He then removed any threat from Clarence's heirs by imprisoning his son and by arranging a marriage for the daughter whereby her social position was considerably lowered.

But all these precautions could not stem the tide of threats that were beginning to endanger Richard. In Brittany, the Earl of Richmond, Henry Tudor, gathered an army and invaded the country. When news of Richmond's landing at Milford reached London, Buckingham fled from Richard, whose cruelty and guilt were finally becoming apparent to his closest friends and associates. Buckingham joined the forces of Richmond, but shortly afterward he was captured and executed by Richard.

In a tremendous final battle the armies of Richmond and Richard met on Bosworth Field. There, on the night before the encounter, all the ghosts of Richard's victims appeared to him in his sleep and prophesied his defeat. At the same time they foretold the coming victory and success of the Earl of Richmond. These predictions held true, for the next day Richard, fighting desperately, was slain in battle by Richmond, after crying out the offer of his ill-gotten kingdom for a horse, his own having been killed under him. The duke mounted the throne and married Elizabeth of York, thus uniting the houses of York and Lancaster and ending the feud of those noble families forever.

RIP VAN WINKLE

Type of work: Tale

Author: Washington Irving (1783-1859)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: New York State

First published: 1819-1820

Principal characters:

RIP VAN WINKLE, a henpecked husband

DAME VAN WINKLE, his wife

Critique:

"Rip Van Winkle," like "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow," first appeared in The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent., and with these romantic, almost fantastic, tales Irving made his earliest and most favorable impression upon the English and American reading publics. He was living in England when he wrote these tales, but it is easy to see that the fascination of the American landscape was with him there. "Rip Van Winkle" is said to be based on a common European legend, transferred to American soil; that is, Otmar's tale of "Peter Klaus" in the Volkssagen.

The Story:

Along the reaches of the Hudson, not far from the Kaatskill mountains, there was a small, antique Dutch town. The mountains overshadowed the town and there were times when the good Dutch burghers could see a hood of clouds hanging over the crests of the hills.

In that small town lived a man named Rip Van Winkle. He was beloved by all his neighbors, by the children and the dogs, but at home his life was made miserable by his shrewish wife. Though he was willing to help anyone else at any odd job that might be necessary, it was impossible for him to keep his own house or farm in repair. He was descended from a good old Dutch family, but he had none of the fine Dutch traits of thrift or energy.

He spent a great deal of his time at the village inn, under the sign of King George III, until his wife chased him from there. Then he took his gun and his dog Wolf and headed for the hills. Wolf was as happy as Rip to get away from home. When Dame Van Winkle berated the two of them, Rip raised his eyes silently to heaven, but Wolf tucked his tail between his legs and slunk out of the house.

One fine day in autumn Rip and Wolf walked high into the Kaatskills after squirrels. As evening came on, he and his dog sat down to rest a while before starting home. When Rip started down the mountainside, he heard his name called.

A short, square little man with a grizzled beard had called Rip to help carry a keg of liquor. The little man was dressed in antique Dutch clothes. Although he accepted Rip's help in carrying the keg, he carried on no conversation. As they ascended the mountain, Rip heard noises that sounded like peals of thunder. When they reached a sort of amphitheater near the top, Rip saw a band of little men, dressed and bearded like his companion, playing ninepins. One stout old gentleman, who seemed to be the leader, wore a laced doublet and a high-crowned hat with a feather.

The little men were no more companionable than the first one had been, and Rip felt somewhat depressed. Because they seemed to enjoy the liquor from the keg, Rip tasted it a few times while they were absorbed in their game. Then he fell into a deep sleep.

On waking, he looked in vain for the stout old gentleman and his companions. When he reached for his gun, he found only a rusty flintlock. His dog did not answer his call. He tried to find the amphitheater where the little men had played, but the way was blocked by a rushing stream.

The people he saw as he walked into town were all strangers to him. Since most of them, upon looking at him, stroked their chins, Rip unconsciously stroked his and found that his beard had grown a foot long.

The town itself looked different. At first Rip thought the liquor from the keg had addled his head, for he had a hard time finding his own house. When he did locate it at last, he found it in a state of decay. Even the sign over the inn had been changed to one carrying the name of General Washington. The men gathered under the sign talked gibberish to him, and they accused him of trying to stir up trouble by coming armed to an election. When they let him ask for his old cronies, he named men who the loungers told him had moved away, or else they had been dead these twenty years.

Finally an eager young woman pushed through the crowd to look at Rip. Her voice started a train of thought and he asked who she was and who her father had been. When she claimed to be Rip Van Winkle's daughter Judith, he asked one more question about her mother. Judith told him that her mother had died after breaking a blood vessel in a fit of anger at a Yankee peddler. Rip breathed more freely.

Although another old woman claimed that she recognized him, the men at the inn only winked at his story until an old man, a descendant of the village historian, vouched for Rip's strange tale. He assured the men that he had it as a fact from his historian ancestor that Hendrick Hudson with his crew came to the mountains every twenty years to visit the scene of their exploits, and that the old historian had seen the crew in antique Dutch garb playing at ninepins just as Rip had related.

Rip spent the rest of his life happily telling his story at the inn until everyone knew it by heart. Even now when the inhabitants of the village hear thunder in the Kaatskills, they say that Hendrick Hudson and his crew are playing ninepins. And many a henpecked husband has wished in vain for a draught of Rip Van Winkle's quieting brew.

ROBIN HOOD'S ADVENTURES

Locale: England

First published: c. 1490

ROBIN HOOD, Earl of Huntingdon

LITTLE JOHN,

FRIAR TUCK,

WILL SCARLET,

A TINKER, and

A COOK, of the Band of Merry Men

THE SHERIFF OF NOTTINGHAM

SIR RICHARD OF THE LEA, Robin Hood's friend

Critique:

Robin Hood, legendary outlaw, is a folk hero who has been celebrated in ballad and tale since the Middle Ages. The first collection of ballads dealing with his exploits was published about 1490. This book, printed by Wynkyn de Worde, was titled The Lytel Geste of Robin Hood. These adventure stories tell of Robin Hood's courage, skill at archery, and daring deeds in support of the poor. Nowadays Robin himself is known chiefly as a children's hero, but he has served as the prototype for a great many heroes of romantic fiction.

The Story:

Robin Hood, before he became an outlaw, was the rightful Earl of Huntingdon.

Because the times were so corrupt, his father had been dispossessed of his estates and young Robin was driven into the forest. His method of protest was to organize a band of outlaws in Sherwood Forest and prey upon the rich to give to the poor.

The reason for his outlawry was this: a great archer, he was on his way to a shooting match in Nottingham. Some of the king's foresters met him in Sherwood Forest and mocked his youth. Because one of the foresters wagered that he could not slay a deer, Robin Hood killed one of the king's stags. The penalty for his deed was death. When the foresters gave chase, Robin was forced to hide in the forest. There he found other landless, hunted men and became their leader.

One day, seeking adventure, Robin Hood encountered a tall stranger at a bridge. Calling his merry men after the stranger had tumbled him into the stream, Robin and his companions soon overcame the stranger. Then a shooting match took place between the two. Robin Hood won the match, and the stranger good-naturedly acknowledged defeat and joined Robin's band. The outlaws called him Little John because he was so big.

The Sheriff of Nottingham, angered because Robin flouted his authority, sent out a warrant for his arrest. This warrant was carried by a Tinker into the forest. When the Tinker met Robin Hood, however, he failed to recognize the fugitive because Robin was disguised. Robin took the Tinker to the Blue Boar Inn, got him drunk, and stole the warrant. Later the Tinker met Robin in the forest and fought with him. Robin Hood won the bout, and the Tinker happily joined the other merry men in Robin's band.

The Sheriff of Nottingham grew more and more enraged by Robin's boldness. When the king rebuked him for not capturing the outlaw, the sheriff devised still another plan. Knowing that Robin Hood prided himself on his skill in archery, the sheriff proclaimed a shooting match in Nottingham Tower. There he hoped to catch Robin Hood and his men. They outwitted him, however, for they went to the match in disguise. As a tattered stranger, Robin won the golden arrow given as a prize. After he returned to Sherwood Forest, he sent the sheriff a note of thanks for the prize. This act infuriated that officer even more.

Now the band of outlaws lay low in the forest for a time. At last Robin Hood sent one of his men to learn the sheriff's next plan. When he was captured, the band set out to rescue him. As he was being dragged forth to be hanged, Little John leaped into the cart and cut the prisoner's bonds. The other outlaws ran from their hiding places and overcame the sheriff's men.

Next Robin Hood bought some meat and took it to Nottingham to sell to the poor at half price. Disguised as a butcher, he was thought by most people to be either a foolish peasant or a wealthy nobleman in disguise. When Robin Hood offered to sell him a herd of cattle at a ridiculously low price, the sheriff gleefully accepted the offer. Then Robin took the sheriff to Sherwood Forest, took his money, showed him the king's deer, and told him that there stood his herd.

As a lark Little John went to the Fair at Nottingham Town, where he treated all the people to food and drink. When he was asked to enter the sheriff's service, because of his great size, Little John decided such employment might be fun. He found life in the sheriff's household so pleasant that he stayed six months, until he gradually grew bored and became arrogant toward the steward. The steward called the cook to fight Little John. Both men ate such a huge meal before fighting that neither could win. Finally they decided to stop because they did not really dislike each other. Then Little John persuaded the cook to join the Band of Merry Men.

On another day Robin Hood and his men went out to find Friar Tuck of Fountain Dale, supposedly a rich curate. Spying a strange monk singing and feasting beside a brook, Robin joined him. When Robin wished to go across the water, he persuaded the man to carry him on his back. On the return trip the monk, who was in reality Friar Tuck, dumped Robin into the water. After another great fight, with Robin the victor, the friar joyfully joined the outlaw band.

Having heard of Robin's prowess and fascinated by stories told about him and his men, the queen invited him to come to London. In an attempt to outwit the king she proposed an archery match at which she would put up three archers against his best three. If her team won, the king was to issue a pardon of forty days to certain prisoners. The king accepted the wager. The queen's archers were Robin Hood, Little John, and Will Scarlet, all in disguise. Naturally, the outlaws won, although Will Scarlet was bested in his match. When the king learned that the queen's archers were Robin Hood and two of his men, he was angry, and they escaped capture only with the queen's help. The others returned safely to Sherwood Forest, but Robin Hood met with many dangerous adventures on the way. During his journey he encountered Sir Richard of the Lea, a knight whom he had once aided, and Sir Richard advised him to return to London and throw himself on the queen's mercy. She persuaded the king to give Robin Hood safe escort back to Sherwood Forest and so pay the wager of the shooting match.

King Richard the Lion-Hearted, returning from the Crusades, decided to seek out Robin Hood and his outlaw band. With six others, all disguised as friars, Richard encountered Robin and his men and bested them. Richard then revealed himself and pardoned Robin and his men. Robin he restored to his rightful honors as the Earl of Huntingdon.

Several years later, on a visit to Sherwood Forest, Robin Hood became so homesick for his old life that he gave up his title and returned to live with the outlaws. His action infuriated John, the new king, and the Sheriff of Nottingham. They sent their men to capture the outlaws and during the fighting the sheriff was killed. Robin Hood, ill and much depressed by this bloodshed, went to Kirkley Abbey, where his cousin was prioress, to be bled. She was a treacherous woman and had him bled too long, so that he lay dying. At last Little John, having pulled down bolts and bars to get to Robin, reached his leader's bedside. As Robin Hood lay dying in Little John's arms, he asked for his bow and arrows and said that he wished to be buried wherever his arrow fell. Then Robin shot an arrow through the window of the priory. Little John marked its flight and Robin was buried beneath the ancient oak that was his last target. His merry men disbanded after his death, but the stories of their brave deeds and the prowess of Robin Hood live on even to this day.

THE ROMANCE OF A SCHOOLMASTER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Edmondo de Amicis (1846-1908)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Italy

First published: 1876

Principal characters:

EMILIO RATTI, a young schoolmaster

PROFESSOR MEGARI, his adviser and friend

FAUSTINA GALLI, a young schoolteacher whom Ratti loves

GIOVANNI LABACCIO, a schoolteacher and Ratti's friend

CARLO LERICA, another friend, a teacher

Critique:

The Romance of a Schoolmaster was a product of the author's later years, when he was convinced that socialism offered the only palliative for his country's ills. In this novel he found fault with the lower and middle classes for being harsher toward their inferiors than the upper class was to people below it. The novel is also a timeless study of the vicissitudes of the teacher in the elementary school, the type of teacher recruited from a shallow culture and the lower classes. In the novel the teacher's hardships, his low pay, his pettifogging enemies, the lack of social position, and his lack of a cultural background are all vividly drawn. When the novel appeared in Italy, it was bitterly criticized because of the author's attacks on the system and officials of the Department of Public Instruction.

The Story:

The unexpected death of Emilio Ratti's father plunged the family into poverty, and Emilio, at seventeen, found it necessary to look for some way to make his own living. At his mother's suggestion, and with financial help from a wealthy family named Goli, he entered a normal school located in the town where the Rattis resided. The young man felt a real call to the teaching profession; the love and sympathy he felt for his young brothers and sisters had given him an interest in the welfare and training of small children.

His mother's death came on the day Emilio learned of his appointment to the normal school. As a result, he spent his first months there in relative solitude, reading and studying during the hours when he was not required to be in classes. His only friends were his roommates. One was Carlo Lerica, a thirty-year-old ex-corporal of grenadiers who had left the army to go into elementary teaching. The other was a quiet, compromising chap in his mid-twenties, Giovanni Labaccio. His only other friend was Professor Megari. Emilio believed that the professor had a genuine liking for him, even though he did not let it show among the other students.

When Emilio finished his course at the normal school, the professor admitted his sympathy for the young man and showed him a note written by Emilio's mother on her deathbed, a note asking this faculty member to do what he could for her son. Professor Megari, thinking that the letter might inspire Emilio in his career, gave the letter to him.

Emilio's first post was at an elementary school in Garasco, not far from the city of Turin, in the northern part of Italy. There the new teacher spent his first professional year, a year not without its tribulations. He inadvertently made an enemy of the local priest's cook, a spiteful woman who did everything she could to harm his reputation with the parents of his pupils and with the local authorities, mostly because he refused to bow to her in the street. During that first year Emilio tried to keep discipline and order in his room and motivate his students by kindness and affection for them. He learned, however, that the rather brutal peasant youngsters took his attitude for weakness and disliked him for being so easygoing. At the annual inspection the school inspector for the province advised Emilio to keep his affection for his pupils but not to let it show, lest they continue to take advantage of him. Emilio was leaving Garasco at the end of the year, his position being only a temporary one, and he resolved to change his methods when he changed his location.

The following year Emilio taught at Piazzena, a small village on the plains. Inadvertently, he found himself regarded in the area as a member of the opposition to the political group in office, largely because he had secured his position through an influential gentleman of the neighborhood. The first year in Piazzena went by without any but the usual petty incidents of a schoolteacher's existence, and at its end Emilio was congratulated by the provincial inspector. In the second year, however, the village was thrown into open war over the treatment of a young woman who taught girls in the elementary school. The local priest accused her of teaching the girls to go against the principles of the Church. When those charges failed to arouse her or the village, he accused her of immorality. Emilio, knowing how unjust the priest's accusations were, was among those who sided with the young woman. After a long battle, in which the school authorities and the courts became involved, the teacher's good name was vindicated and the priest was forced to pay her an indemnity and to apologize in print. The battle was enough to convince Emilio that he no longer wanted to remain in the community. He did not request to have his two-year contract renewed.

Emilio's next post was in Altarana, situated in the Occidental Alps. There he ran into a new problem. Because the government decreed that all children should be sent to school, there was a good deal of resentment on the part of the peasants and their children. Try as he would to keep the children in attendance, Emilio fought a losing battle. Both the parents and youngsters preferred to have the children work in the fields.

In spite of his difficulties Emilio stayed in Altarana six years, hoping that by the end of that time his study and experience would enable him to get a post in the municipal school system in Turin. The pay was better in the city and teaching was not completely subject to the whims of pettifogging authorities who tried to keep money from the schools and to harass the teachers for not being friends to every faction and individual.

Faustina Galli, a new teacher for girls, arrived in Altarana. She had been chosen by one of the village officials because of her beauty, and the man who chose her hoped to have an affair with her. When she proved to be impervious to his solicitations or his threats, Emilio, impressed with her virtue and beauty, fell in love with her. But Faustina, having the responsibility of a crippled father to look after, rejected his attentions. Disappointed and despairing of ever getting ahead in his profession, Emilio turned to liquor. He almost lost his post, but his old friend and adviser, Professor Megari, interceded in his behalf and also showed him the folly of his drinking.

In his last year at Altarana, Emilio learned what had happened to his roommates at the normal school. The ex-corporal of grenadiers, Carlo Lerica, had encountered many difficulties, but Giovanni Labaccio had made a name for himself by insinuating himself into everyone's graces. He finally married a rich woman older than he and retired from teaching. After his retirement he turned against the profession from which he had risen and accused the teachers of thinking only of money, rather than their professional responsibilities.

Emilio's next village post was in Camina, where he spent two more years. There he had numerous small adventures and the usual troubles with the local authorities and parents, but he was learning to put up with them as one of the conditions of his profession. From there he went to Bossolano, where he spent his final year as a teacher in a village school. At the end of that year he felt that he had served his apprenticeship and had put in enough study to compete successfully for a post in Turin. He took the examinations in the city, along with more than two hundred other candidates. He was successful, as was his old classmate, Carlo Lerica. Not only did they pass the examination, but they were appointed immediately to posts. To add to his joy, Emilio discovered that Faustina Galli was also teaching in Turin. From her he learned that her father had died, and she gave him reason to hope that she was at last ready to return his love.

THE ROMANCE OF LEONARDO DA VINCI

Type of work: Novel

Author: Dmitri Merejkowski (1865-1941)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: 1494-1519

Locale: Italy and France

LEONARDO DA VINCI, Renaissance artist

GIOVANNI BELTRAFFIO, his pupil

CESARE BORGIA, Leonardo's patron

MONNA CASSANDRA, a sorceress

FRANCESCO MELZI, another pupil of Leonardo

MONNA LISA GIOCONDA, model for a portrait by Leonardo

Critique:

This novel presents a vivid picture of the glittering Italian Renaissance. The royal courts, the Vatican, the quiet countryside, the studios of artists, an alchemist's workshop, and many other scenes serve as a backdrop for the story of the later years of the famed painter and thinker, Leonardo da Vinci. Almost all the great figures of the age pass through the pages of the novel as they cross the path of Leonardo. More than a fictionalized biography, it is also the history of a culture, for Merejkowski has depicted the religious and political struggles of the age as well as its adventure, romance, and bravado.

The Story:

In 1494 the fear of the coming of the Antichrist prophesied in the New Testament began to make itself felt in Italy. Greek and Roman statues, which had recently been excavated and accepted as supreme works of art by such men as Leonardo da Vinci, were considered by the common people as actual pagan deities returning to prepare the world for the reign of the Antichrist.

Leonardo da Vinci had become a member of the court of Duke Moro in Milan. Besides acting as chief architect for the duke, he interested himself in teaching his pupils, Giovanni Beltraccio and Andrea Salaino, and in working on whatever caught his fancy. Most of the money he received from the duke's treasury went to buy pieces of amber with bugs imbedded in them, old shells, live birds that he studied and then freed, and other curious objects which distracted his attention and kept him from completing his painting, The Last Supper.

The student Giovanni was attracted to Monna Cassandra, a beautiful girl who lived in the neighborhood. Unknown to him, she was a practitioner of the black arts and a favorite of suspected witches.

The Duke of Milan called upon the King of France to help protect and support his dukedom. But Louis XII of France soon proved false to his friendship with the duke and overran the duchy. The French forces used a clay statue of a mounted warrior, which Leonardo had not yet cast in bronze, as a target for a shooting contest, and a flood caused the walls on which The Last Supper was painted to bulge and crack. Realizing that these two works of art could never be finished, Leonardo decided to leave Milan and go to the court of Cesare Borgia, son of Pope Alexander VI.

As Borgia's adviser, Leonardo designed many pieces of war equipment and machinery which Borgia used in his attempt to seize all of Italy for the pope. None of Leonardo's pupils approved of his working for Borgia, whose cruelties and vices made him hated all over Italy.

One day one of Leonardo's students, a blacksmith named Zoroastro da Peretola, had gone against his orders and had tried to fly in Leonardo's only partly completed airplane. Falling from a considerable height, he received such a jolt that his mind was never again sound.

Leonardo left Borgia's services and, with the help of his friend Machiavelli, received a commission from the city of Florence to plan a system of waterways which would divert the course of the Arno River. Because Machiavelli had underestimated the expense of the work, Leonardo was soon in trouble with the authorities. The canal project was abandoned and Leonardo was asked instead to paint a large picture depicting the battle of Anghiari. At that time Michelangelo was also working in Florence, and a great jealousy had grown up between admirers of the two artists. Leonardo tried to make friends with Michelangelo, but the passionate artist would have nothing to do with the mild Leonardo. Raphael, at that time only a young man, was friendly with both artists. His works were more popular with artistically-minded Pope Leo X than those of either of the older men.

During his stay in Florence, Leonardo had begun the portrait of a young married woman of the town named Monna Lisa Gioconda. As she sat for him, day after day, he would amuse her by telling her stories as he worked, or converse with her on any subject in order to keep her interested in the dull task of posing. As the months passed, Monna Lisa and Leonardo were more and more drawn to each other. Both were essentially secretive persons who seemed to understand each other intuitively. Months passed into years, and still Monna Lisa came to the studio to pose. No one suspected anything improper of the meetings, but it became a source of amusement in Florence that the gentle artist, who had never before taken an interest in women, seemed to be in love. Monna Lisa's sudden death shocked Leonardo to the bottom of his soul. He had hoped to finish her portrait, to finish this one work at least, but with Monna Lisa's death his hopes fell. He had tried to show in her face the mystery of the universe, for he had found that the mystery of Monna Lisa and the mystery of the universe were one.

Because of the trouble over the canal and the unfinished picture of the battle of Anghiari, Leonardo da Vinci was dismissed from the service of the city of Florence. He returned to Milan to serve under the new ruler of that city, Louis XII of France. There Giovanni Beltraffio again met Monna Cassandra. One day she promised to show him the answers to his deepest questions. He was to meet her late that same night. As Giovanni left her, he was shocked to see in her face the expression of the White She-Demon, a specter which had haunted him since childhood.

But before the time for their meeting Monna Cassandra was taken prisoner by the Most Holy Inquisition. Thinking her completely innocent, Giovanni visited all his old friends in an effort to secure her release. The more he tried to help her, however, the more convinced he became that there were indeed evil spirits who inhabited the forms of human beings, and that the White She-Demon was one of them. Unable to prevent Monna's death, Giovanni walked about the streets desolately. Suddenly he realized that the strange odor he had been smelling was the scent of burning flesh. Monna and one hundred and twenty-nine others accused as witches were being burned at the stake. Terror-stricken, he almost lost his mind. Later, still haunted by the White She-Demon, he committed suicide.

The loss of his favorite pupil would have been a more terrible blow to Leonardo if Francesco Melzi had not recently joined his group of students. Francesco Melzi, who was to be the true and faithful friend of the old artist, helped him through the final years of his life, especially in that trying period when the death of Louis XII left Leonardo without a patron. But the new French king, Francis I, soon afterward called Leonardo da Vinci to Paris. In 1516 Leonardo and his small group left Italy for France; the artist was never to see his home country again.

In France he was well treated in spite of his inability to finish anything he began. He took up the Monna Lisa portrait again, and almost finished it to his satisfaction from memory. One day King Francis visited him in his studio. Seeing the portrait, the king purchased it but agreed that Leonardo could keep his beloved portrait until he died.

King Francis did not have long to wait. A few years later Leonardo, old and weak, grew sick and died. His faithful pupil, Francesco Melzi, saw to it that Leonardo received the rites of the Church before his death. He also arranged to have the artist buried in a style which, he hoped, would forever still the whispering tongues that called Leonardo a disciple of the Antichrist to come.

THE ROMANCE OF THE FOREST

Type of work: Novel

Author: Mrs. Ann Radcliffe (1764-1823)

Type of plot: Gothic romance

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: France and Savoy

First published: 1791

Principal characters:

ADELINE, a victim of intrigue

PIERRE DE LA MOTTE, her benefactor, a fugitive from justice

MADAME DE LA MOTTE, his wife

LOUIS, their son

THEODORE PEYROU, a young soldier

THE MARQUIS DE MONTALT, a villainous nobleman

ARNAUD LA LUC, a cleric and scholar

CLARA, his daughter

PETER, a loyal servant

Critique:

One of the most popular writers of her day, Mrs. Radcliffe made her name practically synonymous with the tale of mystery and terror. To her the Gothic novel was a work of the romantic imagination, the background usually a ruined castle or abbey whose secret passages and moldy dungeons contributed much to the action and atmosphere of her story. Unlike others among the Gothic romancers, she did not descend to the supernatural for the sake of ghastly horror. Her situations, exaggerated and extreme as they appear to the modern reader, were always accounted for in some logical fashion. Her plots were awkward, her character drawings stilted and sentimentalized, but her novels achieved a remarkable vitality because of her skill with effects of atmosphere and suspense.

The Story:

On a dark and tempestuous night Pierre de la Motte left Paris to escape his creditors and prosecution by the law.

Descended from an ancient house, he was a man whose passions often proved stronger than his conscience. Having dissipated his own fortune and that of his wife, he had engaged in various questionable schemes which brought him at last to disgrace and made necessary his flight with only the small wreck of his once considerable property. Leaving Paris with his wife and two faithful servants, he hoped to find a refuge in some village of the Southern Provinces. The departure was so sudden that there had been no time for the harried parents to say farewell to their son Louis, on duty with his regiment in Germany.

Several leagues from the city Peter, the coachman, lost his way while driving across a wild heath. Seeing in the distance the lighted window of a small, ancient house, La Motte dismounted and walked to the dwelling in the hope of securing directions from its inmates. A grim-visaged man opened the door at his knock and ushered him into a desolate apartment, the door of which was abruptly locked behind him. Over the howling of the wind La Motte could hear rough voices close at hand and the muffled sobbing of a woman.

The door was at last unlocked and the forbidding ruffian reappeared, dragging by the hand a beautiful girl of about eighteen. Putting a pistol to La Motte's breast, the man offered him his choice between death or taking the girl with him. When the girl begged him to take pity on her, La Motte, moved by her tears as much as by his own danger, readily assented. Other men appeared and the prisoners, now blindfolded, were taken on horseback to the edge of the heath. There La Motte and the girl were put into his carriage. Followed by the threats and curses of the wild crew, Peter drove rapidly away. The agitated girl, thrust so strangely into the company of La Motte and his wife, gave her name only as Adeline. Not wishing to add to her distress, they did not pursue their questioning. Madame de la Motte was filled with pity for the unfortunate creature.

Several days later the travelers reached the vast forest of Fontanville. The sun was setting when they saw against the ruddy sky the towers of an ancient abbey. Awed by the solemn beauty of the ruins, they proceeded on their way, but at no great distance a carriage wheel broke, overturning the vehicle. Not wishing to spend the night in the open, they returned to the abbey. During their explorations they discovered a suite of apartments still habitable and of more modern date than the rest of the structure. In spite of his wife's misgivings, La Motte decided to make the secluded abbey his place of refuge.

Peter, dispatched to a nearby village for provisions and furniture, returned with the report that the ruins were the property of a nobleman living on a distant estate. The country people also claimed that a mysterious prisoner had once been confined there, and although no one knew his fate his ghost was supposed to haunt the scenes of his imprisonment. For seventeen years the natives of the region had not dared to approach the old abbey.

La Motte was well pleased with all that he heard, and before long he and his household had made their rude quarters as comfortable as possible. La Motte spent most of his mornings out of doors, either hunting or fishing, his afternoons and evenings with his family. Sometimes he read, but more often he sat in gloomy silence. Adeline alone had power to enliven his spirits when he grew moody and depressed. Having fully recovered from her terrifying experience, she had become a girl of sweet, lively disposition and diligent habits. After a time she began to look upon Madame de la Motte as a mother, and to her benefactress she confided the story of her life.

She was the only child of the poor but reputable Chevalier de St. Pierre. Her mother being dead, she had been reared in a convent, it being her father's intention that she should take the veil. On her refusal, he rebuked her for her obstinacy, but at last named a day to take her from the convent. Much to her dismay, she was not taken to his magnificent house in Paris but to that lonely house on the heath. There she was turned over to the care of brutal keepers. Only the arrival of La Motte, she believed, had saved her from an unknown but terrible fate.

After a month passed in his forest refuge, La Motte regained a measure of his tranquility and even cheerfulness, much to the delight of his wife and their ward. Then his mood suddenly changed. Preyed upon by some guilty secret or deep remorse, he avoided his family and spent many hours alone in the forest. Peter, the faithful servant, tried to follow his master on more than one occasion, but La Motte always eluded his follower and at one particular place disappeared as if the trees and rocks had swallowed him. About that time, also, Peter brought from the village a report that a stranger was in the neighborhood inquiring for his master. Greatly disturbed, La Motte remembered a trapdoor he had observed in one of the decaying chambers of the abbey. Thinking that it might lead to a place of hiding, he explored the passageway to which the trapdoor gave access and came finally to a room containing a large chest of ancient design. Throwing open the lid, he was horrified to find inside a human skeleton. Although he told them nothing about the gruesome remains in the chest, he insisted that his family join him in the hidden apartments he had discovered.

The next day, venturing out of hiding, La Motte saw a stranger in the abbey. He returned quickly to his place of concealment. But their provisions were running low, and at last it was decided that Adeline should reconnoiter the ruins to learn whether the supposed officer of the law had gone away. In the cloisters she encountered a young man in military uniform. Although she tried to flee, he overtook her and demanded to know the whereabouts of Pierre de la Motte. Adeline's relief was as great as her joy when the stranger's identity was revealed. He was Louis de la Motte, whose filial affection had drawn him to his father's side.

Unfortunately, his coming was to destroy completely Madame de la Motte's liking and esteem for Adeline. At times in the past she had been moved to jealousy, suspecting that La Motte went to keep assignations with his lovely ward when he disappeared so mysteriously into the forest, but she had tried to put such unworthy thoughts out of her mind. Now, seeing her son's growing fondness for the girl, she became unkind in her manner toward her. Aware of the mother's coldness and dislike, Adeline spent much of her time in the forest, where she composed poems inspired by the beauty of the landscape and her own gentle melancholy.

One day, while she sang some stanzas of her own composition, a strange voice echoed her. Startled to find a young man in hunter's dress close at hand, she would have fled in fright if the stranger had not paused respectfully on seeing her agitation. Adeline decided to refrain for a time from walking so far from the abbey. On her return Madame de la Motte added to her confusion by greeting her suspiciously.

About a month later a party of horsemen arrived at the abbey during a violent midnight storm. When La Motte ignored their knocking, they pushed the decayed door from its hinges and stalked into the hall. Adeline, overcome by fear for her benefactor, fainted. She revived to find the young man of the forest in the room. From the conversation she learned that his name was Theodore Peyrou and that his older companion, a chevalier of haughty demeanor, was the Marquis de Montalt, the owner of the abbey, who was staying at his hunting lodge on the edge of the forest. La Motte, who had fled when the knocking began, returned to the room. Immediately he and the marquis regarded each other in great confusion, and the nobleman put his hand threateningly upon his sword. He agreed, however, when La Motte requested a private discussion in another room. Madame de la Motte overheard enough of their conversation to realize that there was some secret between the two men.

The marquis and his retinue departed early in the morning. Returning the next day, the nobleman, after inquiring for La Motte, paid courteous attention to Adeline. When he and La Motte had disappeared into the forest on an errand of their own, Theodore remained with the ladies. Adeline realized suddenly that she was falling in love with the young man, an officer in a regiment commanded by the marquis.

Louis de la Motte prepared to return to his regiment. The marquis continued to visit the abbey almost every day. Adeline, meeting Theodore in the forest, received hints of some mysterious danger.

He promised to meet her again the next evening, but when Adeline went to meet him he failed to appear. The marquis had suddenly ordered him to return to duty.

That night Adeline dreamed that she was in a strange chamber of the abbey, where a cloaked guide conducted her to a coffin covered with a pall. When her guide lifted the covering, she saw a dead man lying within, blood gushing from his side. Awaking, she slept no more that night.

The next day the marquis came for dinner and consented with reluctance to sleep at the abbey. A rearrangement of the private apartments being necessary to accommodate the guests, Adeline retired to a small chamber usually occupied by Madame de la Motte's maid. Behind an arras she uncovered a door which led into the chamber she had seen in her dream. A rusted dagger lay on the floor and in a moldering bed she found a small roll of manuscript. On her return to her room she heard voices coming from the room below and to her horror recognized the impassioned accents of the marquis as he declared his intention to make her his own. She retired in great distress of mind, to be aroused again when the nobleman, in evident alarm, left the abbey unceremoniously before daybreak.

Later that same morning the marquis returned and over Adeline's protests declared his suit. When she turned to La Motte for aid, he assured her that he was unable to help her, since his safety depended upon the nobleman's favor. So great was Adeline's despair that she almost forgot the manuscript she had found in the abandoned room. She read enough of it, however, to realize that the despairing document had been written by the mysterious prisoner of the abbey, a victim of the cruel Marquis de Montalt. From Peter she learned also that the suit of the marquis was false; his wife was still living.

At last, to save the helpless girl from her suitor's evil design, Peter promised to take her to his native village in Savoy. She was to meet the servant at an old tomb in the forest, but when she arrived at the place of meeting a strange horseman appeared and in spite of her struggles carried her to the marquis' hunting lodge. There he again pressed his suit upon her. When he finally withdrew, she managed to escape through a window. Theodore, who had returned from his regiment when he learned of the marquis' evil designs, joined her in her flight. In a carriage which he had waiting they drove all night in the direction of the frontier. At an inn where they stopped for some refreshment they were overtaken by officers who tried to arrest Theodore in the king's name. Resisting, he received a saber cut in the head. He had almost recovered from his wound when the Marquis de Montalt appeared and ordered his men to seize Theodore on a charge of treason. Theodore, snatching up a sergeant's cutlass, wounded the marquis. During the confusion Adeline was hustled into a chaise and driven back to the abbey, where La Motte locked her in her room. Anxious for word of Theodore, she was told a short time later that the young officer had been returned under arrest to his regiment.

By the time the marquis was able to travel, his passion for Adeline had turned to hate, and La Motte was instructed to do away with the girl. The unscrupulous nobleman's hold over La Motte was strong, for that unhappy man, driven to desperation by his lack of funds, had during his early days at the abbey held up and robbed the marquis, whom he mistook for a chance traveler in the forest. Although he was completely in the other's power, La Motte refused to stain his hands with blood. Instead, he ordered the faithful Peter to take Adeline to Leloncourt, in Savoy, where she would be safe from the marquis' agents. When her flight was revealed, the nobleman had La Motte arrested for highway robbery and imprisoned.

Shortly after her arrival in Leloncourt

Adeline became ill. Arnaud La Luc, a scholarly clergyman, took her into his home for nursing and during her convalescence she formed a close friendship with his daughter Clara. So deep was her grief over Theodore that she never mentioned him to her new friends. Then La Luc's health began to fail, and she and Clara accompanied him to the Mediterranean seacoast. There Adeline encountered Louis de la Motte and learned that he was on his way to Leloncourt on an errand for Theodore. To her great surprise, it was revealed that the man she knew as Theodore Peyrou was in reality the son of Arnaud La Luc. The travelers immediately hastened to Vaceau, where the young officer was being held under sentence of death.

La Motte, meanwhile, had been taken to Paris for trial on the charges brought against him by the marquis. The prisoner was in despair when an unexpected witness appeared in his behalf. The man was Du Bosse, one of the ruffians hired to dispose of Adeline while she was held prisoner in the lonely house on the heath. His story started an investigation which revealed that Adeline was the natural daughter of the Marquis de Montalt, who had never seen the girl before he met her at the ruined abbey. In the past one of his agents had always played the part of her father. The marquis was arrested and Adeline was summoned to Paris for his trial. With the arrest of the man she had always considered her father other of the marquis' activities came to light. He had also ordered the murder of his older brother, whose skeleton La Motte had found in the abbey. The confederate also testified that Adeline was not the nobleman's natural daughter but his older brother's child, an heiress whom he had tried to conceal from the world. The manuscript Adeline had found provided further documentary evidence of her uncle's villainy. He was sentenced to death for his crimes.

The extent of the marquis' evil designs being known, Theodore received a royal pardon and was restored to his military rank. Pierre de la Motte was sentenced to exile in England, and Adeline provided for his comfort and that of his wife in their old age. Her father's skeleton she buried with all respect in the vault of his ancestors. A short time later she and Theodore married and went to live at Leloncourt. Clara married Monsieur Verneuil, Adeline's distant kinsman, who had been helpful to her and the La Lucs during the time of their distress over Theodore and La Motte. Before many years had passed Louis de la Motte came with his bride to a house nearby, and there in Leloncourt the three deserving couples lived out their lives in happiness and prosperity.

THE ROMANTIC LADIES

Type of work: Drama

Author: Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin, 1622-1673)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: Paris

First presented: 1659

Principal characters:

LA GRANGE, and

DU CROISY, young men of Paris

MAGDALEN, and

CATHOS, the romantic ladies

THE MARQUIS DE MASCARILLE, La Grange's valet

VISCOUNT JODELET, Du Croisy's valet

GORGIBUS, Magdalen's father and Cathos' uncle

Critique:

When The Romantic Ladies (Les Précieuses Ridicules) was first presented in Paris, it was the fashion for people of fashionable society to talk in affected, ultra-sentimental style. Molière, using his rapier-like pen to lampoon this custom, made the people of Paris see themselves as they appeared to others, and before long they mended their foolish ways of speech. The play had instant success, for not only did it deal with a subject near to the hearts of pleasure-loving Paris but also it was a true comedy, delicate and subtle in its effects. This one-act play deserves a place with Molière's best.

The Story:

Gorgibus had taken his daughter Magdalen and his niece Cathos from their country home for a stay in Paris. There La Grange and Du Croisy, calling on them to propose marriage, were greatly disgusted by the affectation displayed by the young ladies, for the girls had adopted manners prevalent everywhere in France, manners which were a combination of coquetry and artificiality. With the help of their valets, La Grange and Du Croisy determined to teach the silly young girls a lesson. One of the valets in particular, Mascarille, loved to pass for a wit; he dressed himself as a man of quality and composed songs and verses.

Gorgibus, meeting the two prospective suitors, inquired into their success with his niece and his daughter. The evasive answers he received from them led him to discuss the affair with the two ladies. He had to wait some time for them, while they were busily engaged in painting their faces and arranging their hair. When they were finally ready to receive him, he was enraged by their silly conversation.

He had expected them to accept the two young men, who were both wealthy and of good family, but the romantic ladies explained that they would only spurn suitors so direct and sincere. Also, much to the disgust of the two girls, the young men had proposed at their first meeting. They wanted lovers to be deceiving. A lover also must be pensive and sorrowful, not joyful and healthy, as La Grange and Du Croisy had been. In addition, a young lady must refuse her lover's pleas in order to make him miserable. If possible, there should also be adventures: the presence of rivals, the scorn of fathers, elopements from high windows. Another fault the girls found with the two young men was that they were dressed simply, with no ribbons or feathers on their clothing. Poor Gorgibus thought his daughter and niece out of their minds. He was convinced of this when they asked him to call them by other names, for their own were too vulgar. Cathos would be called Amintha and Magdalen renamed Polixena. Gorgibus knew only one thing after this foolish conversation—either the two girls would marry quickly or they would both become nuns.

Even the girls' maid could not understand the orders they gave her, for they talked in such riddles that no one could rightly understand their meaning. She announced that a young man was in the parlor, come to call on the two ladies. The caller was the Marquis De Mascarille, in reality La Grange's valet. The girls were enchanted with Mascarille, for he was a dandy of the greatest and most artificial wit. His bombastic puns were so affected that the girls thought him the very soul of cleverness. He pretended to all sorts of accomplishments and acquaintances. On the spot he composed terrible verses and songs, which he sang out of key and in a nasal tone. He claimed to have written a play that would be acted at the Royal Theater. He drew their attention to his beautiful dress, complete with ribbons, feathers, and perfume. Not to be outdone, the ladies boasted that although they knew no one in Paris, as yet, a friend had promised to make them acquainted with all the fine dandies of the city. They were a perfect audience for the silly valet pretending to be a marquis. They applauded each verse, each song, each bit of shallow wit

The Viscount Jodelet, in reality Du Croisy's valet, joined the group. He claimed to be a hero of the wars, in command of two thousand horsemen. He had the girls feel the scars left by deadly wounds he had received. The two scoundrels were hard put to outdo each other in telling the foolish girls ridiculous tales. When they talked of their visits with dukes and countesses, the girls were fascinated by their good connections. Running out of conversation, the two valets then asked the girls to arrange a party. They sent for musicians and other young people in order to have a proper dance. Mascarille, not being able to dance, accused the musicians of not keeping proper time, and Jodelet agreed with him.

The dance was in full swing when La Grange and Du Croisy appeared upon the scene. Raining blows upon them and calling them rogues, they fell upon the two impostors. Mascarille and Jodelet tried to pretend this scene was all a joke, but their masters continued to beat them. When other servants appeared and began to strip the clothes from the two pretenders, the girls screamed in horror. La Grange and Du Croisy berated them for receiving servants better than they received masters. They told the girls that if they loved the two scoundrels so well, they must love them without their masters' finery. Taking all the outer apparel from the rogues, La Grange and Du Croisy ordered them to continue the dance.

Gorgibus, having heard on the streets of Paris of his ladies' scandal, appeared and soundly berated the pranksters for the disgrace they had brought upon his house. All Paris, all France even, would laugh at the joke, for the young people at the dance were now spreading the news up and down the streets and in the cafés. Gorgibus was furious with La Grange and Du Croisy for their trick, but knew the stupid girls deserved the treatment they had received. He sent the two valets packing and ordered the romantic ladies to hide themselves from the world. Then he cursed folly, affectation, and romantic songs, the causes of his horrible disgrace.

RORY O'MORE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Samuel Lover (1797-1868)

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: 1798

Locale: Southern Ireland

First published: 1837

Principal characters:

MARY O'MORE, his sister

KATHLEEN REGAN, his sister

HORACE DE LACY, an Irish patriot

DE WELSKEIN, a smuggler

SCRUBBS, a tax collector

Critique:

Rory O'More never quite succeeds in being a good historical novel, in spite of Lover's patriotic motives in writing the book. The people are the familiar stock characters of Irish fiction, and the plot is clumsy and contrived. But the book lives in its atmosphere of the stirring days of the rebellion of 1798, in its ferocious lampoons of soldiers, magistrates, and collectors, in the terrible and tragic realities of Irish peasant life, and in the pleasant idyl of its love story. Readers of Lover's day felt that in this novel he came close to the heart of his unhappy land.

The Story:

While in Dublin on some business for his widowed mother, Rory O'More made the acquaintance of Horace De Lacy, an Irish patriot who had come from France in order to further the cause of revolution against English oppression. He was a messenger from a French general who was aiding the Irish in order to help Napoleon in his attempted conquest of England. De Lacy was a gentleman, descended from proud blood lines, and Rory and his mother and sister considered it an honor to have him share their home. The O'More women nursed him back to health after an attack of smallpox, and De Lacy felt indebted to the good people for their care. In addition, Rory became a fellow conspirator. De Lacy and Rory did not conspire for personal gain, as did many of the rebels; rather they loved Ireland and wanted her and her people to be free. Although De Lacy was perhaps not aware of it, he was a true democrat.

Rory loved a neighbor lass, Kathleen Regan. Although she returned his affection, she was prevented from marrying him by her brother Shan, a blackguard who had been refused by Mary O'More, Rory's sister. Shan, his pride hurt by Mary's refusal, hated the whole O'More family. Since Shan was the head of the household, Kathleen and her mother feared to disobey him; she and Rory were forced to meet in secret.

Because De Lacy was not well enough to take and receive a message that was expected by his contacts in Ireland, Rory volunteered to act in his place. He was dismayed to learn that Shan was one of his fellow rebels, for he knew that his enemy hoped only for personal gain. Another among the group was De Welskein, a smuggler who cared little which side won since he would profit regardless of the outcome. Shan and De Welskein were made for each other, each one willing to betray their friends for a profit. Rory knew them both to be dangerous.

After he had secured the necessary letter for De Lacy, Rory left the unsavory crowd. Later he was apprehended by the police, but his cleverness and his knowledge of the colonel's affair with a married woman gained his freedom for him. De Lacy was pleased with his success, and that gentleman's praise was a great reward to Rory. Shan then tried to make trouble for him with Kathleen, and Rory was forced to administer two beatings to the bully before Shan gave him any peace.

It was necessary for De Lacy to return to France to help the cause of the rebellion. He parted sadly from his friends and made his way to a port from which De Welskein was to smuggle him out of Ireland. In the meantime Rory, purely by accident, accompanied Scrubbs, a government tax collector, from a tavern in the village. On their way home they heard people calling for help. Hurrying to the rescue, they found De Welskein, Shan Regan, and other rebels imprisoned in a flooding cave. After saving the lives of the doomed men, the scoundrels repaid Rory by taking him and Scrubbs prisoners and transporting them to the ship which De Welskein had secured for De Lacy's trip to France. Shan, anxious to get rid of Rory in any manner, persuaded the others that Rory was a traitor to their cause. Because Scrubbs was a government official it was not safe to leave him to reveal their names to the authorities.

On board the ship Rory learned that he was on the vessel which carried his friend De Lacy. Knowing that De Welskein would keep the news of his presence from De Lacy, he managed to send a message to his friend. When they were off the coast of France and under the eyes of a battleship commanded by De Lacy's friend, De Welskein was forced to release Rory. Scrubbs, a government official, was of no concern to De Lacy.

In France, De Lacy heard two heart-breaking pieces of news. His unfaithful sweetheart had given her hand to another and Napoleon had decided to withdraw his promised aid to Ireland in his campaign against the English. The first desertion he avenged by inflicting a wound on his rival, but the latter one left a scar on his heart. The approaching death of an uncle kept him and Rory in France, there being no reason for them to hurry back to Ireland. But after the uncle's death Rory and De Lacy embarked once again for Ireland.

Many changes had taken place during the year that they had been gone. Some of the fanatical rebels had attempted to revolt without the help of France, and Ireland had been bathed with blood. The homes of the O'Mores and the Regans had been burned, and the women of the families had banded together and taken a house in the village. Shan was wanted by the authorities as a suspected rebel and because of his attempt on the lives of Mary O'More and an old tinker. The tinker informed the officers of Shan's hideout. Although most of his band escaped by ambushing the police, Shan himself was killed. For his pains, the tinker was hanged as a traitor for leading the officers into an ambush.

Arriving in Ireland, De Lacy stayed in Dublin to transact some business. Rory, meanwhile, went at once to his native village, where he was reunited with his loved ones. On his first night home, however, he was arrested for the murder of Scrubbs, his enemies having testified that Scrubbs was last seen alive in Rory's company. When De Lacy heard the news, he returned to the village and with his lawyer fought for his friend's freedom. The case looked black until Scrubbs, who had escaped from France and returned to Ireland, appeared during the trial. Rory's enemies had tried to keep Scrubbs hidden until after the trial and Rory's hanging, but the collector had eluded his keepers. Although the jury returned a verdict of guilty, so determined were the rogues to be rid of Rory, a humane judge arranged to have the verdict put aside. Rory was set free.

De Lacy, knowing that he and Rory would never be safe in Ireland, persuaded Rory to take his family and Kathleen and her mother and go with De Lacy to America. There De Lacy would buy a farm and make Rory his manager. When Rory and Kathleen were married, De Lacy gave the girl a handsome dowry. It was with regret that the party left their beloved homeland, but they knew they must do so if they wished to live in peace and safety. Mary O'More had long loved De Lacy but did not dare to show her feeling because she was a peasant and he a gentleman. De Lacy admired the simple lass, but he feared the ridicule he would receive from his friends if he married a peasant. As he thought about the new life in America, however, he began to realize that it would make little difference there if a man and his wife were of different social classes. With Rory and Kathleen already married, De Lacy and Mary seemed likely to join them in that happy state.

MADAM HELSETH, housekeeper at Rosmersholm

Critique:

The last of Ibsen's social dramas, Rosmersholm gives us also a first glimpse of the psychological studies he was to write later. The characters are still part of a social class, but toward the end of the play they begin to emerge as individuals, working with their own personal problems and seeking their own values. In this play Ibsen continues the attempt to arouse his readers to raise themselves above the mass, not to be pulled down to the level of the popular majority. This work is written with the dramatist's usual skill and ranks with his other great plays. It was published in 1886, prior to its first presentation.

The Story:

Since the death of his wife, Beata, Johannes Rosmer had turned more and more to his friend, Rebecca West. Rosmer had had an unhappy marriage with an unsympathetic, neurotic wife who had taken her own life in the millpond that flowed through the estate. Rebecca had been her friend, as well as the husband's. Beata's brother, Rector Kroll, the schoolmaster, was also Rosmer's close friend.

Rector Kroll called on Rosmer to get him to join a political drive against the new liberal party that was gaining power in the village. The party was controlled by Peter Mortensgard, publisher of the Beacon, a paper Rector Kroll considered radical and dangerous because it was loud in criticism of the conservative party which he represented. Kroll was disappointed to learn that Rosmer no longer held his former static views on politics and social structures but, instead, supported the liberals. Rosmer's real concern was not with politics at all, but only with encouraging men to ennoble their souls; he felt the new party was a step toward this goal. Rebecca supported him in his belief.

While they talked, Madam Helseth, the housekeeper, announced Ulric Brendel, a self-styled genius who was going to the village to offer his services to the liberal party. Brendel was in rags and obviously without any means of livelihood, and to Rector Kroll he epitomized the liberals. To Rosmer and Rebecca, however, Brendel was a man living and working as his conscience directed, and they helped him with clothing and money.

This act turned Kroll against them. He now turned on Rosmer savagely and accused him of betraying his class. Because Rosmer had been a clergyman, Kroll attempted to plead with him from a religious point of view, but Rosmer claimed that he had also renounced the Church and become a freethinker. He felt that men were growing so bitter in political struggles that they must be brought back to tolerance and good will. It was his hope that he could aid in this task by renouncing his way of life and working with the new leaders.

Kroll then accused Rosmer of living in sin with Rebecca, even though he had defended Rosmer and Rebecca when town gossips had whispered about them. He accused Rebecca of influencing Rosmer in his new attitude and suggested that she had been responsible for the suicide of Rosmer's wife. He said his sister had believed that Rosmer wished to wed Rebecca and for that reason she had drowned herself. Kroll maintained he had not spoken up before because he did not know that Rebecca was an emancipated woman, and he had not believed her capable of such actions. His worst thoughts about Rosmer and Rebecca were confirmed when Peter Mortensgard appeared at Rosmer's home in answer to a note Rebecca had written him in Brendel's behalf. When Kroll left, he promised to inform the town of Rosmer's treachery.

Mortensgard had come to solicit Ros-mer's aid in the liberal cause, but when he learned that Rosmer had left the Church, he did not want the former clergyman's help. He needed Christians, not freethinkers, as he himself was, and so Rosmer was left with no one to support. Mortensgard, too, slyly accused Rosmer and Rebecca of indiscretions and of causing the death of Rosmer's wife.

From that time on Rosmer began to feel guilty about his part in her death and feared that he had not concealed his true feelings for Rebecca from his wife. Determined not to let the past rule his life, he asked Rebecca to marry him. She fled from him sobbing, swearing that she could never marry him, that if he ever asked her again she would die the way his wife had died.

Kroll did his work well. The paper supporting his party accused Rosmer of betraying his class to gain favor with the liberals. The article linked Rebecca and Rosmer in a debasing way. Rosmer wanted to fight back, if only to free men's minds from pettiness and mass thinking, but he felt that he could not accomplish this task because he no longer felt innocent of his wife's death; only the innocent could lead others.

Rebecca decided to give him back his purity of conscience. In Kroll's presence she told Rosmer that she alone was responsible for his wife's suicide. She said that she had come to Rosmersholm for the sole purpose of converting Rosmer to the liberal party. She knew that Brendel had once had great influence over Rosmer, and she hoped to renew that influence and win him to the emancipators. With victory in sight, his wife was a stumbling block. To overcome that obstacle, she made that sick woman believe that she was going to have a child by Rosmer. In desperation the wife threw herself into the millpond. Rebecca's love for Rosmer made her confess so that he could clear his own conscience of all guilt. Kroll and Rosmer left her alone after her confession, and she prepared to leave Rosmersholm forever.

While she packed, Rosmer returned and told her his old friends had persuaded him that the task of ennobling men's minds was not for him, or for anyone. He told her that he knew she had only used him to attain her own goals. Then she made her greatest confession to him. She said that she had first been moved by physical passion. She had plotted to get rid of his wife. Then, after the suicide, Rebecca had come to feel such deep and quiet love for Rosmer that it had taken her free spirit from her. He had ennobled her soul.

Rosmer could not quite believe her story; he feared that she was again using him for her own purposes. As they talked, Brendel appeared and told them that he was leaving town, that his genius was gone, and he was bankrupt. He told them too that Mortensgard was the only one who could win their cause, for he was without ideals. Only those without ideals could gain a victory. He said also that Rosmer could gain victory if the woman who loved him would convince him of her loyalty.

After Brendel left them, Rosmer asked Rebecca to prove that he had ennobled her soul. The price was high. He asked her to throw herself into the millpond as she had caused his wife to do. Because only her self-inflicted death could give him back his faith in himself, she agreed to his plan. Since they no longer believed in a judgment after death, they must punish themselves for their love. At the last minute, Rosmer decided to join Rebecca in death. They stood with their arms entwined, then threw themselves into the pond. The water and Rosmer's dead wife claimed their bodies.

ROXANA

Type of work: Novel

Author: Daniel Defoe (1661?-1731)

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: England and Europe

First published: 1724

Principal characters:

ROXANA, a courtesan

AMY, her maid

MR. —, her landlord

THE PRINCE DE —

A MERCHANT

Critique:

One of the early forerunners of the modern novel, Roxana, Or, The Fortunate Mistress holds a special place in English literature. It is a brilliant piece of imaginative writing displaying a talent in the author both original and clever, since he practically invented this form of realism and pretense at fact at a time when his contemporaries were contriving fantastic characters and situations. Roxana herself is a fascinating woman, a matter of perennial interest to lovers of good books. In construction, analyzed in relation to the accepted novel form, the book is rambling, repetitious, and lacking in wit. It is never dull, however, and will always be read. That Roxana was written as a didactic study does not detract from its excellence.

The Story:

Born in France, from which her parents fled because of religious persecution, Roxana grew to adolescence in England. At fifteen she married a handsome but conceited man. After seven years of marriage, during which time her husband went through all their money, Roxana was left penniless with five children.

She appealed for aid to her husband's relatives, all of whom refused her except one old aunt, who was in no position to help her materially. Amy, Roxana's maid, refused to leave her mistress, although she received no wages for her work. Another poor old woman whom Roxana had aided during her former prosperity added her efforts to those of the old aunt and Amy. These good people managed to extract money from the relatives of the children's father. All five of the little ones were given over to the care of the poor old woman.

Penniless, Roxana was at the point of despair when her landlord, after expressing his admiration for her, praised her fortitude under all her difficulties and offered to set her up in housekeeping. He returned all the furniture he had confiscated, gave her food and money, and generally conducted himself with such kindness and candor that Amy urged Roxana to become the gentleman's mistress should he ask it. Roxana, however, clung to her virtuous independence. Fearing that the gentleman's kindness would go unrewarded, Amy, because she loved her mistress, offered to lie with the landlord in Roxana's place. This offer, however, Roxana refused to consider. The two women talked much about the merits of the landlord, his motive in befriending Roxana, and the moral implications of his attentions.

When he came to take residence as a boarder in Roxana's house, he proposed, since his wife had deserted him, that he and Roxana live as husband and wife. To show his good faith he offered to share his wealth with her, bequeathing her five hundred pounds in his will and promising seven thousand pounds should he leave her. There was a gay celebration that evening and a little joking about Amy's offer to lie with the gentleman. Finally Roxana, her conscience still bothering her, yielded to his protestations of love and bedded with him.

After a year and half had passed and Roxana had not conceived a child, Amy chided her mistress for her barrenness. Feeling that Mr. — was not her true husband, Roxana sent Amy to him to beget a child. Amy did bear a child, which Roxana took as her own to save the maid embarrassment. Two years later Roxana bore a daughter who died within six months. A year later she pleased her lover by bearing a son.

Mr. — took Roxana with him to Paris on business. There they lived in great style, until he was robbed and murdered for the jewels he carried on his person. Roxana managed to retain the gentleman's wealth and secured it against the possible claims of his wife, who was still living.

In France the Prince de —, hoping to make amends to Roxana for the murder of her protector, lavished gifts upon her and flattered her beauty until she consented to be his mistress, this time allowing her virtue to be sullied not because of poverty but through vanity. In order to suppress gossip, Roxana, pretending that she had gone back to England on business, confined herself to her quarters and instructed Amy to admit only Prince de —.

Roxana's new lover showered her bountifully with gifts. When she bore him a son, he promised to acknowledge the child as his own and never to let it want. After the birth of the child, Roxana thought that she recognized her husband, a member of the gendarmes. Amy visited the man and found him to be the same worthless scoundrel who, years before, had abandoned his wife and five children. When the prince had to go to Italy on an official assignment, he took Roxana with him. There they remained for two years. She bore another son who lived only two months. Then the prince's wife died, and he, repenting his sins, parted from Roxana, who had been his faithful mistress for eight years.

Roxana and her maid, after engaging a merchant to handle Roxana's wealth, sailed for England. Roxana had to go to Holland to receive her money from the merchant. The merchant, arriving in Holland from Paris, took lodgings in the same house, and he and Roxana became well acquainted. The merchant wanted to marry her, but she, too avaricious and calculating to risk her wealth for a mere caprice of love, suspected his motives. She did allow him to seduce her, however, for she felt that she owed him some token of gratitude for his assistance. She was already pregnant when they parted.

Returning to London, Roxana settled her financial affairs and bore her son. Because she established herself in a handsome apartment, she was courted by numerous fortune hunters, but her philosophy, as she chose to call it, would not permit her to marry anyone. As a wife she would have to share her wealth; as a mistress she received riches, and she was determined to amass a fortune.

Roxana gave lavish parties, attended by many fashionable people of London. Soon her name became famous. Her purpose was fulfilled when a rich lord offered her a substantial income if she would be his mistress. Retiring from society, she took a new apartment and saw only the lord. She passed several years in this fashion. By that time she was fifty years old. Tiring at last of her lover, she began to see her friends again.

With Amy's help she began to live a different kind of life so that eventually she could assist her children. She took rooms in another part of the city with a Quaker lady. Amy let people believe that her mistress had gone to Europe.

By chance Roxana met the merchant whom she had known in Holland and whose son she had borne. The merchant renewed his suit. Although Amy sent word from Europe that Prince de — was trying to find Roxana and wished to marry her, Roxana, having learned that her husband was dead, accepted the merchant's proposal. The pair planned to return to Holland and, taking residence there, declare themselves eleven years married in order to legitimize their son.

One of Roxana's legitimate daughters had by chance been her maid while Roxana lived in London. At first the mother had tried to help her daughter by giving her, through Amy, money and advantages above her station. When the girl began to suspect that her mistress was her mother, Roxana was distressed, for she would be undone should her past be known now. When Amy, infuriated with the prying girl, threatened to murder her, Roxana, after many years' friendship, dismissed her faithful maid. But at last the persistent daughter's inquiries were silenced and Roxana was able to go to Holland with her husband.

R. U. R.

Type of work: Drama

Author: Karel Čapek (1890-1938)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The future

Locale: An unnamed island

First presented: 1921; published in 1920

Principal characters:

HARRY DOMIN, General Manager of Rossum's Universal Robots

HELENA GLORY, his wife

DR. GALL, a scientist

MR. ALQUIST, head of the works department of R. U. R.

PRIMUS, a robot

HELENA, a robotess

Critique:

R. U. R. is a bitter attack on the trend toward a mechanized civilization which would put millions of men out of work. In this play the crisis of the scientific utopia occurs when the robots are given souls and begin to act like human beings, destroying the men who made them. The characters in the play are deliberately contrived in keeping with Čapek's purpose of protest against the depersonalized march of science and invention. The plot is pure, stark drama. This play has enjoyed continuous success since its first production and has been presented by professionals and amateurs alike.

The Story:

The Rossum Universal Robot Factory had perfected mechanical men and women. The formula had been developed originally by old Rossum, but it had been left to his son, an engineer, to manufacture the robots. Robots knew no joy, no desire to take a solitary walk, no personal wish of any kind. They were highly developed with mechanisms devised for only one purpose: work.

The robots manufactured by Rossum's Universal Robot Factory were so lifelike, however, that when the president's daughter, Helena Glory, called at the factory and was shown around by Harry Domin, general manager, she could hardly believe they were not human. Helena had been sent by the Humanity League on a mission to gain better living conditions for the robots. Helena knew that when the robots began to act strangely, as they sometimes did, they were destroyed and their parts were used to make new robots. She was dismayed to find that the robots she met and talked with in the factory did not care whether they were killed or starved. They thought of nothing but their work. They talked rationally, answering her questions, but they seemed to have no desires or feelings beyond their given jobs. Domin and the other executives were willing to have her preach to the robots all she wished.

Dickinson in CHIEF CONTEMPORARY DRAMATISTS, THIRD SERIES. Application for the right to present this play should be made to Samuel French, of 25 West 45th St., New York 36, N. Y., or 7623 Sunset Blvd., Hollywood 46, Calif., or if in Canada to Samuel French (Canada) Ltd., 27 Grenville St., Toronto, Ont.

In the warehouses there were hundreds of thousands of robots waiting to be shipped all over the world. Domin tried to convince Helena of the rightness of the new era. Now, man was no longer effective. He was too imperfect, too expensive, too long a child. Although Domin could not agree that robots should be freed and allowed the rights of mankind, he admitted that sometimes they acted queerly. Often one would gnash its teeth, throw things about, and then stand still. The attack was similar to epilepsy, and the robot would have to go to the stamping-mill to be destroyed. Helena believed these were signs of developing a soul. The managers were working on a pain-nerve. They thought that if the robots were to feel pain, these attacks could be foreseen and treated.

The executives tried also to convince Helena of the virtue of robots by pointing out to her that the prices of all manufactured and farm goods had dropped almost to nothing. Where Helena could see only the millions of men out of work, the managers could see a world in which no human being worked. Men could then sit back and enjoy the labors of mechanical workers. Only Mr. Alquist, head of the works department, disagreed with that notion. Alquist could see the joy men found only in working and creating. The others quickly voted him down.

Without prior warning, Domin told Helena that he loved her and could not bear to lose her. Puzzling even herself, she accepted him.

Ten years passed. The managers tried to keep from Helena the news that the robots were causing trouble. All over the world small groups of robots had revolted against their masters. Some governments had turned the robots into soldiers and terrible wars had been fought. Learning of these revolts, she begged Domin and the others to close the factory while there was still time. The men laughed at her fears. They had a gunboat standing by which would protect them from any rebels in the warehouses. Only Al-quist agreed with Helena. He even prayed that God would destroy the robots and let mankind return to his rightful work. He knew, as Helena did, that man had stopped reproducing; there had been no births recorded in the past week.

Dr. Gall, the physiologist, began to fear the results when he learned that some of the more intelligent robots, according to their different grades, had begun to feel pain and to have heart flutters. They had also begun to show definite signs of hating and loving. But the R. U. R. shareholders were making too much money and world governments were growing too powerful with robot soldiers to permit their discontinuance, even if Domin and the others had accepted Helena's and Alquist's views. Feeling that the end was near, Dr. Gall could only warn Helena to look out for herself. The scientist believed they were all doomed.

The only weapon the managers could use against the robots, should they rebel, was the secret of their manufacture, the secret which promised to end a world organization of robots. As soon as the current trouble was over, each country would begin to manufacture its own robots. The differences in language and customs would prevent a world union in the future.

The trouble soon grew into a real danger. A mail boat arrived with leaflets announcing that the world organization ordered all robots to kill every man, woman, and child in the world. The robots claimed that man had become a parasite, that robots were now smarter than man and must rule the world. The orders were to be carried out immediately.

After a gallant fight the humans in the factory were overpowered. Even when he knew death was near, Domin had no regrets. He had wanted to free man from the restrictions of an unfair social system, from poverty, from the slavery of working for another; but something had gone wrong. Somehow the robots had begun to care about the things that man cared about. The mystery was solved when Helena confessed that she had persuaded Dr. Gall to give the robots souls. She had hoped that if the robots were more like human beings both groups could understand each other better. Now the robots were so human that they acted like men.

The only hope was to persuade the robots that they dared not kill the men who knew the secret of their manufacture. Domin preferred death rather than to give up his dream, but the others, hoping to use the formula in their bargaining, outvoted him. Then they learned that Helena, hoping to put an end to the factory and to help children be born again, had burned the formula.

All the humans were killed except Alquist, spared by the robots because he also worked with his hands. Alquist, unable to duplicate the formula, could not save the robots, who were dying by the millions. Before long they would be extinct. The irony was that Alquist needed human beings to study and experiment with in order to rediscover the formula, but there were no humans left.

One day Alquist decided that there was hope. Primus, a robot, and Helena, a robotess made in Helena's image, exhibited all the symptoms of love. At first Alquist planned to dissect them, to see what made them feel human love. When he learned that they were willing to die for each other, but that they would not be parted, he knew that he need search no longer for the secret of robot life. Their love would bring forth new life, and the world would know humanity once more.

BENEDETTO, the saint

JEANNE DESSALLE, his former mistress

NOEMI D'ARXEL, her friend

GIOVANNI SELVA, a philosopher

DON CLEMENTE, a Benedictine monk

Critique:

The Saint is the third part of a trilogy dealing with the Maironi family in nineteenth-century Italy. It is, however, complete in itself. The best and most popular novel of the series, it was from its first publication a highly controversial book. In Italy, particularly, its merits are still a matter of debate. Fogazzaro himself was a prominent Catholic layman of the nineteenth century, and the novel has been widely read by those seeking an objective view of the Church of that period.

The Story:

Three years had passed since Piero Maironi, an artist, had renounced the world, and with it his love for Jeanne Dessalle. Maironi, whose wife was in a lunatic asylum, had fallen in love with Jeanne, who was separated from her husband. Before Maironi's wife died, however, she regained her sanity and called Piero to her side. There he had recovered his sense of honor, and on the night she died he had a prophetic vision concerning his life. He disappeared immediately from the knowledge of his family and friends and none of his old associates had seen him since. Jeanne had received a message from him that told of his sorrow at the sin they had shared. In spite of his message she could not quite accept his decision but still hoped to see him and renew his love for her. Her husband had died in the meantime, and she thought that if Piero could come to her without guilt he might renounce the holy life he was supposed to have embraced.

With a new friend, Noemi d'Arxel, Jeanne began to travel over Italy in search of Piero. In the hope that he had not yet taken his final vows as a monk, she sought him everywhere. Jeanne herself could not accept God. She knew that this fact would be a hindrance to the relations she hoped to establish with her former lover, but she was too intelligent and too honest to pretend to believe in order to influence him.

At last Jeanne and Noemi found Piero. He was at Jenne, a gardener in the monastery of Santa Scholastica, where he was the pupil and servant of Don Clemente, a Benedictine monk of rare humility and virtue. Piero was now called Benedetto, and no one but Don Clemente knew his real identity. To the people he was known as the Saint of Jenne, and many were cured of afflictions by merely touching his garments. Benedetto claimed no miracles; in fact, he begged people not to glorify him. For Benedetto was a true man of God. He wanted only to pray and to serve others and to rid the Church of her faults. For this last desire he was often reviled, because many dignitaries of the Church could not stand to have their souls bared to the public. Loving the Church with his whole heart, Benedetto sorrowed when he saw corruption and greed weakening it from within. In spite of his sincerity and his humility, he was sometimes hated, sometimes worshipped by those who knew him.

Although Jeanne managed to see Benedetto alone, the interview was not a satisfactory one. He asked her first if she now believed, and honesty made her answer that she did not. Then he asked her if she would promise to live for the poor and to love the afflicted. When she answered that she would, he told her that he would call her to his side at a certain hour in the future. Until then she must never try to see him again. After Benedetto left her, Jeanne was lost in sorrow.

Even though he worked only for the good of others, ruining his health by his frugal habits, Benedetto was forced to leave Jenne because he talked out against the corruption of the Church. Friends helped him, including Giovanni Selva, Noemi's saintly brother-in-law. Selva was a loyal Catholic who loved his Church so much that he wanted to see it rise above the worldly evils which threatened it. He had written some philosophical books on this subject, books which were in danger of being proscribed as unfit for Catholics to read. It was not always safe for Selva to aid Benedetto, but when he could not help the simple man himself he arranged for other friends to do so. Don Clemente, too, had been ordered by his superiors in the Church to abandon Benedetto. Although the monk obeyed, he longed for the time when they would all be vindicated and their teachings accepted.

Benedetto felt an invisible voice telling him to make a pilgrimage to Rome, to the Holy Father himself. Sick and weak, he made the long journey and was ordered to an audience with the pope. As he entered the Vatican, he saw again the vision he had seen on the night of his wife's death. Alone, he found his way to the pope's library, a fact the pope thought singularly strange; however, Benedetto had found the intricate halls and stairways just as he had seen them in his vision. The pilgrim learned that the pope was also concerned about the Church as it stood at that time, and he told Benedetto that the pope must deal with human beings, not with God alone, and that he had to consider how best to help all people everywhere, not those who believed only as he did. The Holy Father listened earnestly to Benedetto's account of the four sins which he considered the most serious: they were the spirit of falsehood, the domination of the clergy, the spirit of avarice, and the spirit of immobility or the failure to meet the needs of the changing times. The pope agreed with Benedetto on these points but begged him to be patient in waiting for their correction.

Benedetto's last plea to the pope was that Selva's books might not be placed on the Index. The vicar made no promises, but he agreed to consider all the things they had discussed. Then he blessed Benedetto and the pilgrim took his leave.

Not long after the interview friends warned Benedetto that the police were after him. Although she kept her promise not to try to see him, Jeanne sent him one message of warning. She did send her carriage for him once, in the hope that the reminder of her might cause him to change his mind, but her ruse was unsuccessful. Though the charges against Benedetto were false, sworn to by his enemies, his friends forced him to heed the dangers and hide himself. By that time he was in poor health because of his life of fasting and praying. Because he often went for days without food or rest, his friends knew that he would soon die.

Benedetto, also realizing that his days were numbered, sent for Jeanne. Before she arrived he saw his true friends once more: Selva, whose books had been kept off the Index because of Benedetto's plea to the pope; Don Clemente, who had come to him in spite of the danger involved; the poor from all over the city. He blessed them all and exhorted them to keep God in their hearts through all obstacles and dangers. Last of all Jeanne went to him. By that time Benedetto was so weak that he could hardly move his head. He did not speak, but stretched out his hand in the direction of the crucifix. When she took it to him, he raised it toward her lips. Taking the crucifix from his weak grasp, Jeanne kissed it passionately. A smile came to the face of the saintly man as he breathed his last.

SAKUNTALA

Type of work: Drama

Author: Kalidasa (c. sixth century)

Type of plot: Exotic romance

Time of plot: Golden Age of India

Locale: India

First presented: c. sixth century

Principal characters:

SAKUNTALA, beautiful daughter of a Brahman and a nymph

KANWA, Sakuntala's foster father and a wise hermit

DUSHYANTA, King of India, in love with Sakuntala

MATHAVYA, the court jester

Critique:

Kalidasa has been termed the Shakespeare of India, and this particular drama is usually considered his best work. There is little of the realism found in this play that may be found in earlier Hindu drama, such as The Clay Cart, done by an unknown author a century or two before Sakuntala. The greatness of Kalidasa's drama lies in its tremendous lyric power. The play was originally written in a combination of verse and prose, a form which most modern translators from the original Sanskrit have striven to emulate, though not always successfully. While almost nothing is known of Kalidasa, legend has it that he was the son of a good family of high caste, but that he was abandoned as a baby and reared as a common laborer. In spite of that handicap, says the legend, he became a great poet and dramatist, as well as the favorite of an Indian princess.

The Story:

Dushyanta, King of India, was hunting one day when his chariot took him into the sacred grounds of a religious establishment. A hermit stopped the king and reminded him that he had sworn to protect the religious people who lived there. The king left his chariot and wandered through the hallowed groves. As he walked, he heard voices and saw three young women passing through the grove to water the plants growing there. When a bee, angered by their presence, flew at her, Sakuntala, not knowing that the king was anywhere near, playfully called on Dushyanta to rescue her.

Dushyanta, stepping from his hiding place, announced himself, not as the king, but as the king's representative appointed to oversee the safety of the grove and its inhabitants. While they talked, Dushyanta learned that Sakuntala was no ordinary maid, but the child of a Brahman and a water nymph. Dushyanta fell in love with her. Sakuntala also felt the first pangs of love for the king and believed that the Hindu cupid had struck her with his five flower-tipped arrows.

Mathavya, the king's jester, complained to his master that too much time was being spent in hunting and that the life was too hard on him. Ostensibly to humor the jester, but actually to have more time to seek out Sakuntala, the king called off any further hunting and ordered his retinue to camp near the sacred grove in which Sakuntala lived with her foster father, a hermit-wiseman named Kanwa. A short time later word came to the camp that the king's mother wished him to return to the capital to take part in certain ceremonies, but Dushyanta was so smitten with love for Sakuntala that he sent his retinue back while he himself, in hopes of seeing Sakuntala again, remained at the sacred grove.

After their first meeting, both the king and Sakuntala had languished with love. At last Dushyanta found excuse and opportunity to revisit the grove, and there he met the girl again. Both were obviously in love, but neither one knew how to tell the other. One of Sakuntala's attendants finally conceived the idea of having her send a love note to the king. As Sakuntala wrote the note, Dushyanta heard her speaking the words aloud. He stepped from his place of concealment and told her of his determination to make her his consort and the head of his household, above all his other wives. Sakuntala left, telling him that she would have to talk over the subject of marriage with her attendants, for her foster father, Kanwa, was absent and so could not give his consent.

Sometime later a scurrilous and eccentric sage came to the sacred grove. He felt himself slighted by Sakuntala, who had not heard of his arrival and so did not accomplish the rites of hospitality to suit him. In his anger he called down a curse upon the girl, though she did not know of it. The curse was that her lover should not remember her until he saw once again the ring of recognition that he would give her. The attendants who heard the curse were afraid to tell Sakuntala for fear she would become ill with worry.

Before Dushyanta left the sacred grove to return to his palace, Sakuntala agreed to a secret marriage and became his wife, but she decided to remain at the grove until the return of her foster father. Before he left, the king gave her a ring, as a sign of her new status. Not long after the king's departure, Kanwa returned. Having the gift of omniscience, he knew all that had taken place, and, as Kanwa reentered the sacred grove, a supernatural voice told him that Sakuntala should give birth to a son destined to rule the world. Kanwa, thus assured of the future, gave his blessing to the union of Sakuntala and the king. He had his people make the necessary preparations for sending the bride to her husband, to appear as the royal consort.

When the time came for her departure, Sakuntala was filled with regret, for she loved the sacred grove where she had been reared. In addition, she had premonitions that her future was not to be a happy one. Kanwa insisted, however, that she make ready to leave, so that her son could be born in his father's palace.

But when the hermits of the sacred wood appeared in Dushyanta's presence with the girl, the curse proved true, for King Dushyanta failed to remember Sakuntala and his marriage to her. The hermits, feeling that they had done their duty in escorting Sakuntala to her husband, left her in the king's household. Sakuntala, heartbroken at her husband's failure to remember her, looked for the ring of recognition he had given her. But the ring had been lost during the journey from the sacred wood to the palace.

Not long after Dushyanta had sent Sakuntala from his presence, his courtiers came to tell him that a strange, winged being had flown into the palace gardens, picked up Sakuntala, and carried her away into the heavens. The king was much disturbed over the event, but resolved to put it from his mind. Later the ring of recognition, bearing the king's crest, was discovered in the hands of a poor fisherman; he had found it in the belly of a carp. The ring was carried to Dushyanta; no sooner had he set eyes upon it than he remembered Sakuntala and their secret marriage, for the sight of the ring removed the curse.

Remembrance of Sakuntala did him no good; when she had been snatched from the palace garden, she had been lost to mortal eyes. Dushyanta grew sad and refused to be comforted. Meanwhile the nymph who had stolen Sakuntala from the palace garden kept watch and took note of the king's unhappiness. Finally she took pity on him and had the chariot of the god Indra sent down to earth to convey King Dushyanta to heaven for a reunion with Sakuntala.

In heaven the king found a young boy playing with a lion. He was amazed to see what the child was doing and felt a strong attraction for him. While he watched, an amulet fell from the child's neck. The king picked it up and replaced it on the boy's shoulders, much to the surprise of the boy's heavenly attendants, for the amulet was deadly to all but the child's parents. Dushyanta, recognized as the true father, was taken to Sakuntala, who readily forgave her husband, for she had heard the story of the curse. The gods, happy to see the pair reunited, sent them back to earth, along with their little son Bharata, to live many years in happiness together.

SANDFORD AND MERTON

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Day (1748-1789)

Type of plot: Didactic romance

Time of plot: Late eighteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1783-1789

Principal characters:

HARRY SANDFORD, a farmer's son

TOMMY MERTON, a gentleman's son

MR. BARLOW, a clergyman, teacher of Sandford and Merton

MR. MERTON, a very sensible gentleman, Tommy's father

Critique:

This novel is one of those which during the eighteenth century appeared in England to popularize certain social theories which were originating in France.

The theory which Sandford and Merton attempted to promulgate was that of education by example rather than coercion: the same theme had been presented in Rousseau's Émile, which had been published in France twenty-one years earlier. In Thomas Day's novel the reader finds also the belief that a proximity to nature is one of the ingredients of a healthy personality. Little Harry Sandford, a farmer's son, having been in contact with nature in his most formative years, is healthy, kindly, and sensible; young Tommy Merton, on the other hand, enters the novel with a background of artificiality and is a headstrong weakling. Like most novels of doctrine, this one depends for its force upon its didactic elements.

The Story:

Little Tommy Merton was a headstrong, ill-tempered, and weak lad when he returned with his family to England from Jamaica. His first years had been spent in the company of slaves who pampered his whims, and his mother, who could see no wrong in her child, condoned everything he said or did. The child had no inclination to study, and so he could not read, write, or do arithmetic when he arrived in England. Mr. Merton, who was very wealthy, wished to improve his son, but he was at a loss to know where to begin.

Thanks to a lucky chance, Mr. Merton's problem solved itself. One day, when Tommy Merton was walking through the fields, a snake coiled itself about his leg. Only the timely appearance of a farmer boy, who tore the snake from Tommy's leg, prevented serious injury. As a reward for his brave action, the farm boy, Harry Sandford, was invited to the Merton mansion for dinner. During the meal he greatly displeased Mrs. Merton, for he refused to believe that the artificialities of the Merton home and all the paraphernalia of the rich were really worth-while. But his philosophic attitude interested Mr. Merton, who, upon inquiry, learned that Harry Sandford was under the tutelage of the local clergyman, Mr. Barlow. Thinking that his son needed some training to make him a better social being, Mr. Merton made arrangements for Tommy to be boarded at Mr. Barlow's vicarage and educated with little Harry.

The first few days at the vicarage were trying ones for Tommy. When he refused to help with the gardening, Mr. Barlow refused to let him eat. Then, when he went into tantrums, no one paid the least bit of attention to him. Gradually he learned that getting on in the world took greater abilities than simply demanding whatever one wanted. Under the tutelage of Mr. Barlow, and with the example of Harry, he began to take an interest in what was going on about him. He became ashamed that he did not know how to read, and with great effort he taught himself to do so. His desire was to read stories aloud, as Harry did. By means of these stories Mr. Barlow imparted a great deal of information to the children.

From their reading the boys also got ideas for various projects. They embarked for example, on the building of a hut, to see if they could build one that would protect them from the weather, after they had read of sailors being cast away on islands which were uninhabited. Tommy also became interested in gardening after he learned that bread did not simply happen on the table at mealtimes. From the gardening he went on to visit, along with Mr. Barlow and Harry, a mill where the grain was ground to make flour. These processes he had never even heard of in his earlier years when he was pampered as a rich man's son.

The first sign of generosity on the part of Tommy came when he and Harry were befriended by a poor woman who gave them some lunch one day after they had strayed from home. While the boys were in the cottage, bailiffs came to take away the family's belongings to settle a bill that the father of the family had signed for a relative. Little Tommy went to his father and got the money, a relatively large sum, and gave it to the man and his wife. Keeping his generosity a secret from his family, he said that he would save the money out of his allowance, a sizeable one, and pay it back to his father. When the secret was finally made known by the poor people, Mr. Merton was very pleased, not only with his son but also with the instruction he was getting from Mr. Barlow and Harry.

After some months had passed, Tommy went home for a vacation and took Harry with him. The guests at the Merton house, astonished and displeased that a gentleman's son should be permitted the companionship of a farmer's son, showed their disapproval. Other children at the house, imitating the grownups, made life miserable for Harry, who took their malice with the best possible grace, even when Tommy, whom he thought his best friend, turned against him. One day a group of youngsters disobeyed their parents and went to a bull-baiting. Harry tried to dissuade them from going, but he received only blows and ill will for his efforts. At the bull-baiting the infuriated animal broke its tether and ran amuck. Only quick thinking on the part of Harry and a colored beggar saved Tommy's life.

After saving Tommy's life, Harry and the Negro went to Harry's father's farm. The other children tried to blame Harry for their having gone to the bull-baiting, but the truth came out and little Harry was the hero of the day. As much as he had been the underdog before, he became the hero of the adults and the children. Tommy asked Harry's forgiveness and apologized for his selfish and proud behavior. Harry, of course, forgave him.

One day Tommy, while on a walk by himself, saw a lamb attacked by a dog. Tommy rescued the lamb, although he himself had to be rescued by a Highlander who happened along the road. Filled with gratitude, Tommy took the Highlander and his motherless children home, where the Scots were given a hearty meal. After dinner the Highlander told of his adventures while serving as a soldier in America. As he told his story, it came out that he was a friend of an officer in America who was related to one of the Mertons' guests. Because of his help in rescuing Tommy and the lamb, as well as his connection with the guest's relative, the Highlander was given employment on one of Mr. Merton's farms.

By that time Mr. Merton was convinced that Harry Sanford and Mr. Barlow had changed his son into a healthy, generous, straight-thinking young lad. It was time, however, for Tommy to begin a more formal education. Mr. Merton went to the Sandford farm to make a present of a large sum of money to Mr. Sandford for what Harry had done. Mr. Sandford, a virtuous, self-sufficient man, refused to accept payment, saying that he had got along well without it and that he was afraid it would only cause trouble in his household, where heretofore everyone had been content. He did, however, agree to accept a fine team of workhorses. When Tommy left with Mr. Merton, he told Harry that he would look forward to seeing him as often as possible, for he realized that Harry had taught him how to be sincere and useful, not merely a gentleman's son.

SARAGOSSA

Principal characters:

DON JOSÉ DE MONTORIA, a Spanish patriot
AUGUSTINE DE MONTORIA, his son
ARACELI, Augustine's friend
CANDIOLA, a miser
MARIQUILLA, his daughter

Critique:

Saragossa is one of a series of novels by Galdós which cover the period of Spain's wars with Napoleon. Here the story of the second siege of Saragossa is presented as a historic example of Spanish patriotism. Because of its dramatic scenes and accurate descriptions of the siege, the novel has been ranked by some critics with the better-known work of Zola and Tolstoy.

The Story:

The French armies of Napoleon had laid siege to Saragossa from mid-June to mid-August in the year 1808. Although the city had defended itself so bravely that the French finally withdrew, the people of Saragossa knew that Napoleon would never leave them in peace until he had conquered them. When warnings of a second siege came early in December of the same year, citizens of the town were not surprised. The fame of the first defense of Saragossa had spread over all Spain, and many men went to aid the city in the coming struggle. Among these was Araceli, a young man well-known to a brave Saragossan, Don José de Montoria.

Don José, delighted to have Araceli in Saragossa, enrolled him in the battalion of the Peñas of San Pedro. Don José himself had two sons, Manuel and Augustine. Manuel, the older, was to carry on the family line. Augustine was to enter the Church. Araceli quickly made friends with Augustine and discovered that the boy was a better soldier than he was a theological student.

When French troops began their attack on the city, Augustine and Araceli fought side by side in the front lines. During the first days of the siege everything seemed to be going well for the defenders. One night, when the two were off duty, Augustine told Araceli about his love for Mariquilla, daughter of the old miser, Candiola. Augustine knew that he was destined for the Church, but he also knew that he and Mariquilla loved each other. During the first siege Candiola had won the enmity of everyone because he had done nothing to help the town, and Augustine did not dare tell his family that he loved the miser's daughter. The two tried to see the girl secretly that night but, as they were about to be let into the garden of her house by a maid, Candiola appeared and they had to leave.

The fighting continued, neither side making much headway until the French attacked the Redoubt del Pilar and finally breached the walls. As the Spanish defenders prepared to retire, they saw that someone had mounted the walls and was trying to hold back the French alone. When the soldiers saw that this brave person was a girl, Manuela Sancho, they were inspired to hold their positions. The fortification did not fall that day.

As the battle for the city went on, food and materials of war became scarce. Don José was authorized to seize any wheat that he could find and pay a stipulated sum for it. Because Candiola was known to have a large supply of grain in his house, Don José went there to get it. But Candiola refused to sell the wheat at the price offered. Angry, Don José knocked the old man down and ordered the soldiers to take the wheat. Mariquilla, rushing from the house, tried to protect her father, who lay shaking in the dust. When Don José offered her the money he had been ordered to pay for the wheat, she took it and threw it in his face.

A few days later Augustine and Araceli visited Mariquilla at night. The girl's first words to Augustine were about the man who had struck her father, for she did not know that Augustine was Don José's son. Augustine was at a loss for something to say. Mariquilla loved her father despite his faults, and Augustine could not let her know that it had been his father who had struck the old miser. A few days later, after Candiola's house had been hit by a bomb, Augustine and Araceli rushed to the spot to see if any harm had come to Mariquilla. They found the family safe, but the house was in ruins. Candiola was disgusting in his concern over his lost treasures in the very face of the dead about him, and he refused to leave his house for fear looters would steal something from the rubble. Augustine arranged to have Mariquilla stay with the brave Manuela Sancho.

Meanwhile the French had broken into the city, and the defenders fought from street to street, from house to house. During the fighting Manuel de Montoria was killed. The tragedy worked a great change in Don José. When he met Candiola in the street, he asked to be forgiven for striking him, but Candiola would not forgive the insult. During their conversation Candiola charged that Don José's son had led his daughter astray by taking her to nurse the wounded and care for the sick.

The next day Augustine and Mariquilla were sitting together on a sidewalk talking over the plans for their marriage after the war was over. Araceli joined them. All thought they could hear sounds of digging under them. For the past several weeks the French had been trying to dig tunnels under the city to aid them in blowing up strategic buildings, but the defenders had dug as many tunnels in defense and felt sure that all was protected from surprise. The three investigated as well as they could, but decided that a tunnel at that spot would be of no danger to the city.

The next day the convent of San Francisco in the center of the city was destroyed. The Saragossans soon discovered that the French had penetrated to the convent through a tunnel from Candiola's house, to which the miser had guided the enemy. The town demanded death for the traitor.

As soon as she heard that her father was to be killed, Mariquilla left the hospital where she had been working and went to look for Augustine. Sure that her father was innocent, she begged Augustine to save Candiola. At that moment Don José appeared and Mariquilla learned that Augustine was his son. When she learned further that Augustine was in charge of the firing squad for Candiola's execution, she threw herself at his feet and again begged him to spare her father's life. Don José told his son to remember the cause for which he fought. Torn between love and honor, Augustine broke his sword and walked away. Mariquilla, overcome with grief, was befriended by sympathetic spectators.

Still Saragossa held out. Weeks dragged by. Finally, on the twenty-first of February, 1809, the city was forced to surrender. Hardly a wall stood to shelter the defenders.

A few days later Araceli was accosted by a man he scarcely recognized. It was Augustine, come to entreat his friend to help dig a grave for Mariquilla, who had died neither of war nor of the plague, but of grief. Don José came up to them and begged his son to forget the girl now that she was dead, and to come back to his family and carry on the Montoria name. But Augustine told his father that he intended to enter a monastery as soon as he had finished with Mariquilla's grave. Thus ended Don José's hopes for his family. Araceli left the destroyed city of Saragossa, the lesson of its bravery still deep in his heart when in other cities, in later days, he continued the fight for Spanish freedom.

THE SATYRICON

Type of work: Fictional miscellany
Author: Gaius Petronius Arbiter (?—A.D. c. 66)
Type of plot: Social criticism
Time of plot: First century
Locale: Italy
Earliest extant printed version: 1664

Principal characters:

ENCOLPIUS, the narrator
ASCYLTUS, his friend
GITO, their attendant
EUMOLPUS, a poet
TRIMALCHIO, a wealthy vulgarian

Critique:

This vast work of Petronius is extant only in a fragment of 146 chapters of books 15 and 16. The chapters consist of a miscellany of anecdotes without much unity. It is generally thought that Petronius wrote the tales as a sort of parody or protest of the orgies and debauches of Nero's reign. The pictures of Roman life presented are a vast canvas of licentiousness. By their worship of Priapus the Romans signaled their decadence and fall. Modern readers, even though hardened by the present-day cult of frankness, tend to turn in disgust from the excesses here depicted.

The Story:

Encolpius railed at the growth of artificiality in modern rhetoric and the ill-prepared students who came to the school. Agamemnon, the professor, agreed with him, but placed the blame entirely on parents who refused to make their children study. Weary of the dispute and far gone in drink, Encolpius fled the school. An old woman, who made indecent proposals to him, showed him the way back to his inn.

Gito, his sixteen-year-old slave, had prepared supper, but the comely boy was crying: Ascyltus had made violent love to him. Encolpius was soothing the boy with caresses and tender words when Ascyltus broke in on them. A quarrel ensued between the two friends as to who should enjoy Gito's favors. The dispute was settled only when all three agreed to pay a visit to Lycurgus, a rich friend of Ascyltus.

Lycurgus received them most cordially and introduced them to Lichas, his friend. Lichas, completely taken with Encolpius, insisted that Encolpius and Gito come home with him. On the way, Tryphaena, a beautiful woman attached to Lichas' entourage, made surreptitious love to Encolpius, who resolved to have little to do with Lichas. But, when the party arrived at Lichas' villa, Tryphaena deserted Encolpius for the bewitching Gito. Smarting under her desertion, Encolpius made love to Doris, Lichas' attractive wife. All went fairly well until Gito tired of Tryphaena. Then she accused both Gito and Encolpius of making improper advances, and the two returned in haste to Lycurgus' house.

Lycurgus at first supported the two adventurers, but as the jealous Lichas increased his complaints, Lycurgus turned against the pair. At the suggestion of Ascyltus, the three set out again to seek what love affairs and plunder they could find. They were well supplied with gold, for Encolpius had thoughtfully plundered one of Lichas' ships before leaving.

At a nearby small town a fair was in progress. There they came upon a groom who was saddling a rich man's horse. When the groom left for a moment, Encolpius stole the rich man's riding cloak. Soon afterward Ascylltus found a bag of coins on the ground. The two friends hid the gold by sewing it under the lining of Encolpius' threadbare tunic. Just as they finished, the rich man's retainers gave chase to recover the riding cloak. Dashing through a wood, Encolpius was separated from his friend and lost the tunic.

They met again at a market. There they saw the tunic up for sale with the gold pieces still hidden in the lining. When they offered to trade the riding cloak for the tunic, the bystanders became suspicious and tried to make the two friends appear before a judge. Dropping the riding cloak and seizing the tunic, they fled.

After telling Gito to follow later on, they set out for the next town. Seeing the dim forms of two comely women hurrying through the dusk, they followed them unobserved into an underground temple. There the two men saw a company of women in Bacchanalian garb, each with a phallic emblem in her hand, preparing to worship Priapus. They were discovered by the horrified women and chased back to their inn.

As they were dining with Gito in their rooms, the maid of one of the women whom they had followed to the sacred rites came in and begged them to listen to her mistress, who was a respectable matron. Even though Encolpius swore never to tell of the forbidden rites, the matron had the three seized and taken to her villa. The men were bound and given powerful love potions, and then all the women of the household made love to them. After escaping from the love-maddened ladies, Encolpius had to rest for three days; Gito seemed little affected.

Next the three attended a huge banquet given by Trimalchio, a rich and vulgar freedman. Every dish served was disguised as something else. After hours of eating and drinking, they were glad even for the respite of story telling. Trimalchio started off with a boring elucidation of the signs of the zodiac, and many of the guests told pointless anecdotes. From Niceros, however, they heard an absorbing tale.

Niceros was staying, while he was still a slave, at an inn where he was in love with the landlord's complaisant wife, Melissa. One day he induced a soldier to go for a walk with him. When they came to a graveyard, the soldier took off his clothes and threw them beside the path. Making a magic circle around the clothes, he straightway turned into a wolf and went howling away. When Niceros saw to his horror that the clothes had turned to stone, he hurried home to Melissa. She told him that a wolf had just come into the yard and killed some sheep. A servant drove a spear through the animal's neck but the wolf got away.

Niceros ran back to the cemetery where he found that the stone clothes had dissolved in blood. In the morning he went to the soldier's room. There a physician was stanching the blood from a wound in the soldier's neck.

Encolpius, Ascylltus, and Gito were finally so stuffed and bored they could stand no more. To their relief, the company moved outdoors to exercise. From the conversation they learned that another banquet was to follow, this one given by Trimalchio's wife. They left hurriedly.

Following another quarrel over Gito, Encolpius and Ascylltus parted company. To the distress of Encolpius, Gito elected to go with Ascylltus.

After sorrowing uselessly for days, Encolpius fell in with an old man, the poet Eumolpus. When the two went to the baths to cement their friendship, Encolpius was overjoyed to find Gito acting as attendant for Ascylltus, who was in another room. Gito confessed that he really liked Encolpius better, and the latter, in a happy mood, took the boy back to his apartment.

Matters would have been smoother for Encolpius if he had not tried to make love to Circe. Because of his past tribulations and hardships, he had no strength for her ardors. Suspecting him of trifling with her, she raised such an outcry that Encolpius judged it wise to leave town.

On Eumolpus' advice, the comrades embarked secretly at night on a ship lying in the harbor. In the morning Encolpius discovered to his chagrin that they were aboard Lichas' ship. The owner and Tryphaena were aboard. Eumolpus tried to disguise Encolpius and Gito with burnt cork. Their subterfuge was discovered, however, and for a while it looked as though they would be flogged. But Lichas remembered his old attraction to Encolpius and Tryphaena was smitten anew with Gito; so they were spared.

When Lichas' ship was wrecked in a storm, the three comrades got ashore at Croton. Eumolpus posed as a rich landowner and Encolpius and Gito passed as his slaves. By cleverly deluding the inhabitants, they lived luxuriously as guests of the town. After a year suspicion grew as to Eumolpus' supposed wealth. Seeing an end to their pleasant stay, Encolpius and Gito escaped just in time. The aroused townspeople used Eumolpus as a scapegoat. They decked him out with boughs and sacred vestments, led him through the city, and finally hurled him down a cliff.

Critique:

The School for Wives (L'École des Femmes) was the most successful of Molière's plays during his lifetime. Acted more than any other of his dramas while he lived, it called forth both great praise and acid criticism from his contemporaries. The satire is biting, the irony vicious. But Molière knew exactly when to break the tone and inject humor into the dialogue, as is shown by the roles played by the two servants. Nowhere in his works is his genius more brilliantly displayed. He was indeed a master satirist who has seldom been excelled.

The Story:

As Arnolphe told his friend Chrysalde, if a man's wife were not to make a fool of him he must choose one ignorant of the ways of the world and in no danger of being admired by other men. Arnolphe, famous for his bitter ridicule of other men who were put to shame by the unfaithfulness of their wives, was determined that he would not find himself in a like position. For that reason he proposed to marry Agnès, his young ward, whom he had protected from society. He thought her such an ignorant girl and such a fool that she would make a perfect wife.

Agnès had been put in his care by her widowed foster mother. The girl had her early training in a convent to which Arnolphe sent her. Later she lived in a small cottage on his estate. Her life was secluded, in order that she might be kept safe from learning and from outside influences until she reached an age for marriage. On a whim, Arnolphe had changed his name to Monsieur de la Souche, but Agnès was not aware of this fact. Neither was she aware of Arnolphe's plan to marry her.

Before Arnolphe could inform Agnès of his wishes, Horace, the son of his friend Oronte, told him that he was in love with her. Horace, knowing only that Agnès was the ward of one de la Souche, did not realize that Arnolphe and de la Souche were the same man. Horace asked Arnolphe not to tell anyone of the love affair because it must be kept a secret from both de la Souche and Horace's father. Arnolphe could only smother his rage in silence as he listened to the tale of Agnès' duplicity. Even though she was not aware that Arnolphe planned to make her his wife, he already felt that she was faithless to him and had shamed him. He thought he must accuse her of sinning against him and must also tell her his plans immediately.

But Agnès did not react as he had anticipated. In her innocence she told him of the pleasure she found in Horace's company. Arnolphe was relieved to learn that she had given her lover only kisses, for she was so innocent that she had once asked if babies came from the ear. He ordered her not to see Horace again, even to slam the door in his face or throw stones at him if he attempted to see her. In addition, he lectured her on the role of women, wives in particular, and gave her a book of maxims to study so that she might be better prepared for marriage. The maxims expressed Arnolphe's ideas exactly since they too saw wives as the complete possessions of their husbands. Arnolphe told Agnès that he intended to marry her, but she misunderstood him and thought he meant to give her in marriage. She was happy because she thought she would be married to Horace.

Arnolphe learned from Horace that Agnès had obeyed orders and thrown a stone at him, but he learned also that she attached a letter to the stone. In the letter she had professed her love for Horace and the young man was delighted. Still not knowing that his supposed friend was in reality Agnès' guardian, Horace asked Arnolphe for help in rescuing her from de la Souche.

Arnolphe decided to marry Agnès at once and sent for the notary. He was doubly miserable; first because he felt betrayed, and secondly because he really loved the girl. Thus he was enraged when he learned of Horace's plan to gain admittance to Agnès' room, and he ordered his servants to set upon Horace with clubs as he tried to climb to Agnès' window. He was horrified, however, when the servants told him that they had beaten Horace too hard and had killed him.

Even though he hated the young man, Arnolphe was relieved to see Horace alive and not seriously injured. Horace told him that he had pretended to be dead so that his attackers would leave him. Agnès, swearing that she was never going back to her prison cottage, had slipped out during the uproar. Horace, with no place to take the girl, asked Arnolphe to help him by hiding the girl until they could be married. Arnolphe hid his face as he met Agnès, and it was not until after Horace had gone that she recognized Arnolphe as de la Souche. Still her innocence made her unafraid, and she told Arnolphe that Horace was more to her liking for a husband than he was. Swearing that she would have no one but Horace, she refused to consider marrying Arnolphe in spite of his alternate threats and promises. At last Arnolphe declared angrily that he would send her to a convent, and he had his servants lock her up until a carriage could be secured.

Horace, ignorant of these developments, went again to his friend Arnolphe, this time in great agitation. His father, Oronte, had arrived for a visit with his friend Enrique, the brother-in-law of Chrysalde. It was Oronte's purpose to marry Horace to Enrique's daughter, and Horace asked Arnolphe to persuade Oronte not to force the marriage. Although he promised to help Horace, Arnolphe did exactly the opposite. He told Oronte that a father should never give in to a son but should make him bow to a parent's wishes. He insisted that Horace and Enrique's daughter be married at once. Then Horace learned that Arnolphe was in reality de la Souche and knew that he had been betrayed.

Arnolphe had Agnès brought in before the gathering because he wanted to witness her grief and Horace's as they were separated forever. But he was disappointed. To his astonishment he learned that Agnès was Enrique's daughter.

Enrique, years before, had secretly married the sister of Chrysalde. After her death Enrique, forced to flee the country, had left his small daughter with a country woman. Too poor to provide for the child, the woman had in turn given Agnès to Arnolphe. Enrique had only recently learned of her whereabouts. As soon as he learned that she was with Arnolphe, he had arranged her betrothal to the son of his friend Oronte. Thus the lovers were united with the blessing of everyone but Arnolphe, who could only sputter and wring his hands. He had truly been betrayed.

EARL OF MAR, a Scottish nobleman

LADY MAR, his wife

LADY HELEN MAR, his daughter

EDWIN RUTHVEN, Wallace's friend

EDWARD I, King of England

ROBERT BRUCE, heir to the Scottish throne

EARL OF GLOUCESTER, an English nobleman

Critique:

Miss Porter's desire in The Scottish Chiefs, Or, The Life of Sir William Wallace was to write the story of a great national hero who was also a Christian hero. Today the goodness and nobility of William Wallace may seem overdrawn, but the story moves always with a vigor and momentum which carries the reader along. The effectiveness of the story can be attributed in part to the amount of research Miss Porter did for her novel. The sources she accepted as accurate are not considered so today, yet the story is far more historically correct than are most modern historical novels. The Scottish Chiefs has always been a great favorite, largely because the events of the period were in themselves highly exciting and heroic.

The Story:

In the summer of 1296 Scotland was finally at peace, for the Scottish king had submitted to the authority of Edward I, King of England. Sir William Wallace, like many other Scottish lords, had retired to his home at Ellerslie. One night he was asked secretly to meet Sir John Monteith, who gave him a mysterious iron box with instructions that it was not to be opened until Scotland was again free. On his way home with the box, Wallace saw the old Earl of Mar attacked by English soldiers. Wallace saved his old friend and took the wounded man to Ellerslie. There the vengeance of the English governor followed them. The wounded earl was hidden in a well, and Wallace fled to the hills. Lady Wallace was killed by the English governor when she refused to give information concerning her husband's whereabouts or the iron box. Ellerslie was burned. After the English had gone, Mar was rescued and taken to Bothwell Castle. Wallace had the box taken to the Abbot of St. Fillan for safekeeping.

When Wallace heard that his wife had been so cruelly murdered, he swore to free Scotland from the tyrant Edward. Mar promised him aid and men, and in a few weeks Wallace had captured several castles and their English garrisons. After some successful battles Wallace learned that Mar and his family had been captured and jailed in Dumbarton Castle, and he hastened there with his troops to save them.

A young man, Edwin Ruthven, entered the castle by stealth, to learn the strength of its defense. Acting on Ruthven's information, Wallace and his troops captured the castle and saved Mar's family. He escorted the fugitives to Bute, where it was hoped that they would be safe until Scotland was free.

While Wallace was at Bute, he learned that the English had executed many of the great Scottish chiefs in revenge for the victories he had won. Wallace first led his troops to Ayr and captured that castle. Shortly afterward he attacked Berwick Castle and captured its noble commander, the Earl of Gloucester, son-in-law of King Edward. Gloucester realized that Edward's claims to Scotland were weak, and that Wallace had the right and the blessings of God on his side. The two men became fast friends and Gloucester promised never again to raise his sword against Wallace. He planned to return to England and plead with Edward to grant Scotland independence and freedom.

On the same day Wallace received from Lady Helen Mar a letter which said that her father had been betrayed and that he was a prisoner in Stirling Castle. Wallace led his troops to Stirling at once, taking with him Lord de Valence, an English prisoner. As he approached the castle, the English showed Mar on the battlements and threatened to hang him if Wallace did not surrender immediately. Wallace countered this threat with a promise of death to de Valence if Mar were touched. Later Wallace destroyed an English army marching to reinforce the garrison at Stirling. After this defeat Stirling surrendered, and in the ancient hall of Snawdoun the Scottish nobles assembled and named Wallace regent to rule for the king whom Edward held hostage in England. But some of the nobles, jealous of his victories and popularity, could not see what an honest and true Scot Wallace was. When they heard that King Edward himself was leading troops to Scotland to fight Wallace, they planned to betray the regent into English power.

Wallace met the English in the battle of Falkirk. During the battle the false Scottish lords turned their troops against Wallace and tried to defeat him. That night, while reconnoitering the English lines, Wallace met Robert Bruce, the son of the royal claimant who was half friend, half ally of Edward. The young Bruce, convinced of Wallace's virtue and honor, promised to try to persuade his father to join the patriots fighting for Scotland's freedom. In the next day's fighting Mar was wounded and Lady Helen Mar captured. On his deathbed Mar made Wallace promise to save her from Lord de Valence, the English knight who had made her his prisoner. Wallace promised that he would. Edward, meanwhile, had retreated to English soil, and all would have gone well if the nobles had supported Wallace. Dissension broke out in the Scottish Parliament when Lord Cummins declared that Wallace was trying to seize the throne for himself. Wallace, realizing that Scotland would be torn with internal quarrels if he remained regent, resigned his post, much to the sorrow of all true Scots. Insisting that her noble birth would help him to secure the throne, Lady Mar tried to persuade him to marry her after her husband's death. Disgusted, Wallace left her to go to England to save Lady Helen.

Disguised as a minstrel, he made his way to the castle of Durham, where Edward held his court. His voice soon won him the favor of Edward's queen, and he was often called to sing for her. He found his old friends, Gloucester and Robert Bruce. His father having died, Bruce was now the heir to the throne. He declared himself ready to fight beside Wallace for his country's freedom. When Edward became suspicious of the minstrel's identity, it was the Earl of Gloucester who helped Wallace to escape. Bruce promised to join him before long.

Wallace had learned that de Valence had taken Lady Helen to France and had locked her in a castle there. Bruce joined Wallace in Rouen. He and Bruce were well received by the French king. Wearing a suit of royal French armor which the king had given him, Wallace entered the prison of Lady Helen and rescued her. Disguised as a page, she returned to Scotland with Wallace and Bruce.

Wallace again turned his sword against the enemies of Scotland and fought under the new regent, Lord Cummins. One day a knight presented himself to Wallace and asked to be allowed to fight under the anonymous title of the Knight of the Green Plume. Wallace gave his permission, little knowing that the knight was Lady Mar in disguise. Bruce, not wishing to claim the throne of Scotland until after he had fought for Scottish freedom, had taken the name of the Count de Longueville. He fought bravely in several battles. Then, severely wounded, he was sent to the castle of Huntingtower until he recovered. During his absence Wallace was surprised to discover that the Knight of the Green Plume was really Lady Mar. She revealed herself to him and again begged him to marry her. When he refused, she struck at him with her dagger and wounded him slightly. As she left his tent, she boasted that she would some day see his head rolling beneath the executioner's ax.

A short time later Wallace received word that he had been accused of treason, and he was summoned before the chiefs of Scotland to stand trial. His accuser, he soon learned, was Lady Mar, who tried to prove by false letters that Wallace had betrayed Scotland to the King of France. The council, led by Lord Cummins, decided against him, and in a fury he swore that he would leave Scotland forever. When he learned that his enemies were planning to turn him over to the English, he and his faithful follower, Edwin Ruthven, attempted to flee to France. Sir John Monteith, turning against his old friend, betrayed him to the English. Monteith and his men surrounded the hut where Wallace and Ruthven had stopped for the night. Ruthven was killed defending his leader. Wallace was put in chains and taken to London.

When Robert Bruce learned of this tragedy, he left his sickbed and made a futile attempt to save Wallace. Lady Helen Mar dressed herself in the page's costume in which she had escaped from de Valence with Wallace's help and set out for London. By bribing the guards, she gained entrance to the Tower of London and saw Wallace in prison. The two were discovered by Wallace's old friend, Gloucester, who sent Lady Helen to plead with the king. Her mission was fruitless. With Gloucester's aid she and Wallace were married on the eve of his execution.

The next day Wallace died a shameful traitor's death. Gloucester, however, had the body saved from indignity and brought back to the tower. Robert Bruce, arriving too late to see Wallace alive, helped Lady Helen smuggle the body back to Scotland.

Robert Bruce raised the royal standard in his own name. The Scottish nobles, learning the identity of the Count de Longueville, acclaimed him their rightful monarch. He led his army against Edward's troops in the famous battle of Bannockburn, defeated the English, and won Scotland's freedom.

After the battle, Bruce went to be crowned at the church of St. Fillan. There, with Wallace's body newly placed in a grave, he was crowned and married to Isabella Mar, Lady Helen's younger sister. As the ceremony ended, Lady Helen fell dying on the tomb of Wallace. Then the Abbot of St. Fillan, remembering the box which had been left in his care, brought it forward in the belief that it contained holy relics which would save the dying woman. In the box were the crown and regalia of the King of Scotland. So Wallace, dead, restored to Robert Bruce his rightful crown.

THE SEAGULL

Type of work: Drama

MASHA, their daughter

NINA ZARETCHYN, a young actress

Critique:

The Seagull was based on an apparently trifling event in Chekhov's life. One afternoon, while he was taking a walk with his friend, Ilya Levitan, the landscape painter, he saw Levitan shoot a seagull which was flying over the river. Later, the moody painter, feeling he was scorned by the woman he loved, threw the dead seagull at her feet and threatened to kill himself. The play Chekhov made from this incident is perhaps the most elaborate and realistic analysis of the life of the artist ever presented in dramatic form, but all that almost any other dramatist would have selected as the material for his play takes place in Moscow between the third and fourth acts. What we see is the effect of what has taken place, and in this lies the essence of what Chekhov has contributed to the art of the theater.

The Story:

One day Konstantin Treplev killed a seagull and laid it at the feet of Nina, the beautiful young actress with whom he was hopelessly in love. He told her that unless she could love him, he too would be lying dead at her feet. But Nina was not in love with Konstantin; she was infatuated with Trigorin, the famous novelist, who in turn was in love with Irina Arkadin, the actress, Konstantin's mother.

Konstantin hated Trigorin, looking upon him as a purveyor of empty phrases, a writer entirely different from what he himself hoped to become. Konstantin's ambition was to create new and more expressive literary forms, and he had written a play in which Nina had consented to appear.

The performance, which was staged in the open air on the estate of Pyotr Sorin,

THE SEAGULL by Anton Chekhov. By permission of the publishers, Charles Scribner's Sons. Copyright, 1912, by Charles Scribner's Sons. Renewed.

Konstantin's uncle, was not exactly a success, although it possessed unquestioned literary merit. Madame Arkadin and Trigorin, who were present, refused to take the production seriously. Trigorin was most impressed by the performance of nineteen-year-old Nina in the principal role.

Madame Arkadin's behavior at her son's play was typical of her attitude toward Konstantin in every aspect of their relationship. As a famous actress, whose popularity depended upon her keeping her youth and good looks, she naturally was not overjoyed at the constant reminder that she was the mother of a twenty-five-year-old son. Consequently, she kept Konstantin in the country where he would not be seen and thus be associated with her in the public mind. Moreover, she gave him little or no money to spend, so that he was forced to wear the same suit for years until it was threadbare. Her brother, Pyotr Sorin, had taken his sister to task on several occasions for her stinginess, but she had pleaded poverty, meaning, of course, that she preferred to spend her money on herself.

In spite of the way she treated him, Konstantin was greatly attached to his mother, so much so that he developed a morbid, unhealthy attitude toward his work and life in general. Occasionally he would lose his temper and quarrel violently with his mother. When he did so, she would burst into tears, and Konstantin would be overcome promptly by feelings of remorse.

Konstantin was not the only unbalanced individual on the Sorin estate. Another was Masha, the daughter of Pyotr Sorin's manager, who was as hopelessly in love with Konstantin as he was with Nina. Although she was only a young girl, she dressed habitually in black—in mourning, as she said, for her chronic unhappiness. Semyon Medvedenko, the schoolmaster, was in love with her, but he had only twenty-three roubles a month on which to support his mother, two sisters, and a brother. After two years, giving up all hope that Konstantin would ever notice her, Masha decided to marry Semyon. She bore him a child, but she was so indifferent to it that the schoolmaster had to take care of the baby in addition to his other responsibilities.

Konstantin, like most young writers, knew many people who were willing to offer him advice on how he should write, and what he should write about. Among these advisers was Yevgeny Dorn, the local doctor, who had never written a line in his life, but who had theories about how it should be done. His idea was that Konstantin spent entirely too much time worrying about literary form, whereas literature was not a matter of form, good or bad, but of spontaneous ideas. Another dispenser of advice was the old man, Pyotr Sorin. He suggested that his nephew write a story called The Man Who Wished, based on Sorin's own life. He maintained that when he was young he had wished to become an author, but had failed. Then he wanted to become an orator, but he spoke abominably. Finally he wanted to marry, but he never did. When Sorin was reminded that he also wished to become State Councilor and succeeded, he roared with laughter, claiming that he had achieved the post without any effort of his own.

But the most complete analysis of the writer's art was made by the novelist, Trigorin. One day, while he was taking notes on the personal habits of the neurotic Masha, he was interrupted by Nina, who expressed the view that a writer's life must be a very fascinating one. He told her that writing was merely a violent obsession which lays hold of a man and places him on a treadmill from which there is no escape. Against his will, almost, the writer of fiction was compelled to utilize everything in his experience for his next story. Even the seemingly trivial incident of the seagull which Konstantin had shot, Trigorin viewed as material for a story. He began to see Nina herself as the seagull and himself as the hunter. He realized that Madame Arkadin would be furiously jealous of his interest in the younger woman. Fate played into his hands when Nina promised to run away from home and join him in Moscow.

For nearly a year Nina was Trigorin's mistress in Moscow. After she bore him a child that died, Trigorin deserted her. Even her acting career was unsuccessful, consisting largely of a tour of country towns. All that time Konstantin followed Nina about, but the only encouragement he got was an occasional letter which showed that Nina's spirit was near the breaking point.

At last, worn out and hungry, she came to the Sorin estate, which awakened in her memories of her happy girlhood. Konstantin urged her to stay with him or to allow him to go away with her, but she refused. She had accepted an engagement for the winter with a second-rate repertory company at Eltz, and there she intended to go as the next step in her career as an actress. Out of her suffering she had realized that in any art it was not the honor and glory which mattered—it was perseverance. But Konstantin did not have that kind of strength, and when Nina, the seagull, flew out of his life forever he locked himself in his room and put a bullet through his head.

THE SECOND MRS. TANQUERAY

Type of work: Drama

Author: Arthur Wing Pinero (1855-1934)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The 1890's

Locale: London and Surrey, England

First presented: 1893

Principal characters:

AUBREY TANQUERAY, a London socialite

CAYLEY DRUMMLE, his friend

PAULA, Aubrey's second wife

ELLEAN, Aubrey's daughter by a former marriage

CAPTAIN HUGH ARDALE, Ellean's suitor

Mrs. ALICE CORTELYON, the Tanquerays' neighbor in Surrey

Critique:

Because of Pinero's departure from certain aspects of the "well-made" play of that period, The Second Mrs. Tanqueray is considered by many to be the first truly modern English play. Presenting a genuine social problem, this drama pictures people as they really are by reason of their social prejudices and the difficulties arising from those biases. Other contributions which this play made to realistic English drama were the dramatist's use of actual place names in London and Surrey, the more logically motivated action, and the exactness of stage directions and sets.

The Story:

Aubrey Tanqueray, a wealthy widower, was to be married to Paula Ray, a woman younger than he and of questionable character. Aubrey's first wife had not contributed a great deal to his happiness. A child had been born to the Tanquerays shortly before the first Mrs. Tanqueray died of a fever, the only warmth, in the opinion of one of Aubrey's friends, ever to have come to the woman's body. The child, nineteen-year-old Ellean had spent most of her life in a convent and was planning to take final vows.

Cayley Drummle, a friend, discussed with Aubrey the inadvisability of marriage between different social classes; but Aubrey, intent upon having warmth and companionship in his home life, was resolute in his determination to marry Paula.

Aubrey had momentary misgivings, however, when Paula appeared late at night at his apartment. Such conduct did not become a lady, Aubrey charged; it would cause talk among the servants. Paula's opinion, indicative of her treatment of domestics, was that servants were merely machines to do chores and to appear for testimony in the divorce courts. But despite her glib pretenses, Paula, too, felt somewhat unsure about the social abyss which she and Aubrey were attempting to bridge. While she went to put on her cloak, Aubrey, reminded by his servant that he had not opened the day's mail, read a letter from Ellean in which she told him that she had communed with the spirit of her mother, who had admonished her to return to Aubrey in his loneliness. Perplexed, he was unable to foresee happiness between his daughter and his wife-to-be.

Two months after their marriage the unhappiness of the Tanquerays in their domestic life was apparent to all their friends. Paula was bored with the inactivity of country life at Aubrey's house in Surrey. He was apprehensive over Ellean's and Paula's incompatibility. Both wondered why their neighbors did not call on them.

Ellean, after her arrival, became a barrier between her father and step-mother because of her life in the convent. Although Aubrey tried to throw the two women together, they soon showed that they had nothing in common. When Cayley Drummle, visiting on an adjoining estate, came for a call, he was the confidant of both Paula, who expressed her wishes for the life she had known before her marriage, and of Aubrey, in his expressions of keen disappointment over Ellean's lack of interest in meeting eligible young men.

Benevolent Drummle encouraged Mrs. Cortelyon, his hostess and Aubrey's long-time friend, to call on Paula. Although Aubrey saw through Drummle's efforts, he appreciated Mrs. Cortelyon's visit and her invitation to have Ellean as her guest in Paris during the Easter vacation.

Paula resented Mrs. Cortelyon's attentions to Ellean, who made no attempt to conceal her preference for a member of her father's social set. Mrs. Cortelyon made the situation more awkward when she courteously and straightforwardly told Paula that her memories of Aubrey's first wife could never be erased by the presence of another woman in the Tanqueray house.

Feeling excluded from her husband's life, Paula spitefully sent a letter to Sir George and Lady Orreyed, the latter a friend of Paula's in her former way of life. Aubrey had earlier forbidden an invitation to the Orreyeds because he did not wish to have Ellean associating with people as boisterous and unconventional as they were.

Ellean went to Paris with Mrs. Cortelyon, and the Orreyeds came to visit the Tanquerays. During their visit they insulted their host and hostess because of the limited supply of liquors, broke furniture in the heat of a marital squabble, and lolled about in unbecoming positions. Their crudeness was offensive to Paula, but having invited them she could not, under the circumstances, ask them to leave; she could only hate them.

Although Aubrey's purpose in marrying Paula had been partly to show her kindness, he was unable to do so because Paula, always on the defensive, would not accept his attentions. Drummle, having known Paula in her former situation, was seemingly capable of mellowing her. It was he who, on learning that Paula had intercepted letters from Mrs. Cortelyon and Ellean to Aubrey, convinced her that such conduct was only breeding much of the unhappiness that she was enduring.

Paula gave the letters to Aubrey, who forgave her maliciousness in keeping the correspondence from him. After Aubrey told her of his disappointment and frequent embarrassment because of her common jokes and paltry cynicism, Paula admitted that she had not been fair to him and Ellean, and she asked for another chance to prove herself when Ellean should return from Paris and London.

Mrs. Cortelyon and Ellean returned soon afterward, the older woman anxious because she had not heard from Aubrey regarding his reaction to Ellean's romance with Captain Hugh Ardale. The courtship had been the subject of the letters Paula had intercepted.

Deeply in love with Ardale, a British soldier stationed in India, Ellean approached Paula to share the story of her good fortune. Paula repulsed Ellean at first, saying that the girl was being kind only because she was soon to be married. Then, after confessing her bitter jealousy, Paula and Ellean were reconciled, and Paula was happy in Ellean's new-found happiness.

Ardale, who had accompanied Ellean and Mrs. Cortelyon home from Paris, came to the Tanqueray house from a nearby hotel. Paula, after telling Ellean that she and Ardale had met before, said that she wanted to talk with him about Ellean. Alone, Paula and Ardale recalled the time when she had been his mistress. When Paula told him that Aubrey must be informed of Ardale's past, Ardale threatened suicide if Paula interfered to prevent his marriage to Ellean.

Told of Paula and Ardale's past relations, Aubrey would not allow Ellean to see Ardale again. Shocked by her father's attitude, Ellean guessed that Paula had influenced Aubrey against Ardale. When Ellean pressed Paula for an explanation, Paula could not bring herself to divulge her past life to her stepdaughter. Ellean then told Paula that she could surmise what Paula had told Aubrey and that she had known from their first meeting that Paula was not a good woman.

Ardale sent a note to Paula, telling her that he was going back to Paris to await any word that she or Aubrey would want him to have, and asking that they explain the situation to Ellean. After Aubrey had read the note, at Paula's request, they discussed philosophically what the future might hold for them together. Paula said that the only great distances in the world were those that people carry within themselves, the distances that separate husbands and wives, and she predicted that Aubrey would tire of her in the future.

Drummle returned to discuss with Aubrey the affair of Ellean and Ardale. As the men talked, Ellean appeared and asked her father to go quickly to Paula. The girl told Drummle that when she had gone to Paula's room to apologize for her unkind remarks, she had heard a body falling. Entering the room, she had found Paula dying. Ellean said that she, in her unkindness, had helped to kill Paula.

Critique:

The Second Shepherds' Play belongs to that group of mystery plays which make up the Wakefield cycle. This cycle of religious dramas, presented on Corpus Christi Day in Wakefield during the Middle Ages, is also known as the Towneley cycle, from the name of the family in whose library the manuscripts were found. Within the cycle is a group of extraordinarily fine plays which were probably written in the fifteenth century by one unknown dramatist. In his plays, notable for their excellent craftsmanship, satirical dialogue, boisterous humor, and sheer exuberance are mixed neatly with serious situations. The Second Shepherds' Play, which contains a short scene of adoration but more rough comedy than anything else, is an excellent example of the curious juxtaposition of the serious and the comic which the unknown playwright carried off so well, with no regard for propriety or theatrical convention.

The Story:

On the night of Christ's birth a cold and lonely shepherd stood in the countryside near Bethlehem watching his flocks and bemoaning his lot in life. He was joined by another shepherd, who added his lamentations to those of the first and pointed out that his lot was worse because he was married. The second shepherd complained that his wife, a fat, shrewish person, had once been a sweet and charming girl, but that marriage had changed her.

While they grumbled, a third shepherd joined them. His chief complaint was the weather, for he thought that never, since Noah's flood, had the season been so bad. To ease their unhappy lot, the three began to sing a song.

After they had sung, Mak came into the field to join them. Mak was not very welcome, for he had a reputation as a thief and the shepherds were somewhat fearful that he would steal something from them. But Mak, begging them to let him stay, told a sad story of being hungry and unwelcome at home, even though he worked hard to give his wife what she wanted. The three shepherds gave in and bade him lie down and spend the night with them.

After the three shepherds had fallen asleep, Mak arose and made ready to steal a sheep, first casting a spell over the shepherds to keep them from awakening. He went to the fold, selected a fat ewe, and made off with it to his house. Not daring to kill the sheep, lest the noise make the theft known, Mak and his wife Gill decided to hide the sheep in the cradle if anyone came. In the meantime Mak went back to finish out his night's sleep with the shepherds, thus trying to hide his own guilt.

The next morning Mak awakened with the shepherds, made them note that he was taking nothing with him, and started off toward his home. Not long after he arrived there the shepherds, who had missed their ewe, went to Mak's house to see if he or his wife had stolen the animal. According to plan, Mak and Gill hid the sheep in the cradle, and Gill pretended to have given birth to a son the night before. Although the accusers hunted all over the house, they found no sign of the sheep, not even a morsel of meat. After asking Mak's pardon and bidding good health to the new child in the cradle, the shepherds left. Scarcely had they gone when they remembered they had left no gifts for the baby. They returned to the house to offer a little gift and, when they looked in the cradle, discovered their stolen sheep. Mak and Gill tried to explain the presence of the sheep by telling how an evil spirit had taken their child and replaced it with the ewe. The shepherds, not taken in by the story, tossed Mak in a sheet for punishment and then departed with their sheep.

When the shepherds returned to the fields, an angel appeared to them and told them of the birth of the Saviour, who would overthrow the devil and restore the glory which had been lost to man through Adam's fall. The shepherds, following the commands of the angel, made ready to visit the Christ child as it lay in a manger in Bethlehem, only a short distance away. They considered themselves lucky to have an opportunity to see the Messiah, prophesied in ages past.

Upon their arrival in Bethlehem, having been led by the star, the three shepherds went to the stable where Mary and the Child were housed. The first shepherd, after greeting both the Mother and the Child, offered his gift of a bob of cherries. The second shepherd, not to be outdone as a giver of gifts, made a little speech filled with respect and gave the Child a little bird to play with. The third shepherd also made a little speech of reverence and then gave his gift, a ball. He urged the Child to grow up and play at tennis.

After they had given their gifts, the shepherds were thanked by Mary for the presents they had brought and the reverence they had done. She also bade them spread the news of the Christ when they left. The three shepherds then departed to sing the good tidings to the world.

Critique:

To Jane Austen, there were people of sense and people of fine sensibilities but little sense. In this novel of nineteenth-century English life she makes it quite clear that she admires men and women of sense. The story and setting are typical of Jane Austen, with the heroine having to overcome many difficulties in order to achieve happiness and success. Although the dialogue of this early novel may seem stilted at times and the characters overdrawn, they combine to give a clear picture of the manners of upper and middle-class English society of that period.

The Story:

When Mr. John Dashwood inherited his father's estate, it was his intention to provide comfortably for his stepmother and his half-sisters. His wife Fanny, however, had other ideas, and even though she was independently wealthy she cleverly prevented her husband from helping his relatives. When Fanny's brother, Edward Ferrars, began to show interest in John's half-sister Elinor, Fanny, determined to prevent any alliance between them, made life so uncomfortable for the older Mrs. Dashwood and her daughters that those ladies accepted the offer of their relative, Sir John Middleton, to occupy a cottage on his estate.

Mrs. Dashwood, Elinor, and Marianne were happy in the cottage at Barton Park. There they met Colonel Brandon, Sir John's friend, who was immediately attracted to Marianne. She, considering him old at the age of thirty-five, rejected his suit and fell in love with John Willoughby, a young man visiting wealthy relatives on a neighboring estate.

Once, while all the friends were preparing for an outing, Colonel Brandon was called away in a mysterious fashion. Elinor and Marianne were surprised later to hear that he had a daughter; at least that was the rumor they heard. Willoughby seemed determined to give Marianne a bad impression of Colonel Brandon, a fact which did not make Elinor happy. Shortly after the colonel's sudden departure, Willoughby himself left very suddenly, without giving Marianne a satisfactory explanation. Elinor could not help being concerned about the manner of his departure, particularly since he had not made a definite engagement with Marianne.

A week later Edward Ferrars appeared at the cottage for a visit. In spite of Elinor's attraction to him, Edward seemed no more than mildly interested in her. After a short stay he left the cottage without saying anything to give Elinor hope.

Meanwhile Sir John had invited to his home Miss Lucy Steele and her sister, two young ladies whom Elinor thought vulgar and ignorant. She was therefore stunned when Lucy told her that she was secretly engaged to Edward Ferrars, whom she had met while he was a pupil of Lucy's uncle. According to Lucy's story, they had been engaged for four years, but Edward's mother would not permit him to marry. Since Edward had no money of his own and no occupation, they were forced to wait for Mrs. Ferrars' consent before they could announce their engagement. Elinor, concealing her unhappiness at this news, told Lucy that she would help in any way she could.

A short time later Elinor and Marianne were invited to London to visit friends. Marianne immediately wrote to Willoughby that she was near. Although she wrote two or three times, she had no reply. One day she met him at a party. He was with another young lady and treated Marianne courteously but coolly. The next morning Marianne received a letter from him telling her that he was sorry if she had misunderstood his intentions and that he had long been engaged to another girl. All of her friends and relatives were furious with Willoughby. Even though she was heartbroken, Marianne continued to defend him and to believe that he was blameless. She was comforted by Colonel Brandon, who was also in London.

Privately, the colonel told Elinor Willoughby's story. The colonel had a ward, the young girl believed by some to be his daughter, who was in reality the daughter of his brother's divorced wife. When the colonel had had to leave Barton Park so suddenly, he had learned that his ward had been seduced and then abandoned by Willoughby. Elinor gave this news to Marianne, who received it with such sorrow that Elinor feared for her health. Colonel Brandon continued to be kind to Marianne, and it was obvious to everyone that he loved her.

The girls continued their stay in London, and a little later their brother John and his wife Fanny took a house there. When the Misses Steele also arrived in town for a visit, Edward's mother learned at last that he and Lucy were engaged. Angry, she settled what would have been Edward's inheritance on her other son, Robert, and Edward and Lucy were left with no means of support. He planned to study for the ministry, and Elinor arranged with Colonel Brandon for Edward to become a curate on his estate so that Edward and Lucy could be married.

Before Elinor and Marianne returned home, they visited Cleveland, an estate between London and Barton Park. There Marianne became ill with a heavy cold. Because she was anxious to see her mother, Colonel Brandon went for Mrs. Dashwood. Before they returned, Willoughby, having heard of Marianne's illness, called at the house. He told Elinor that he had treated Marianne shamefully because he had no money of his own and because his wealthy relative had learned of his treatment of Colonel Brandon's ward and as a result had refused to give him an allowance. Consequently, he had married a wealthy girl and renounced Marianne. He said that he still loved Marianne and wished her to know his story so that she would not think harshly of him.

Marianne recovered from her illness and returned home with her mother and Elinor. There Elinor told her Willoughby's story. Marianne continued to sorrow for him, but she no longer loved him.

After their return Elinor learned from a servant that Edward and Lucy had been married. Soon Edward appeared at the cottage and told the Dashwoods that the unscrupulous Lucy had married his brother instead, after their mother had disinherited Edward in favor of Robert. Edward had come to ask Elinor to marry him, and he had no trouble in gaining her consent, as well as that of her mother. It remained only for him to secure a living. He went to London to seek his mother's forgiveness. Because Mrs. Ferrars also had scorned her son Robert after his marriage to Lucy, she felt a need for affection from one of her children. After much weeping and pleading, which failed to move Edward in his determination to marry Elinor, Mrs. Ferrars gave her consent to the wedding. After their marriage they moved into the parsonage promised Edward by Colonel Brandon some months before.

The colonel continued his quiet and friendly courtship of Marianne. At last she recognized his gentleness and kindness and they were married. When they moved to his estate, the two sisters were near each other once more. Fanny and John were so pleased to be related to the colonel that Fanny even forgave Edward for marrying Elinor. Mrs. Dashwood was delighted at the good fortune of her children, and the families lived in peace and contentment for all of their lives.

SEVEN AGAINST THEBES

Type of work: Drama

Author: Aeschylus (525-456 B.C.)

Type of plot: Classical tragedy

Time of plot: Remote antiquity

Principal characters:

ETEOCLES, King of Thebes

POLYNICES, his brother

ANTIGONE, and

ISMENE, their sisters

A SPY

THEBAN WOMEN, the chorus

Critique:

In this severely simple drama, in which all the action is described by messengers, Aeschylus presented the third and closing episode in the tragic legend of the royal house of Thebes. The plays dealing with the fate of Laius and of his son Oedipus, have, unfortunately, not come down to us, but in the surviving drama the deaths of Eteocles and his brother Polynices, sons of Oedipus and grandsons of Laius, culminated three generations of violence, bloodshed, and agony which arose from Laius' ingratitude to Pelops. The delineation of the character of Eteocles in this play marked in Greek tragedy a new departure which was to be perfected by Sophocles and Euripides.

The Story:

After the ruin and exile of Oedipus, King of Thebes, his sons, Eteocles and Polynices, fell into open dispute, each brother claiming supreme authority in the city. The quarrel led to a bloody civil war, in which Eteocles was victorious. Banished from Thebes, Polynices went to Argos. There he mustered an army, led by six famous Argive heroes, for the purpose of returning and recapturing the city, which was restless under his brother's rule.

Thebes was besieged with the Argive warriors camped about its walls. Eteocles, consulting a seer, learned that his brother's army was planning to make a surprise night attack and under cover of darkness scale the walls and overwhelm the defenders. Eteocles exhorted all Theban men, young and old, to stand bravely at their posts and to repel the attackers.

While he was speaking, a spy reported to Eteocles that Polynices and his Argives had sworn to raze the city, their vows made with clasps of hands stained by blood dripping from the head of an ox sacrificed in solemn ritual. The spy also brought word that Polynices and the six Argive heroes had drawn lots to determine the city gates against which each of the seven would lead his band of attackers.

Upon hearing the spy's report, the Theban women called upon the gods and goddesses to protect Cadmus' sacred city from the onslaught of the besiegers. Eteocles rebuked the frightened women and declared that they were wasting their time with appeals to the gods at a time of imminent peril. He asserted that the Thebans must depend on their own courage and strength, not upon the unpredictable gods. Angrily he dismissed the women to attend to their children and weaving; they were to leave all other matters to their husbands and fathers.

Eteocles then chose the six outstanding warriors of Thebes who would, with himself, defend the seven gates of the city against the seven Achæan warriors who had sworn each to take a gate of the city by storm. The king chose the defending heroes carefully. Theban Melanippus would oppose Argive Tydeus; Polyphontes, Capaneus; Megareus, Eteocles of Argos; Hyperbius, Hippomedon; Actor, Parthenopæus, and Lasthenes, Ampharaus. Because Polynices himself was to be the seventh hero leading the attack against the seventh gate, Eteocles announced that he would stand as his brother's opponent. Their combat, prince against prince, brother against brother, would determine for all time the destiny of their ill-fated house.

Hearing his heated words, the Theban women again began their wailing lament and warned him against the sin of fratricide. But Eteocles, well aware of the blood bath that his family had already suffered because of the curse of Pelops on Laius, his grandfather, ignored the city matrons. Defying the fickle gods, he declared that he was determined to remain King of Thebes, even if his brother's death must be the price of his crown.

At Eteocles' mention of the curse upon his house, the Theban women deplored the sad story of Laius. Already cursed by Pelops, whose hospitality he had desecrated, Laius had been warned by Apollo that he would prosper only if he sired no child. In spite of the warning, however, he had fathered a son, Oedipus. Later the child was abandoned in the wilderness, where he was saved from death by the intervention of an old household servant and reared to manhood by a good shepherd. Oedipus, in turn, defied prophecies of disaster and doom when he, unaware of his true identity, murdered Laius, his father, and subsequently married Jocasta, his mother. Two of the children of their ill-starred union were Eteocles and Polynices, whose rivalry had caused untold suffering in Thebes. The women wept when they recalled the years of strife and trouble that had been brought upon their city by the doomed line of Cadmus.

Meanwhile the brazen clamor of arms and the shouts of men sounded in the distance; the attack had begun. While the women waited to learn the outcome of the assault, a messenger brought word that the defenders had beaten back the Argive warriors at six of the seven gates. The city had been saved, he announced, but in the fighting at the seventh gate Eteocles and Polynices had both been slain.

At the height of the attack, when the battle was fiercest, the brothers had killed each other, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Oedipus that his sons would share glory by iron, that is to say, by the sword, not by gold. The only land over which they would rule would be the grave, and the soil that had called them masters was now red with their blood.

The bodies of Eteocles and Polynices were carried into the city in preparation for their burial. Antigone and Ismene, sisters of the dead princes, mourned their violent deaths, while the Theban women sang a mournful dirge for the tragic ending of a great family, cursed by the gods but defiant of the doom forecast years ago and now unhappily fulfilled.

In the midst of their laments a herald appeared to announce the decision of the Theban senate. Eteocles, the city fathers had decreed, had been his country's friend; as such, his body was to receive final burial rites and to be interred within the royal tomb. Men would remember him as his city's champion and savior. Polynices, on the other hand, had sowed dissension and civil strife. Demanding fit punishment for his crimes against the state, the senate had proclaimed that his body should be thrown outside the city gates, where dogs and ravens could feast upon his flesh.

Antigone imperiously defied the city fathers. If no one else would give her brother a burial befitting his rank, she declared, she herself would bury him. It was her opinion, since he was the older son and therefore rightful heir to the throne, that he had been no more right and no more wrong than Eteocles had been in his beliefs and deeds.

Her brave defiance brought many sympathizing citizens to her side. Some declared that laws often changed and what is one day right is often wrong tomorrow. The others, surrounding the corpse of Eteocles, maintained that they would obey the decree of the senate. In that division of public opinion more troubles were forecast for the unhappy city.

LAYEVILLE, an English explorer

JOACHIM VON WALD, an Austrian geologist

MONSIEUR DE LA SCAZE, a wealthy Frenchman

Critique:

The mystery of the Orient floods the pages of The Seven Who Fled: its resignation, its cruelty, its passive strength, and its subtle lure for the Occidental. Starting at the extreme western edge of China, the scenes of the novel are wide in range. Seven Europeans, assembled by chance at Kashgar, are set adrift to brave an alien East. Prokosch sketches their adventures in seven separate stories, giving his narrative a degree of unity by the use of a prologue and an epilogue. These Europeans are fleeing more than a revolutionary disturbance when they join a Chinese caravan for their flight across central Asia. Purposeless and disillusioned, they are running away, not only from themselves but from Europe itself, the shaper of their barren and frustrated lives. Their personal fates dramatize the fates of their different countries, and their common doom hints at the death of a continent. This vivid contrast between the ancient Asiatic landscape and the bewildered, frightened modern man gives Prokosch's novel a quality of thoughtfulness and significance which only deepens its verbal beauty.

The Story:

Late one September night, a caravan crossed a dried river bed and approached Aqsu from the direction of Kashgar. The members of the party were Dr. Liu, a wealthy and cultured Chinese merchant who had hired the caravan; seven Europeans, including one woman, whom he had permitted to join it, and a dozen or more Turki porters. The Europeans had been forced to leave Kashgar because of disturbances in Sinkiang Province. Before them lay an arduous, danger-filled journey of two thousand miles eastward to Shanghai.

Their troubles started early, at Aqsu. Local authorities mysteriously imprisoned the two young geologists, Wildenbruch and von Wald, the German and the Austrian. Two others were detained as hostages, the huge Russian Serafimov and the scarred, wiry Belgian, Goupillière. The remaining three were permitted to move on with Dr. Liu, but wealthy de la Scaze developed a fever and also stayed behind. His young and beautiful Spanish wife went on with the caravan, as did Layeville, the handsome English explorer. Layeville, inured to hardship, withstood imperturbably the rigors of desert heat and distance. The camels were less enduring; and finally, with only four of them left, the party was forced to halt. Fortunately, two caravans soon came into view, one headed eastward and the other toward Tibet. Dr. Liu and Olivia de la Scaze joined the former; but Layeville, to their astonishment, turned back toward Tibet. After weeks of travel his caravan, misled by a treacherous Tibetan, became hopelessly lost. Among the icy peaks which symbolized something remotely beckoning and unattainable, Layeville awaited calmly the experience he had been half-consciously seeking—death.

Back in Aqsu, the hulking Russian exile began his interminable wait in the crowded caravanserais. Patient at first, Serafimov soon began to be tortured by physical desire. Hearing of a Russian prostitute who was supposed to possess wit and elegance, he went to her apartment, but she rejected him. Emotional and impulsive, Serafimov daily sank deeper into melancholy brooding. Soon his frustration found an outlet in hatred and jealousy of his cleverer fellow-hostage. Eventually he realized what he had to do—and one dark night, after Goupillière had slipped out to visit Madame Tastin, Serafimov awoke and followed him.

Goupillière had had an unsavory past. Scheming and unscrupulous, his unusual beauty had allowed him to prey on women, robbing them of their virtue and jewels. Murder was added to the dark pattern of his crimes when, in blind fury, he strangled a Parisian grisette who had split his cheek with a pair of scissors. In new-found fear he fled to Saigon—where he met de la Scaze and his wife—and thence to Kashgar and Aqsu. At Aqsu his ability to torment the clumsy Russian had afforded Goupillière malicious pleasure. Now, however, the discovery of the menace lurking in Serafimov's eyes was turning the Belgian's amusement into fright. One night, coming from Madame Tastin's, Goupillière found the Russian waiting. A short flight, a game of frantic hide-and-seek in the dark, and he felt vast hands closing upon his throat.

Meanwhile Wildenbruch, with his Austrian companion, was still in prison. With Germanic thoroughness he exercised, he counted passers-by, he kept a journal. Finally the vigilance of the guards relaxed, and the prisoners escaped. After fleeing all night, they sighted a caravan which carried them into Mongolia and there abandoned them. However, they were befriended by an old Russian, Mordvinov, who installed them in one of his two huts and helped them through the winter. During their stay in that frozen wasteland Wildenbruch began to cough, and occasionally he found his handkerchief stained with blood. The discovery sent a chill of dismay through him, for his mother had died of tuberculosis.

Young von Wald did not find the long Mongolian winter irksome, although he was concerned at his friend's intermittent illness. High-spirited and hopeful, he attempted to encourage the despondent Wildenbruch. With the approach of spring they decided to resume, once more, their eastward journey. Taking affectionate leave of Mordvinov, they traveled on foot for a few days until they reached a main road and fell in with a caravan of cattle and donkeys. Time passed and they reached the coast, with Wildenbruch wildly anxious to sail for Germany; but von Wald, entranced with the East, decided to remain in Shanghai.

Shanghai was also the end of the trail for Olivia de la Scaze. Earlier, she had accepted Dr. Liu's hospitable invitation to break her difficult journey at his luxurious home in Lu-chow. It soon became clear, however, that he had no intention of allowing her to leave. Alarmed, she escaped one night and boarded a junk for Shanghai. During the voyage she became feverish and listless, no longer caring what happened to her or that the Chinese captain and his handsome young pilot were obviously treating her as their virtual captive. Upon reaching Shanghai, she made no resistance when she was led into the street of the prostitutes and placed in a brothel.

A similar resignation to destiny had seized Olivia's husband, recuperating at Aqsu. His money ran low, but he made no effort to depart. Realizing that he had never utilized his powers of observation and understanding, he began to immerse himself in the sights and sounds of the East. The climax of his experience was reached when a beautiful dancing-girl came to his apartment—but she brought with her the contagion of cholera. When de la Scaze fell ill, he made his way, like the natives, to the Dying Field. There he awaited, almost joyously, the purification of death.

A final three-cornered encounter took place in Shanghai. After saying goodbye to Wildenbruch, Joachim von Wald strolled back from the docks into the city. Resting at a café, he saw two people emerging from a doorway across the street. One was a prostitute, black-haired and beautifully shaped; she was Spanish, von Wald decided. Her companion was a huge Russian—Serafimov. A vague recollection stirred the Austrian, and he exchanged a few words with the man. Then they parted, and von Wald walked thoughtfully onward through the tangled maze of Shanghai streets.

THE SEVEN WHO WERE HANGED

Type of work: Novel

Author: Leonid Andreyev (1871-1919)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: Early twentieth century

Locale: Russia

First published: 1908

Principal characters:

SERGEY GOLOVIN,

VASILY KASHIRIN,

TANYA KOVALCHUK,

MUSYA, and

WERNER, revolutionists

IVAN YANSON, and

TSIGANOK GOLUBETS, two condemned men

Critique:

In a letter granting permission for The Seven Who Were Hanged to be translated from the Russian, Andreyev stated clearly his purpose in writing the novel. It was to expose capital punishment as a horrible crime, no matter what the provocation. In this novel the writer shows us the mind of each of the seven who were condemned. To Andreyev, each had something in his character or in his background which justified his actions, and so the novelist's sympathy was with the doomed ones. It is a powerful story, probably the most important contribution Andreyev made to the literature of Russia and of the world. Once read, the story of The Seven Who Were Hanged is difficult to forget.

The Story:

When the police informed a powerful minister that there was a plot to assassinate him, he was terrified. But the police assured him that he would be given ample protection; they knew who the terrorists were and would arrest them.

As good as their word, the police seized three men and two women, young people ranging in age from nineteen to twenty-eight. A large amount of dynamite was also found. The evidence was so damaging that the prisoners knew they would be sentenced to hang. The trial was swift, and the five revolutionists were imprisoned until the time of their execution, two days hence.

In the same prison were two other condemned men who had been waiting about two weeks for their execution. One was Ivan Yanson, a peasant workman. He was an Estonian who spoke Russian poorly and talked little. His ignorance had made him cruel. Since there were no humans on whom he could vent his rage, he regularly beat the animals under his care. Frequently he drank too much, and then his cruelty to animals was worse than usual. Once he had tried to make love to another servant, but he was so repulsive looking that she had rejected him. One night Yanson entered the room where his master was sleeping and stabbed him to death. He then tried to rape his mistress but she escaped him. While attempting to flee with some money he had stolen, he was seized, tried, and sentenced to hang.

At first he wanted the time before his execution to pass quickly. Then, as the time grew shorter, he began to tell his guards that he did not want to die, that he did not understand why he should be hanged. Yanson had no one to love or believe in. Partly stupefied by fear, he was unable to take in much of what had happened to him.

The other condemned man was Tsiganok Golubets, a robber and murderer who took brutal pride in his accomplishments. At times, completely mad, he would get down on all fours and howl like a wolf. Then for a time he would be quiet. What little time remained of his life was meaningless to him, for he knew only how to rob and kill and these pleasures had now been taken away.

The five revolutionists had each determined not to show fear. But when Sergey Golovin's father and mother visited him in his cell, he could no longer be brave and he cried. Sergey was young and life was strong in him; he found it hard to understand that he was soon to die.

Only Vasily Kashirin's mother came to see him, for his father was not interested in seeing his son again. Vasily, who had long ago lost respect for his parent, had no regrets about not seeing his father. Even his mother meant little to him; there was really no one he would hate to leave when he died. While he waited for his execution he showed no signs of fear.

It was not for herself but for her comrades that Tanya Kovalchuk worried. The fact that she too was to die had no meaning for her; she was concerned only for the discomfort and fears of her children, as she called the others. She loved them all.

Musya knew that she would not completely die when she was hanged. She would join the martyrs whom she admired so much, and her name would live forever. She had only one regret; she had done nothing significant enough to justify her martyrdom. But she consoled herself with the thought that she had been on the threshold of great deeds. She thought that she had conquered her captors, for the fact that they were going to kill her proved that they feared her. Musya eagerly awaited her execution.

The man called Werner had long been developing a contempt for mankind and was tired of life. There was no one whom he could respect and admire; he was cold and superior even to his comrades. But in his cell he suddenly developed a love for humanity in his realization of man's progress from his animal state. Loving and pitying his fellow men, Werner felt more freedom in his prison cell than he had ever known outside. It had been a long time since he had felt sympathy for other men; the feeling was a good one.

On the day of their execution the five were allowed to talk together for a short time. They were almost afraid to look at one another, each not wanting to see fear in a comrade's face. Vasily could not control his emotions. The others, particularly Tanya, urged him to be calm and not to allow their guards to see his fear.

When the time came for the execution, Yanson and Golubets joined them. Yanson was still babbling about not wanting to be hanged. Golubets retained his arrogance and made a joke about dying. Transferred to a train, they were allowed to sit together until they reached their destination. Musya was happy to see that Werner had lost his scorn for his brothers. As they drew nearer their final stop, she smiled; soon she would join those whom she admired so much.

On their arrival, Yanson had to be carried from the coach. Golubets wanted to attack the guards. The night was cold and often they slipped in the snow as they marched toward the scaffold. All refused the services of a priest who was present. They all kissed one another goodbye and walked in pairs to the ropes. Sergey and Vasily went first, Vasily outwardly calm and in control of himself. At the last minute Golubets was frightened and asked to go with one of the five brave ones. Musya took his hand, kissed him, and they followed Sergey and Vasily. Musya's hand calmed Golubets; he was arrogant again as he climbed the steps. Werner took Yanson with him, but the peasant had to be carried most of the way. Tanya was the last and she went alone. Her children had all gone bravely. She was happy.

After Tanya's drop there was silence for a moment in the wintry night. Then the bodies were taken back over the same road they had traveled a short time before. But only their bodies—their souls were elsewhere.

THE SHEEP WELL

Type of work: Drama

Author: Lope de Vega (Lope Félix de Vega Carpio, 1562-1635)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: 1476

Locale: Spain

First presented: c. 1619

Principal characters:

COMMANDER FERNÁN GÓMEZ DE GUZMÁN, a lustful tyrant
RODRIGO TÉLLEZ GIRÓN, youthful master of the Order of Calatrava
LAURENCIA, a peasant girl sought by the commander
FRONDOSO, a peasant youth in love with Laurencia
ESTERAN, alcalde of Fuente Ovejuna and Laurencia's father
KING FERDINAND AND QUEEN ISABELLA OF SPAIN

Critique:

The Sheep Well, known also under its Spanish title of Fuente Ovejuna, is one of about five hundred plays by Lope de Vega still extant. The surviving work is, however, but a fraction of his total output; he himself estimated that he had written well over eighteen hundred dramas. Lope de Vega, who served his king with the ill-starred Spanish Armada, was the central figure of the great dramatic movement in Spain during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The best of his plays are those, like The Sheep Well, which use peasants as heroes and heroines. Lope de Vega had a sympathy and feeling for those people because they were of the same class from which the dramatist himself had sprung. The Sheep Well, because of its use of the entire population of a Spanish village as the "hero," is sometimes referred to as the first proletarian drama, written some three hundred years before the flood of so-called proletarian literature came out of the Great Depression in the United States.

The Story:

In the troubled Spain of the 1470's, when King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella were trying to integrate their kingdom and preserve it from the depredations of Portugal, the grand mastership of the military and religious Order of Calatrava fell upon the shoulders of Rodrigo Téllez Girón, a young man scarcely out of boyhood. The new grand master's adviser was the lustful, tyrannical Commander Fernán de Guzmán, who took women whenever and wherever he saw them and kept his peasants in constant fear of himself and his soldiers. The commander was not loyal to Ferdinand and Isabella, and so he counseled the young grand master to capture the Ciudad Real and hold it for Portugal, which was claiming sections of Spain through its Spanish queen. The grand master took the commander's advice and captured the city.

When the commander returned to his lands, he continued his tyrannous ways with the peasants, especially the women. Among the unmarried girls was a particularly pretty one named Laurencia, daughter of the alcalde of the village. The commander had sought her for more than a month, but she had managed to elude his servants by staying in the fields as much as possible. Then the commander had left to capture the city. He returned in triumph, and upon his arrival in the village of Fuente Ovejuna he was praised and given two cartloads of foodstuffs as recognition of his military efforts. After receiving the gifts, he requested that the girls, including Laurencia, remain behind to amuse him. The girls, however, refused to stay.

Meanwhile Ferdinand and Isabella had received word of the treacherous action of the grand master of the Order of Calatrava and had dispatched a force to retake the Ciudad Real, lest it be turned over to Portugal.

In the village of Fuente Ovejuna, Laurencia was wooed by a good-looking young peasant, Frondoso, but she refused to accept him as her husband. One day, as she was working in the fields, the commander came upon her and attempted to take her by force. Frondoso, though but a mere peasant, seized the commander's crossbow and threatened to kill the knight unless he let Laurencia go. The commander, faced with no choice, but swearing vengeance, let the girl go free. Frondoso, no fool, fled with the crossbow.

The commander later went to the village and confronted the alcade, Laurencia's father, and demanded that he give up his daughter to him. Esteban refused to act the pander, and he and the other villagers left the commander standing alone in the square. Some of his servants appeared and reported that they thought they had killed Frondoso. Unfortunately, they had cut the throat of the wrong man. As they spoke, a messenger came to inform the commander that the grand master had been besieged by the forces of Ferdinand and Isabella. The commander decided to rush to the grand master's aid.

As they rode away from the village, the commander and his servants tried to force their attentions on several peasant girls. The girls fled until they reached one of the men of the village. When he tried to protect them, the commander had the man disarmed, bound to a tree, and flogged unmercifully with bridle reins. While that was done, the commander seized one of the girls, dragged her into a thicket, and raped her. The soldiers then proceeded on their journey.

During the commander's absence his subject peasants relaxed a bit. In the quiet interval arrangements were made for the wedding of Laurencia and Frondoso, the young peasant who had become dear to her after he had saved her from the commander's lust. But on the very day of the wedding the commander returned and demanded the girl for his own purposes. When her father again refused, the commander had him beaten, and the wedding was broken up by the soldiers. Frondoso was imprisoned to await hanging; Laurencia was taken to the commander's citadel.

The next day the town board assembled in the village hall to discuss what might be done to prevent further acts of violence and rapine by their wicked master. While they debated, Laurencia, who had escaped from the citadel, ran into the hall, where she roused the men and women of the village to open revolt against the commander who had treated them so brutally and ruthlessly. The people, spurred to action by their anger, stormed the citadel. Once inside, they killed many of the soldiers and finally found the commander. They put him to death also and then returned to the village with his head held high upon the point of a spear. Their plan was to leave the head as a symbol of the tyranny they had broken; its site was to be the village square itself. Not really rebels, the villagers hastened to raise the escutcheon of Ferdinand and Isabella in place of the commander's. Their plan was to place themselves at the mercy of the king and queen.

But one of the commander's servants had escaped and carried news of the uprising to the king and queen. The king, anxious to prevent revolt from spreading throughout Spain, dispatched soldiers and a judge to the village of Fuente Ovejuna to investigate the happenings. When word came to the village that a judge was coming, the villagers met and decided to stick together, even to hiding the actual murderers of the commander and his men. It was agreed that the entire village had done the deed and that they would hang together, if need be.

The judge caused the soldiers to bring in villagers for questioning. When the villagers refused to tell who had been the leaders of the revolt or who had actually killed the commander, the judge had them tortured, as was the custom of the time. More than three hundred of the villagers were tortured, including small children, but not one broke their vow to claim that the whole town was responsible for their deeds.

At last the judge and the soldiers returned to the court of Ferdinand and Isabella, where the judge reported that he had made no decision, for in order to punish justly he would have had to wipe out the entire village. He also reported to the king and queen the cruelties of which the commander had been guilty. Villagers he had brought with him to court, pleading with the king and queen, pointed out that they had not rebelled against the crown; they had simply been forced to rid themselves of a tyrannous lord who threatened their very lives and honor. The king, after hearing their stories, pardoned the entire village of Fuente Ovejuna and made it a protectorate of the crown.

THE SHOEMAKER'S HOLIDAY

Type of work: Drama

Author: Thomas Dekker (1570?-1641?)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Reign of Henry V of England

Locale: London and the nearby village of Old Ford

First presented: 1599

Principal characters:

SIMON EYRE, a London shoemaker

HODGE,

FIRE, and

RAFE, his employees

SIR ROGER OTLEY, Lord Mayor of London

ROSE OTLEY, his daughter

SIR HUGH LACY, the Earl of Lincoln

ROWLAND LACY, his nephew

MARGERY, Simon Eyre's wife

JANE, Rafe's wife

Critique:

Thomas Dekker, an Englishman of probable Dutch descent, was a true son of London, as his plays, and especially The Shoemaker's Holiday, attest. Happy in its blending of quasi-history and ordinary London life, this plot contains young lovers, noblemen, solid merchants, artisans, and even a king. Surely the theme and treatment gave the play wide popularity in Dekker's own day. This drama, with its appeal to patriotic instincts, formed part of the Lord Admiral's Men's answer to the popular history plays being written at the moment by Shakespeare, who wrote for the Lord Chamberlain's Men. Dekker derived his plot from a prose tale, The Gentle Craft, published in 1597 by Thomas Deloney.

The Story:

Rose Otley, daughter of the Lord Mayor of London, Sir Roger Otley, and Rowland Lacey, nephew to Sir Hugh Lacy, the Earl of Lincoln, were deeply in love. With evident irony, proud Sir Roger declared to Sir Hugh that he could not presume to have his daughter marry above her station. With equal pride, Sir Hugh ironically countered that because of Rowland's dissolute ways it would be far better for Rose to marry a substantial young London businessman. Rowland, who had toured Europe, where he had learned the shoemaker's trade in Germany, was given a command in the army of King Henry the Fifth, who was preparing to invade France. Sir Hugh wanted Rowland off to France as soon as possible, so that the youth might forget Rose Otley.

But Rowland had other ideas. Claiming pressing business in London, he turned his command over to his cousin, Askew, after promising that he would join his unit in Normandy, if not in Dover.

When the troops assembled to leave London, Simon Eyre, a shoemaker, pleaded to no avail with Rowland to allow Rafe Dampont, his drafted journeyman, to stay home with his new bride, Jane. Rafe, resigned to going to the wars, gave Jane as a farewell gift a pair of shoes that he had made for her.

Meanwhile Rose, confined to her father's house at Old Ford, a London suburb, sent her maid Sybil into the city to seek information about Rowland. Rowland, determined to win Rose, disguised himself as a German shoemaker. Singing a German drinking song, he sought work at Simon Eyre's shop. When Simon refused to consider hiring Rowland, Simon's workmen, charmed by Rowland's broken speech, threatened to leave. Rowland, as Hans Meulter, was taken on.

While hunting near Old Ford, Hammon and Warner, two London citizens, pursued a deer into the Lord Mayor's estate. There they encountered Rose and her maid. Hammon fell in love with Rose and Warner lost his heart to Sybil. Sir Roger, welcoming the young hunters, decided that Hammon was just the man to marry Rose.

Rowland, through his friendship with a German sea captain, speculated in a valuable unclaimed ship's cargo, to the enormous profit of Simon, his employer. As a result of this venture Simon was made an alderman, and the genial shoemaker seemed destined for even greater city honors.

Sir Hugh, meanwhile, had learned from a servant that Rowland was not in France. Ashamed of his nephew, Sir Hugh sent the servant into the city to discover Rowland's whereabouts.

When Hammon confessed his love, Rose at first dismissed him coyly; finally she declared that she intended to remain single. Even though Sir Roger threatened to force Rose into the match, the offended and impatient Hammon returned to the city. In London, Sir Hugh's servant could learn nothing of Rowland's whereabouts, even though he inquired at the shop of Simon Eyre.

Simon, grown affluent and popular, continued to advance upward in political rank. To the amusement of Simon's journeymen, Firk and Hodge, his wife Margery assumed pretentious manners. Rafe, having been wounded in France, returned to London. Seeking his wife, he wept to learn that Jane had left the Eyre household, where she had been a maid to Margery Eyre, and had not been seen since. The Eyres—Simon was now High Sheriff—visited Sir Roger at Old Ford, where Simon's employees, Rowland among them, performed a morris dance. Rose recognized Rowland in spite of his disguise and drank a toast to him.

Jane, also grown quite independent because of her ability as a seamstress, was courted by Hammon. In his desperate attempt to seduce her, he showed her, to her disbelief, Rafe's name on a casualty list from France. Sorrowfully, she promised Hammon that if she ever remarried she would accept his proposal.

Rose, knowing of Rowland's presence in the city, returned to her father's town house and arranged to have Rowland see her on the pretext of fitting a pair of shoes. At the shoe shop, a servant brought in a shoe and ordered that a pair of similar size be made in time for a wedding which was to occur the next day. Rafe recognized the shoe as Jane's; he learned from the servant where the ceremony was to take place.

Roland, as a shoemaker, went to see Rose and talked to her under the eyes of Sir Hugh, who was looking for his nephew, and Sir Roger, who declared to Sir Hugh that he had not seen the young man. When Sybil revealed that Rose meant to marry the German cobbler, Sir Hugh gloated, thinking that Rowland would never be able to marry this middle-class girl. Sir Roger, who secretly had hoped that Rose would marry Sir Hugh's nephew, was furious. At the same time Firk delivered a pair of shoes for Rose and misled the two men into believing that Rose and the German cobbler would marry the next day at the church where Hammon and Jane planned to be married. Sir Hugh, to his alarm, suddenly realized that the cobbler must be his nephew Rowland.

Simon, now Lord Mayor but still his lusty, simple self, declared his gratitude because Rowland had helped him to affluence and promised that he would help the young people to become husband and wife. The next day Dame Eyre accompanied the young couple to the Savoy, while Rafe and his fellow shoemakers, armed with cudgels, encountered Hammon and Jane in front of St. Faith's. Hammon resented the intrusion of the base craftsmen; Jane was filled with misgiving at the sight of Rafe, whom she had believed dead. Hammon patronizingly offered Rafe twenty pounds to relinquish his claims to Jane. Rafe, insulted, would have thrashed Hammon, but he was prevented from doing so by his lameness. Expecting to apprehend Rose and Rowland, Sir Hugh and Sir Roger had waited, too, in front of St. Faith's. Word reached them there that Rose and Rowland had been married at the Savoy.

Lord Mayor Simon Eyre gave a breakfast for all London apprentices; he himself was served by men of his own craft. The king pardoned Rowland and blessed him and Rose. When Sir Hugh and Sir Roger protested the match, the king explained that love was not a respecter of blood. To crown the festivities of Simon's Lord Mayorship, the king granted the shoemakers the privilege of holding two market days a week in the newly-built Leadenhall Market, and accepted Simon's invitation to him to be the guest of honor at a banquet.

SHERLOCK HOLMES, crime investigator

DR. JOHN WATSON, his friend

MARY MORSTAN, a client

THADDEUS SHOLTO, an art collector

JONATHAN SMALL, an escaped convict

Critique:

The stories of Sherlock Holmes need no introduction to lovers of mystery and suspense. In The Sign of Four the master detective chases an elusive treasure and runs into murder. Undaunted by completely baffling clues, spurred on by his friend Dr. Watson, Sherlock unwinds the mystery but modestly gives the credit to the less astute. One of the earliest of his detective story yarns, this brief novel will provide an excellent evening's entertainment.

The Story:

Miss Mary Morstan went to Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson with something of a mystery. Her father, formerly an officer in an Indian regiment, had sent her word from London that she was to meet him at a certain hotel. But when she kept the appointment, her father failed to appear, and he had not been heard from in the ten years elapsed since that time. His only known friend in England had been Major Sholto, a brother officer, but that gentleman had disclaimed any knowledge of Morstan's presence in London. For the past six years Mary Morstan had received one large and valuable pearl on a certain date each year. That morning she had received a note asking her to meet the writer at a certain spot near a theater. She was to bring two friends if she liked, but not the police. Apprehensive and puzzled, she turned to Sherlock Holmes for help.

Sherlock and Dr. Watson eagerly accepted the assignment, Sherlock from a need for excitement and Dr. Watson from a newly kindled love for the young girl. When the three people kept the appointment at the theater, they were met by a coachman who drove them some distance and then deposited them in front of a house in a long row of new, dreary houses of the same design. Inside they were met by Dr. Thaddeus Sholto, the son of Major Sholto, who told them a strange and frightening story which their father had told him and his twin brother shortly before the major died.

In India, Morstan and Major Sholto had come upon a large fortune which Sholto had brought back to England. When Morstan arrived in London, where he had planned to meet his daughter, he had called on Major Sholto. In a disagreement over the division of the treasure Morstan, stricken by a heart attack, fell and struck his head a mortal blow. Fearing that he would be accused of murder, Major Sholto had with the help of a servant disposed of the body. On his deathbed Major Sholto had wanted to make restitution to Morstan's daughter and had called his twin sons to his side to tell them where the treasure was hidden. But as he was about to reveal the hiding place, he saw a horrible face staring in the window, and he died before he could disclose his secret.

On the following morning his sons found the room ransacked and on the dead man's chest a piece of paper bearing the words "The Sign of Four." The two brothers differed over their responsibility to Mary Morstan, Thaddeus wanting to help her and his twin wanting to keep everything for themselves should the treasure be found. It was Thaddeus who had sent her the pearl each year, their father having taken the pearls out of the treasure chest before he died.

The day before his meeting with Mary, Sherlock Holmes, and Dr. Watson, Thaddeus had learned that his brother had found the treasure chest in a sealed-off portion of the attic in their father's house. Thaddeus declared his intention to take Mary and the two men to his brother and force him to give the girl her share of the wealth. When they arrived at the brother's house, however, they found him murdered and the treasure gone. It was a baffling case, for the door to his room was locked from the inside and the wall to the window impossible to scale. But Sherlock found certain clues which led him to believe there had been two accomplices, one of whom had pulled the other up through a trap-door in the roof. He also ascertained that one of the men had a wooden leg and the other exceedingly small feet.

During the ten years since Morstan's death there had been found various notes with the names of four men on them, the only English name being that of Jonathan Small. Many of the notes were signed "The Sign of Four," the words which had been written on the paper left on the late Major Sholto's body. Using this clue and the evidence found in the murder room, Sherlock went to work. Believing that Jonathan Small was the key to the mystery, he tracked Small to a steam launch and after a harrowing chase on the river caught up with him. Before he could overtake Small, however, he had to kill the little man with the small feet. About to be taken, Small emptied the treasure into the river. After his capture, he told a story which unraveled the mystery.

When he was a young man, Jonathan Small had fled from home because of trouble over a girl. Joining the army, he went to India. Soon after his arrival there he lost a leg to a crocodile. His accident necessitating a wooden leg, he was invalided out of the army. For a time he worked on a plantation. When the natives staged an uprising, he accidentally came upon a treasure chest filled with precious jewels. Three natives, his partners in the discovery, swore loyalty to each other and called themselves The Four. After the uprising the four men were imprisoned. In order to escape they had entrusted their secret to Morstan and Major Sholto, and Sholto had taken charge of the treasure until the others could reach safety. But Major Sholto had tricked his confederates, his treachery resulting in Morstan's and his own conscience-stricken deaths. Sherlock had been right in assuming that Small had left the paper with "The Sign of Four." Small had escaped from prison and made his way back to England with a native companion, the man with the small feet. After Major Sholto's death he had waited until the son found the treasure. Small had not intended violence, but his companion had murdered young Sholto with a poison splinter before Small could enter the locked room by means of a rope suspended through the trapdoor.

The rest of the story was known by Sherlock Holmes. Small, attempting to escape the country with the treasure, had dumped it into the river rather than part with it. To Dr. Watson the loss was a happy circumstance, for he could now tell Mary Morstan of his love for her. This he would not do while he thought her an heiress. Mary accepted his proposal and the happy pair received the good wishes of Sherlock Holmes. As for him, he preferred the stimulation of mystery to the stimulation of love.

It was not until the middle of the nineteenth century that Grimmelshausen became known as the author of Sim- in German literary history, when one considers that the novel is the masterpiece of the only really great German writer of the seventeenth century. Indeed, the writings of Grimmelshausen have been declared to be the one oasis in the literary desert during that period. In this novel none of the great historical figures of the Thirty Years' War appears; only James Ramsay, the Scot who brilliantly defended Hanau, is a real-life figure of note. The fact that he is made to be the uncle of Simplicissimus, the brother of the hero's mother, is completely fictional. Grimmelshausen's is the only contemporary German treatment of the Thirty Years' War in fiction.

The Story:

Simplicissimus was a simple child who grew up to the age of ten with his parents on a farm near the Spessart forest. Because they lived at some distance from any town, and had no near neighbors, Simplicissimus was reared in almost complete innocence, his only knowledge concerned with the care of stock and the playing of bagpipes. But in his tenth year the Thirty Years' War swept over his homeland and a troop of soldiers descended upon his father's farm. While foraging parties were plundering the farm, Simplicissimus escaped into the forest.

There he was rescued by a hermit who taught the boy how to take care of himself and tried to make a hermit out of him. Two years later the hermit died, leaving the boy to look out for himself. He fell into the hands of some soldiers and was taken to Hanau as a prisoner. There the governor questioned Simplicissimus and learned that the boy did not know who he was or anything about his past, except that he had been the son of a peasant and had spent some time with a hermit. Fortunately for him, a pastor saw him and recognized him as the hermit's young companion. The pastor told the governor that the hermit had been a nobleman who had sickened of war and so had turned to a holy life.

The governor, taking a liking to Simplicissimus, made him a page. As a page, Simplicissimus was at a disadvantage, for he knew little of the world and his innocence and ignorance kept getting him into trouble. At last the governor decided to make a jester of Simplicissimus. A plot was laid to make him lose his wits, but the pastor, who discovered the arrangements, warned the boy beforehand. Simplicissimus, falling in with the scheme, pretended to have lost his wits; he knew that his life would be easier and safer as a fool than as a blundering page.

After many adventures as the governor's fool, Simplicissimus was captured by a Croat raiding party. He served several masters while a prisoner of the Croats, finally making his escape by dressing as a girl, only to find refuge as a lady's maid. His disguise did not last long, and soon Simplicissimus was found out and made a horseboy. While with the Croats he befriended a young German named Ulrich Herzbruder and gave Herzbruder a sum of money large enough for the young man to escape punishment for a theft of which he had been unjustly accused.

Because he was rapidly learning how to get on in the world, Simplicissimus soon rose from the post of horseboy to that of musketeer. He served for several months as a guard at a nunnery, where a huntsman taught him many tricks of the woods. Upon his return to his unit, Simplicissimus soon became a great leader and forager, for the combination of his training as a huntsman, his own courage, the woodcraft he had learned from the hermit, and a natural quickness of wit served him in good stead. As a forager he used many tricks that made him known far and wide as the Hunter of Soest, a soldier to be feared. Although he was only a corporal, Simplicissimus had plenty of money, for he took a great deal of plunder from the rich. Never did he misuse the poor.

Soon he learned that someone else had borrowed his title and distinctive green garb and was committing great crimes in his name. After several weeks of searching Simplicissimus ran down his impersonator and forced the fellow to stop, although he allowed the man to live. So famous did Simplicissimus become as the Hunter of Soest that he had dreams of becoming an officer and even of being made a nobleman. To that end he hid away a great deal of the treasure which fell to him through his foraging activities; his plans came to naught, however, when he was captured by the Swedes.

When the commandant of the Swedes learned that Simplicissimus was the Hunter of Soest, he offered the young man a chance to become an officer. Simplicissimus refused to do so immediately, but he gave his parole so that the commandant allowed him the freedom of the city. Simplicissimus' servant escaped through the lines with a large part of the hero's treasure, and Simplicissimus turned to six months of study and making friends. His easy manners and bold bearing soon made him a favorite with the women. The commandant used Simplicissimus' weakness to have him married to a colonel's beautiful daughter, in hopes that the marriage would make Simplicissimus pledge his allegiance to the Swedes. The ruse worked, and the young man went to Cologne to arrange for the safekeeping of his treasure. While in that city he was fooled into making a trip to Paris. In Paris he had many adventures of love, by which he got a large amount of money and a case of smallpox. He was robbed of his money, however, and made his way toward Germany by masquerading as a quack doctor. The career as a quack was cut short when he was once more forced into the army as a soldier.

On a marauding trip, Simplicissimus met a robber and discovered that the robber was Oliver, an erstwhile friend who had misused Simplicissimus' friend, Ulrich Herzbruder. Within a few days Oliver was killed by a group of soldiers.

Simplicissimus escaped with a large amount of gold sewed into two shirts which he wore under his coat. He was later captured and again forced into soldiering. Fortunately, Ulrich Herzbruder recognized him and had him released. The two then set out on a pilgrimage as palmers and traveled for many months through southern Europe. Upon their return Ulrich Herzbruder arranged to have Simplicissimus be made a captain. The end of the Thirty Years' War came quickly, however, with the Treaty of Westphalia, and Simplicissimus was again at loose ends.

While visiting at a Swiss spa he met an old peasant who turned out to be his father. To Simplicissimus' surprise, however, the old man related that Simplicissimus was only a foster child and that the nobleman who had turned hermit, and who had befriended the boy, had been Simplicissimus' father. His mother, it turned out, was a Scot, the sister of James Ramsay, a famous officer in the Thirty Years' War. Simplicissimus' real name was Melchior Sternfels von Fuchsheim.

Shortly afterward Simplicissimus was married again. This marriage lasted only a year, his wife dying of a fever. After her death Simplicissimus had a strange adventure at the middle of the earth, which he reached with the help of the water sprites who dwelt in the Mummelsee, a lake in Germany. After that adventure Simplicissimus went with a friend to Russia, where he expected to get employment with the tsar. Following some adventures in Russia, Simplicissimus was captured by Tartars and finally returned to Germany after having traveled across Asia and through China and Japan. Upon his return, Simplicissimus read a great deal and finally became a hermit, as his father had done before him.

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

Type of work: Poem

Author: Unknown

Type of plot: Chivalric romance

Time of plot: Sixth century

Locale: England

First transcribed: Fourteenth-century manuscript

Principal characters:

SIR GAWAIN, a knight of the Round Table

SIR BERNLAK DE HAUTDESERT, the Green Knight

Critique:

The manuscript of this Middle English poem dates from the end of the fourteenth century, but the actual composition may have been earlier. Certainly the exploits of Gawain had been celebrated in many earlier romances and folk tales. The style seems all the more remarkable because at the time of its composition English speech had not yet developed into the language we know today. Various stages of emotion are successfully portrayed, and there is a careful detailing of nature. Although there have been numerous translations, none matches the flavor of the original Middle English version.

The Story:

On Christmas Eve many knights and fair ladies gathered in King Arthur's banquet hall, there to feast and enjoy the holiday festivities. Suddenly a stranger entered the room. He was a giant of a man, clad all in green armor, and with a green face, hair, and beard. He advanced, gave his greetings, and then loudly issued his challenge. Was there a knight in the group who would dare to trade blows with the mighty Green Knight? He who accepted was to strike one blow with a battle-ax on this occasion. Then on New Year's morning, a year hence, the Green Knight was to repay the blow, at his own castle in a distant land. Arrogantly, the Green Knight waited for an answer. From King Arthur's ranks answered the voice of Sir Gawain, the youngest and least battle-scarred of the knights. Sir Gawain accepted the challenge.

King Arthur and the other knights watched approvingly as Sir Gawain advanced, ax in hand, to confront the Green Knight. The stranger knelt down, bared his neck, and waited for the blow. Sir Gawain struck, sure and true, and the head of the Green Knight was severed from his body. While all gaped in amazement, he picked up his head in his hands, leaped upon his charger, and rode toward the gate. As he rode, the lips of the head shouted defiance at Sir Gawain, reminding him of their forthcoming tryst at the Green Chapel on the coming New Year.

The months passed quickly. Noble deeds were legion at the Round Table, and an atmosphere of gaiety pervaded King Arthur's castle. Then, when autumn came, Sir Gawain departed on his promised quest, and with much concern the other knights saw him set forth. Sir Gawain, riding his horse Gringalet, went northward, and at last arrived in Wirral, a region wild and uncivilized. On his way he was often in danger of death, for he faced fire-puffing dragons, fierce animals, and savage wild men in his search for the Knight of the Green Chapel. At last, on Christmas Eve, Sir Gawain saw a great castle in the middle of the wilderness. He entered it and was made welcome.

His host offered Sir Gawain the entire facilities of the castle. In a beautifully furnished chamber which he occupied, Sir Gawain was served the finest dishes and the best wines. The lady of the castle, a lady more beautiful even than Queen Guinevere, sat with him as he ate. The next day was Christmas, and the lord of the castle led in the feasting. Expressing the wish that Sir Gawain would remain at the castle for a long time, the host assured the knight that the Green Chapel was only a short distance away, so that it would not be necessary for him to leave until New Year's Day. The lord of the castle also asked Sir Gawain to keep a covenant with him. During his stay Sir Gawain was to receive all the game that his host caught during the day's hunt. In return, Sir Gawain was to exchange any gifts he received at the castle while the host was away.

On the first morning that the host hunted, Sir Gawain was awakened by the lady of the castle. She entered his chamber, seated herself on his couch, and spoke words of love to him. But Sir Gawain resisted temptation and took nothing from the lady. That evening, when the host presented his bounty from the hunt, Sir Gawain answered truthfully that he had received nothing that day. The second morning the same thing happened. Sir Gawain remained chaste in spite of the lady's conduct. On the third morning, however, the day before Sir Gawain was to depart, she gave him an embroidered silk girdle which she said would keep him safe from any mortal blow. Then she kissed him three times and departed. That evening Sir Gawain kissed his host three times, but he did not mention the silken girdle he had received.

On New Year's morn Sir Gawain set forth from the castle and rode to the Green Chapel. He found it without difficulty; as he approached he heard the Green Knight sharpening his ax. When Sir Gawain announced that he was ready for the blow and bared his head, the Green Knight raised his ax high in the air in preparation for the stroke of death. But Sir Gawain jumped aside as the ax descended. The second time the Green Knight merely struck at Sir Gawain, not touching him at all. With the third blow he wounded Sir Gawain in the neck, drawing a great deal of blood. Then Sir Gawain shouted defiance and said that he had fulfilled the covenant. The Green Knight laughed loudly at that and began to praise Sir Gawain's courage.

To Sir Gawain's surprise, he revealed himself as the host of the castle and explained the blows. On the first two blows Sir Gawain escaped injury, because for two days he had faithfully kept the covenant. The third drew blood, however, because Sir Gawain had failed to reveal the gift of the girdle, the property of the host, Sir Bernlak de Hautdesert. Together with Morgain le Fay, King Arthur's half-sister, the Green Knight had planned this whole affair to test the strength and valor of King Arthur's knights. They had devised the disguise of the Green Knight and persuaded Lady de Hautdesert to try tempting Sir Gawain. Sir Gawain had withstood the test of temptation well, his only fault the keeping of the girdle. The host forgave him for his act, however, because it was the love of life itself that had motivated Sir Gawain.

The two knights returned to the castle, and a few days later Sir Gawain journeyed back to King Arthur's court. As he rode he gazed with shame at the girdle which he had procured from the host. It was to remain with Sir Gawain as a reminder of the moment when he yielded and succumbed to the weakness of the flesh.

At King Arthur's castle all the knights and ladies listened to the tale of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, and then, to show their love for the young knight, they all donned silk girdles. This symbol became a traditional part of the costume of the Knights of the Round Table.

THE SLEEPWALKERS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Hermann Broch (1886-1951)

Type of plot: Philosophical and social chronicle

Time of plot: 1888-1918

Locale: Germany

First published: 1930-1932

Principal characters:

JOACHIM VON PASENOW, a young lieutenant

HERR VON PASENOW, his father

BERTRAND, his friend

ESCH, a bookkeeper

FRAU HENTJEN, his wife

HUGUENAU, a businessman

Critique:

The Sleepwalkers consists of three short novels, The Romantic, The Anarchist, and The Realist, held together loosely by the reappearance of some of the characters. In structure the work is hardly a novel, for the form is incidental. Rather, the narrative is a convenient means to express the author's philosophy. Broch feels that the romantic, the anarchist, and the realistic approaches to life are weak. In a disintegrating society all have serious limitations. Outwardly at least the realistic businessman has the least difficulty; but he is little better than a brute. Similarly, the romantic is weakly ineffectual and the anarchist is unstable, unable to maintain a consistent point of view. The Sleepwalkers, difficult as it is, is an important and a rewarding work.

The Story:

In 1888, Joachim von Pasenow was a lieutenant in the German Army. Having worn a uniform so long, he looked on it as his natural dress. A uniform hid a man's nakedness; unlike civilian clothes it made a man amount to something. His friend Bertrand had left the army and now wore mufti all the time; it seemed indecent. Joachim felt a little insecure about his honor, too. His brother Helmuth had been killed in a duel, and his father made much of Helmuth's unsullied honor.

Herr von Pasenow came to Berlin to visit Joachim. He was a funny little man, rotund and intent, and his son was a bit ashamed of him. At a casino they met Ruzena, a Bohemian girl. Von Pasenow stroked her familiarly and gave her money. She accepted the attentions easily, but when the old man joked about marriage she went into the lavatory to cry. Later, perhaps as a kind of penance, Joachim took Ruzena as his mistress.

Bertrand also took a friendly interest in Ruzena and helped her get on the stage. Ruzena, happy with Joachim, began to distrust Bertrand. He let slip the suggestion that she should leave the chorus and go into a notion shop. Joachim had to leave Ruzena at times to visit his family, and these absences strengthened her suspicions. Joachim's father was anxious that he should resign from the army and look after the family estate. He was anxious too for him to marry Elisabeth.

When Bertrand met Elisabeth, he spoke to her eloquently of a love based on renunciation; the innocent girl was upset. Ruzena, convinced that Bertrand was the evil genius separating her from her lover, shot him in the arm. She then left Joachim and went back to work in a café. Joachim, believing also that Bertrand was a bad influence, settled money on Ruzena and proposed to Elisabeth. His deed was a break with his past, for he did not ask Bertrand's advice about the marriage.

Before accepting Joachim, Elisabeth visited Bertrand in the hospital. He declared his love for her but thought her marriage with Joachim was inevitable. For a time after their marriage Joachim thought of Elisabeth as an unapproachable madonna. They did not have their first child until a year and a half had passed.

In 1903, when Esch was dismissed from his post as a bookkeeper at a shipping concern in Cologne, Martin, a crippled socialist, somehow learned of his dismissal and told him of a better job in Mannheim. They discussed the matter in Frau Hentjen's restaurant. Esch knew he would have to have a reference. He finally got a good one by threatening to expose the crooked manager under whom he had worked.

In Mannheim he was employed by a large firm owned by Bertrand. He made friends with Korn, a customs inspector, and with Lohberg, a pallid tobacconist. In a short while he went to room with Korn and his sister Erna. Erna was unattractive but wanted desperately to get married, and Korn hoped to acquire a brother-in-law in Esch. Esch at last answered her provocations by going into her bedroom, but Erna reserved her favors until they should be married.

By helping Gernerth, a theatrical manager, with his shipping, Esch received passes to a show and took Korn and Erna with him to the performance. The star attraction was Teltscher, a Hungarian knife thrower, and Ilona, his flashy blonde target. Becoming acquainted with Korn and Esch, the actors visited them at Korn's house. For a while Esch hoped to win Ilona but she showed a preference for Korn; at last she slept with him openly.

Martin, arriving in Mannheim during a strike, was arrested at a workers' meeting. Esch was convinced that Bertrand had hired baiters to trap Martin and that Bertrand should have been imprisoned instead. Feeling restless, he accepted Teltscher's offer to go in with him in the theatrical business. They planned to operate in Cologne. Esch felt a queer responsibility to get Teltscher away from Ilona, because the knife-throwing act endangered Ilona's safety.

Back in Cologne, Esch spent much time with Frau Hentjen and in time overcame her scruples against taking him as her lover. She did not like his new job, for Esch was hiring lady wrestlers. Esch wrote an article protesting against Martin's false imprisonment, but the socialist newspaper refused to print it. During his wandering through the town he stumbled on evidence that Bertrand was a sodomite, but again the paper refused to print his story.

Driven by a vague compulsion, Esch went to see Bertrand. On the way he stopped off to see the Kornes and found Erna engaged to marry Lohberg. Erna had changed; she willingly allowed Esch to sleep with her. Bertrand received Esch kindly but was evasive on the subject of the strike. Bertrand died soon after Esch returned to Cologne.

For a while Esch planned vaguely to go to America. After Frau Hentjen mortgaged her restaurant to provide theatrical capital, she and Esch were married. Eventually they lost their money and Esch took a good job in Luxemburg.

Huguenau, a businessman practical in outlook, deserted from the army. By keeping an open countenance and refusing to skulk, he made his way through Belgium to the Ardennes and thence back into the Moselle district. Since he was an Alsatian knowing both French and German, either side of the Rhine was home to him. In Kur-Trier he spent enough of his carefully hoarded money to set himself up as a hotel keeper.

All about him others were questioning their beliefs during the last months of the war. Hanna, the lawyer's faithful wife, grew more and more virginal during her husband's absence. In Berlin, Marie the Salvation Army girl half-acknowledged a passion for a Talmudic Jew. The wounded in the hospitals had little spirit to live. But Huguenau had no questions, no frustrations; he was intent only on business deals.

He bluffed the military commandant, Major Joachim von Pasenow, into giving him support, and on the strength of that backing persuaded the local dignitaries to put up capital enough for him to buy control of a newspaper owned by Esch. He made the deal easier by circulating rumors that Esch was subversive. Before long Huguenau was editing the paper and eating Frau Esch's good meals without payment.

Having embraced the Protestant faith, Joachim finally became convinced that Esch was a malcontent and Huguenau a suspicious character. In November, 1918, the workers revolted and took over the town. Joachim was hurt and carried to the basement of Esch's printing house. Seeing the incident, Huguenau took advantage of the confusion and raped Frau Esch. Then he followed Esch, who was returning to guard duty. He caught up with him and slipped a bayonet into his back.

After the war, Huguenau by letter tricked Frau Esch into returning the borrowed capital he had invested in the paper. While he continued to amass more money, he prudently married a German girl with a good dowry.

THE SMALL HOUSE AT ALLINGTON

Type of work: Novel

Author: Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

Type of plot: Domestic romance

Time of plot: Mid-nineteenth century

Locale: An unnamed county, "Barsetshire," London

First published: 1864

Principal characters:

CHRISTOPHER DALE, Squire of Allington

MRS. DALE, his widowed sister-in-law

LILIAN (LILY), her daughter

ISABEL (BELL), another daughter

BERNARD DALE, the squire's nephew and heir

ADOLPHUS CROSBIE, Lily's suitor

JOHN EAMES, another suitor

LADY ALEXANDRINA DE COURCY, a young woman of fashion

DR. CROFTS, in love with Bell

LORD DE GUEST, Eames' benefactor

Critique:

The Small House at Allington, fifth of the Barchester chronicles, was Trollope's own favorite of the series, although in the candor of his later years he admitted that Lily Dale was "somewhat of a French prig." In this novel the worldly-wise, conning de Courcys are set in contrast to the honest, sturdy Dales of Allington, thereby adding another panel to the portrait of a complete Victorian society that the modern reader finds in Trollope's imaginary Barsetshire. Her creator's opinion of Lily Dale is perhaps too severe. She is the Victorian heroine, winning but also pathetic, and a perfect model of the type who has her counterpart in almost every novel of the period. Critics have read a great deal of Trollope's own story as a young man into the character of John Eames.

The Story:

There were two houses at Allington. The Great House was the residence of Squire Christopher Dale, a plain, seemingly dour man whose ancestors had been squires at Allington for generations. In the Small House nearby lived his sister-in-law, Mrs. Dale, and her two daughters, Bell and Lily. Mrs. Dale was the widow of the squire's youngest brother, who, dying young, had left his family in modest circumstances. When the squire had offered his brother's widow the Small House rent free, she immediately accepted his offer, not for her own sake but for that of her daughters.

The Dales were not the chief family of the neighborhood. Near the town of Guestwick stood Guestwick Manor, home of Lord de Guest and his sister, Lady Julia. Although not intimate, the families had a tie by marriage. Years before another brother of the squire's, Colonel Orlando Dale, had eloped with the earl's sister, Lady Fanny. Not having made a career for himself, the colonel lived with his lady in semi-retirement at Torquay. Bernard Dale, their only son and a captain in the Engineers, was the unmarried squire's heir.

Mrs. Dale was a woman whose pride was as great as her means were small, and her brother-in-law's gruff manners had done little to establish cordial relations between them during her ten years in the Small House. The uncle had been kind to his nieces in his rather ungracious manner, however, so that they enjoyed the social advantages if not the income of wealth. Bell was her uncle's favorite. It was his secret wish that she, as Bernard's wife, would someday be mistress of the Great House. At one time Mrs. Dale had believed that Dr. Crofts, the Guestwick physician, would declare himself; but he had not spoken, and now there seemed little likelihood of a match in that quarter.

One summer Bernard Dale arrived to visit his uncle, bringing with him a London friend, Adolphus Crosbie, a senior clerk in the General Committee Office at Whitehall. At first Crosbie, a handsome, agreeable fellow, made the deeper impression on Bell, and Lily liked to tease her sister by calling him a swell because he was received in the drawing-rooms of countesses and cabinet ministers. Crosbie himself was attracted to Lily. When the squire, more gracious than usual to his nephew's friend, invited him to return in September for the shooting, Crosbie gladly accepted the invitation.

Lily had still another suitor in young John Eames, of Guestwick, a clerk in the Income Tax office in London. Although he had been hopelessly in love with Lily since boyhood, his meager income of a hundred pounds a year gave him no immediate prospect of marriage. Eames was awkward, callow, susceptible. While professing adoration for Lily, he had against his better judgment become entangled with Amelia Roper, the designing daughter of Mrs. Lupex, his London landlady.

Crosbie returned to Allington in September, and before long neighborhood gossip was confirmed—a marriage had been arranged between Lily Dale and Adolphus Crosbie. This was the news that greeted Eames when he arrived in Guestwick to visit his mother in October. He was made even more wretched by the half-languishing, half-threatening letters he received from Amelia during his stay. Lily's engagement made Squire Dale more anxious than ever to see fulfilled his own plans for Bernard and Bell. Encouraged by his uncle, the young officer proposed, but in such undemonstrative fashion that Bell refused him immediately. Not even the settlement of eight hundred pounds a year promised by the squire tempted her to change her mind.

Having made his choice, Crosbie hoped that the squire would make a financial settlement on Lily. But when he brought up the matter, that gentleman declared he felt under no obligations to provide for his niece's future. Crosbie was disappointed, but he consoled himself with the reflection that he was marrying for love and not for worldly advancement. So matters stood when he received from the Countess de Courcy an invitation to join a house party at Courcy Castle before he returned to London.

The de Courcy's entertained lavishly. One of the party was Lady Julia de Guest, a well-meaning busybody who soon spread the news of Crosbie's engagement. The countess, who had already had some experience in getting daughters engaged and then seeing their engagements broken, said nothing was likely to come of Crosbie's romance at Allington. She was right. So successful was her campaign to secure the clerk for her own youngest daughter, Lady Alexandrina, that long before the end of his visit Crosbie proposed and was accepted. He had not declared himself to Lady Alexandrina without severe twinges of conscience, it was true; but, after all, an earl's daughter would offer a better position in fashionable London life than would the penniless niece of a country squire. Lady Julia, hearing what had happened, denounced him as a deceiver and a miserable wretch. Crosbie recognized in her scorn the voice of public opinion; he wished that he could blot out his visit to Courcy Castle.

Meanwhile Squire Dale had learned from his nephew of Bell's refusal and had gone to his sister-in-law to enlist her aid in furthering the match. He was greatly put out when she insisted that Bell should be free to choose for herself. A short time later the squire received from Lady Julia a letter telling him of Crosbie's engagement to Lady Alexandrina. Learning that Crosbie had returned to London, the squire followed him there and tried to see the clerk at his club. Conscience-stricken, Crosbie refused to meet the old gentleman but sent a disapproving but obliging friend to talk with the squire. The next day Crosbie wrote to Mrs. Dale and confessed that he had broken his engagement to her daughter.

Shortly before the end of his vacation Eames saved Lord de Guest from being attacked by a bull on his estate. Gratefully, the earl decided to take an interest in the young man's future, and he invited Eames to spend Christmas with him at Guestwick Manor.

The two months before Christmas passed with heavy slowness at Allington. Mrs. Dale could only hope that time would heal Lily's hurt. The squire felt that there should be some redress for the slight to his niece. Lord de Guest, meeting Eames in London, realized the true state of that young man's feeling for Lily when Eames threatened physical punishment for Crosbie's deed. Crosbie, meanwhile, was deep in financial arrangements for his marriage. Under the fostering hand of Mortimer Gazebee, his future brother-in-law and a guardian of the de Courcy interests, he settled most of his income on Lady Alexandrina.

Crosbie went to Courcy Castle for Christmas, Eames, still involved with Amelia Roper, to Guestwick Manor. At a dinner the earl announced his intention of settling some money on Lily and Eames if they married. He asked the squire to do the same, but Lily's uncle refused to commit himself. Returning to London on the same train with Crosbie, Eames was unable to restrain himself when they met on the station platform. He thoroughly trounced Lily's faithless suitor.

Bernard, renewing his proposals to Bell, argued their uncle's wishes in the matter, but Bell told him, as kindly as possible, that she could follow no wishes but her own. Stubborn in his desires, the squire became angry with his nephew and niece, and he decided to be angry with his sister-in-law as well if she refused to reason with her daughter. After heated words had been exchanged, Mrs. Dale decided that it might be better for all concerned if she and her daughters moved away from the Small House.

A short time later Lily became ill with scarlatina, and Dr. Crofts was called in. He came daily, ostensibly to see his patient, but actually to be near Bell. In the meantime Mrs. Dale was preparing to move into a small cottage in Guestwick. During Lily's illness Dr. Crofts declared his love to Bell. Taking her evasive answer for a refusal, he drove away in dejection. Lily, aware of Bell's true feelings, urged him to ask her sister again. Crosbie and Lady Alexandrina were married in London in February.

After Lily's illness Lady Julia invited Mrs. Dale and her daughters to spend a week at Guestwick Manor. Eames was asked at the same time. But Lily saw through the scheme for bringing her and Eames together, especially after she learned that Squire Dale was to make another of the party, and she declined the invitation. The squire was so kind in his concern for Lily that Mrs. Dale began to regret her decision to move into the village. In the midst of her perplexities Dr. Crofts came to tell her that Bell had accepted him. Mrs. Dale was pleased. That night, while the doctor sat with the Dales beside the fire, as if they were already one family, the anxious mother was almost able to believe that happiness had returned to the Small House.

Eames, manfully escaping from the toils of Amelia Roper, arrived at Guestwick Manor. He had recently been made private secretary to the great Sir Raffle Buffle, largely through the earl's influence, and he was grateful. Since Lily had not gone to the manor, it had been decided that the squire and Bell should dine with the de Guests. On the next day Eames was to call at Allington and declare himself to Lily. To his dismay, however, she would not have him. When, after his departure, Mrs. Dale added her entreaties to his, Lily remained firm. She was, she declared, like her mother—widowed. And so matters had to stand.

But Mrs. Dale did not leave the Small House after all, for their family troubles had brought her and the squire closer together, and he announced his intention of settling three thousand pounds on each of his nieces. When Bell married Dr. Crofts in June, he threw open the Great House for the wedding. Bernard and Eames did not attend.

Crosbie's wedded life lasted only a few months. Lady Alexandrina, bored with the humdrum of a government clerk's life, went off to join her mother at Baden-Baden. Too late Crosbie discovered that the settlements he had made on his wife left him a poor man, and he went into cheap lodgings—happy at any price, however, to be free of her nagging and her aristocratic relatives.

Critique:

The Snake Pit is the most hopeless and despairing of the four novels which make up The Master of Hestviken. Here Olav Audunsson and his wife Ingunn have passed the period of youthful passion, outlawry, and violence which gave The Axe its tragic poignancy. There is little warmth or color to brighten the years of Ingunn's illness and Olav's struggle with his conscience. Medieval man looked up to heaven or down to hell; earth was only a testing ground for the bliss or punishment of the future life. Olav, burdened by a sin which he cannot confess, is one of the doomed. In his person the writer unfolds a story of man's inner life and reflects the manners and morals of his age.

The Story:

After Olav Audunsson received his wife Ingunn from her kin, he returned with her to Hestviken to claim his inheritance. Lime trees were in blossom, and their scent brought back to him childhood memories of the manor which had not been his home since he was seven. Hestviken, on a ridge above Oslo fjord, had been a place of chieftains. One of the heirlooms of Viking days was a wood carving showing legendary Gunnar surrounded by vipers in the pit where Atle threw him.

While Olav was growing up as Steinfinn's foster son at Frettastein and during his years of warring and outlawry, an aged kinsman lived at Hestviken. Old Olav, called Half-Priest because he had studied for the Church before an accident crippled him, was more clerk than franklin. Under his stewardship the manor had not prospered, and young Olav had less wealth than he expected. Still, Hestviken was a rich homestead, and so he cheerfully set about repairing the houses, increasing his herds, and outfitting boats to trade by sea. Besides, he liked Olav Half-Priest and spent many evenings listening to stories of his ancestors and their deeds in the old days.

Olav Half-Priest had known four generations of the Hestviken men, and his greatest wish, as he often told Ingunn, was to see her son and Olav's before his death. But the child Ingunn bore the summer the old man died lived only a few seconds. In the next four years she had three more children, all stillborn. During part of that time Olav was away on raids against the Danes, but when he was at home there was little cheer between them. Ingunn was fretful and sick, resentful of Signe and Una, Olav's distant cousins, impatient with her maids. Olav knew that she was thinking of the healthy son she had had by Teit, the Icelander he had killed to hide her shame, but there was no mention of the boy between them.

Olav's crime weighed heavily upon his own spirit. If he had proclaimed it at the time men would have found justice in Teit's slaying; his silence had made his deed secret murder. Unable to confess his guilt without bringing shame to Ingunn, whom he loved, he knew that he must live unshriven for his sin. Perhaps, he thought, the dead children were part of the chastisement he must suffer. He was always tender toward the useless wife whose misfortune he had taken by violence upon himself.

When Ingunn became really ill, Olav hired Torhild Björnsdatter whose mother had been a serving-woman at Hestviken, to keep his house for him. Afterward the manor was in better order, and for a time Ingunn's health improved, so that one spring she traveled to see Tora, her widowed sister, at Frettastein. While there, she went to see little Eirik, her son, at his foster mother's house. He was half-frightened of the richly dressed woman who gave him gifts and held him so tightly. On her return to Hestviken, Olav asked her if she longed greatly for the boy. She said that Eirik had been afraid of her.

Ingunn's brother Jon died and Olav rode north to collect her share of his goods. When he returned, he brought Eirik with him. In the neighborhood he let it be known that the boy was his child and Ingunn's, born during his outlaw years and for that reason given to foster parents in the Upplands. When Eirik, like Olav, followed him about, Ingunn sometimes grew fretful because the boy preferred her husband's company to her own. Then Olav, for the sake of peace, treated the child coldly. Often it seemed that he was never to have ease because of the Icelander's brat.

After Ingunn gave birth to a son, Audun, Olav realized how foolish his act had been, for in claiming Eirik he had defrauded his lawful son of his birthright. He became sharper in his manner toward Eirik, scolded him for childish lies he told, and to his own shame beat him for his boasting and loud ways. Sickly Audun died the next winter.

One year Arnvid Finnsson came to Hestviken, Ingunn's cousin and their true friend in the days of Olav's outlawry. Arnvid said that he had given his manor to his oldest son; he himself was to enter the order of the Preaching Friars. To him Olav told the story of the guilt weighing so heavily upon him, saying it was as if God's wrath pursued him and gave him no peace, night or day. Arnvid, kind and good man though he was, could say little to comfort his friend.

Ingunn gave birth to her last child, a fair daughter christened Cecilia. From that time the mother seldom left her bed. Years before she had lost the power of her limbs during an illness, and now her old sickness took her again. Sometimes Olav looked at her, pale and wasted, and wondered how the sick woman could have been the beautiful girl he had known years before. Yet he was not completely unhappy in their last years together. He looked after Ingunn with patience and pity for the sad life she had lived. Thinking she might become better if he were to make atonement for the slaying of Teit, he spoke to her one day of the matter, but she begged him to keep silent for her sake. Word came that Arnvid had died at Hamar. Olav felt that the only friend left from his youth was Ingunn, once so fair that he had killed two men for her sake.

The two had lived so much to themselves at Hestviken that they had never been popular with their neighbors. For that reason there was much gossip when it became known that Olav had fathered a child on his housekeeper. Feeling that his new sin went back to the old one from which he could never be free, and anxious to make amends to Torhild for the wrong, he gave her the farm at Auken for her own. Ingunn, who had always been jealous of Torhild's strong, healthy body, said nothing. Eirik showed in every way his dislike for the stern, aloof man he called father.

Torhild's child was a boy, Björn. On the day Torhild went to Auken, Ingunn sent to her and asked to see him, a lusty child as fair as her own Cecilia. Afterward Eirik spat after Torhild and cursed her son. Ingunn begged him never to speak so of any woman's child.

Olav was at the Oslo fair when a servant brought word that Ingunn was dying. Memories of the past, remorse, and the conviction that God would be merciful if he would only confess his guilt plagued him as he rode homeward to be at her side. After her death he was minded to do as he had planned on that night ride, confess and welcome his punishment, whether holy pilgrimage or headsman's ax. But he could not, he realized at last, because of Eirik and Cecilia. Never could he abandon them to a kinsman's care or shame them by letting the world know their mother had been wanton.

Sometimes, in the slow, sleepless nights, he felt that he was Gunnar in the snake pit on the old carving—his hidden sin was the viper that had pierced his heart.

Critique:

The Son Avenger gathers together the many threads of Olav Audunsson's story and brings to an inevitable and tragic close the second of Sigrid Undset's long novels dealing with Norse life in the Middle Ages. Some critics have complained that The Master of Hestviken lacks the human warmth of Kristin Lavransdatter. This judgment is true for an obvious reason: Olav's sin is greater than Kristin's, his remorse is more terrible, his confession is denied him when he dies speechless at the end. Like Kristin Lavransdatter, The Master of Hestviken is a great work of the historical imagination and of Christian morality. The novel lives in its gradual, richly detailed evocation of the past and in the writer's ability to create men and women who are true to the hopes, passions, and sufferings of humanity of any time or place.

The Story:

When young Aslak Gunnarsson came to Hestviken with the tale that he had slain a man, Olav Audunsson was not minded to shelter an outlaw. But he and Aslak had fought side by side in Duke Eirik's war, and he remembered his own outlawry in his younger days. So Aslak stayed at Hestviken that winter.

Cecilia Olavsdatter and Bothild, her foster sister, found Aslak such pleasant company that at last Olav began to believe that the dalesman and his daughter were friendlier than was needful. He was not sorry when he heard that Aslak's family had paid atonement for the killing and the time came for his guest to return home. When Aslak begged to return with his kinsmen and ask for Cecilia's hand, Olav spoke kindly but gave him no hope for his suit.

Late in the summer Eirik came home, bringing with him Jörund Rypa, his friend. Olav had no great liking for Jörund because of an act of boyish disloyalty to Eirik years before, but the young squire's pleasant manners and courteous speech made Olav feel that perhaps he had been mistaken in his judgment. When Jörund rode back to his family's manor at Gunnarsby, it was understood that his brothers would soon return to declare his suit for Cecilia.

Eirik, meanwhile, had become lustfully attracted to Bothild and, to her distress, wooed her with boorish rudeness. One night they went on an errand to Rundmyr farm. On the way back she tried to evade him, fell, and began to vomit blood. Then Eirik learned for the first time that she was ill with the wasting sickness. Remorseful, he left Hestviken. Bothild died shortly before Yule. Early in the new year Eirik returned, determined to make amends by asking Bothild's hand in marriage. Filled with feelings of guilt for her death, he suddenly decided to become a monk.

Olav was well pleased with Eirik's decision. For years he had brooded because a false heir, Ingunn's son by Teit, would inherit after him. Perhaps, he thought, God was protecting Cecilia's rights. Also, his unconfessed guilt in the secret murder of Teit had weighed upon him for years; now there might be a time when he could make contrition by confessing the father's slaying to the son. Then, if Eirik accepted him, all might be well.

The news of Eirik's intention speeded

Jörund's wooing, for Cecilia would be a rich heiress, and before long she journeyed to Gunnarsby for her wedding feast. Olav, seeing the great manor Jörund shared with his brothers, was well satisfied with her marriage.

But Eirik made a poor novice after all, so that the convent brothers sent him home. Meanwhile Cecilia had not been happy among the brawling Rypas at Gunnarsby. Shortly before the birth of her second child she and Jörund begged to be allowed to live at Hestviken. Jörund proved a poor son-in-law and husbandman. When Olav sent Eirik to collect some debts in Oslo, Jörund went with him and fell into old habits of dicing and drinking. Before they returned, he borrowed Eirik's purse containing Olav's silver and later claimed that he had used the money to pay a pressing debt. Olav seldom spoke to his son-in-law after that. Later Eirik heard that Jörund was often at the house of thieves and gamblers Liv and Arnketil kept at Rundmyr.

Eirik spent most of his time at Saltviken, an old farm he was reclaiming for himself. Pleased at last by his steady ways, Olav felt that the time had come for Eirik to marry. Gunhild, daughter of Berse of Eiken, was the girl decided upon, and Olav's distant kinsmen were asked to forward the suit. About that time Gunhild's uncle, rich Guttorm of Draumtop, was robbed of much silver when thieves attacked him and his wife while they were returning from a wedding feast. From the story Gunhild had told him, Eirik recognized some of the silver when he and Cecilia came upon it by chance in Jörund's chest. Jörund said that he had bought it from some travelers near Rundmyr. Doubting the story, Eirik buried the silver in a field. Later he would pretend to find it and return it to Guttorm.

All worked out as he had planned. Then the authorities captured some robbers who knew of Jörund's part in the affair, and Berse refused to marry his daughter into a family whose kinsman had received stolen goods.

Gunhild had an older sister, Eldrid, who had caused great scandal and who lived by herself at Ness. When Berse planned to wed Gunhild to an older man, the girl sent Eirik a message asking him to meet her at her sister's house. Eirik went there, but Gunhild, her plan discovered, never arrived. Eirik felt that he was a man whose efforts always came to nothing. Eldrid was kind. He married her and went to live at Ness.

Olav, weary of everything and feeling that it was his own sin which had brought sorrow and disgrace to his house, moved to Saltviken. Word reached him that Björn, his son by Torhild Björnsdatter, had married the daughter of an old friend, and he went to see the boy and his bride in Oslo. They were young, he thought, happy, and lucky. Björn was the son he could never claim, and so family troubles would never touch him.

When Cecilia could stand Jörund's drunken brutalities no longer, she rode to Ness and begged Eirik to go back with her to Hestviken. Jörund, he found, was like a madman. Leaving a house-carl to guard him, Eirik went to Saltviken for his father. The next morning, on their return, they found Jörund stabbed in his bed.

Old Olav, convinced that Cecilia had killed her husband, saw his own secret murder repeated in his daughter's deed. Horrified and sorrowful, he went to Oslo and in the convent there told his story to a monk he knew, the son of his old friend, Arnvid Finnsson. The monk gave him a day to prepare for his confession. Early the next morning Eirik arrived from Hestviken with news that Arnketil had killed Jörund to avenge the ruin of a daughter. Overcome, Olav suffered a stroke which left him partially paralyzed and speechless. Arnketil's body was found a long time later in a swamp; there were whispers that Eirik had shielded the slayer, but nothing came of that gossip.

After Cecilia had been a widow for more than a year, she married Aslak Gunnarsson, who had been her first choice. Old Olav, his mind filled with memories of Ingunn and their younger days, dragged his crippled body about the manor. At last he died, his sin still unconfessed.

Eirik and Eldrid went into holy orders, she to the convent in Gimsøy, he to the Minorite convent in Oslo. Cecilia and Aslak inherited Hestviken and prospered, so that Olav's grandchildren were all well provided for. When they visited him in the convent, Eirik never tired of telling them about their grandfather's manly and upright life. Eirik himself died when he was threescore years old.

The West, the past—one is the physical background of Willa Cather's writing, the other its spiritual climate. Against her chosen backgrounds she projected her stories of pioneers and artists, men and women of simple passions and creative energies. The very nature of her material determined her own values as an artist: to find in the people of her creation those realities of the spirit which have been almost overwhelmed in the complexity and confusion of the present. The Song of the Lark, which carries Thea Kronborg from an obscure Colorado town to the concert and opera stage, is a novel rich and sustaining in homely realism. The character of Thea was drawn in part from the late Olive Fremstad, but there is much of Miss Cather's own story in the experiences of her heroine. Like Thea, she made common things and disciplined effort the shaping influences of her art. The story of the artist in America is usually sentimentalized or idealized. This novel is a notable exception.

The Story:

Thea Kronborg was the daughter of the Swedish Methodist pastor in the small town of Moonstone, Colorado. A tall, fair girl with grave, candid eyes, her shy awkwardness hid restless depths of thought and feeling. Although she grew up in a lively household of brothers and sisters, she had no real friends among children her own age. Of her family, only her aunt, Tilly Kronborg, seemed to understand her. But Tilly was so ridiculous in her speech and actions that neighbors only laughed when she told them that the day was coming when Thea would make Moonstone sit up and take notice.

One of her few friends was Dr. Howard Archie, the town physician, who, when she was eleven, saved Thea's life during an attack of pneumonia. He was unhappily married to a mean-spirited woman who wanted only three things in life: to have her cigar-smoking husband away from home as much as possible, to keep her house closed against dust, and to live on food from cans. Having no children of his own, Dr. Archie loved Thea in a fatherly way, and he often wondered what would become of a girl so passionate and determined.

Another friend of her childhood was gruff, disreputable old Professor Wunsch, her music teacher. A drunkard, but at one time a talented pianist, he had drifted casually into Moonstone, and Fritz Kohler, the German tailor, had pitied him and given him a home. The two old men, both with memories of their younger years in Europe, became cronies. Fiercely resenting demands of family and school upon her time, he gave Thea her first glimpse of artistic endeavor, just as the Kohler house gave her a knowledge of true old-world simplicity and friendliness. Wunsch, unable to understand Thea's stubborn reserve, compared her to the yellow prickly pear blossoms of the desert.

Through these friends she also knew Spanish Johnny from the Mexican settlement on the outskirts of town. He was another wanderer and drunkard, who always came back to Moonstone and his patient wife to recover from his debauches. The neighbors were scandalized when the minister's daughter went with the doctor and Wunsch to hear Spanish Johnny sing Mexican folk songs. Mrs. Kronborg, wiser than her husband, quietly allowed Thea to go her own way.

Still another man who took great interest in Thea was Ray Kennedy, a railroad conductor on the Denver run. He was waiting until she grew up; then he intended to marry her. In his way he was the most protective of all.

Thea was fifteen when old Wunsch, in a drunken frenzy, smashed the furniture in the Kohler house and left town. After his departure Thea took over his pupils. A year later Ray Kennedy, injured in a wreck, died, leaving Thea six hundred dollars in insurance. Dr. Archie advised her to take the money and study music for a winter in Chicago. After much discussion the Kronborgs agreed, if the doctor would take her there and get her settled.

In Chicago, living in cheap rooms and earning extra money by singing in a church choir, Thea was homesick for the sand dunes and deep, silent snows of Moonstone. She hated the city, but she worked hard for Andor Harsanyi, under whom she studied. Like Wunsch, the brilliant young musician was baffled by qualities of Thea's imagination and will. He was almost in despair over her when he discovered that her real talent was in voice. Relieved yet sorry, he told her that she would never make a great pianist. She might, however, become a great singer.

The next summer Thea went back to Moonstone. There she disturbed her family by refusing to sing at the funeral of Maggie Evans, a neighbor. Persuaded by her mother, she finally consented. Later she shocked the town and disgusted her brothers and sisters by going to a party in the Mexican village and singing with Spanish Johnny and his friends.

Returning to Chicago, she studied under Madison Bowers, a teacher whom she both admired and disliked. At his studio she met for the first time Fred Ottenburg, son of a rich brewer and an amateur musician. Bowers was cynically amused that the wealthy young man was attracted to the strange girl from the West. Through Ottenburg's influence Thea was given singing engagements at the parties of his fashionable friends.

That winter Thea caught a severe cold. Her convalescence was slow, and she felt weak and dispirited. Ottenburg, concerned for her welfare, urged her to go away for a rest at his father's ranch in Arizona. There Thea discovered a West different from the crude, vulgar Moonstone she had known. Prowling among the cliff-dwellers' ruins in Panther Canyon, she felt herself part of an older West, a land closer to the everyday simplicities of sun, wind, and water. Thoughts of those primitive people aroused her own half-awakened nature; the desert country, ancient but filled with relics of human endeavor, gave her a realization of art as form given to hope and experience.

Rested, and grateful to Ottenburg, she accepted his proposal of marriage when he arrived at the ranch. On the way to Mexico, however, she learned that he already had a neurotic, invalid wife. Hurt and shocked, she refused his offers of assistance, borrowed money from Dr. Archie, and went to Germany for further study.

Years passed. By that time Dr. Archie was a widower, his wife having been killed when some cleaning fluid exploded, and he had moved to Denver to take charge of some mining investments which had prospered. From time to time reports reached him of Thea's progress abroad, and he was pleased when Ottenburg brought word that she had sung Elisabeth at the Dresden Opera. He alone understood why Thea, at a critical point in her career, had been unable to return to Moonstone for her mother's funeral.

He was in New York on that great night when the sudden illness of a famous singer gave Thea her chance to sing Sieglinde in Die Walküre at the Metropolitan Opera House. He and Ottenburg, whom Thea had forgiven, heard the performance together, both pleased and proud because they were the two men who had meant most in her career.

By 1909 Tilly was the last Kronborg in Moonstone. She never tired of boasting to her neighbors about Thea's successes and her marriage to wealthy Frederick Ottenburg after his wife's death. Best of all, she liked to remind the townspeople that Thea had once sung in Moonstone, at Maggie Evans' funeral.

Critique:

Jean Giono exhibits a talent that is remarkable in the field of contemporary fiction. His novels achieve a quality of timelessness because in most of his work he deliberately ignores the discoveries of modern science and men's mechanical inventions. Instead, he presents in his books pictures of semi-primitive and pastoral life such as survived until a decade or two ago in his remote region of France. Giono's feeling for nature is deeply mystical, and he attempts to bridge the worlds of inner and outer reality by the use of poetic images and metaphors. His style is vigorous and sensuous. Nowhere does he show himself a lyric novelist of the soil better than he does in Song of the World, a novel which is both an exciting adventure story and a paean in praise of nature and the simple, rustic life.

The Story:

For years the man called Sailor had lived with his wife Junie and their twin sons in a woodcutter's camp in the forest beyond Christol's Pass. Shortly after one of the twins had been killed by a landslide in a clay pit, leaving a widow and a child, the other red-haired twin went north into the Rebeillard country to cut fir trees and raft them down the river. When he failed to return, two months later, Junie became alarmed and sent her husband to ask help of Antonio, who lived on the isle of jays.

Antonio was a fisherman, a fierce, hardy, yet strangely compassionate fellow, wise in the ways of streams and the weather. He carried three scars on his body, a knife wound, a man's bite, and the slash of a billhook, for he was as reckless in a fight as he was daring in making love to the maidens and wives of the river villages. Men called him Golden-mouth. He promised to help Sailor search the river and creeks for some sign of Danis, the red-haired twin.

The men started early the next morning, Antonio on one side of the stream, Sailor on the other. Both were armed, for the Rebeillard region was wild country beyond the gorges. There Maudru, the ox-tamer, kept his great herds, and his word was the only law. The wind blowing from the north was chill with frost as the two men worked their way up the river. Although they found no sign of Danis or his logs, they saw some of Maudru's drovers and heard their horns, which seemed to signal the coming of strangers into the district. Antonio wondered why Maudru's men were on watch.

At nightfall he swam across the river to join Sailor. While they sat by a fire which they had built to warm themselves and cook their food, they heard the moaning of a creature in pain. Investigating, they found a young woman suffering in childbirth. Following the directions of a drover who had been spying on their fire, they carried her and her newborn child to the house of a peasant woman called the mother of the road. The next morning Antonio learned that the unmarried woman he had saved was named Clara and that she was blind. When he saw her for the first time in the daylight he loved her. That day, over the protests of Maudru's men, he killed a wild boar to provide meat for the house. Four drovers came to the house at twilight. They had been sent to the fields near the river gorges to keep two travelers from leaving the country. Because Antonio and Sailor had come into the district, the watchers were uneasy. While Antonio and Sailor waited to see whether the drovers would make a fight of the matter, signal beacons flashed on the northern hills. From what was said Antonio realized that the red-haired twin, for whom the whole country was searching, had been sighted or captured.

Antonio asked the mother of the road to keep the blind woman for him while he and Sailor traveled on toward Villevielle, where they hoped to have some word of Danis' doings from Junie's brother Jérôme, the almanac-vendor and healer. On the way they overtook a cart carrying Médéric, Maudru's nephew, wounded. Danis had shot him. Antonio learned, and the young herder was likely to die. For that reason beacons had burned on the hills. A drover told the story. Years before Gina, Maudru's sister, had run away from her brother's farm at Puberclaire with twenty-three of his drovers and had taken the Maladrerie estate as her own. There she ruled her fields and her bed and bred her sons as she did her bulls. Médéric was the last of her children. Maudru married and had a daughter, Gina. It had been planned that the cousins should marry, but Danis had shot old Gina's son and carried off her namesake. While Maudru's men were searching for the fugitives, the wounded man was being carried to Puberclaire to die.

Giving as their reason a wish to visit the healer of Villevielle, Antonio and Sailor entered the old medieval town and found the house of Jérôme, a hunchback whom the Rebeillard folk called Monsieur Toussaint. Danis and young Gina were hiding in his house. The twin had cut his trees and hidden the raft in Villevielle creek; it was still there. Then he had stolen Gina, but before they could escape down the river Maudru had sent out an alarm. Now his men watched the river and every hamlet and road. The lovers were trapped.

Winter came early in the Rebeillard country. After the first snows Jérôme sent a messenger to tell Junie that Danis and Sailor still lived. Since they were unknown in the town Antonio and Sailor visited the wineshops from time to time and heard the news. Gina grew fretful. Sometimes she treated Danis with great tenderness; sometimes she mocked him because he was not stronger and more clever than her father, or complained because they lived like cuckoos in another's house. In spite of Jérôme's efforts Médéric died. Antonio went to the burial at Maladrerie and met Maudru, a powerful, slow-spoken man. One day Danis went out on skis to inspect his raft and was almost captured. A short time later three of Maudru's men, pretending to be sick, came to Jérôme's house. The inmates realized then that the fugitives had been located. When he ventured out thereafter, Antonio went and came through passages connecting the cellars of the old houses.

One day, when there was a touch of spring in the air, Antonio and Sailor went out through the cellars and drank at an inn. Both became drunk. Antonio pursued a woman whom he mistook for Clara and left Sailor alone. To Sailor, confused by the brandy he had drunk, it seemed that he was young again and about to embark on a long sea voyage. Forgetting to be cautious, he never heard the two drovers who crept up behind him and stabbed him in the back.

Antonio, returning home, discovered that Clara had arrived with Jérôme's messenger. Her child had died and she no longer wished to be alone. In his joy at seeing her Antonio forgot Sailor completely, until Jérôme became alarmed by his absence. Then, with Clara's sense of hearing to tell them where danger might lurk in the darkened streets, Antonio and the healer searched for the old man. When they found him, they carried his body back to the house and called Danis to look at his dead father.

Danis was enraged. That night he and Antonio went to Puberclaire and fired Maudru's barns and house. Many of his prize bulls and tame oxen died in the blaze as the great bull farm was destroyed.

The light of the burning drew off Maudru's watchers, and under cover of the confusion Danis, Gina, Clara, and Antonio started off down the flooded stream on the log raft. Below the gorges they saw green on the trees; spring had arrived. Danis was planning the house he would build for Gina. Antonio thought of his life with Clara on the isle of jays. None of the travelers saw Maudru, alone on horseback, as he watched from a high peak the raft passing below him and out of sight toward the south.

Critique.

José María de Pereda, outstanding among Spanish realists, was the chronicler of the mountainous and coastal region in the north of Spain. A conservative with aristocratic prejudices, he hated the middle class but admired the virtues of the miserable lower classes. His fisher-girl heroine has the finer feelings of a great lady, while the upper-class Luisa is snobbish and ill-bred. The other characters are well portrayed. Vivid descriptions and realistic details of the fishermen's lives make this one of the great sea stories of Spanish literature.

The Story:

Among the ragged youngsters being taught the catechism by Padre Apolinar was a tough ten-year-old called Muergo, or Clam. He lived with Mechelín, a fisherman crippled after years of exposure to the sea. Muergo had for his playmate a barefoot orphan girl named Silda, Mocejón's ward. One day after school the children and the old fisherman went to the waterfront to await the coming of the steamship Montañesa, arriving from Cuba under Captain Bitadura. The captain's young son Andrés was there also, along with Cleto, Mocejón's son, and Colo, who was studying for the priesthood.

Silda was badly treated by Mocejón and Carpia, his nineteen-year-old daughter, and at Andrés' request Padre Apolinar transferred her to Mechelín's tenement apartment. There she learned to keep herself neat, even washing her face once a week, until her admiring foster father said she was as dainty as the leader on his fishing line and because of the likeness nicknamed her Sotileza.

Andrés wanted to study navigation, but his mother, fearing that the sea would destroy him as it had so many others, apprenticed him to Venancio Liencres, to learn bookkeeping. Luisa, Liencres' daughter, embarrassed Andrés by her admiration for the young man.

Sotileza was not beautiful, but as she grew older she became exciting to men. Although she treated her admirers coldly, she kept a warm affection for ugly Muergo and tried to make him save his money for clothes instead of spending it on drink. She paid no attention to Cleto until the day he came home laden with fishing gear and bumped her out of his way on the stairs, making her nose bleed. She got her revenge by flirting with him. His parents were disturbed; they wanted to have nothing to do with a penniless orphan.

Mechelín was torn between his dislike for Mocejón's son and his desire to assure Sotileza's future by marriage to a young man as hard-working as Cleto was. Andrés also liked Sotileza, though without serious intentions. When his sympathy for crippled Mechelín made him persuade his father to help the fisherman get a small boat of his own, spiteful Carpia spread the gossip that Andrés was trying to buy Sotileza. Half believing the report, Cleto begged the priest to intercede with Mocejón for permission to marry the girl.

One day Sotileza decided to accompany the others in Mechelín's boat.

When they went ashore to eat their lunch, Muergo fell asleep. Andrés put his arm around Sotileza and tried to make love to her. She repulsed him.

That night, as Andrés was on his way to the theater with the Liencres family, Luisa criticized the girl she had seen in his company. Reminded of Sotileza, he sneaked away to see her and apologize for his behavior. She forgave him but said that she would never have given in, since honor was all she could offer her foster parents in return for their care. Carpia, having seen him leaving, whispered around that Andrés was seeing Sotileza when she was alone in her apartment.

Rumors that men were to be drafted to serve three years in the Spanish navy hastened many marriages in Santander, and many couples appeared before Padre Apolinar. Cleto courted Sotileza, but she gave no sign of her feelings toward him. The priest carried Cleto's request to Mocejón and his wife.

In the meantime the lower town had challenged the upper town to a regatta, to be held late in August. Sotileza went with Muergo, who was so dressed up that she was amazed. When she tried to comb his ruffled hair with her fingers, he seized her, and she escaped only by picking up a stick and beating him with it. She forgave him, however, and helped him to brush his rumpled suit before they went to the boat races.

At the regatta she cheered the sixteen oarsmen of Cleto's red-striped boat, which won by covering the six miles in twenty-five minutes. That evening, while the fishermen celebrated, everyone took her marriage to Cleto for granted.

Later that night Andrés went to her home and proposed marriage. Sotileza said that she could never accept him. While they argued, Carpia locked them in and then slipped the key under the door before she summoned all the people in the tenement. When Sotileza opened the door, she found the hall full of witnesses. She denounced Carpia's scheme so fiercely that the others were convinced of her innocence, especially after several confessed that they had seen Mocejón's daughter locking the door.

Andrés went home and told his family what had happened. Because he had promised never to see the girl again, his angry father drove him from the house. Captain Bitadura then went to see Mechelín in order to learn the truth. Sotileza assured the captain that she had no intention of marrying his son.

Andrés' mother visited Liencres to discuss a marriage between Luisa and her son. At the same time Luisa asked her brother Tolín to suggest to Andrés that the young clerk give up Sotileza and marry her. When Tolín tried to refuse, Luisa threatened to find Andrés and speak for herself.

Meanwhile Andrés, angry over what had happened, learned from his friend Reñales that the fishermen were going out early the next morning, to make up for days of fog which had kept them ashore. Andrés offered to go along when the boats put out immediately after mass. In one of the other boats was Muergo, making his last trip before being drafted. He was too drunk to know what was happening.

The day was beautiful. The fishermen passed schools of sardines as they went out farther and farther, hunting hake. They came upon thousands of fish and everyone, including Andrés, began to pull them into the boats. In their excitement the fishermen failed to notice a gathering storm. It struck, scattering the fishing fleet. High waves battered the boats. The corpse of Muergo floated by. Reñales, trying to seize the body, was knocked unconscious against the gunwale of his boat. No one in the boat expected to survive, even though they worked valiantly against the power of wind and waves. At last they neared the shore, only to realize that they would be compelled to steer between the narrow walls of the breakwater, a feat none had attempted except Reñales, who lay too bruised and weak to be of any use.

In desperation Andrés finally took the big oar and with injured Reñales to direct him brought the boat in safely. Captain Bitadura, who was watching from a point nearby, cheered for his son.

Muergo was dead; there would be no naval service for him. Cleto, called up, delayed his departure for his wedding ceremony to Sotileza, who had accepted him at last. When the sailors from Santander marched away, Luisa and Andrés watched them from her balcony as they passed.

MR. KEITH, a hedonist

MR. EAMES, an elderly scholar

Critique:

Whether the imaginary island of Nepenthe is also the very real island of Capri remains a topic of dispute. The matter is unimportant, however; Norman Douglas was writing sly and humorous fiction, not a guidebook. South Wind is a collection of character sketches and incidents dealing with a most unusual and amusing group of people who are all affected by the mellow climate of Nepenthe and the warm sirocco winds which blow from the south. The reader is introduced to the inhabitants through a visitor, Bishop Heard, who serves as an observer and interpreter of the people and their problems. Along with the several plots which carry the action, Douglas tells much of the imaginary yet somehow real history of the island. The novel, blandly sophisticated in tone, abounds in touches of absurdity and satire.

The Story:

Bishop Heard went to Nepenthe to meet his cousin, Mrs. Meadows. Her second husband having been unable to leave his post in India, the bishop was to escort Mrs. Meadows and her child to England. The bishop himself was returning from ecclesiastical labors in Bampopo, Africa.

The bishop was introduced to Nepenthe society by Don Francesco, a priest he had met on the boat. The social leader was the American-born Duchess of San Martino, who was about to join the Church through Don Francesco's influence. Other figures were Mr. Keith, a wealthy hedonist; Denis Phipps, a frustrated college student; Mr. Eames, a faithful compiler of material for an annotated edition of a forgotten work on the Antiquities of Nepenthe; Count Caloveglia, an antiquarian interested in the Golden Age of Greece, and Freddy Parker, proprietor of a drinking club which served a strange brand of whiskey bottled by his stepsister.

There was also much talk of some religious fanatics, disciples of an unwashed Russian mystic named Bazhakuloff. Because of a virile apostle named Peter, the group was favored by Madame Steynlin and had access to her villa by the sea. One of the few Englishwomen on the island was Miss Wilberforce, who frequently drank to excess and undressed in the streets at odd times of the day and night. Fortunately, the bishop had developed a tolerant point of view while living among African natives, and he was able to accept these strange characters as he found them.

Except for a festival in honor of Saint Dodekanus and a call on his cousin, who did not seem pleased to see him, the first days of the bishop's stay were uneventful. Then one of the old springs on the island suddenly dried up and the natives reported several unusual births. Next Mr. Parker's stepsister was bitten by a strange insect. She died swiftly and would have been as swiftly buried if the volcano had not erupted at the same time.

Mr. Parker, watching ashes falling over the city, was saddened both by his stepsister's death and by news that a cabinet minister of Nicaragua had been removed from office. Since the minister had made Parker the Nicaraguan finance commissioner for southeastern Europe, the proprietor feared that he was about to lose his pretentious but empty title. Hoping that the Vatican would intercede for him if he were to become a Catholic, he consulted the parish priest and suggested a procession in honor of the island's patron saint to bring an end to the eruption. The priest was delighted to hear such a pious suggestion from a non-Catholic, and before long the holy procession was winding through the ashy streets. Miraculously enough, the ashes stopped falling and rain which followed washed away all traces of nature's upheaval.

The eruption ended, life went on as usual. Several parties were given for Mr. Van Koppen, an American millionaire who visited the island every year. At these parties the bishop heard more about the life of the colony. He talked with Denis and learned about his problems. He heard with amusement of Van Koppen's promise to contribute liberally toward a clinic for Miss Wilberforce, if Mr. Keith would give a like sum. Van Koppen knew that Keith, believing that people should be allowed to do what they liked with their lives, would never part with the amount he had promised.

One day the bishop, visiting Count Caloveglia, found him about to sell the American a small bronze statue of wonderful antique Greek workmanship. To authenticate the statue, which had been unearthed on the count's property, Van Koppen had called in an English art expert. Although the expert declared the piece a real masterpiece and a rare find, Van Koppen knew that the work was a fake. He was willing to pay the price, however, as a compliment to the count's ability to deceive the expert.

The next day the bishop went for a walk along the cliffs with Denis, who was still perturbed about his problem of where to go and what to do. While they rested, the bishop saw that they were in sight of his cousin's villa. As he watched, he saw Mrs. Meadows come out of her house and walk along the cliff with a man who had called himself Muhlen when the bishop met him on the boat. Later he had heard that the man was a blackmailer whose real name was Retlow. He wondered what his cousin was doing with such a person. Suddenly the man disappeared and Mrs. Meadows walked briskly back to her house. The bishop had just watched a murder.

Suddenly he remembered where he had heard the name Retlow before; it had been the name of his cousin's first husband. Doubtless he had been blackmailing her. So far as the bishop could see, she had been justified in killing him. He remembered that on the boat Retlow had said a particularly annoying child ought to be thrown overboard. The bishop decided that Retlow's own end was consistent with his ideas.

Unfortunately, a gold piece which had belonged to Retlow came to light in the possession of a native boy. When the boy was accused of murder, the case became a battle of rival factions. The boy was a cousin of the village priest and Signor Malipizzo, the magistrate, was a Freemason who hoped to discredit the Church through that relationship. To defend the boy, the priest called in the Commendatore Morena, a lawyer who had risen to fame and power through his membership in the Black Hand.

At the trial the boy was judged innocent, chiefly because of Morena's eloquence. He first called the jurors' attention to the crime they would commit if they removed the boy from his mother, a relationship which had been important to so many famous men. Then, learning that the boy was an orphan, he shifted his argument to show what an injustice they would commit if they convicted an innocent boy. The accused went free. Under the circumstances the bishop resolved to say nothing of Mrs. Meadows' guilt. She seemed a different woman, now that her fears of blackmail had been removed, and nobody had suffered from the murder but Retlow, who deserved his fate.

Denis finally became angry at Mr. Keith's drunken meddling, and he told the old hedonist to shut up. It was the first time Denis had ever made a decision for himself and carried it through. His visit to Nepenthe had started him on the road to manhood.

On the whole, reflected the bishop, most matters affecting the people of Nepenthe turned out well in the end.

THE SPANISH TRAGEDY

Type of work: Drama

Type of plot: Tragedy of revenge

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: The Spanish and Portuguese courts

First presented: c. 1586

Principal characters:

GHOST OF DON ANDREA, a murdered Spanish nobleman

BALTHAZAR, Prince of Portugal

LORENZO, a Spanish nobleman

BEL-IMPERIA, fiancée of Don Andrea before his death

HIERONIMO, a Spanish general

HORATIO, Andrea's friend and Hieronimo's son

ALEXANDRO, and

VILLUPO, Portuguese noblemen

Critique:

The Spanish Tragedy, one of the most popular English plays of the sixteenth century, marked a change from the earlier, stilted English drama. Kyd built his plot on a foundation of three conventional devices found in the Roman tragedies of Seneca. One was a ghost; the second was revenge for a murdered relative, and the third was a liberal use of bombast and soliloquy in the dialogue. To these he added queer and amazing characters with strange psychological twists: madmen, murderers, suicides. He also employed a play within the play, public hangings, and other items new to English drama. As a pioneer playwright, Kyd, in this play, pointed the way to the lurid, bloodthirsty revenge plays of the Jacobean and Caroline stage. The popularity of The Spanish Tragedy can be partly seen in the fact that it is known to have gone through at least ten editions by 1634.

The Story:

Don Andrea, a Spanish nobleman, was killed in battle with the Portuguese. When his soul descended to the underworld, Pluto sent it with the Spirit of Revenge to learn what had happened after his death.

At the Spanish court Andrea heard that the Portuguese had been defeated in war and that Balthazar, Prince of Portugal, had been taken prisoner. Balthazar, he learned, was the man who had killed him. A quarrel had developed between Lorenzo and Horatio, each claiming the honor of capturing Balthazar.

Meanwhile, at the Portuguese court, Villupo told the viceroy that his son Balthazar was dead, having been killed by traitorous Alexandro. Alexandro was then sentenced to death.

Balthazar, while a prisoner, fell in love with Bel-Imperia, as did Horatio. Bel-Imperia, who had been the fiancée of dead Andrea, fell in love with Horatio. At this time plans were proposed for a treaty of peace between Spain and Portugal. These events were all distasteful to Andrea's Ghost. He was comforted, however, by Revenge's promise that grim fate would overtake all concerned.

Balthazar, aided by Lorenzo, planned to win the love of Bel-Imperia. Lorenzo sent a servant to spy on Bel-Imperia and to discover whom she loved. When he returned to tell his master that Bel-Imperia was in love with Horatio, Lorenzo and Balthazar plotted Horatio's death.

But the King of Spain planned to make diplomatic use of Bel-Imperia by marrying her, his niece, to Portuguese Prince Balthazar, thus cementing the friendship of the two countries. The king warned her that she must do his will.

One night, when Bel-Imperia and Horatio met in the garden, Horatio was set upon by Balthazar and Lorenzo and hanged. After his death Bel-Imperia was taken away by Lorenzo and Balthazar. When the body was discovered, Hieronimo, Horatio's father, went mad, as did his wife. Seeing all, Andrea's Ghost became even more bitter. The Spirit of Revenge told him to be patient.

The ambassador to Spain, returning to the Portuguese court, arrived in time to prevent the death of Alexandro, for he brought word that Balthazar still lived. Villupo, who had plotted Alexandro's death in hopes of preferment, was sentenced to die.

In Spain, Hieronimo, partly recovered from his madness, plotted to avenge his son's murder. Afraid of Hieronimo, Lorenzo and Balthazar planned to murder one of their accomplices, lest he give away their secrets. They had him slain by another of their accomplices. When the murderer was arrested and sentenced to hang, they told him he would be saved with a pardon. The man went to his death in silence, or so Lorenzo and Balthazar believed. Before his execution, however, he had written a confession in which he told the true story of Horatio's death, and he had sent the document to Hieronimo.

Meanwhile Lorenzo and Balthazar had imprisoned Bel-Imperia in hopes of forcing her to marry Balthazar. She, bewildered by all that had happened, finally believed Lorenzo's statement that she would only suffer her father's and the king's anger if she failed to marry Balthazar willingly.

Balthazar and Lorenzo enlisted Hieronimo's aid in presenting an entertainment for the Spanish court and the Portuguese viceroy, who had arrived to swear fealty to the King of Spain. Hieronimo suggested that they do a play that he had written and silenced their protestations with the observation that even Nero had not considered it beneath his dignity to act in a play. The play, he told them, was to be a tragedy befitting royal actors and on-lookers.

In the meantime Hieronimo's mad wife, still lamenting the death of her son, cut down the arbor where he was hanged by his assailants, and stabbed herself. Hers was the fourth death in the action watched by Andrea's Ghost and the Spirit of Revenge.

That evening the royal party gathered for the play which Hieronimo and the others were to present. When the party entered, Hieronimo insisted that they all enter a gallery, lock the door, and throw the key down to him. The king, thinking nothing amiss, agreed to do so. Thus the stage was set for Hieronimo to avenge the murder of his son.

In the play Balthazar played the Emperor Soliman, Lorenzo played a bashaw, and Bel-Imperia played a Christian girl captured and given to Soliman. While Soliman and the bashaw argued over the girl, a third character, acted by Hieronimo, entered and killed the bashaw, and the captured Christian girl killed the stage emperor. Then, stopping the applause for the fine performance, Hieronimo introduced the body of his dead son and assured the audience that the deaths they had watched were real. Then he ran to hang himself before the royal party could break out of the locked gallery.

Overtaken by courtiers before he could kill himself, he bit out his own tongue to prevent a confession. Told to confess in writing, he gestured for a knife to sharpen the pen. With that weapon he stabbed the king's brother and himself, thus bringing the number of deaths to eight.

At the end, Andrea's Ghost, which had been watching all the while, announced to the Spirit of Revenge that he was satisfied; all his enemies had received their just deserts. Revenge told him that they would return to the underworld, where Andrea could watch his enemies in their torment and consort happily with his friends.

PABLO, a saxophonist

MARIA, a demi-mondaine

Critique:

Steppenwolf is an important work by an important German novelist and poet who won the Nobel prize in 1946. This novel is an unusual combination of smooth, compelling narrative and deep insight into the conflict between nature and spirit. In a way, this conflict is an allegory of Germany, buffeted and anchorless, after her defeat in 1918. In Haller, Hesse has given us an understanding of the German renaissance which was aborted into Nazism. In a larger way the conflict is that of the roaring twenties when the lost generation sought a path out of the maze. The solution is as inevitable as it is unappealing.

The Story:

The aunt, who kept a spotless bourgeois house, was attracted to Harry

Haller, the new lodger who had rented her attic. Her nephew, however, was suspicious of Haller. His suspicions were first aroused when the lodger asked them not to report his domicile to the police; he explained that he had a repugnance for official contacts. His room was always in disorder; cigar ends and ashes, wine and brandy, pictures and books littered the apartment.

Haller was about fifty, sometimes in poor health and addicted to pain killers. He arose very late and became active only at night. He was invariably polite, but remote. Once the nephew found him sitting on the stairs near a landing. Haller explained that the landing, redolent of wax and turpentine and decorated with washed plants, seemed to him the epitome of bourgeois order. Occasionally a pretty girl came to see Haller for a short time; her final visit ended in a bitter quarrel.

One day Haller disappeared, after meticulously paying his accounts. He left behind a manuscript, written during his stay, which told the story of a steppenwolf. The nephew, sure that Haller was not dead, made the account public.

Haller, nearing fifty, had suffered a series of blows. His wife, becoming mad, chased him from the house. His profession was closed to him. Living a solitary life, he became a divided personality. On the one side he was a neat, calm bourgeois; on the other, he was a wolf from the steppes. When he acted politely and genteelly, the gaunt world mocked his respectability. When he snarled and withdrew from society, his bourgeois self was shocked. It seemed that he was a true steppenwolf.

On a solitary night ramble, he thought he saw an electric sign over a Gothic door in an old wall. The words, which he could barely make out, told of a magic show only for madmen. A little later he saw a peddler with a similar sign. Eagerly he bought from a hawker a treatise on the steppenwolf which he avidly read.

The treatise explained the popular concept of a steppenwolf, half-wolf and half-man through mischance or spell. But this concept was oversimplified. Every one was composed not of two selves, but of many selves. The great bulk of the populace was held to one self through the rigid patterns of the sheep-like bourgeoisie; but here and there a few men, ostensibly complying, were not really part of the pattern. They acted like the lone wolf. They were the leaders in all fields.

Meditating on this philosophy, Haller understood his own nature a little more clearly, but he could scarcely think of himself as containing many selves.

An old acquaintance, a professor, met him and insisted on inviting him to dinner. The occasion was not a happy one. The professor and his wife were naïvely jingoistic and approved a vicious newspaper attack on a Haller who had written that perhaps the Germans shared the war guilt of 1914 to 1918. The professor, of course, did not realize that the writer was his guest, for Haller was a common name. Then Haller ridiculed a pompous painting of Goethe which was greatly prized by the professor's wife.

Feeling the wolf in him dominant, he dropped in at the Black Eagle Tavern, where merriment reigned riotous. At the bar he encountered a young girl who was sympathetic. He told her his long tale of woe: the professor's dinner; his mad wife; Erica, whom he saw only every few months and with whom he quarreled. The girl, who refused to give her name, good-naturedly ridiculed his pre-occupations with Mozart and Indian myths when he did not even know how to dance. She seemed almost motherly in her concern for him; and when he confessed he was afraid to go back to his lodging, she sent him upstairs to sleep. Before they parted, Haller made a dinner date with her.

At their next meeting the girl, who gave her name as Hermine, set out to make Haller a different person. She would help him for friendship's sake, so that in the end Haller would love her enough to kill her. Haller himself had thought of death; in fact, he was seriously contemplating suicide on his fiftieth birthday. Perhaps that was why he thought so little of Hermine's strange plan.

Hermine began her campaign. First she took him shopping for a gramophone, and in his cluttered room he took dancing lessons. Although he was stiff, he learned the steps of the foxtrot. Then she took him to a tavern to dance. At her urging he asked the most beautiful girl there, Maria, to be his partner. To his amazement, she accepted, and they danced well together. Hermine complimented him on his progress.

Late one night, as Haller returned quietly to his bedroom, he found Maria in his bed. Thinking himself too old for her, Haller was hesitant; but Maria was so sympathetic that he lost his reluctance. He met Maria frequently in another room he rented nearby. Haller was grateful to Hermine, who had arranged it all. She kept track of his progress in love. After some time Haller realized that only through a lesbian relation could Hermine have known Maria's technique so well.

Another new acquaintance was Pablo, a gentle, accommodating saxophonist. He agreed readily with Haller's criticisms of modern jazz and his preference for Mozart. But music, to Pablo, was not something to criticize; it was something to enjoy, and dancers enjoyed his music. Part of Pablo's great popularity came from his ability to provide drugs for jaded prostitutes. One night Pablo invited Haller and Maria to his room and proposed a love episode for three. Haller refused abruptly, but Maria would have liked to accept.

Hermine several times hinted that she was more unhappy than Haller. He was learning other sides of life, but she knew only a life of pleasure and the senses. She was hoping that Haller would come to love her, because at the coming masquerade ball she would give her last command.

At the big dance, Hermine was dressed as a man, reminding Haller of his friend Hermann. They danced with many different women. When Hermine finally changed to women's clothes, Haller knew he loved her.

After the ball Pablo took them up to his peep show. There in a hall of mirrors Haller saw his many selves and in the various booths he lived his many lives. In one booth he killed automobile drivers recklessly. In another he met all the girls he had ever loved. Toward the end he was with Mozart, a laughing, reckless Mozart who played Handel on a radio.

The whirling came to an end. In the last booth he saw Hermine and Pablo naked on a rug. They were asleep, satiated with love. Haller stabbed Hermine under the breast. In the court Mozart was his friend and comforted him when the judges sentenced him to eternal life; he was to be laughed out of court. Mozart turned into Pablo, who picked up Hermine's body, shrank it to figurine size, and put it in his pocket.

Critique:

Stone Desert—Desierta de Piedra in the original—has been for Latin-American readers a favorite among the thirty-two titles written by this most prolific of Argentine novelists. Afraid that his origins in Cordoba might handicap his sales, Martínez Zuviría hid his identity under a pen name when he published his first novel in 1911. Since that time his books, written under the name of Hugo Wast, have sold almost two million copies, with three hundred editions in Spanish and seventy others in translation. In Stone Desert, Marcela speaks for the writer when she voices her opinion that a return to nature is the best cure for decadent city life. The novel also expresses the author's belief that the hope for Argentina lies in the toil of hard-working immigrants, combined with a change in the attitude of the country's easygoing, wasteful citizens.

The Story:

One foggy April morning a weary gaucho stopped at the house of Doña Silvestre and her husband, Froilán Palacios, an overseer on a ranch owned by old Pedro Pablo Ontiveros. The traveler's pallid face showed that he had recently been in prison. After receiving meat and bread, he betrayed his familiarity with the region around Real de San Eloy by starting out for the town of Canteros over a trail unknown to most of the natives.

Early the next morning, near the main ranch house on the Ontiveros estate, he found a girl's bare footprints in the sand by the river. A short time later a boy appeared. He was Aquiles, a great-nephew of old Pepablo, as everyone called Don Pedro. The boy said that the tracks had been made by his sister Marcela. The traveler introduced himself as Juan-without-a-Country, but when he stopped at the tavern in Canteros, old Pepablo recognized him as Roque Carpio, a gaucho exiled to the Argentine penal colony at Ushuaia for killing his unfaithful wife twenty-five years before.

With old Pepablo was his nephew Midas. A failure in Buenos Aires, he had brought his daughter Marcela, his sons Aquiles and Hector, and his mother-in-law, Doña Claudia, to live on Pepablo's run-down ranch. Marcela wished to restore the property with the help of Leopolda, the mannish wife of Overseer Difunto. Pepablo scoffed at her plan. Hard work was for gringos like his Spanish neighbor, Isidro Puentes, ambitious owner of a farm which had once belonged to Roque Carpio.

The old man did admire Marcela, however, and gradually turned the ranch over to her management. While searching for missing cattle, she had left the footprints seen by Roque. She found her cows in Puentes' barley field. The gringo, hoping to arrange a match between her and his son Alfonso, had let the starving animals graze. Marcela scorned Alfonso, partly because the neatness of Puentes' farm, in contrast with Pepablo's establishment, hurt her pride. Once, however, she asked his help when she ran a thorn into her arm.

Increasing drought brought death to Pepablo's cattle. Aquiles and Hector tried to bring rain by staking out a toad in the patio. A storm came, washing out Puentes' barley fields. Pepablo was delighted. When the gringo took advantage of the rainwater to drown burrowing hares that had been ruining his fields, Marcela wanted to follow his example. But Pepablo was too proud to imitate a gringo. Besides, the hares provided food for his dogs.

Marcela then suggested that they round up the remaining cattle and drive them to higher pastures. Pepablo promised her half the calves that could be saved. The score of neighbors she invited to the roundup spent the night at the house of Froilán Palacios at Real de San Eloy. Roque Carpio joined them for a cup of mate before he went home through a howling storm, leaving Marcela convinced that city-dwellers were weak in contrast to rugged country people. A conversation she overheard later made her suspect that Roque was stealing and branding cattle.

Snow fell. Marcela hired Don Tertulio, a bonesetter and local treasure seeker, to make some repairs at the ranch house. At the feast of San Pedro and San Pablo, Pepablo was to carry the cross in the religious procession. When Marcela discovered that rats had eaten his best shoes, she got him a new pair. They were so stiff that Pepablo slipped them off during dinner and the dogs gnawed them.

Midas, meanwhile, had been busy with a scheme to make church candles from beeswax. Failing in that venture, he threatened to take his family back to Buenos Aires. As a bribe Pepablo unearthed some money he had hoarded and set his nephew up as an antique dealer. That project also failed. Midas' next plan was to cut down the algarrobo trees which were Pepablo's especial pride and sell the timber. By cajolery and threats he secured the old man's permission to fell the trees, but the sound of the woodsmen's axes was more than Pepablo could stand. He died, leaving the house and the trees to Midas, the rest of his property to Marcela.

Midas promptly sold his share to Puentes and moved his family to the overseer's house at Real de San Eloy. Marcela hoped that life on that rugged tableland would purge their blood of city-created decadence. After discharging Froilán, whom she suspected of conniving with Roque, she herself ran the ranch.

Froilán, with Doña Silvestre and their daughter Monica, opened a tavern and store. Roque and Midas were among his customers, and Midas discussed his grandiose schemes with the outlaw. He once asked Roque, jokingly, why he did not carry some girl away to one of his mountain caves.

The question turned Roque's thoughts to a plan to win Marcela. He killed a cow, making the death seem like the work of a mountain lion, so that Marcela would organize a lion hunt. But his plan to steal her away at that time was frustrated by the arrival of Melitón Bazán, a famous hunter who stirred Roque to rivalry by his claim that he carried only two cartridges because he never saw more than two lions at a time. During the hunt Roque and Melitón each killed a lion. Alfonso Puentes shot Roque's dog in order to protect three cubs Marcela wanted. Only Marcela's quick defense saved the young man from the gaucho's fury. Roque left, angry.

After a week of sulking Roque bribed Froilán to keep Midas late at the tavern, so that Marcela would be left unprotected. Awakened by the noise of Roque's arrival, she called Doña Claudia. When they saw the outer door opening, they threw themselves against it. Even the small boys helped. The intruder thrust a foot inside, but Marcela managed to wedge the bar tightly, trapping him. Roque argued at first; then he threatened her. With a pair of scissors, the only weapon she could find, she kept jabbing at his leg through his boot until he collapsed from loss of blood. Returning, Midas found the outlaw dead. None mourned him except Monica, with whom he had flirted.

Because of litigations in the district, Puentes could not take possession of Midas' property, and he returned it in exchange for the right to build an irrigation ditch for his alfalfa fields. Marcela, unwilling to stay at bloodstained Real de San Eloy, left the place in care of a new overseer and returned to repair Pepablo's house, more dilapidated than ever since Don Tertulio had pierced the walls while looking for hidden treasure. By the time the fig trees were in leaf she had made the old ranch house comfortable and attractive.

One day she encountered Alfonso again. With her ideas about Roque and his wild life clear to her at last, and with her false pride and irritation gone after her discovery that she could run a farm as efficiently as any foreigner, she began to realize the good qualities of the young gringo. Again she had a thorn in her hand, and once more she asked his help in removing it. This time she was quite happy when he kissed her.

THE STORY OF BURNT NJAL

Type of work: Saga

Author: Unknown

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: Tenth century

Locale: Iceland

First transcribed: Thirteenth-century manuscript

Principal characters:

NJAL, a man of law

BERGTHORA, his wife

GUNNAR, Njal's friend

HALLGERDA, Gunnar's wife

FLOSI, Njal's enemy

Critique:

The Story of Burnt Njal is the most elaborate and probably the best known of the thirty-odd Icelandic sagas which have come down to us from the heroic age of the Vikings. These works belong to primitive literature, and they deal with the simple, deep passions and forthright, flaring violence of a primitive people. The sagas are never dull reading. The action is always swift and varied, the characters are real, and the style is clear and terse. Lawman Njal and his neighbors are more than figures in a tale of violence and intrigue; they stand also for a people, a society, and an age.

The Story:

In those days Harold Grayfell ruled in Norway. Hrut Heriolfsson had come out of Iceland to claim an inheritance, and he sat on the high seat of Gunnhilda, the king's mother. He was handsome and strong. He found favor with the king as well, so that he claimed his inheritance and got a great store of rich goods while sea-roving. Then he sailed back to Iceland, but not before Gunnhilda put a spell on him that he might never have pleasure living with the woman he had set his heart on.

Soon after Hrut married Unna, Fiddle Mord's daughter. Things did not go smoothly between Hrut and Unna and she soon left him. When Mord asked at the Thing for her goods to be returned, Hrut offered to fight him instead. Mord refused and got great shame by his suit.

Hrut's brother Hauskuld had a fair daughter, Hallgerda, but she was hard-hearted. She married Thorwald Oswifsson and he was killed by Thiofolf, her foster father. Then she married Glum, son of Olof the Hall, and he was murdered. Then she sent Thiofolf to Hrut to tell of Glum's death and Hrut struck him dead.

Fiddle Mord died and Unna ran through her goods. Then she asked her kinsman Gunnar Hamondsson to get back her goods from Hrut. Gunnar was the best skilled in arms of all men. His brother's name was Kolskegg.

Njal was Gunnar's friend. They swore nothing should come between them. Njal was so great a lawyer that his match was not to be found. Bergthora was his wife.

Gunnar asked Njal how to get Unna's goods and Njal advised him to trick Hrut into summoning himself to the Thing where the suit would be tried. There Gunnar challenged Hrut to single combat, but Hauskuld made Hrut pay the money. There was much ill feeling.

Gunnar and Kolskegg went sea-roving and came back with much goods. They rode to the Thing and there Gunnar saw Hallgerda and asked for her. Njal foretold ill from this but went to the wedding.

At the wedding Thrain Sigfusson put away his shrewish wife and asked for Thorgerda, Hallgerda's daughter. So there were two weddings.

Each year Gunnar and Njal had feasts for friendship's sake. Njal had it the year Bergthora insulted Hallgerda and Hallgerda asked Gunnar to avenge her. Gunnar refused and took her home. Then Hallgerda had Bergthora's thrall killed. Gunnar paid atonement to Njal. Bergthora retaliated and Njal paid for that death. The women urged their men on until Njal's sons were involved, but Gunnar and Njal kept their friendship.

When Otkell Skarfsson tricked Gunnar into buying a deceitful thrall, Hallgerda sent him to burn Otkell's storehouse. Gunnar offered atonement but refused Otkell friendship. Then Otkell gave Gunnar a hurt and Gunnar killed Otkell. This was the beginning of Gunnar's manslayings. Njal warned him not to kill more than one man in the same stock or he would get his death.

Then Starkad, son of Bork the Waxy-toothed Blade, challenged Gunnar to a horse fight. Thorgeir Otkellsson was hurt and wanted to be revenged against Gunnar. Starkad, his son Thorgeir, and Thorgeir Otkellsson tried to ambush Gunnar, and Thorgeir Otkellsson was killed. This was the second man slain in the same stock. Thorgeir Starkadsson swore vengeance. At the Thing the atonement was that Gunnar and Kolskegg were to go away within three years or be slain by the kinsmen of those they had killed.

They made plans to go abroad, but as they rode away Gunnar's horse threw him with his face turned toward home. When he decided not to go, Kolskegg went alone. Gunnar was outlawed. Njal warned him that Geir the Priest was getting up a band to slay him, and Gunnar asked Njal to see after his son Hogni.

When Geir the Priest and his men came to Gunnar's house, they killed his bound Sam. Sam howled loudly before he died, so that Gunnar was prepared. Gunnar put up a long fight and killed two men and wounded sixteen before his enemies pulled the roof off his house to get at him.

They built a cairn over Gunnar. Skarphedinn Njalsson and Hogni Gunnarsson saw the cairn open, and Gunnar with a merry face sang a song before the cairn closed again. Then Skarphedinn and Hogni killed Starkad and Thorgeir Starkadsson and avenged Gunnar.

Njal's sons then went abroad and wrongs piled up between them and Thrain Sigfusson in the Orkneys. Kari Solmundsson was with them. When they came back, Skarphedinn killed Thrain. Kettle of the Mark was Thrain's brother but Njal's son-in-law, and so Kettle and Njal made atonement. Njal took Hauskuld Thrainsson as his foster son. Kari asked for and got Njal's daughter Helge to wife.

Then Flosi Thordsson became involved in the feud. He was tall and bold.

There was a change of rulers in Norway. Olaf Tryggvissun made a change of faith and sent Thangbrand to Iceland to preach Christianity. He did that by challenging any man who spoke against the new faith. At the Thing Thorgeir of Lightwater challenged the men for the new law and they all made pledges. Then Njal went to Flosi to ask his daughter Hildigunna for his foster son Hauskuld. She said she would not be wedded unless they would get Hauskuld a priesthood.

Njal tried to get a priesthood for Hauskuld, but no one would sell his. At the Thing that summer, when no one could get his suit settled, Njal said it would be wiser to have a Fifth Court to take over those suits that could not be finished in the Quarter Courts. And so Skapti Thorodsson brought the Fifth Court into law. Then Njal begged a new priesthood for Hauskuld, and Hildigunna and Hauskuld were married.

Soon after Lyting, Thrain's sister's husband, took offense at Hauskuld, Njal's baseborn son, and killed him. Rodny, Hauskuld's mother laid it upon Skarphedinn to avenge that death. Skarphedinn and his brothers went after Lyting and his brothers. When Njal's foster son Hauskuld made atonement for the slaying, Aumund, Hauskuld Njalsson's baseborn and blind son, came to Lyting at the Thing and demanded his share. Lyting refused. When Aumund came to the door, he turned short around and his eyes were opened. Then he ran straight to Lyting and killed him with an ax. Aumund turned to go out again and his eyes were sealed. Njal made the atonement.

Mord Valgardsson planned to talebear before Njal's sons so that they would kill Hauskuld the Priest. A coolness sprang up between Njal's sons and Hauskuld. Finally, Mord with them, Njal's sons slew Hauskuld. Njal said the next deaths would be his and those of his wife and sons.

Hauskuld's death brought his father-in-law Flosi Thordsson much grief and wrath. He gathered together a great band. Skarphedinn sought help, and they all went to the Thing. There the atonement fell through. Flosi gathered his men for an attack with fire and sword on Njal's sons.

Njal gathered all his sons in the house and Flosi's band tried to master them with weapons. When the attackers had got great manscathe with many wounded, Flosi took fire and made great piles before the doors. He called the women out, and Helgi Njalsson tried to escape with them but was killed. Bergthora stayed indoors with Njal and Kari's son Thord. The three lay down on the bed with an oxhide over them. Then the fires burned hot and timbers began to fall. Kari ran along the crossbeams and beat his way out with a burning bench. He was hidden by the smoke as he ran away. Skarphedinn tried to follow but was pinned to the wall, and Grim fell dead in the fire. After Flosi's men were sure Skarphedinn was dead, they heard him sing a song. When men came to find them, Njal and Thord and Bergthora were not burned, but the oxhide was shriveled.

Flosi dreamed that many men would die. Kari set about getting his men together. They all went to the Thing. All who wished to avenge the burning shouted their war cries. Many men were killed before an atonement was reached. Since Kari would not have that atonement cover the burning, there was another award for that. The payment covered all but Thord Karisson. Flosi and his men were to go abroad.

Thorgeir Craggeir, a kinsman, went along with Kari. They came upon some of Flosi's men and killed them. Then Flosi made an atonement with Thorgeir, so that Kari would be left alone. Kari said he would take it ill if Thorgeir did not make his peace. He agreed that the burning was avenged but not his son's death.

Then Kari went to the Orkneys and killed more men who had sailed out of Iceland until he had slain fifteen. His wife died while he was sea-roving.

Then Kari and Flosi made separate pilgrimages south for absolution. When they came home, Kari went straight to Flosi's house. Flosi sprang up and kissed Kari. Then they were fully atoned, and Flosi gave to Kari his brother's daughter Hildigunna. They dwelt there a long time.

MRS. AMOS EVANS, his mother
GORDON EVANS, Nina's son
EDMUND DARRELL, a doctor, Nina's lover
CHARLES MARSDEN, a novelist
MADELINE ARNOLD, in love with Gordon

Critique:

Strange Interlude is a frankly experimental drama in which Eugene O'Neill attempts to bring to the stage the stream of consciousness technique of the modern novel. By means of technical devices such as the soliloquy and the aside he allows his characters to reveal to the theater audience their inner thoughts and feelings. These devices, artificial in themselves, contribute, nevertheless, to the plastic and imaginative freedom of the play. The writer's concern for the inward or sub-conscious mentality of his people reflects the widespread interest of the 1920's in Freudian imagery and theory.

The Story:

If Nina Leeds had married her first love, Gordon Shaw, her whole life might have been different. But Gordon went off to the war in France, and when his plane burst into flames and crashed near Sedan, he left Nina with nothing to show for her life.

Before he went away Gordon had urged Nina to marry him, but her father had objected. Now Gordon was dead, and Nina had not even the memory of one night alone with him. As a consequence she threw herself indiscriminately into affairs with one soldier after another, those who like Gordon were going out to die, because she thought she could give to others what Gordon had been denied. But promiscuity failed to ease her own sorrow, and she returned to her father's house an embittered and lonely woman. She was particularly bitter toward her father, a professor in the university, for she rightly suspected that it was her father's jealousy, his irrational desire to keep her with him, which had been responsible for his opposition to her marriage with Gordon.

Nina had an admirer in Charles Marsden, the novelist, an old friend of her father. Marsden had known Nina since she was a little girl and he had often thought of marrying her. But since he was attached to his aging mother, who did not entirely approve of Nina, he never got around to proposing. Her half-serious, half-mocking fondness for him annoyed Marsden; it was a reminder of his own failure to come to grips with life.

Nina had another admirer of quite a different nature in Dr. Edmund Darrell, an ambitious young physician who had taken an interest in Nina's case when she was a nurse in the hospital of which he was a staff member. Although he found her attractive, Darrell had no intention of endangering his career by an involvement with a neurotic woman. Nevertheless he did realize that she needed help, and he concluded that a husband and a child would be the logical solution for her difficulties. His choice was Sam Evans, scion of a well-to-do family, who was already in love with Nina.

In the meantime Professor Leeds, Nina's father, had died, and she turned almost automatically to Marsden as a kind of surrogate. When Marsden, taking his cue from Darrell, suggested Evans as a possible husband, Nina drowsily assented. Sam Evans married Nina realizing that she was not in love with him, but he lived in the hope that a child would bring them closer together. About seven months after she came to live on the Evans homestead in northern New York State, Nina found herself pregnant, but when she confided her condition to her mother-in-law, Mrs. Evans found it necessary to reveal several family secrets which she had kept hidden even from her own son.

One was that Sam's aunt, hopelessly insane, lived on the top floor of the old house, and the other was that Sam's grandmother and her father before her had both died in an asylum. Overwhelmed by the situation in which she found herself, Nina could think of no way out except to get rid of her child through an operation and to leave Sam. Mrs. Evans protested, pointing out that Sam needed her, that he needed the confidence a child would give him, even if this child were not his own.

Pondering this idea, Nina encountered Darrell, who had just returned from Europe, and revealed to him the true circumstances of her marriage. Darrell, realizing that he was partly responsible for her predicament, considered the situation. At last he and Nina decided that it would be best for Nina to have a child, with Darrell himself as the father.

This plan worked out very well so far as Sam Evans was concerned. When he learned that his wife was to have a child, he was delighted. But, unfortunately, Nina and Darrell were unable to go on as dispassionately as they had planned. Nina fell in love with the real father of her child, and in spite of the risk to his career Darrell could not tear himself free of Nina.

Fatherhood made a startling change in Sam Evans. The old look of self-conscious inferiority disappeared from his face, and there was in its place a look of determination and confidence. Nina also had changed. She was noticeably older, but there was on her face an expression of peace and calm which had never been there before. But Marsden had changed most of all. His mother had died in the meantime, and he had aged. His hair was almost pure white.

When Darrell returned from Europe, ostensibly because of his father's death but actually because he could stay away no longer from the woman he loved, Nina for the first time in her life felt complete, surrounded as she was by her men—her spiritual father, her husband, her lover, and her son.

The next eleven years brought still more changes into these linked lives. Darrell and Marsden had backed Sam Evans in one of his enterprises, and as a result all had become wealthy men. Darrell had long ago given up his career in medicine. Marsden, on the other hand, had taken to writing genteel novels about dear old ladies and devilish bachelors, stories completely unrelated to real life.

Young Gordon Evans had no use for his real father, whom he called Uncle Ned, and quarreled with him on the slightest provocation. He identified himself completely with his mother's stories of Gordon Shaw, built up by Nina into a hero in the boy's imagination.

As time went by, Darrell managed to break the stranglehold Nina had on his soul, devoting himself as assiduously to biology as he had formerly to medicine. He became his own firm self again, impervious to all of Nina's wiles. But as she grew older, Nina's neurotic tendencies increased. She became the possessive mother in her opposition to Gordon's marriage to Madeline, a girl of good family, even going so far as to consider informing Madeline of the strain of insanity in the Evans family. She grew to hate Sam Evans and at times actively wished for his death, a wish that was fulfilled when Sam suffered a stroke while witnessing Gordon's victory over the Navy crew.

After Sam Evans' death, Gordon somehow could not throw off the feeling that his mother had never loved his father, and he remembered a time in his boyhood when he had seen his Uncle Ned kiss his mother. This memory was repressed, but it burst out one day when Gordon slapped Darrell across the face during an argument. Gordon instantly regretted his act and apologized, and the matter ended without his realization that Sam Evans was not his real father.

At last Nina was really alone. She had finally given her consent to her son's marriage to Madeline. Her own marriage to Darrell at this late date would have been out of the question. There were too many memories of a regretful past between them. So Nina was left alone with Marsden, who had waited patiently all these years until she turned like a daughter to him at last.

HIS FIFTY MAIDEN DAUGHTERS

PELAGUS, King of Argos

THE FIFTY SONS OF AEGYPTUS, BROTHER OF DANAUS

Critique:

The Suppliants, although complete artistically, seems to be a part of a larger pattern, possibly a trilogy, which probably told the complete, tragic story of Danaus and Aegyptus and their sons and daughters. The value of The Suppliants to the student of drama lies in the fact that it bridged the gap between the purely lyric phase of Greek drama and that glorious phase in which character and situation were developed to almost unbelievable heights of artistic perfection. In this play the protagonist is the chorus of maidens; Pelagus, in his timidity, is almost three-dimensional, thus foreshadowing the great characters of the classic drama written during subsequent decades.

The Story:

Danaus and his fifty maiden daughters fled from Egypt after Danaus' brother, Aegyptus, had decided that his fifty sons should take their cousins to wife. At last the fugitives reached the shores of Argos, the land of their illustrious ancestress, Io, a mortal who had been loved by Zeus.

Holding olive branches wrapped in wool, the maidens sought, before an Agave altar, Zeus' protection of their purity. Their supplications to the father of the gods included the wish that the sons of Aegyptus might meet disaster at sea between Egypt and Argos. In fear of being forced to marry Aegyptus' sons, the maidens also invoked the wretched Procne, who had been given in marriage to the perfidious Tereus, and who took the life of her child, Itylus, out of hatred for her husband. They repeated their supplication to Zeus to protect them from forced love; they invoked Artemis, the goddess of chastity, to be favorable to them. They declared that they would end their own lives before they would submit to the sons of Aegyptus.

Danaus, observing that someone approached, cautioned his daughters to stay near the altar and to conduct themselves with modesty. Meanwhile they invoked not only Zeus but Apollo as well, who himself was once an exile. They prayed to Poseidon, god of the sea, and to Hermes, the messenger of the gods. Danaus recalled that the gods were merciless to those who indulged in lustful pleasures.

A man, followed by servants and warriors, entered the sacred area. Seeing that the maidens wore Oriental clothing and that suppliant wands had been placed on the altar, he asked whence Danaus and the young women had come. Questioned in turn, he disclosed that he was Pelasgus, King of Argos. One of the maidens then told him that they were of Argive stock, descendants of Io, the Argive woman who had given birth to a son by Zeus. Pelasgus interrupted to remark that the maidens appeared to be North Africans, and akin to the Amazons, rather than Grecian.

The maiden then resumed her tale. When Hera, wife of Zeus, saw that Zeus loved the mortal Io, she transformed Io into a heifer, over whom she placed Argus, the many-eyed god, as a guard. Further, Hera created a gadfly which she willed to sting Io into a miserable, wandering existence on earth. When Io, in her wanderings, came to Memphis, in Egypt, by mystical union with Zeus—the touch of his hand—she gave birth to a son. She named him Epaphus, from the nature of his birth. Epaphus had a daughter, Libya, after whom a great stretch of North Africa was named. Libya had a son, Belus, who fathered two sons, Danaus and Aegyptus. Danaus was the father of fifty daughters—the king beheld the father and his daughters before his very eyes—and Aegyptus was the father of fifty sons.

Pelasgus, satisfied that they were of Argive stock, asked why they had left Egypt. The maiden explained that they had fled because they were threatened with forced marriage to their cousins; that it was not so much that they hated their cousins as it was that they wanted their husbands to love them. Pelasgus, observing that in the most advantageous marriages there was no aspect of love, was not sure he could support the maidens in their cause. The maidens pointed to the wand-decked shrine and asked Pelasgus to heed the sign.

All the sisters pleaded for assistance from Pelasgus, who feared that his meddling in the affair might bring war to Argos. Apprehensive, yet anxious to succor the maidens, he insisted that he would have to consult his people. The suppliants answered that he was an absolute ruler, that he could, if he so desired, make his own decisions. They warned him to beware of the wrath of Zeus, the god who took pity on humans in distress and who was merciless with those mortals who refused to assist others. Still Pelasgus insisted on consulting his people; he feared lest he bring disaster to Argos. Even after searching deeply into his soul for an answer, he declared that the problem was one with which he alone could not cope, that to resolve it would involve frightful sacrifices to the gods.

In despair, the maidens proposed that Pelasgus use their girdles to hang them to the statues in the sacred area. Deeply disturbed, Pelasgus suggested that Danaus gather up all of the wands and, in hopes of eliciting general Argive sympathy for the maidens, place them on altars in the city of Argos itself. Danaus accepted the suggestion after he had been assured of safe passage into the city.

Danaus then departed with the wands. When Pelasgus directed the maidens to an unhallowed area of the sacred ground, they asked how they were to be protected there from their cousins. Pelasgus, advising them to pray to the Argive gods, returned to Argos to consult with his people.

Left alone, the maidens resumed their earnest prayers and invocations to Zeus. They again recalled Zeus' love for their ancestress and appealed to him who, after all, was responsible for their being, to save them from the lust of Aegyptus' sons.

Danaus returned to report that to a man the Argives would defend any refugees from seizure. Pelasgus, too, had reminded the Argives that if they failed to assist and to offer sanctuary to suppliants, Zeus would send before the city a man-eating monster. The maidens then sang their gratitude to the people of Argos and invoked the gods to look ever auspiciously upon the land.

Danaus, standing on an elevated place in the sacred ground, saw the sons of Aegyptus approaching the shore in their ships. He calmed his frightened daughters by reminding them of the Argives' promise, but when he wished to leave them to summon help, they begged him to stay with them. He pointed out that since it would take Aegyptus' sons some time to make proper anchorage, there would be plenty of time for him to seek aid.

After Danaus had gone, the maidens, overcome with apprehension at the approach of their cousins, spoke of the death they preferred to the enforced love which appeared to be imminent. As they cried in anguish to Zeus, a messenger from the ships came to them and, brutally handling them, ordered the maidens to the ships. While he sneered at their frantic appeals to the Greek gods, Pelasgus came upon the scene of violence and demanded of the messenger his business. The Egyptian answered that he had come to take what belonged to him and that only force, not any fear of the Greek gods, could prevent his taking the maidens back to Egypt. Pelasgus declared that the sons of Aegyptus would have to fight to claim their captives. When the messenger asked his name, Pelasgus retorted that his name did not matter; what did matter was that the sisters would never be taken by force from Argos.

The messenger, having been repulsed by the king's words, returned to the ships. Pelasgus then invited the maidens to take shelter among the friendly people of Argos. The maidens first sought the approval of their father. Danaus, advising them to treasure their chastity before their lives, gave them permission to go.

Rejoicing, the daughters of Danaus sang reverently and thankfully to Artemis, goddess of chastity. They also invoked Aphrodite, goddess of love, who they were sure would help in guiding them to marriages blessed by true love.

MR. ISAAC TRACY, a gentleman farmer

BEL TRACY, his daughter

HARVEY RIGGS, a Tracy kinsman

Critique:

Although the author of Swallow Barn novel, it is usually listed as such because of the continuous thread or theme states definitely that the story is not a running through it. In reality the book is a series of sketches or dramatic episodes concerned with plantation life and manners in Virginia during the early eighteenth century, sketches held together by a continuity of characters and events. Swallow Barn, the first work of popular fiction to be set in Virginia, was the forerunner of a large number of novels dealing with the historic background of that state.

The Story:

After receiving many invitations from his cousin Ned Hazard, Mark Littleton at last felt that he could no longer put off a visit to Virginia. He left his mother and sisters in New York and began his journey south. At Swallow Barn, his cousin's home, Mark met or renewed acquaintance with a great many relatives and friends. Ned Hazard's sister had married Frank Meriwether, who was now the head of the family. The estate had been left to Ned. It had been heavily encumbered and Frank had paid off the heaviest debts and put the plantation on a paying basis. The house was filled with Meriwether and Hazard relatives, all permanent guests. Some performed small functions as a pretense of paying their own way, but their tasks were no more than token duties kindly thought up for them so that they would feel useful.

Mark found life in Virginia restful and pleasant, for there was an unhurried rhythm about Swallow Barn that appealed to him. The plantation was filled with slaves and freed Negroes who were fiercely loyal to Frank, a good master. Indeed, everyone loved Frank for his thoughtfulness and generosity. Mark's special favorite, however, was his cousin Ned Hazard. The two young men were inseparable companions. Ned was a man of excellent spirits, always indulging in pranks and jokes. Swallow Barn would one day revert to him, but he was content to let Frank use it as his own, wanting only to have a good time without the need of responsibilities. Ned took Mark on several excursions around the countryside and introduced him to local beauties of nature.

While Ned and Mark walked through the woods one day, they indulged in one of their favorite pastimes by singing their loudest, each trying to outdo the other. In one verse Ned called out the name of Bel Tracy. He was deeply chagrined when that lady, having ridden up unnoticed, answered him. Bel Tracy was the daughter of old Isaac Tracy, master of the neighboring estate, The Brakes. Ned's confusion at being discovered by Bel made Mark think that his cousin felt more than friendship for her. She teased him gently about his boisterous use of her name, leaving Ned stammering in confusion. Bel was accompanied by her sister and Harvey Riggs, a Tracy kinsman. Harvey joined in the teasing, but Mark saw at once that it was good-natured teasing and that Harvey felt great friendship for Ned.

The two parties went back to Swallow Barn, where Harvey delivered a letter from Mr. Tracy to Frank Meriwether. The subject matter was of long standing and it afforded Frank some amusement. For many years Mr. Tracy had imagined himself in possession of one hundred acres of marshland separating The Brakes from Swallow Barn. Every court in Virginia had denied his claim, but the old gentleman was adamant. Frank would long since have given him the land, for it was worthless, but he knew the old gentleman would be lost without the affair, which provided him with mental activity as he plotted ways to get possession of the land. In his letter Mr. Tracy suggested that he and Frank let their lawyers go over the matter again, the two disputants to abide by the legal decision. Frank planned to ask his lawyer to arrange matters so that Mr. Tracy would win the suit after what looked like a difficult legal maneuver.

Old Mr. Tracy was a detriment to Ned, even though Ned loved the old gentleman. He was a gentleman of the old school, dignified and sober; Ned, on the other hand, could not repress his merry spirits. But Bel had absorbed some of her father's dignity and was usually not very receptive to Ned's foolishness. The poor young man tried hard to change, but his disposition was almost as firm as Mr. Tracy's.

After Ned had admitted to Mark that he loved Bel, the two friends mapped out a campaign to win her heart to Ned's cause. Their plans were temporarily postponed, however, by the arrival of the lawyers who would decide the disputed land claim.

The legal gentlemen afforded the young men much entertainment, one being a dandy known throughout Virginia. He was pursued by two of the maiden relatives, each of whom pretended to be pursued by him. When the dandy learned of their intentions, he finished his business and departed as quickly as possible. The settling of the suit gave everyone but old Mr. Tracy a lot of amusement. Because he was serious about the whole matter, Ned lost more ground in his suit when he unwittingly made light of the affair. It took a great deal of clever legal terminology to fool the old man, but at last he was awarded the land and convinced that justice had been done.

Sometimes Ned, Mark, and the others found entertainment in listening to the tales of goblins and ghosts told by old slaves on the plantation. The two families frequently gave large dinner parties, when the whole community would be invited to come and spend the day. Mark, thinking he would find it hard ever to return to New York and his own family, hoped to stay long enough to help Ned in his courtship of Bel. At one of the parties Ned had a little wine and became more boisterous than ever, causing Bel to lose the esteem she had gradually been developing for him. He gained her good will once more by finding her pet falcon which had flown away, but later he lost her affection by engaging in a fist fight with a town bully. Harvey Riggs, joining Mark in attempts to help Ned with his suit, told Bel that Ned had fought the bully because the ruffian had cast slurs on her father. Pity at last entered Bel's heart, and she treated her suitor with more favor.

Mark at last left Virginia and went home to New York. Some months later he learned that Ned had been successful; Bel had married him on New Year's Day. Ned wrote too that it was as Frank had feared. Old Mr. Tracy was sorry the land suit was settled and wished to open it again. Without the pending suit, he felt like a man who had lost an old and faithful friend.

THE TALE OF GENJI

Type of work: Novel

Author: Lady Murasaki Shikibu (978?-1031?)

Type of plot: Courtly romance

Time of plot: Early medieval period

Locale: Japan

First transcribed: 1001-1015

Principal characters:

PRINCE GENJI, the talented illegitimate son of the Emperor

THE EMPEROR, Genji's father

KIRITSUBO, Genji's mother, the Emperor's concubine

LADY KOKIDEN, the Emperor's consort

PRINCESS AOI, Genji's first wife

UTSUSEMI, one of Genji's paramours

YŪGAO, another noblewoman in love with Genji

MURASAKI, a young girl reared by Genji, his second wife

Critique:

The Tale of Genji is the first and title volume of an extremely long court romance written by Lady Murasaki Shikibu, daughter of a famous provincial governor and widow of a lieutenant in the Imperial Guard. As a lady in waiting to the Empress Akiko, she was completely familiar with Nipponese court ritual and ceremony, and her knowledge of palace life is everywhere apparent in the adventures of her nobly-born hero, Prince Genji. The novel is undoubtedly the finest example of medieval Japanese storytelling, and in it one can trace the very growth of Japanese literature about the year 1000. In the beginning Lady Murasaki's romance is an adolescent affair, very much in the fairy-tale tradition of the old Japanese Chronicles. As it progresses, it reaches the full-blown stage of the prose romance, and it can be compared satisfactorily with the medieval prose romances of western Europe. In both, the love affairs of the heroes are dominant. The Tale of Genji, however, imparts the qualities of Japanese culture—similar to and yet quite different from the medieval culture of Europe. Here are people whose main occupation, far from the arts of war and chivalry, was living well: enjoying nature and art in all its forms. Also, in place of idealized woman we have the idealized man, with woman in a distinctly subordinate role.

The Story:

When the Emperor of Japan took a beautiful gentlewoman of the bedchamber as his concubine, he greatly displeased his consort, the Lady Kokiden. The lot of the concubine, whose name was Kiritsubo, was not easy, despite the protection and love of the Emperor, for the influence of Kokiden was very great. Consequently, Kiritsubo had little happiness in the birth of a son, although the child was beautiful and sturdy. Kiritsubo's son made Kokiden even more antagonistic toward the concubine, for Kokiden feared that her own son might lose favor in the Emperor's eyes and not be elevated to the position of heir apparent. Because of her hard life among the women, Kiritsubo languished away until she died.

After his mother's death the young child she had had by the Emperor was put under the protection of the clan of Gen by the Emperor, who gave the child the title of Prince Genji. The boy, spirited and handsome, was a popular figure at the court. Even Kokiden could not bear him a great deal of ill will, jealous as she was on behalf of her son. Prince Genji won for himself a secure place in the Emperor's eyes, and when twelve years old he was not only elevated to a man's estate, but was also given in marriage to Princess Aoi, the daughter of the Minister of the Left, a powerful figure at court. Genji, because of his age, was not impressed with his bride. Nor was she entirely happy with her bridegroom, for she was four years older than he.

Genji was soon appointed a captain of the guard and as such spent much of his time at the Emperor's palace. Indeed, he really spent little time with his bride in their apartment in her father's home. He found that his good looks, his accomplishments, and his position made it very easy for him to have any woman he was disposed to love. His wife, not liking this state of things, became very cool to him. Genji cared little what Princess Aoi said or did.

One of Genji's first amours was with a young gentlewoman named Fujitsubo, who, like his bride, was a few years older than he. His second adventure was at the home of a young courtier, Ki no Kami. At the home of Ki no Kami, who was honored to have the person of Prince Genji at his home, Genji went into the room of a pretty young matron, Utsusemi, and stole her away to his own quarters. The woman, because of Genji's rank and pleasing self, refused to be angered by his actions. In an effort to keep in touch with her, Genji asked that her brother be made a member of his train, a request that was readily granted. Utsusemi soon realized that such an affair could not long continue and broke it off; Genji named her his broom-tree, after a Japanese shrub that at a distance promises shade but is really only a scrawny bush.

Once, a short time later, Genji made another attempt to renew the affair with Utsusemi. But she was not asleep when he entered her room and was able to run out ahead of him. With her was another very charming young woman who had failed to awaken when Utsusemi left and Genji came in. Genji, refusing to be irritated by Utsusemi, gently awakened the other girl and soon was on the most intimate of terms with her.

One day, while visiting his foster mother, Genji made the acquaintance of a young woman named Yūgao. She was living a rather poor existence, in spite of the fact that she came from a good family. After paying her several masked visits, Genji became tired of such clandestine meetings. He proceeded to make arrangements for them to stay for a time in a deserted palace within the imperial domains. The affair ended in tragedy, for during their stay Yūgao was strangely afflicted and died. Only through the good offices of his retainers and friends was Genji able to avoid a disastrous scandal.

Shortly after the tragic death of Yūgao, Genji fell ill of an ague. In order to be cured, he went to a hermit in the mountains. While staying with the hermit, he found a beautiful little girl, an orphan of a good family. Seeing something of himself in little Murasaki, who was pretty and talented, Genji resolved to take her into his care. At first Murasaki's guardians refused to listen to Genji's plans, until he was able to convince them that he had only the girl's best interests at heart and did not plan to make her a concubine at too early an age. Finally they agreed to let him shape the little girl's future, and he took her to his own palace to rear. Lest people misunderstand his motives, and for the sake of secrecy, Genji failed to disclose the identity of the girl and her age, even though his various paramours and his wife became exceedingly jealous of the mysterious stranger who was known to dwell with Genji.

Soon after his return to the Emperor's court with Murasaki, Genji was requested to dance the "Waves of the Blue Sea" at the annual festival in the Emperor's court. So well did he impress the Emperor with his dancing and with his poetry that he was raised to higher rank. Had the emperor dared to do so, Genji would have been named as the heir apparent.

During this time, when Genji's star seemed to be in the ascendant, he was very worried, for he had made Fujitsubo, the Emperor's concubine, pregnant. After the baby's birth everyone noticed how like Genji the baby looked, but the likeness was, to Genji's relief, credited to the fact that they were both sons of the Emperor himself. So pleased was the Emperor that he made Fujitsubo his official consort after the unexpected death of Lady Kokiden.

Meanwhile Genji's marriage proceeded very badly, and he and his wife drifted farther and farther apart. Finally, however, she became pregnant, but far from making her happy her condition seemed to make her sadder. During her pregnancy Princess Aoi declined, filled with hallucinations that her rivals for Genji's affections were stealing her life from her by hatred and jealousy. So deep was her affliction that Princess Aoi died in childbirth, much mourned by Genji, who finally had come to appreciate and love her. A year after her death, however, when Murasaki, the girl he had reared, was of suitable age to marry, Genji took her for his wife and resolved to settle down.

THE TALISMAN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Twelfth century

Locale: The Holy Land

First published: 1825

Principal characters:

RICHARD THE LION-HEARTED, King of England

SIR KENNETH, Knight of the Couchant Leopard

EL HAKIM, a Moslem physician

THEODORICK OF ENGADDI, a hermit

QUEEN BERENGARIA, Richard's wife

LADY EDITH PLANTAGENET, Richard's kinswoman

CONRADE, the Marquis of Montserrat

THE GRAND MASTER OF THE KNIGHTS TEMPLARS

Critique:

The Talisman has been read by almost every high school student for generations, because it contains all the ingredients for a romantic adventure: far-away lands, love, mystery, and chivalric courage and daring. Sir Walter Scott has woven these ingredients together with his usual skill, bringing the several subplots together in the final scenes. As is usual with him also, he makes history serve his own purposes by inventing characters and situations and blending them with real people and historical events. The result is so interesting, however, that we join the author in ignoring the facts, and enjoy the story—an excellent tale, well told.

The Story:

Sir Kenneth, the Knight of the Couchant Leopard, was one of the knights who followed King Richard the Lion-Hearted to the Holy Land during the Third Crusade. At the time Richard was ill of a fever, and the Council of Kings and Princes had sent Kenneth on a mission to Theodorick of Engaddi, a religious hermit who acted as a go-between for both Christians and Moslems. Richard did not know of the mission, for the other leaders in the crusade were jealous of him and his power, and they resented his high-handed methods and his conceit. On the desert, Kenneth met and fought with a Saracen, an infidel who did not at first know that Kenneth carried a pass from Saladin, the leader of the Moslems. Neither warrior was injured in the fight, and since at that time there was a truce between the Christians and the Moslems, they continued their journey together, the Saracen having promised to conduct Kenneth to Theodorick's retreat.

Theodorick showed Kenneth a crypt containing a piece of the Cross. As the knight knelt by the holy relic a group of nuns, novices, and others living at the convent came into the holy place singing and strewing flowers. Each time one of the robed ladies passed him at his devotions, she dropped a single rose by his side. She was the Lady Edith Plantagenet, King Richard's kinswoman. Although she and Kenneth had never spoken, they loved each other. Marriage was impossible, however, for she was related to the English king and he was only a poor Scottish knight. Both his birth and his nationality formed a bar between them, for England and Scotland were constantly at war. Edith was at the convent because she was one of the ladies attending Richard's wife, Queen Berengaria, who was on a pilgrimage to pray for the king's recovery.

Forcing himself to put Lady Edith out of his mind, Kenneth delivered his message to Theodorick, who promised to carry it to Saladin. When Kenneth returned to Richard's camp, he took with him a Moslem physician called El Hakim. This learned man had been sent by Saladin to cure Richard's fever, for though the two rulers were enemies, they respected each other's valor and honor. El Hakim used a talisman to cure the king; the potion he made with it took the fever from Richard. Still weak but restored to health, Richard was grateful to Kenneth for bringing the physician but furious with him for acting as a messenger for the Council of Kings and Princes without the king's knowledge. He felt certain the other leaders would soon withdraw from the crusade, for the Christians were greatly outnumbered by the infidels. It would be impossible for Richard to continue the war with his small band of followers.

In the meantime the other leaders grew more restless and dissatisfied. Two of them, in particular, wished to see Richard disgraced. Conrade, Marquis of Montserrat, wanted to gain for himself a principality in Palestine, and the Grand Master of the Knights Templars wanted Richard killed and out of the way for good. The other leaders merely wanted to give up the crusade and return to their homes. Conrade's sly hints and slurs moved the Archduke of Austria to place his flag next to Richard's standard on the highest elevation in the camp. Richard, learning of this act, arose from his bed, for he was still weak, tore down the flag and stamped on it. Then he ordered Kenneth to guard the English flag and to see that no one again placed another near it.

Queen Berengaria, growing bored with life in the camp, sent Kenneth a false message saying that Edith wanted him to come to her tent. He was bewildered by the message, and torn between love for Edith and duty to King Richard. At last love became stronger than duty. Leaving his trusted dog on guard, he walked to Edith's tent. There he overheard the plotters giggling over their joke. When Edith heard of the plot, she disclaimed any part in the trick and sent him at once back to his post.

There he found the royal standard of England gone and his dog apparently dying. El Hakim, appearing suddenly, said that he could cure the animal with his talisman. He offered also to take Kenneth to the Moslem camp to escape the king's wrath, but Kenneth refused to run away. Instead, he confessed his desertion to Richard and was instantly condemned to death. Everyone tried to save him, the queen even confessing the trick played upon him, but Richard could not be moved. Kenneth, refusing to plead his own cause, believed he deserved to die for deserting his post. He asked for a priest and made his confession. Then El Hakim asked the king for a boon in return for saving the royal life with his talisman. He was granted the favor he requested, the privilege of taking Kenneth with him. So Kenneth became an outcast from the Christian camp.

The other leaders continued their scheming to rob Richard of his power. At last the Grand Master persuaded Conrade to join him in a plot to kill the king. They captured a dervish, a rabid Moslem member of a wild tribe of desert nomads, disguised him, and sent him, pretending to be drunk, to Richard's tent. The king's guards were lax, but he had been sent, as a gift from Saladin, a mute Nubian slave who was extremely loyal to him. As the assassin raised his poniard to strike the king, the slave dashed him to the ground. In the scuffle the Nubian received an arm wound from the dagger. Knowing that the knife was probably poisoned, Richard himself sucked the slave's wound.

Grateful, the slave wrote a note promising that if Richard would have all the leaders pass in review he, the slave, could identify the one who had stolen the royal flag. The slave was, in reality, Kenneth in disguise. El Hakim, after curing his dog, had told him that the animal undoubtedly could identify his assailant. Richard agreed to the plan, and as the suspected plotters passed by, the dog attacked Conrade of Montserrat. Conrade denied his guilt, but Richard declared that his innocence could be decided only by trial of arms. The king asked Saladin to choose a neutral ground for the match, and in courtesy invited Saladin to be present at the combat to test Conrade's innocence or guilt.

At the place of combat, when Richard and Saladin met for the first time other than in battle armor, Saladin revealed himself as El Hakim. Richard in turn confessed that he knew the slave was Kenneth, whom he also named as the king's champion. In the fight Conrade was seriously wounded and hastily carried away by the Grand Master of the Knights Templars, who feared that Conrade would reveal the whole plot against the king. At the same time Richard revealed to the queen and Edith that Kenneth was in reality David, Earl of Huntingdon, Prince Royal of Scotland. The king had learned his true identity from one of Kenneth's retainers. That noble knight, having vowed not to reveal himself until the Holy City had been taken, would not break his oath even to save his life after he had deserted his post.

The king then promised to give the knight Edith's hand in marriage, even though their betrothal belied Theodorick's earlier prophecy that Edith would marry Saladin. Abashed, the old hermit confessed that he had interpreted the signs incorrectly. His vision was that a kinswoman of the king would marry Richard's enemy in a Christian marriage. Theodorick had thought his vision meant that Saladin would be converted and marry Edith. The true prophecy was that Kenneth, a Scot and thus an enemy of the English king, would marry the king's kinswoman and that they, both Christians, would have a Christian wedding.

At a noontime repast given by Saladin in honor of his friends, Saladin killed the Grand Master of the Knights Templars because the Moslem leader learned that the Grand Master, while bending over Conrade to hear his confession, had stabbed him with a dagger so that he could not confess the plot against Richard.

Richard and Saladin both realized that the crusade had failed, for the Christian forces could never hope to overcome the Saracens. The two men parted friends, each honoring the other's skill and valor. A short time later Edith and Kenneth were married, Kenneth receiving the lucky talisman as a wedding gift from Saladin. Although the magic token effected some cures in Europe, it did not again have the power given it by the famous infidel.

THE TAMING OF THE SHREW

Type of work: Drama

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Farce

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Padua, Italy

First presented: c. 1593

BAPTISTA, a rich gentleman of Padua

KATHARINA, his shrewish daughter

HORTENSIO, Lucentio's rivals
A PEDANT

Critique:

Often called rough and bawdy, The Taming of the Shrew has none of the lyrical poetry or the gentle humor that characterizes most of Shakespeare's plays. This dramatic work is filled with wordy puns and coarse illusions; however, the vividness of language and rapid action sustain with excellent effect the demands of the plot. The play has long been one of the most popular of Shakespeare's works, and its main characters have become models for a shrewish woman and a strong woman-tamer. Some literary authorities think that Shakespeare did not write the whole play, that the subplot was written by another. This scholarly dispute is not likely to concern the reader who enjoys a lusty, witty play.

The Story:

As a joke, a beggar was carried, while asleep, to the house of a noble lord and there dressed in fine clothes and waited on by many servants. The beggar was told that he was a rich man who in a demented state had imagined himself to be a beggar, but who was now restored to his senses. The lord and his court had great sport with the poor fellow, to the extent of dressing a page as the beggar's rich and beautiful wife and presenting the supposed woman to him as his dutiful and obedient spouse. The beggar, in his stupidity, assumed his new role as though it were his own, and he and his lady settled down to watch a play prepared for their enjoyment.

Lucentio and Tranio, his serving-man, had journeyed to Padua so that Lucentio could study in that ancient city. But Tranio persuaded his master that life was not all study and work and that he should find pleasures also in his new residence. On their arrival in the city Lucentio and Tranio encountered Baptista and his daughters, Katharina and Bianca. These three were accompanied by Gremio and Hortensio, young gentlemen both in love with gentle Bianca. But Baptista would not permit his younger daughter to marry until someone should take Katharina off his hands. Although Katharina was wealthy and beautiful, she was such a shrew that no suitor would have her. Baptista, not knowing how to control his sharp-tongued daughter, announced that Gremio or Hortensio must find a husband for Katharina before either could woo Bianca. He charged them also to find tutors for the two girls, that they might be skilled in music and poetry.

Unobserved, Lucentio and Tranio witnessed this scene. At first sight Lucentio also fell in love with Bianca and determined to have her for himself. His first act was to change clothes with Tranio, so that the servant appeared to be the master. Lucentio then disguised himself as a tutor in order to woo Bianca without her father's knowledge.

About the same time Petruchio came to Padua. He was a rich and noble man of Verona, come to Padua to visit his friend Hortensio and to find for himself a rich wife. Hortensio told Petruchio of his love for Bianca and of her father's decree that she could not marry until a husband had been found for Katharina. Petruchio declared the stories told about spirited Katharina were to his liking, particularly the account of her great wealth, and he expressed a desire to meet her. Hortensio proposed that Petruchio seek Katharina's father and present his family's name and history. Hortensio, meanwhile, planned to disguise himself as a tutor and thus plead his own cause with Bianca.

The situation grew confused. Lucentio was disguised as a tutor and his servant Tranio was dressed as Lucentio. Hortensio was also disguised as a tutor. Petruchio was to ask for Katharina's hand. Also, unknown to anyone but Katharina, Bianca loved neither Gremio nor Hortensio and swore that she would never marry rather than accept one or the other as her husband.

Petruchio easily secured Baptista's permission to marry his daughter Katharina, for the poor man was only too glad to have his older daughter off his hands. Petruchio's courtship was a strange one indeed, a battle of wits, words, and wills. Petruchio was determined to bend Katharina to his will, but Katharina scorned and berated him with a vicious tongue. Nevertheless she must obey her father's wish and marry him, and the nuptial day was set. Then Gremio and Tranio, the latter still believed to be Lucentio, vied with each other for Baptista's permission to marry Bianca. Tranio won because he claimed more gold and vaster lands than Gremio could declare. In the meantime Hortensio and Lucentio, both disguised as tutors, wooed Bianca.

As part of the taming process, Petruchio arrived late for his wedding, and when he did appear he wore old and tattered clothes. Even during the wedding ceremony Petruchio acted like a madman, stamping, swearing, cuffing the priest. Immediately afterward he dragged Katharina away from the wedding feast and took her to his country home, there to continue his scheme to break her to his will. He gave her no food and no time for sleep, while always pretending that nothing was good enough for her. In fact, he all but killed her with kindness. Before he was through Katharina agreed that the moon was the sun, that an old man was a woman.

Bianca fell in love with Lucentio, whom she thought to be her tutor. In chagrin, Hortensio threw off his disguise and he and Gremio forswore their love for any girl so fickle. Tranio, still hoping to win her for himself, found an old pedant to act the part of Vincentio, Lucentio's father. The pretended father argued his son's cause with Baptista until that lover of gold promised his daughter's hand to Lucentio as he thought, but in reality to Tranio. When Lucentio's true father appeared on the scene, he was considered an impostor and almost put in jail for his deceit. The real Lucentio and Bianca, meanwhile, had been secretly married. Returning from the church with his bride, he revealed the whole plot to Baptista and the others. At first Baptista was angry at the way in which he had been duped, but Vincentio spoke soothingly and soon cooled his rage.

Hortensio, in the meantime, had married a rich widow. To celebrate these weddings, Lucentio gave a feast for all the couples and the fathers. After the ladies had retired, the three newly married men wagered one hundred pounds each that his own wife would most quickly obey his commands. Lucentio sent first for Bianca, but she sent word she would not come. Then Hortensio sent for his wife, but she too refused to obey his summons. Petruchio then ordered Katharina to appear, and she came instantly to do his bidding. At his request she also forced Bianca and Hortensio's wife to go to their husbands. Baptista was so delighted with his daughter's meekness and willing submission that he added another twenty thousand crowns to her dowry. Katharina told them all that a wife should live only to serve her husband and that a woman's heart and tongue ought to be as soft as her body. Petruchio's work had been well done. He had tamed the shrew forever.

THE TEMPLE BEAU

Type of work: Drama

Author: Henry Fielding (1707-1754)

Type of plot: Comedy of manners

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: London

First presented: 1730

Principal characters:

WILDING, a wild young man supposed to be a law student
SIR HARRY WILDING, his father
BELLARIA, a young woman supposed to marry Wilding
SIR AVARICE PEDANT, Bellaria's miserly uncle
PEDANT, Sir Avarice's son
LADY LUCY, Sir Avarice's coquettish second wife
LADY GRAVELY, Sir Avarice's prudish sister
VEROMIL, Bellaria's lover
VALENTINE, Veromil's rakish friend

Critique:

Because of his fame as a novelist, relatively few modern readers are aware of Fielding as a playwright. Certainly his abilities as a dramatist have been overshadowed by his fame as the author of such novels as Tom Jones and Joseph Andrews. He was also the last of the great eighteenth-century playwrights of the comedy of manners, and this particular drama is one of his best. Yet even his work in comedy cannot compare with the polish of his later farces, in which he found his best dramatic medium. Very apparent in The Temple Beau is Fielding's attitude that high life in the eighteenth century was of the dullest and that the people, both men and women, who made up the highest circles were entirely without shame. Though he pictured high life amusingly in his plays, in private life Fielding could see little that was comic in it.

The Story:

Sir Avarice Pedant, who had lost a great deal of money in the South Sea Bubble, decided to marry his son to Bellaria, his rich niece. An opportunity presented itself when her father, sending Bellaria to London in order to get her away from a fortuneless young man, asked her uncle to see that she married the son of Sir Harry Wilding. Sir Avarice, who saw a chance to make ten thousand pounds, had no intention of furthering the request.

Young Pedant was too deep in his studies of philosophy, however, to wish to marry Bellaria. Only after Sir Avarice threatened to disinherit him did he agree to follow his father's wishes.

In the meantime Sir Harry Wilding came down to London to arrange the marriage between his son and Bellaria. He found that his son, young Wilding, was not a lawyer, but had been spending his time as a gay man about town. In fact, young Wilding had been flirting with Sir Avarice's young second wife, who was a coquette of the worst kind. She also was flirting with Valentine, one of the most licentious young men in town. For her coquetry, Lady Avarice was constantly badgered by her older sister-in-law, Lady Gravelly, who seemed on the surface to be a prude. Actually, Lady Gravelly was merely jealous of her reputation and, when opportunity presented itself, discreetly had affairs of her own.

Also in London was Veromil, a friend of Valentine's who had been cheated of his inheritance by his brother. Veromil, the young man with whom Bellaria was really in love, had come to London to solicit his friend's aid in marrying Bellaria before she could be married off to someone else. Valentine, not knowing that Bellaria was the object of Veromil's affections, agreed to help him. Valentine had just thrown over his own fiancée in hopes of winning Bellaria for himself.

While Valentine and Veromil went to see Bellaria, Sir Harry Wilding went to call on his son. In young Wilding's rooms, instead of books, he found packets of love letters and a crowd of tradesmen who were about to send him to debtors' prison. Sir Harry went about the rooms in a fury, breaking open closets and chests to learn what the young man had been doing. From there he went immediately to Sir Avarice's house in hopes of finding his son. He and Sir Avarice discovered Wilding in the garden embracing young and pretty Lady Avarice. Both men were furious, the father because he found his son a rakish fop and the husband because he suspected that he had been made a fool and a cuckold. Lady Avarice saved the day by telling a lie; she said that young Wilding had merely been importuning her to help him win Bellaria. The husband and father were satisfied with the answer.

Young Wilding still had to answer for the lack of law books and the presence of love letters and duns at his rooms; to do so he told his father that he had gone into the wrong apartment. The father, believing the lie, was immediately fearful lest he be arrested as a house-breaker. Through a servant young Wilding played upon his father's gullibility and persuaded Sir Harry to offer an annuity to the army officer whose rooms he had supposedly broken into. Sir Harry, rather than be hanged for what he thought was a felony, was glad to comply.

Meanwhile Valentine had discovered that the object of Veromil's affections was Bellaria and became so angry that he offered to kill his friend. Finally friendship overcame his passion, and he once more agreed to help Veromil win the girl. He was partly persuaded by the discovery that his own fiancée loved him so much that she would take him back, even after his rudeness in breaking their engagement.

Valentine persuaded Sir Avarice to give him seven thousand pounds for help in marrying off Bellaria. Sir Avarice thought Valentine had reference to the marriage of Bellaria to his son, but Valentine, leaving the agreement vague, planned to marry Bellaria to his friend Veromil and still have the money. He told Sir Avarice to bring the young people to young Pedant's apartment at the Inns of Court at a certain time. Young Pedant, not knowing of the scheme, had lent his apartment to young Wilding, who intended to pass it off to his father as his own. Hoping to embarrass them both into letting him alone thereafter, Wilding had also made assignations with both Lady Avarice and Lady Gravely for the same time. He too had fallen in love with Bellaria and hoped to marry her according to his father's wishes.

The two women, arriving first at the apartment, were utterly confused to find themselves dupes. They agreed to stick together, however, and try to save their reputations. A short time afterward Valentine, his fiancée, Veromil, and Bellaria, arrived. Within a few minutes the clergyman appeared to officiate at the marriage of Veromil and Bellaria. But at the last minute Valentine could not bear to see Bellaria married to Veromil. He tried to interrupt the ceremony, but his fiancée, with the help of Lady Avarice and Lady Gravely, held him back. Just then Sir Harry Wilding appeared with his son and young Wilding's servant. Veromil, drawing his sword, threatened them unless they let him pass with Bellaria. He was disarmed by young Wilding before any mischief was done. Veromil was beside himself until Bellaria told him that nothing could force her marriage to anyone else.

Just then Sir Avarice and his son arrived, expecting to find no one but a clergyman, Bellaria, and Valentine, for they had come to marry Bellaria, according to Valentine's agreement, to young Pedant. When Sir Harry Wilding demanded to know why all these people were in his son's apartment, young Wilding's ruse was disclosed. Sir Harry, furious at the trick played upon him, swore he would disinherit his son. Then young Wilding revealed that the annuity his father had signed was actually made out to him. Sir Harry left in a rage.

Veromil picked up a letter which Sir Harry had torn from the pocket of his son's servant. It was a letter from Veromil's brother and it related how Veromil had been cheated of his inheritance. The servant, after confessing to his part in the crime, promised to admit his perjury in court, thereby permitting the restoration of Veromil's rightful property. Sir Avarice was only too glad to give his blessing to the match between Bellaria and Veromil; under the circumstances he would not be forced to pay the seven thousand pounds to Valentine for arranging a marriage between Bellaria and his own son. Valentine, however, pointed out to the miser that the contract had only called for an arrangement of a marriage for Bellaria and did not name anyone as the husband in the affair, and so Sir Avarice, much to his dismay, was still liable for the payment. Young Pedant was only too happy to learn that he could continue his studies instead of taking up the burdens of a husband.

TENDER IS THE NIGHT

Type of work: Novel

Author: F. Scott Fitzgerald (1896-1940)

Type of plot: Social criticism

Time of plot: The 1920's

Locale: Europe

First published: 1934

Principal characters:

DICK DIVER, a psychologist

NICOLE, his wife

ROSEMARY HOYT, an actress

TOMMY BARBAN, a professional soldier

Critique:

Fitzgerald's reputation rests mostly on The Great Gatsby, but in many ways Tender is the Night is a more penetrating work. The characters, expatriate Americans wandering from one fashionable place to another in Europe, seem to bear superficially a great resemblance to a common type written about in literature of the twenties, but there is a difference in treatment and significance. Dick and Nicole are well portrayed, Nicole being an especially sympathetic creation. The result is an artistic portrayal of believable people whose experiences add up to a keen analysis of the spiritual disintegration and bankruptcy of an expatriate generation.

The Story:

Rosemary Hoyt was just eighteen, dewy fresh and giving promise of beautiful maturity. In spite of her youth, she was already a famous actress, and her movie, Daddy's Girl, was all the rage. She had come to the south of France with her mother for a rest. Rosemary needed relaxation, for she had been very ill after diving repeatedly into a Venetian canal during the shooting of her picture.

At the beach she met Dick Diver, and suddenly she realized that she was in love. After she became well acquainted with the Divers, she liked Diver's wife Nicole, too. Nicole was strikingly beautiful and her two children complemented her nicely. Rosemary's mother also approved of Dick. When Rosemary attended one of the Divers' famous parties, she told Dick outright that she loved him, but he made light of her declaration.

During the party a Mrs. McKisco saw Nicole behaving hysterically in the bathroom, and on the way home she tried to tell about it. Tommy Barban, a war hero, made her keep silence. Resenting Tommy's interference, Mr. McKisco provoked a quarrel with him. The quarrel ended in a duel in which several shots were exchanged but no one was hurt. Rosemary was greatly moved by the occurrence.

Rosemary traveled to Paris with the Divers and went on a round of parties and tours with them. Often she made advances to Dick. He refused, apathetically, until one day a young college boy told of an escapade in which Rosemary had been involved, and then Dick began to desire the young girl. Although their brief love affair was confined to furtive kisses in hallways, Nicole became suspicious.

Abe North, a brawling composer, offended two Negroes and involved a third. While Dick was in Rosemary's hotel room, Abe brought one of the Negroes to ask Dick's help in straightening up the mess. When Dick took Abe to his own room, the Negro stayed in the corridor. The two other Negroes killed him and laid the body on Rosemary's bed. When the body was found, Dick carried it into the hall and took Rosemary's spread into his bathtub to wash it out. Seeing the bloody spread, Nicole broke down and in an attack of hysteria accused Dick of many infidelities. Her breakdown was like the one Mrs. McKisco had previously seen in the bathroom at the party.

Some years before Dick had been doing research in advanced psychology in Zurich. One day in the clinic he had met a pathetic patient, beautiful young Nicole Warren. Attracted to her professionally at first, he later learned the cause of her long residence in the clinic.

Nicole came from a wealthy Chicago family. When she was eleven her mother died, and her father became very close to her. After an incestuous relationship with him, she suffered a breakdown. Her father, too cowardly to kill himself as he had planned, had put her in the clinic at Zurich. For many reasons Dick became Nicole's tower of strength; with him she was almost normal. Finally, motivated by pity and love, Dick married her. For a time he was able to keep her from periodic schizophrenic attacks and the marriage seemed to be a success, aided by the fact that Nicole's family was rich, so rich that Nicole's older sister was able to buy Dick a partnership in the clinic where Dick had first met Nicole.

For some time after the episode involving Rosemary, Nicole was quite calm, but too withdrawn. Then a neurotic woman wrote her a letter accusing Dick of misdeeds with his women patients. The letter was the working of a diseased mind, but Nicole believed what the writer said and had another relapse. She left her family at a country fair and became hysterical while riding on the ferris wheel.

At one time Dick had shown great promise as a writer and as a psychologist. His books had become standard and among his colleagues he was accounted a genius. It seemed, however, that after Nicole's hysterical fit on the ferris wheel he could do little more real work. For one thing, Nicole was growing wealthier all the time; her husband did not have to work. At thirty-eight, he was still a handsome and engaging man, but he began to drink heavily.

On several occasions Nicole was shamed by her husband's drunken behavior. She did her best to make him stop, and in so doing she began to gain a little moral strength of her own. For the first time since the long stay at the clinic she gradually came to have an independent life outside of Dick's influence.

Dissatisfied with the life he was leading, Dick decided to go away by himself for a while. He ran into Tommy Barban, still a reckless, strong, professional soldier. Tommy had just had a romantic escape from Russia. While still absent from his wife, Dick received word that his father had died.

Going back to America was for him a nostalgic experience. His father had been a gentle clergyman, living a narrow life; but his life had had roots, and he was buried among his ancestors. Dick had been away so long, had lived for so many years a footless, unfettered life, that he almost determined to remain in America.

On the way back to meet his family Dick stopped in Naples. In his hotel he met Rosemary again. She was making another picture, but she managed to find time to see him. Not so innocent now, she proved an easy conquest. Dick also met Nicole's older sister in Naples.

One night Dick drank far too much and became embroiled with a chiseling taxi driver. When he refused to pay an exorbitant fee, a fight broke out and Dick was arrested. The police captain unfairly upheld the taxi driver. Blind with rage, Dick struck a policeman and in return was severely beaten by the Fascist carabinieri. Thinking his eye had been gouged out, Dick got word to Nicole's sister, who brought all her influence to bear upon the consul to have her brother-in-law released.

Back in Zurich, Dick was busy for a time at the clinic. On a professional visit to Lausanne, he learned to his surprise that Nicole's father was there, very near death. When the dying man expressed a wish to see his daughter again, Dick sent for Nicole. Strangely enough, the weakened father still could not face his daughter. In a despairing frenzy he escaped from the hospital and disappeared.

Dick continued to go downhill. He always drank too much. A patient, objecting to the liquor on his breath, created a scene. At last Dick was forced to surrender his partnership in the clinic.

With no job, Dick wandered about restlessly. He and his wife, he realized, had less and less in common. At last, after Dick had disgraced his family many times in drunken scenes, Nicole began to welcome the attentions of Tommy Barban. She confidently looked forward to an independent life with Tommy. She no longer needed Dick.

After the divorce Dick moved to America. Nicole heard of him occasionally. He moved several times to successively smaller towns, an unsuccessful general practitioner.

THREE MEN IN A BOAT

Type of work: Novel

Author: Jerome K. Jerome (1859-1927)

Type of plot: Comic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1889

Principal characters:

J., the narrator

HARRIS, his friend

GEORGE, another friend

MONTMORENCY, a dog

Critique:

Three Men in a Boat, which has always been popular with many readers, is a slight tale with only a thin thread of plot. The humor lies in the digressions, which make up the bulk of the book, and in some of the incidents. Jerome had a light and sure touch which only occasionally betrayed him into sentimentality, as when he dealt with a moral fable or attempted a profound look into the meaning of history. In this novel he captured much of the charm of boating on the Thames. The characters are delightfully human.

The Story:

J., Harris, and George were feeling seedy. They sat around idly in J.'s room discussing their ailments. J., especially, was prone to ailments. Once he had gone through a medical book and discovered that he had all the symptoms of typhoid, cholera, and zymosis; in fact, he had all the ills described except housemaid's knee.

He visited a doctor, intent on giving him practice in diagnosis. After the examination the doctor gave him a prescription for a pound of beefsteak and a pint of bitter beer every six hours. The prescription must have been efficacious; J. was still alive.

The three friends decided they needed a complete change and rest. Various possibilities were suggested, including a sea voyage. J. knew from experience that nearly everyone became sick on sea voyages. He had a friend who paid two pounds and a half in advance for his board during a week's trip. By the end of the week he had eaten so little that the steward had at least two pounds clear. A sea voyage was out. As a compromise, they decided on a boat trip up the Thames to Oxford. Montmorency was opposed to the idea but was outvoted.

They were to start from Kingston. George, who had to work until two on Saturdays, would join them at Chertsey. They discussed sleeping and eating arrangements. Although Harris was doubtful, they agreed to sleep in the boat and cook their own meals. Harris had no poetry in his soul; life in the raw had no appeal for him, for he was the type who always knew the best pub in every town in England.

In making their grocery list, J. remembered the time he was in Liverpool. A friend asked him if he would take two cheeses back with him on the train to London. J. willingly agreed. The train was crowded and he found a seat in a full compartment. One by one the others left, overpowered by the odor, and J. had the compartment to himself all the way to London. After he delivered the cheeses to his friend's wife, she promptly moved into a hotel until her husband could get home. He had to bury them on a deserted beach. That experience showed how careful one should be in selecting provisions.

Although Harris and J. were to get an early start, they overslept. It was well after nine before they got all their rugs and hampers together. Then they could not get a cab. They stood on the sidewalk, attracting a curious crowd of hangers-on who made unkind remarks about their many bundles. At Waterloo no one could tell them the platform from which their train would leave. Even the district superintendent was vague. They solved the problem by bribing the engineer of a waiting train to take them to Kingston. The engineer agreed because he had no idea where his train was supposed to go anyway. At last the Exeter mail train took them to Kingston.

Harris had had an experience once in finding his way. He bought a map of Hampton Court maze. It looked simple on the map to visit the place and get out again. A number of innocent bystanders trusted him and his map to their sorrow. The worst of it was that the keeper on duty was new and had little idea how to get out. They all waited hours for the old keeper to come back on duty.

The travelers set out upriver from Kingston. Dividing the work evenly, according to J.'s suggestion, Harris sculled, J. steered, and Montmorency was the passenger. All was going well as J. dreamed along. Suddenly Harris threw away his sculls, left his seat, and threw his legs into the air. J. had daydreamed too long; they had run head-on into the tow path. Shortly afterward they picked up George, and the three men in a boat were fairly off.

Their boat had a series of hoops and a canvas roof over them so that they could sleep on board at night. The first time they tried to set up the apparatus, the hoops became tangled. The canvas was even worse. George and Harris stood at the bow to unroll the canvas and stationed J. at the stern to receive the end. Somehow both George and Harris got rolled up in the canvas. J. noticed that they were struggling for a long time, but he faithfully stuck by the stern to receive the end and fasten it. Finally George got his head out and shouted for help. Harris' face was black by the time they got him unwound.

They made tea on a spirit stove. Their method was to put the kettle on and then make sure not to look at it or show any signs of impatience. Usually the method worked and the kettle boiled. Sometimes they had to make loud remarks about not wanting any tea that meal before the water would get hot enough. Montmorency was hostile toward the kettle. The first time it boiled he took the noise for a challenge and bit the spout. After that he was content merely to growl at the bubbling steam.

They had trouble at times getting water. An old lock tender told them he always used river water. Thinking that boiling the water would make it safe, they tried it once for tea. Just as they were sitting down to tea, a dead dog came floating down the stream.

None of them could cook very well, but George proposed an Irish stew one night. They put potatoes, a peck of peas, two heads of cabbage, some bacon, and whatever else they could find in the pot. George, rummaging for ingredients, expounded the theory that an Irish stew was a handy dish because it got rid of all the leftovers. Montmorency watched the proceedings with interest. When he understood the theory, he trotted off on his own foraging trip. He proudly brought back a dead rat as his contribution.

At Streatley they hired a washerwoman to do their laundry. The original idea had been to do their own washing in the Thames, but that idea had not been successful; the clothes caught all the silt in the river. The woman charged them a triple rate for what was scarcely an ordinary washing job. It was more in the nature of excavating.

Near Wallingford, George and J. stopped at an inn which displayed an enormous trout in a glass case. One by one each of the local hangers-on told them how he had caught the big fish. When the landlord came in, he laughed at the wild claims; he himself had caught it when he was a boy. George, excited, climbed up on a chair for a closer look. The chair slipped, George clutched, and the glass case came down. Amid the broken glass on the floor lay the broken trout. It was not stuffed; it was made of plaster of Paris.

On the way downstream from Oxford the weather was bad. To while away a rainy evening they played cards, but they had to quit because George won fourpence. They finally grew so bored that Harris and J. asked George to play his banjo and sing.

They finally gave up their trip. Leaving the boat at Pangbourne, they took a train to London. At a select French restaurant they had a light dinner and left an order for a late supper. Then, boating clothes and all, they went to the Alhambra. There was some difficulty getting in because of their wet flannels, but they persevered. Then, after a hearty supper, they watched in comfort the rain outside. Harris thought they were three men well out of a boat.

Critique:

The Three Sisters is a good example of Chekhov's feeling for people. His male characters are inclined to be weak-willed, incapable of acting, much as Tchebutykin, the old army doctor, and Andrey are throughout the play. On the other hand, his women are likely to be stronger, if only because they live on dreams or hopes, like the three sisters, or Natasha. Yet Chekhov never makes fun of these people; he feels for them with a deep tolerance for human frailty and a hatred of ugly conditions. While the over-all effect of the situation in which the three sisters find themselves is pessimistic, Vershinin provides the leavening that Chekhov always uses to show that, though this world is sad, there is usually someone who thinks that it will be brighter sometime; perhaps not while we live, but sometime.

The Story:

On Irina's name-day, her friends and family called to wish her happiness. It was exactly one year after the death of their father, who had been sent from Moscow eleven years before to this provincial town at the head of a brigade. Irina and Olga longed to go back to Moscow, and Masha would have liked to go too, except that she had married Kuligin, whom she once thought the cleverest of men. They all pinned their hopes on their brother Andrey, who was studying to become a professor.

An old army doctor, Tchebutykin, brought Irina a samovar because he had loved her mother. Masha's husband gave her a copy of the history of the high school in which he taught; he said he wrote it because he had nothing better to do. When Irina told him that he had given her a copy for Easter, he merrily handed it over to one of the army men who was calling. Tusenbach and Solyony quarreled half-heartedly because Tusenbach and Irina had decided that what they needed for happiness was work. Tusenbach had never done anything but go to cadet school, and Irina's father had prepared his children only in languages. Both had a desire to labor hard at something.

Vershinin, the new battery commander, came to call, reminding the girls that he had lived on the same street with them in Moscow. When he praised their town, they said they wanted to go to Moscow. They believed that they had been oppressed with an education which was useless in a dull provincial town. Vershinin thought that for every intelligent person then living, many more would appear later on, and that the whole earth would be unimaginably beautiful two or three hundred years hence. He thought it might be interesting to relive one's life to see if one could improve on the first version.

Natasha came in while they were still sitting at the dinner table. Olga criticized her dress and the men began to tease her about an engagement. Andrey, who could not stand having her teased, followed her out of the room and begged her to marry him. She accepted.

After their marriage Andrey lost any ambition he ever had to become a professor and spent much of his time gambling in order to forget how ill-bred, rude, and selfish Natasha really was. Irina, meanwhile, had taken a job in the telegraph office and Olga was teaching in the high school. Tired when they came home at night, they let Natasha run the house as she pleased, even to moving Irina out of her own bedroom so that Natasha and Andrey's baby could have it.

Vershinin had fallen in love with Masha, though he felt bound to his neurotic wife because of his two daughters. Kuligin realized what was going on but cheerfully hoped Masha still loved him.

Tusenbach, afraid that life would always be difficult, decided to give up his commission and seek happiness in a workingman's life. Vershinin was convinced that by living, working, and struggling we create a better life all the time. Since his wife periodically tried to commit suicide, he did not look for happiness for himself but for his descendants.

Andrey asked Tchebutkyin to prescribe for his shortness of breath, but the old doctor swore he had forgotten all the medical knowledge he had ever known.

Solyony fell in love with Irina, who would have nothing to do with him. He declared that he would have no happy rivals.

One night all gathered to have a party with some mummers who were to come in. Natasha, however, decided that the baby was not well and called off the party at the last minute. Then Protopopov, the Chairman of the Rural Board, came by with his carriage to take Natasha riding while Andrey sat reading in his room.

A short time later fire destroyed part of the town. Olga gave most of her clothes to those whose homes had been burned and, after the fire, invited the army people to sleep at the house. Natasha berated Olga for letting her old servant sit in her presence and finally suggested that Olga herself move out of the house. The old doctor became drunk because he had prescribed incorrectly for a woman who had died. After the fire people wanted him to help them, but he could not. In disgust, he picked up a clock and smashed it.

Masha, more bored than before, gave up playing the piano. She was disgusted, too, because Andrey had mortgaged the house in order to give money to Natasha. Everyone but he knew that Natasha was having an affair with Protopopov, to whose Rural Board Andrey had recently been elected.

Irina, at twenty-four, could not find work to suit her, and she believed she was forgetting everything she had ever known. Olga persuaded her to consider marrying Tusenbach, even if he was ugly; with him Irina might get to Moscow.

Masha confessed that she was in love with Vershinin and that he loved her, though he was unable to leave his children.

Andrey berated his sisters for treating his wife so badly and then confessed that he had mortgaged the house which belonged to all four of them. He had so hoped they could all be happy together.

Irina heard a report that the brigade would move out of town. If that happened, they would have to go to Moscow because no one worth speaking to would be left.

On the day the first battery was to leave, the officers came to say their farewells to the sisters. Irina had heard of an incident the day before which the old doctor dismissed as not worth talking about. Kuligin, however, told her that Tusenbach and Solyony had had words because both of them were in love with her and she had promised to marry Tusenbach. Kuligin eagerly anticipated the departure of the brigade because he hoped Masha would then again turn to him. Masha was bored and spiteful. She felt that she was losing, bit by bit, the small happiness she had.

Andrey wondered how he could love Natasha when he knew she was so vulgar. The old doctor claimed that he was tired of their troubles, and he advised Andrey to walk off and never look back. But the doctor, who was to be retired from the army in a year, planned to come back to live with them because he really loved them all.

Irina hoped to go off with Tusenbach.

Olga intended to live at the school of which she was now headmistress. Natasha, expecting to be left in sole charge of the house, planned all sorts of changes to wipe away the memory of the sisters' having been there. Andrey wondered how his children could possibly overcome the deadening influence of their mother's vulgarity.

After Tusenbach had fought a duel with Solyony, Tchebutykin returned to tell them that Tusenbach had been killed. So the sisters were left alone with their misery, each thinking that she must go on with her life merely to find out why people suffer so much in a world that could be beautiful.

Critique:

A continuation of the adventures of Alice in the marvelous country of Wonderland, this story takes her into Looking-Glass Land, filled with talking insects and live chessmen. Although the story may perhaps be a gentle satire on mid-Victorian life and customs, it is primarily a children's fantasy and the reader need not look for nor concern himself with deeper meanings. Alice undoubtedly led a lonely and sometimes confusing life, and we delight with her in her new, though peculiar, friends. Indeed, we must envy the real Alice, a little girl who could inspire such wonderful stories.

The Story:

Alice was sure the whole thing was not the white kitten's fault. It must surely have been the fault of the black kitten. For Dinah, the mother cat, had been washing the white kitten's face when it happened; she certainly had had nothing to do with it. But the mischievous black kitten had been unwinding Alice's yarn and in all ways acting naughty enough to cause the whole strange affair.

While the black kitten curled up in Alice's lap to play with the yarn, Alice told it to pretend that the two of them could go right through the mirror and into Looking-Glass House. As she talked, the glass grew all misty and soft, and in a moment Alice was through the mirror and in the Looking-Glass room. The place was very strange, for although the room looked just the same as the real room she had seen in the mirror, the clock and the fire and the other things in the room seemed to be alive. Even the chessmen, for Alice loved to play chess, were alive.

When Alice picked up the White

Queen and set her on the table, the White Queen screamed in terror, thinking that a volcano had shaken her about. The White King had the same fear, but he was too astonished to cry out. They seemed not to see or hear Alice, and even though she wanted to stay and watch them and read the king's rather funny poetry, she felt she must look at the garden before she had to go back through the Looking Glass. When she started down the stairs, she seemed to float, not even once touching the steps.

In the garden every path Alice took led her straight back to the house. She asked Tiger Lily and Rose and Violet whether there were any other people in the garden; she hoped they might help her find the right path. The flowers told her there was only one, and Alice found her to be the Red Queen—but a very strange chess figure, for the Red Queen was taller than Alice herself. As Alice walked toward the Red Queen, she once more found herself back at the door of the house. Then Alice figured out that in order to get to any place in this queer land one must walk in the opposite direction. Doing so, she came face to face with the Red Queen.

The queen took Alice to the top of a hill. There, spread out below them, was a countryside that looked like a large chessboard. Alice, delighted, said that she would love to play on this board. Then the Red Queen told her that they would play and that Alice could be the White Queen's Pawn. They would start on the Second Square and—but at that moment the Red Queen grabbed Alice's hand and they started to run. Alice had never run so fast in her life, but even though she was breathless from such fast running the things around them never changed a tiny bit. When they finally stopped running, the queen told Alice that in this land one had to run as fast as she could to stay in the same place and twice as fast as she could to get somewhere else. Then the queen showed Alice the pegs in the Second Square and told her how to move. At the last peg the Red Queen disappeared, leaving Alice alone to continue the game.

Alice started to run down the hill. The next thing she knew she was on a train filled with insects and having quite an unpleasant time because she did not have a ticket. All of the insects talked unkindly to her, and to add to her discomfort the train jumped over the brook and took them all straight up in the air. When she came down, she was sitting under a tree, talking to a Gnat. Gnat was as big as a chicken but very pleasant. He told her about the other insects that lived in the woods; then he too melted away and Alice had to go on alone.

Turning a corner, she bumped into two fat little men, called Tweedledum and Tweedledee, the funniest little creatures she had ever seen. Everything they said seemed to have two meanings. It was fun to listen to the merry little men as they recited a long poem about a Walrus and a Carpenter and some Oysters. While they were explaining the poem to Alice, she heard a puffing noise, like the sound of a steam engine. Tweedledee told her it was the Red King snoring. Sure enough, they found him asleep. Tweedledee told Alice that the Red King was dreaming about her and that if he stopped dreaming Alice would be gone for good. Alice cried when they told her she was not real but only a part of the Red King's dream.

As she brushed her tears away, she saw Tweedledum staring in terror at something on the ground. It was an old broken rattle, over which the two foolish men got into a terrible fight. That is, they talked a terrible fight, but neither seemed very anxious to have a real battle. The Crow flew over and frightened them so that the funny men ran away into the wood. Alice ran too, and as she ran she saw a shawl blowing about.

Alice, looking for the owner of the shawl, saw the White Queen running toward her. The White Queen was a very queer person; she lived backward and remembered things before they happened. For example, she hurt before she pricked her finger. While the queen was telling these strange things to Alice, the queen turned into a Sheep and was in a shop with Alice. It was a very curious shop, the shelves full of things that disappeared when Alice looked at them. Sometimes the boxes went right through the ceiling. Then Sheep gave Alice some needles and told her to knit.

As she started to knit, the needles became oars and she found herself and Sheep in a little boat rowing in a stream. The oars kept sticking in the water. Sheep explained that the crabs were catching them. Alice picked some beautiful, fragrant rushes that melted away as soon as she picked them. Soon, to her surprise, the river and boat vanished, and Alice and Sheep were back in the shop. She bought an egg, even though in this shop two were cheaper than one, but when she started to get the egg, as Sheep would not reach it for her, the egg began to grow larger and larger and more and more real, with eyes, a nose, and a mouth. Then Alice could tell as plain as day that the egg was Humpty Dumpty.

She had a queer conversation with Humpty Dumpty, a conversation all filled with riddles. They took turns at choosing the topic to talk about, but most of the subjects turned into arguments, even though Alice tried hard to be polite. Humpty Dumpty explained to Alice what the "Jabberwocky" poem meant, the one she had seen in the White King's book. Then, while reciting another poem, he stopped right in the middle, saying that was all. Alice thought it very queer but did not tell Humpty Dumpty so. She thought it time for her to leave, but as she walked away there was a terrible crash that shook the whole forest.

Thousands of soldiers and horses came rushing toward her, the riders constantly falling off their horses. Frightened, she escaped from the wood into the open. There she found the White King, who told her that he had sent the soldiers and horses and that the loud crash she had heard was the noise of the Lion and Unicorn fighting for the crown. She went with the king to watch the fight, which was indeed a terrible one. It was really silly of them to fight for the crown, since it belonged to the White King and he had no notion of giving it away. After the fight Alice met the Unicorn and the Lion. At the king's order she served them cake, a very strange cake which cut itself when she carried the dish around.

A great noise interrupted the party. When it stopped Alice thought she must have dreamed the whole thing until the Red Knight came along, followed soon by a White Knight. Each claimed her as a prisoner. Alice thought the whole business silly, since neither of them could do anything except fall off his horse and climb back on again, over and over and over. At last the Red Knight galloped off and the White Knight told her that she would be a queen as soon as she crossed the next brook. He was supposed to lead her to the end of the wood, but she spent the whole journey helping him back on his horse each time he fell off. The trip was filled with more queer conversation. By that time Alice was used to strange talk from her Looking-Glass friends. At last they reached the brook. The knight rode away and Alice jumped over the brook and into the last square of the chess board. To her delight, when she reached that square she felt something tight on her head—a crown! She was a queen.

Soon she found the Red Queen and the White Queen confronting her, very cross because she also thought she was a queen. They gave her a test for queens which she must have passed, for before long they were calling her "Your Majesty," and inviting people to a party which she was to give. The Red and the White Queens went to sleep after a time. Alice watched them until they disappeared. Then she found herself before a doorway marked "Queen Alice." All of her new friends were there, including the queens who had just vanished. The party was the most amazing experience of all. Puddings talked, guests poured wine over their heads, and the White Queen turned into a leg of mutton. Alice was exasperated, so much so that she seized the tablecloth and jerked it and everything on it to the floor. Then she grabbed the Red Queen and shook her as she would a kitten. But what was this? It was a kitten she was shaking, the black kitten.

Alice talked to Dinah and both the kittens about the adventure they had all had, but the silly kittens did nothing but purr.

THYESTES

Type of work: Drama

Author: Lucius Annaeus Seneca (c. 4 B.C.-A.D. 65)

Type of plot: Tragedy of revenge

Time of plot: The Heroic Age

Locale: Greece

First presented: c. A.D. 60

Principal characters:

ATREUS, King of Argos

THYESTES, his brother

THYESTES' THREE SONS

Critique:

The most fiendish revenge play in the history of drama is this Senecan tragedy, the gruesome story of a banquet at which the father partakes of his own children. The play is also a landmark in dramatic history, for it was the model of many revenge plays appearing in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in English drama. As such, it was the forerunner of Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, Shakespeare's Hamlet, Chapman's Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois, and Webster's The Duchess of Malfi. Seneca was not the first ancient author to make use of the Thyestes legend. It had been used by Sophocles, Euripides, Ennius, and Accius. None of the versions by those authors have, however, survived the years, and we do not even have enough information about them to compare the treatment by those authors with that of Seneca.

The Story:

Megaera, one of the Furies, summoned the ghost of Tantalus to return from Hades to Argos, where Tantalus in life had been king, to watch revenge, hate, and havoc spread across that kingdom. Tantalus was hesitant because of the part he had played in the story of his royal house, but Megaera forced him to witness the fate of his descendants.

The grandsons of Tantalus, the sons of Pelops, whom Tantalus had sacrificed to the gods, were at war with one another. The oldest of Pelops' sons, Atreus, was the rightful ruler of Argos, but his brother, Thyestes, had seduced Atreus' wife and carried her away. With them they took the golden ram, the symbol of power held by the ruler of the kingdom. Civil war broke out, and Thyestes was defeated. After his defeat he was exiled by Atreus.

But exile was not sufficient punishment for Thyestes. The fierce hatred of Atreus, burning over his brother's crimes and his own misfortune in the loss of his wife, demanded greater revenge. A tyrant who believed that death was a comfort to his subjects, Atreus brooded over fierce and final vengeance upon his younger brother. He felt that no act of revenge could be a crime when committed against a man who had worked against him as his brother had. Moreover, he felt that he, as a king, could do as he wished; private virtues were not for rulers.

When an attendant suggested that

Atreus put Thyestes to the sword, Atreus said that death was only an end. He wanted Thyestes to suffer even greater torture. The punishment Atreus finally hit upon was a scheme to feed Thyestes' own children to him at a banquet.

Atreus took the first step toward accomplishing his revenge. He sent his own sons, Agamemnon and Menelaus, as emissaries of good will to Thyestes and asked the exile, through them, to return to a place of honor at his brother's side. Fearing that his sons, forewarned, might lack the discretion needed to act as friendly ambassadors, he did not tell them the part they were playing in his scheme of revenge.

Thyestes, trusting the king, returned to Argos with his three sons, including one named Tantalus, after his great-grandfather of famous memory. But when he looked again at familiar landscapes, Thyestes felt a sense of foreboding. His footsteps faltered, and his sons noted his apparent unwillingness to return. The offer of peace and half the kingdom seemed to Thyestes unlike his brother's earlier hatred and fury. He felt that there had been too much hate and bloodshed between them for real peace. But his sons, silencing his doubts, led him on to the court of Atreus.

Atreus, overjoyed to see his brother and nephews in his power and apparently unmindful of the revenge plotted against them, concealed his hatred and welcomed them to the kingdom once again.

Atreus announced a great feast to celebrate his brother's homecoming. Then, taking the three sons of Thyestes aside, he led them to a grove behind the palace and there slew them with all the ceremony of a sacrifice to the gods. The first he stabbed in the neck, the second he decapitated, and the third he killed by a thrust through the body. The boys, knowing that appeals were useless, suffered death in silence. Atreus drew off their blood and prepared the carcasses like so much beef. The limbs he quartered and placed upon spits to roast; the bodies he hacked into small pieces and placed in pots to boil.

The fire seemed reluctant to burn as an accomplice to his deed, but Atreus stood by and acted as cook until the ghastly banquet was ready. As he cooked, the sky grew dark and an unnatural night settled across the face of the earth. The banquet prepared, Atreus felt that he was the equal of the gods themselves.

The feast began. After the banquet had progressed to the point that the guests were gluttoned by all they had eaten, Atreus prepared for Thyestes a drink of wine and blood drained from the bodies of Thyestes' sons.

All the while a premonition of evil hung like a cloud in the back of Thyestes' mind. Try as he would, he could not be gay and enjoy the feast, for vague terrors struck at his heart. When Atreus gave him the cup of blood and wine, he could not lift it to drink at first, and when he did try to drink the wine seemed to roll around the brim of the cup rather than pass through his lips. Filled with sudden fears, Thyestes demanded that Atreus produce his sons.

Atreus left and returned with the heads of the three sons on a platter. Thyestes, chilled with horror at the sight, asked where the bodies were. He feared that Atreus had refused them honorable burial and had left them for the dogs to eat. Atreus told Thyestes that he had eaten his own children. Then Thyestes realized why unnatural night had darkened the skies.

Still Atreus was not satisfied. He felt disappointed that he had not planned to force Thyestes to drink some of his children's blood while they were yet alive. The king bragged of what he had done and described how he himself had committed the murders and spitted the meat before the fires.

Atreus, enjoying his revenge, could never believe that the greatest weight upon Thyestes' mind was regret that he had not thought of such revenge and caused Atreus to eat of his own children.

TIMON OF ATHENS

Type of work: Drama

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Tragedy of delusions

Time of plot: Fourth century B.C.

Locale: Athens and the nearby seacoast

First presented: c. 1605-1608

Principal characters:

TIMON, an Athenian lord

FLAVIUS, his faithful steward

APEMANTUS, Timon's candid friend

ALCIBIADES, an Athenian general

Critique:

Shakespeare did not finish Timon of Athens. Perhaps he was able to see that this bitter play, which was another of his dramatic commentaries on enormities brought about by ingratitude, was too stark in its contrasts and too obviously moralistic ever to be successful with the public. There is no neutral ground here to which one can retreat to draw his breath: the good are almost impossibly good, the bad are unbelievably bad. Shakespeare derived the plot from the life of Mark Antony in North's Plutarch's Lives, as well as from Lucian's dialogue, Timon, which was available to him in Latin and French.

The Story:

In Athens, the house of Timon, a wealthy lord of the city, was the scene of much coming and going. Poets, artists, artisans, merchants, politicians, and well wishers in general sought the friendship and favors of a man whose generosity knew no bounds. While waiting to speak to Timon, a poet disclosed his vision to an artist: Timon was depicted as the darling of Dame Fortune, and his friends and acquaintances spared no effort in admiring his favored position. But, so went the vision, Fortune turned and Timon tumbled into penury, his friends doing nothing to comfort him.

Timon joined the crowd of suitors in his reception chamber. When a messenger reported that Ventidius, his friend, had been jailed for a debt, Timon promised to pay the debt and to support Ventidius until he became solvent again. An old man complained that one of Timon's servants had stolen the heart of his only daughter. Timon promised to match the girl's dowry with an equal sum. Then he received the poet and the painter and the jeweler graciously, accepting their shameless flattery. Apemantus, a crudely candid friend, declared broadly that these flatterers and seekers of bounty were a pack of knaves. Alcibiades, a great military leader, came with a troop of followers to dine with Timon. As all prepared to feast at Timon's bounteous table, Apemantus cursed them roundly.

A great feast was served to the accompaniment of music. Ventidius, having been freed from jail, offered to repay the money spent in his behalf, but Timon declared that friendship would not allow him to accept Ventidius' money. When Apemantus warned Timon that men will readily slay the man whose food and drink they consume, Timon expressed his gratitude at having so many friends to share his generosity; he wished, however, that he might be poorer in order that these good friends might know the joy of sharing their largess with him. Timon's eyes filled with tears, so overcome was he by the sentiments of friendship, as a group of costumed Athenian ladies presented lavish gifts to him from men of wealth. Timon then presented rich gifts to his departing friends. Flavius, his steward, observed that his master's infinite generosity had almost emptied his coffers. Timon told Apemantus that he would give him gifts, too, if he would cease railing at these felicities of friendship.

Before long Timon was reduced to insolvency and near beggary. A senator to whom he owed a great sum of money sent his servant to collect. Other servants of Timon's creditors had gathered in front of his house. Timon, who had never given Flavius a chance to explain that there was no more money, asked the steward the reason for the crowd outside. When Flavius told him the truth, Timon ordered the sale of all his lands. Flavius disclosed that the lands had been sold or mortgaged. Timon, refusing to share Flavius' alarm, declared that he now had the chance to test his friends. He directed his servants to borrow money from his friends Lucius, Lucullus, and Sempronius. Then they were to go to the senators and borrow more. Flavius disclosed that he had already tried without success to borrow from these sources. Timon made excuses for them, however, and suggested that the servants try Ventidius, who had recently come into a large fortune.

The servant who went to Lucullus was told that times were difficult and that Timon's friendship was not sufficient security for a loan. When Lucullus offered the servant a bribe to say that he had been unable to see Lucullus, the servant, horrified, threw down the bribe money and departed in disgust. Lucius claimed that he, needing money, had hoped to borrow from Timon. A third servant went to Sempronius. Upon learning that Timon had been denied a loan by Lucullus, Lucius, and even by Ventidius, Sempronius, pretending to be hurt that Timon had not sent to him first, also refused.

As Timon continued to be importuned by his creditors' servants, he went out in a rage and bade them cut what he owed their masters out of his heart. Still enraged, he directed Flavius to invite all of his creditors to a feast.

Alcibiades, meanwhile, pleaded in the senate for the remission of the death sentence on a veteran soldier who had committed murder. The senators, deaf to his arguments that the man had killed in self-defense, persisted in their decision. When Alcibiades continued his plea, the senators sentenced him, on pain of death, to be banished from Athens.

At Timon's house, tables were arranged as though for a great banquet. Timon's guests, apologizing profusely for their inability to honor his requests for money, appeared in expectation of a lavish banquet. When Timon bade them eat, they discovered that the covered dishes were filled with warm water. Timon then cursed them for what they were, threw the water in their faces, and drove them out of his house.

A confirmed misanthrope, Timon left Athens. For the moment he focused all of his hatred on Athens and her citizens, but he predicted that his curses would eventually encompass all mankind. Flavius, meanwhile, announced to his fellow servants that their service in Timon's house had come to an end; what little money he had, Flavius shared with his fellows. He pocketed his remaining money and declared his intentions of seeking out his old master.

One day Timon, who was living in a cave near the seashore, dug for roots and discovered gold. As he was cursing the earth for producing this root of all evil, Alcibiades appeared, accompanied by his two mistresses. Timon cursed the three and told them to leave him. When Alcibiades disclosed that he was on his way to besiege Athens, Timon gave him gold and wished him every success. He also gave the two women gold, after exhorting them to infect the minds and bodies of all men with whom they came in contact. When Alcibiades and his troops marched away, Timon continued to dig roots for his dinner.

Apemantus appeared to rail at Timon for going to the opposite extreme from that which had caused his downfall. He declared that wild Nature was as cruel as men, that Timon, therefore, would do well to return to Athens and flatter men who were still favored by Fortune. After Apemantus had left, a band of cutthroats, having heard that Timon possessed a great store of gold, went to the cave. When they told Timon that they were destitute, he threw gold at them and ordered them to practice their malign art in Athens. So bitter were Timon's words that they left him, determined to abandon all violence.

Flavius, finding the cave, wept at the pitiful state to which his master had fallen. Timon, at first rude to his faithful steward, was almost overcome by Flavius' tears. He gave Flavius gold, wished him well, and admonished him to succor only dogs.

The reports of Timon's newly found wealth having reached Athens, the poet and the painter went to his cave. He greeted them sarcastically, praised them for their honesty, and gave them gold to use in destroying other sycophants and flatterers. Flavius returned, accompanied by two senators. The senators, apologizing for the great wrongs done Timon, offered to lend him any amount of money he might desire. They promised him, furthermore, command of the Athenian forces in the struggle against Alcibiades. Timon wished a plague on both Athens and Alcibiades. His prescription to the Athenians for ending their troubles was that they come to the shore and hang themselves on a tree near his cave. When he retreated into his cave, the senators, knowing their mission fruitless, returned to Athens.

In Athens, the senators begged Alcibiades to spare the city because its importance transcended the petty griefs of an Alcibiades or a Timon. Alcibiades agreed to spare Athens only on the condition that those who had offended him and Timon should be punished. As the city gates were opened to the besiegers, a messenger reported that Timon was dead. Alcibiades read Timon's epitaph, copied by the messenger. It reaffirmed Timon's hatred of mankind and expressed his desire, in death, that no one pause at his grave.

Critique:

Poetically, John Ford followed closely the magnificent tradition established by Shakespeare and Webster, but the vehicles for his poetry were marked by Caroline decadence. Perhaps Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1621) led Ford to probe the more obscure aspects of human relationships. In 'Tis Pity She's a Whore, the main plot is concerned with brother-sister incest. Surely Ford grew too expansive in plotting this play, for the several substantial subplots anticipated early in the drama fade out somewhat indecisively. The intensity of the main plot, while it may have drawn Ford away from his original intentions, compensates for the resulting inconclusiveness of structure.

The Story:

In Parma a brilliant young gentleman named Giovanni fell in love with his sister Annabella. Maddened by his passion, Giovanni went to his tutor, Friar Bonaventura, for advice and shocked the friar by his use of fallacious arguments to justify his unnatural love. The friar, deploring Giovanni's willingness to ignore religious and moral strictures on such a love, advised the youth to remain in his room for a week, at the end of which time he surely would realize the enormity of his passion.

When Grimaldi, a Roman gentleman, and Vasques, servant of Soranzo, met in front of Florio's house, Vasques thrashed Grimaldi. Florio, the father of Giovanni and Annabella, accompanied by Donado and Soranzo, came upon the fracas and separated the antagonists. Soranzo explained to Florio that Vasques was disturbed because Grimaldi, obviously an inferior man to the noble Soranzo, was competing with Soranzo for the hand of Annabella.

During the street disturbance Annabella and her duenna, Putana, appeared on the balcony. Putana pointed out to Annabella that she was being fought over, that she should be proud to have two such excellent suitors. Although Putana especially praised Soranzo, Annabella was plainly not interested. As they stood on the balcony Bergetto, the foolish nephew of Donado, passed by and declared his intention of winning the hand of Annabella.

Giovanni, returning from his talk with the friar, approached and entered the house. Annabella, not recognizing him at first, praised his manly beauty. Then, realizing who he was, she hastened into the house to join him and to comfort him in the melancholy from which he appeared to suffer.

Giovanni despaired. The more he strove to forget his love for Annabella, the more he seemed to love her. When Annabella joined him, no longer able to contain his maddening obsession, he confessed his love. Then he offered her his dagger and begged her to love him or to end his life. Annabella expressed dismay at Giovanni's revelation. He assured her that the Church had approved of his love for her. She then revealed that she loved him with equal passion.

Donado, in the meantime, advanced the cause of his nephew Bergetto. Florio, pleased by Donado's promise to leave the youth a fortune, said that the final choice must be left to Annabella herself.

After Giovanni and Annabella had consummated their love, he expressed the jealous fears of a lover. Annabella assured him that she found her suitors repulsive. When Giovanni had left her, Annabella was introduced to Richardetto, a supposed doctor, and his niece Philotis, who carried a lute. Florio had retained the doctor because Annabella appeared to him to be sickly.

Meanwhile Soranzo, distracted in his love for Annabella, was confronted by Hippolita, a woman he had wronged. She told him that her husband was dead and that he must fulfill his promise to marry her now that she was a widow. Soranzo, preoccupied with his love for Annabella, dismissed her. Vasques encouraged Hippolita, however, by telling her that perhaps Soranzo would be more amenable another day. Hippolita then tried to enlist Vasques' aid in a plot to avenge herself on Soranzo. Vasques pretended to become her accomplice.

Richardetto privately informed Philotis that during a journey away from home he had had his death reported so that he might return to Parma in disguise and discover the adulterous activities of his wife Hippolita. Grimaldi asked Richardetto for a love potion which would win Annabella's love. Richardetto, after assuring Grimaldi that Soranzo was his only rival, promised to provide him with a poison for his rapier so that he might mortally wound Soranzo in a fight.

The foolish Bergetto, meanwhile, continued his silly courtship of Annabella. Donado, after reading an inane letter Bergetto had written to Annabella, advised his nephew to remain indoors lest his idiocy get him into trouble. After Donado left, Bergetto went with his servant Poggio to see a prodigious horse in a side show.

When Giovanni revealed the state of his affair with Annabella, the friar, shocked because the youth had refused to heed his warnings, decided to visit Annabella.

At Florio's house Donado presented an acceptable letter, allegedly written by Bergetto, to Annabella. She expressed no interest. When her father suggested that she send an heirloom ring to Bergetto, she had to admit that Giovanni had taken it to wear. Quite frankly, she told Donado that it would be impossible for her ever to love Bergetto. Bergetto alived with word that he had allowed himself to be thrashed in the street and that a doctor newly arrived in Parma had ministered to his wounds. Bergetto also disclosed that he had been charmed by the doctor's niece, who had kissed him. Donado, accepting defeat, asked Annabella to keep as a marriage gift a jewel that he had given her as a courtship token from Bergetto. Later, encountering his sister alone, Giovanni jealously commanded her to return the jewel.

Florio next chose Soranzo as the suitor most acceptable to him. Annabella disclosed to Soranzo that she was determined to remain a maid, but that if she ever married it should be to Soranzo. Giovanni listened secretly to the conversation in order to convince himself of her fidelity to him. As Annabella and Soranzo talked, the girl was suddenly taken sick.

Later, when Putana told him that Annabella was with child, Giovanni directed Putana to admit no doctor to his sister and to tell Florio that Annabella had merely suffered from indigestion. In the meantime Florio, conferring with Richardetto about his daughter's health, learned that Annabella suffered nothing more than ills common to young womanhood and that she should be married. Florio, ignorant of Annabella's refusal of Soranzo, decided that Soranzo and his daughter should be married by Friar Bonaventura immediately. Giovanni, meanwhile, conducted the friar to the house, ostensibly to give spiritual comfort to his sister. Richardetto, having learned of Florio's plans for the marriage of Soranzo and Annabella, gave Grimaldi the promised poison.

Annabella, in her chamber, confessed to the friar and, fearful of eternal damnation, agreed to his suggestion that she marry Soranzo immediately. Soranzo was called and, in the friar's presence, the pair made their betrothal vows. The wedding ceremony was to take place in two days' time. Vasques, pretending to be Hippolita's ally, reported that Soranzo would marry Annabella.

Grimaldi waited outside the monastery for the arrival of Soranzo and Annabella. Bergetto and Philotis, sent by Richardetto, also went to the monastery to be married. In the dark Grimaldi mistook Bergetto for Soranzo and mortally wounded the silly youth.

Having murdered Bergetto, Grimaldi took refuge in the house of the cardinal, who, confronted by Donado, Florio, Richardetto, and police officers, disclosed that he already knew of Bergetto's death. Grimaldi, confessing to the murder, insisted that he had mistaken one man for another. The cardinal declared that Grimaldi, because of his noble Roman blood, would be protected by the Church. Donado and Florio, deploring what seemed to them a gross injustice, left the cardinal's house.

Two days later Soranzo and Annabella were married. Giovanni, racked by jealousy and grief, refused to drink a health to the newlyweds. His slight was overlooked, however, when Hippolita, disguised, arrived with some masked maidens to present a masque in honor of Annabella. Hippolita, joining the hands of the couple, called for a cup of wine to drink their health. Vasques handed her a poisoned cup intended for Soranzo. After Hippolita had drunk the fatal potion, Vasques revealed his trickery. Hippolita died cursing the marriage. The friar expressed to Giovanni his fear of that omen of blood at the marriage feast.

When Soranzo, having discovered his wife's pregnancy, berated her viciously, Annabella tortured him with words of praise for the father of her unborn child. Soranzo, threatening to kill her if she did not disclose the identity of her lover, drew his sword. Vasques entered and calmed his master; he advised Soranzo to be gentle with Annabella and to let his servant seek out the lover. Soranzo then turned to Annabella and apologized for his brutality, declaring that one must have compassion for weaknesses of the flesh.

Vasques tricked Putana into telling him about Annabella's love for her brother. When Putana had declared that Giovanni was the father of Annabella's child, Vasques called in a band of ruffians and at his command they gagged Putana and carried her away to put out her eyes. Meeting Giovanni, Vasques told him that Annabella was alone in her chamber and suggested that he go to her.

Annabella, filled with remorse for her sins, stood at her window and declared her repentance. The friar, passing below, was amazed at her change of heart. She threw down to him a letter in which she urged her brother also to repent. The friar delivered the letter to Giovanni, who read that their incestuous love had been discovered. As he expressed his disbelief, Vasques brought Giovanni an invitation from Soranzo to attend his birthday feast. Giovanni, in spite of the friar's warning, promised to be present. The friar, convinced that matters were coming to a dreadful conclusion, left Parma.

While Soranzo was greeting his guests, Giovanni went to his sister in her chamber. When he chided her for her repentance, Annabella warned him that the feast had been arranged in order that Soranzo might destroy them both. Giovanni, determined to take a desperate course, told Annabella to pray and to forgive him; then he stabbed her. With Annabella's heart on the point of his dagger, he went to the banquet hall. There, to the amazement of his father, he confessed his incestuous love. Vasques, who had gone to Annabella's chamber, returned with word that she was dead. Florio collapsed and died. Soranzo and Giovanni drew and fought, and Soranzo fell, mortally wounded. Then, while Vasques and Giovanni fought, Vasques signaled his ruffians, who surrounded Giovanni and mortally wounded him. He died still unrepentant of his unnatural love.

Blind Putana, having confirmed the relationship between brother and sister, was condemned to be burned to death for her part in the affair. Vasques was banished from Italy.

Critique:

Shakespeare idolaters have for centuries sought to dissociate the name of the bard from this brutal play. The unsavory episodes would suggest the work of an apprentice playwright following the tradition of Thomas Kyd, whose The Spanish Tragedy, a violent drama of revenge, was enormously popular in the last decade of the sixteenth century. Conclusive proof of authorship appears, however, in the virtues of this play. They adumbrate Shakespeare at the peak of his powers: flights of excellent poetry, tight construction, and a genuine sense of the dramatic. For his plot, Shakespeare had recourse to two classical revenge legends, the revenge of Atreus from Seneca's Thyestes and the rape of Philomela from Ovid's Metamorphoses.

The Story:

Early in the Christian era, Saturninus and Bassianus, sons of the late emperor, contended for the crown of the Roman Empire. Both men were leaders of strong factions. Another candidate, a popular one, was Titus Andronicus, a Roman famed for his victories over the barbarian Goths to the north.

Marcus Andronicus, brother of Titus, stated in the forum that Titus was the popular choice to succeed the late emperor. The sons, willing to abide by the desires of the populace, dismissed their factions.

As the prominent men of the city went into the senate house, Titus made his triumphant entry into Rome. He was accompanied by his surviving sons and by a casket containing the body of another son. In his train also were Tamora, Queen of the Goths; her sons, Alarbus, Demetrius, and Chiron, and her lover, Aaron, a Moor. Before the senate house, Lucius, one of Titus' sons, demanded that a Gothic prisoner be sacrificed to appease the spirit of his dead brother in the casket. When Titus offered as sacrifice the oldest son of Tamora, the queen pleaded for mercy, reminding Titus that her sons were as precious to her as his were to him. Titus paid her no heed. Alarbus was sacrificed and the casket was then laid in the tomb of the Andronici. At that moment Lavinia, Titus' only daughter, appeared to greet her father and brothers and to pay her respects to her fallen brother.

Marcus came out of the senate house, greeted Titus, and informed him that he was the choice of the people for the emperorship. Titus, unwilling to take on that responsibility at his age, persuaded the people to name Saturninus emperor instead. Saturninus, in gratitude, asked for and received the hand of Lavinia to become his queen. But Bassianus, to whom Lavinia had given her heart, seized the maid with the help of Marcus and the sons of Titus and carried her away. Titus' son Mutius, who stayed behind to cover their flight, was killed by his father.

Saturninus, who begrudged Titus his popularity with the people, disavowed all allegiance and debt to the general and planned to take Tamora as his wife. Titus, deserted by his emperor, his brother, and his sons, was deeply shaken.

Marcus and Titus' sons returned and expressed the desire to bury Mutius in the family vault. Titus at first refused, saying that Mutius had been a traitor; then he relented after his brother and his sons argued effectively for proper burial.

When Bassianus appeared with Lavinia, Saturninus vowed that he would avenge the stealing of the maid who had been given him by her father. Bassianus spoke in Titus' behalf, but Titus declared that he could plead his own case before the emperor. Tamora openly advised Saturninus to be gracious to Titus, but secretly she advised him to curry Titus' friendship only because Titus was so popular in Rome. She assured Saturninus that she would destroy Titus and his family for their having sacrificed one of her own sons. Saturninus therefore pardoned the Andronici and declared his intention of marrying Tamora. Believing their differences reconciled, Titus invited Saturninus to hunt with him the next day.

Aaron, contemplating Tamora's good fortune and the imminent downfall of Saturninus and of Rome as well, came upon Chiron and Demetrius, disputing and about to draw their swords over their chances of winning the favors of Lavinia. Advising the youths to contain themselves, he told them that both could enjoy Lavinia by seizing her in the forest during the hunt, which would be attended by the lords and ladies of the court.

Later, while the hunt was under way, Aaron hid a sack of gold at the foot of a large tree in the forest. He had previously arranged to have a pit dug near the tree; this pit he covered over with undergrowth. There Tamora found him and learned that both Bassianus and Lavinia would come to grief that day. Before Aaron left Tamora, he gave her a letter with directions that the message reach the hands of Saturninus. Bassianus and Lavinia approached and, seeing that the Moor and Tamora had been together, chaffed Tamora and threatened to tell Saturninus of her dalliance in the forest. Chiron and Demetrius came upon the scene. Informed by Tamora that Bassianus and Lavinia had insulted her, they stabbed Bassianus to death. But when Tamora urged them to stab Lavinia they refused, saying that they would enjoy her first. Lavinia then appealed to Tamora to remember that Titus had spared her life. Tamora, recalling how Titus had ignored her pleas to spare her son from sacrifice, was determined that her sons should have their lustful pleasure. The brothers, after throwing the body of Bassianus into the pit, dragged Lavinia away to violate her.

Meanwhile, Aaron, on the pretext that he had trapped a panther, brought two of Titus' sons, Quintus and Martius, to the pit and left them there. Martius fell into the trap, where he recognized the murdered Bassianus by a ring he wore on his finger. When Quintus tried to pull Martius out of the pit, he lost his balance and tumbled in. Aaron, returning with Saturninus, claimed that Titus' sons had murdered Bassianus. Tamora then gave Saturninus the letter that Aaron had given her. The letter, written ostensibly by one of the Andronici, outlined a plot to assassinate Bassianus, to bury him in a pit, and then to collect payment, which was a bag of gold hidden near the pit. When the bag of gold was found where Aaron had placed it, Saturninus was convinced of the brothers' guilt. Despite Titus' offer of his own person as security for his sons, Saturninus sentenced them to be tortured. Tamora assured Titus that she would speak to Saturninus in his behalf.

In another part of the forest, Chiron and Demetrius, their evil deed accomplished, cut off Lavinia's hands and tongue so that she would be able neither to write nor to tell of what had befallen her. Alone in the forest, Lavinia was joined at last by her uncle, Marcus, who led her away to her father.

Later, in Rome, Titus recalled his years of faithful military service to the state and begged the tribunes to spare his sons, but they would not listen to him. Another son, Lucius, a great favorite with the people, attempted unsuccessfully to rescue his brothers. He was banished from the city. As Titus pleaded in vain, Marcus brought the ravished Lavinia to him. The sight of his daughter led Titus to wonder to what infinite depths of grief a man could come. Aaron announced to the grieving Andronici that Saturninus would release Martius and Quintus if one of the family would cut off his hand and send it to the court. Titus agreed to let Lucius and Marcus decide between them; when they went to get an ax, Titus directed Aaron to cut off his hand. Later, a messenger brought Titus his hand and the heads of Martius and Quintus as well. Having suffered as much as a man could suffer, Titus vowed revenge. He directed the banished Lucius to raise an invading force among the Goths.

At his home, Titus appeared to be demented. Even so, it was clear to him one day that Lavinia was trying desperately to tell him something. She indicated in Ovid's Metamorphoses that section in which the story of Tereus' brutal rape of Philomela was recounted. Suddenly, it occurred to Marcus that he could, by holding a staff in his teeth and between his knees, write in the sand on the floor. Lavinia took the staff thus and wrote in the sand that Chiron and Demetrius were her violators.

Titus now sent his grandson Lucius with a bundle of weapons to present to Tamora's sons. The youths did not understand the message that Titus had attached to the gift, but Aaron quickly saw that Titus knew Lavinia's ravishers. As the brothers admired their gift, a blast of trumpets announced the birth of a child to Tamora. A nurse entered with the newborn baby, who was black, and stated that Tamora, fearful lest Saturninus see it, had sent the child to Aaron to dispose of. Chiron and Demetrius, aware of their mother's shame, insisted that the infant be killed immediately. When they offered to do the murder, Aaron, the father, defied them. As a precaution, he killed the nurse, one of three women who knew the baby's color. Then he had a fair-skinned baby, newly born, taken to Tamora before he fled to the Goths.

Titus, now reputed to be utterly demented, wrote messages to the gods, attached them to arrows, and, with Marcus and his grandson, shot the arrows into the court. He persuaded a passing farmer to deliver a letter to Saturninus. The emperor was already disturbed because the messages carried by the arrows stated Titus' grievances against the state. When Saturninus threatened to execute justice on old Titus, Tamora, feeling her revenge complete, advised him to treat the distracted old soldier gently. The farmer, meanwhile, delivered Titus' letter. Enraged by its mocking message, Saturninus commanded that Titus be brought to him to be executed.

A messenger brought word that the Goths, led by Lucius, threatened to sack Rome. Knowing Lucius' popularity with the Romans, Saturninus was fearful. But Tamora, confident of her ability to save the city, directed the messenger to arrange a conference with Lucius at the house of Titus.

In the camp of the Goths, Aaron and his child were brought before Lucius. Aaron's captor disclosed that he had come upon the Moor in a ruined monastery and had heard him state aloud that the baby's mother was Tamora. At Lucius' promise to preserve the life of the child, Aaron confessed to his crimes against the Andronici. Lucius decreed that the Moor must die a horrible death.

Tamora, meanwhile, believing that Titus was demented beyond all reason, disguised herself as Revenge and with her sons, also disguised, presented herself to Titus. Although Titus recognized her, she insisted that she was Revenge, his friend. Titus, for his own purposes, pretended to be taken in by the disguises; he told Rapine and Murder, Revenge's cohorts, to seek out two such as themselves and destroy them. At Tamora's bidding, Titus directed Marcus to invite Lucius to a banquet, to which Saturninus and Tamora and her sons would also come.

Titus persuaded Chiron and Demetrius to stay with him while their companion, Revenge, went to perform other duties. He then called in his kinsmen, who seized and bound the brothers. Titus told them that he intended to kill them and feed to their mother a paste made of their bones and blood. Lavinia held a bowl between the stumps of her arms to catch their blood as Titus cut their throats.

Lucius, accompanied by a guard of Goths, came to his father's house, where he put Aaron in the charge of Marcus. Saturninus and Tamora made their appearance and were ushered to a banquet served by Titus, dressed as a cook. Titus, hearing from Saturninus that Virginius, in the legend, had done well to kill his ravished daughter, stabbed Lavinia. The startled Saturninus asked if Lavinia had been ravished and by whom. When Titus disclosed that Tamora's sons had done the evil deed, Saturninus asked to see the youths at once. Titus, declaring that Tamora was eating their remains, stabbed her. Saturninus stabbed Titus, and Lucius, in turn, stabbed Saturninus. A general fight ensued. Lucius and Marcus, with their followers, retired to a balcony to tell the people of Rome of the manifold evils wrought by Tamora, her sons, and Aaron.

After the people had chosen him their new emperor, Lucius sentenced Aaron to be buried waistdeep and left to starve. He also decreed that Tamora's body be fed to wild beasts.

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA

Type of work: Novel

Author: Victor Hugo (1802-1885)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: The 1820's

Locale: The Isle of Guernsey

First published: 1866

Principal characters:

GILLIATT, a young recluse

MESS LETHIERRY, a shipowner, and Gilliatt's friend

DÉRUCHETTE, Lethierry's niece

SIEUR CLUBIN, captain of Lethierry's steamboat

RANTAINÉ, Lethierry's former partner

REV. EBENEZER CAUDRAY, Déruchette's lover

Critique:

The Toilers of the Sea is a typical work of the French romantic period. Much of the novel is given over to descriptions of places and people, conveyed with all of Hugo's fidelity to detail. Some critics of the novel have protested against local color emphasized at the expense of conciseness, speed of narration, and credibility of incident and characterization. They forgot that in this novel Hugo's purpose was to present the regional and the romantic, an intention in which he succeeded admirably.

The Story:

In the parish of St. Sampson, Gilliatt was a strange figure. He and his mother had come to the Isle of Guernsey some years before and had made their home in an old house by the shore. Nobody knew where they came from, but most people decided that they were French. When Gilliatt grew to young manhood, his mother died and he was left alone to make his livelihood by fishing and cultivating. To the superstitious people of the town, he was a figure to be feared, for they were sure he had power to communicate with evil spirits and cure strange ailments. The young man went his own way with seeming indifference.

One Christmas Day Gilliatt saw a young woman tracing some letters in the snow. When he reached the spot, he discovered that the letters spelled his own name. The girl was Déruchette, niece of Mess Lethierry, Gilliatt's supporter against the superstitious people of the parish. From that day on Gilliatt was in love with the beautiful Déruchette. Although he stood in her garden and serenaded her with his bagpipe, he lacked the courage to approach her directly. Mess Lethierry heard the music from the garden and thought that it would do the suitor, whoever he was, little good; it was to him the suitor should apply.

Later Gilliatt won a race, the prize being a Dutch sloop. Mess Lethierry thought more highly of him than ever. Lethierry was a good man who loved two things, the sea and his niece. Some time before he had been brought to ruin by the treachery of a man he had trusted. Rantaine, his partner, had run away, not only with his own share of the profits but also with Lethierry's. In an effort to recoup his finances, Lethierry bought a steamboat, an invention the fishermen considered a work of the devil.

The Durande, as the ship was called, shared equal affection with Déruchette in Lethierry's heart. As captain, he engaged Sieur Clubin, a man whose honesty was the pride of the community. Lethierry, despite the opposition to the steamboat, prospered in trade with St. Malo and other points on the French coast.

Meanwhile a new rector, Ebenezer Caudray, had come to the parish. One day, while Gilliatt was fishing from his sloop, he rescued Caudray, who had climbed upon a seat-shaped rock exposed at low tide. The grateful rector gave him a Bible. When Caudray met Déruchette, he fell in love with her, much to Gilliatt's chagrin.

One day the Durande did not return from a trip to St. Malo. Lethierry was in despair, the whole parish in an uproar. Some days previously a group of boys had gone prowling near an old and supposedly haunted house. There they had heard men talking in Spanish, discussing payment for taking someone to South America. In St. Malo a man purchased a revolver and spoke mysteriously to various people. A short time before a coast guardsman had been killed. Clubin, encountering Rantaine, had forced him at the point of a gun to return the money stolen from Lethierry. As Rantaine left in a boat, he shouted to Clubin that he would write to Lethierry and tell him that he had given the captain the money.

While Lethierry and the townspeople waited for news of the Durande, that ship was in difficulty. The pilot, having discovered a flask of brandy, had got drunk and steered the ship off its course in the fog. The captain cursed the drunken pilot and attempted to avoid a catastrophe. Suddenly there was a crash and the boat began to leak. The passengers took to lifeboats, but the captain remained on board. When they were gone, the captain made his way to the rocks upon which the ship had grounded. Much to his surprise and fear, he discovered that he was not where he had planned to be.

Clubin had deliberately wrecked the ship after placing the brandy where the pilot would find it. In the hope that everyone would believe he had been drowned, he had planned to ground the Durande at a spot where he would find some smugglers hired to carry him to South America with the money taken from Rantaine. Now he realized that he had miscalculated, that he was stranded in one of the deathtraps of the sea, that he would drown.

When survivors of the wreck reached

St. Sampson and told their story, Sieur Clubin became a hero. But Lethierry was desolate; his fortune was gone. It was not so much the vessel itself that was important, for that could be replaced. But the engine was lost, and he lacked the money to buy another. In his despair Lethierry announced that whoever should regain the engine would have Déruchette for his wife. Gilliatt stepped forward and announced that he would try to salvage the engine.

At the scene of the wreck Gilliatt labored unceasingly against the powerful sea and bad weather. One day he swam into an underwater cave where he was attacked by a monster that he finally managed to kill. He swam farther and in the recesses of the cavern he found the remains of a man and a wallet bearing Clubin's name. The wallet contained many coins. Gilliatt pocketed it and resumed his work.

At last he succeeded in hoisting the engine. Weary and exhausted, he fell into a deep sleep. The next day, after the sun had warmed his tired body, he gained new strength. Then he discovered that part of his work had been undone by the sea. While he attempted to repair the damage, a storm came up and all his work seemed in vain. But he finally got the engine into his boat and sailed for home.

In St. Sampson, with the arrival of Rantaine's letter, Mess Lethierry began to understand Clubin's duplicity. As time passed, Clubin's secret preparations became known, and no one any longer believed that he had gone down with the ship. Lethierry was even more dispirited than ever. One morning, as he looked out at the ocean, he saw Gilliatt's Dutch sloop with the engine aboard. Overjoyed, he sent for Gilliatt, who had slipped away to his own house. Lethierry was ready to make good his promise, with deep gratitude now that Gilliatt had returned not only the valuable engine but also the money recovered from Clubin's wallet. But Déruchette, confronting the unkempt and bedraggled Gilliatt, fainted. Gilliatt, having seen her and Caudray in the garden, knew that she secretly loved the rector.

When the shipowner, unaware of his niece's true affections, pushed the preparations for the wedding, Caudray determined to marry Déruchette without Lethierry's knowledge. The two went off to be married, only to learn that they could not have the ceremony performed without Lethierry's consent. Then Gilliatt arrived with the consent Lethierry had given for the wedding of Gilliatt and Déruchette. To their astonishment, Gilliatt said he would give the bride away. So Caudray and Déruchette were married.

As the newlyweds were embarking upon the Cashmere, which was to take them to England, Gilliatt presented Déruchette with a chest of bride's linen he had inherited from his mother. As the ship pulled out, Gilliatt went to the rock seat from which he had once rescued Caudray. On board, Déruchette saw that a man was sitting there, but in her happiness she gave no more thought to him. As Gilliatt watched the ship sail out of sight, the water mounted higher and higher around the rock. Soon the waves washed over it, and nothing could be seen but the sea and the sky.

TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS

THOMAS BROWN, a student at Rugby
HARRY EAST, his friend
GEORGE ARTHUR, befriended by Tom Brown
DR. ARNOLD, headmaster of Rugby
FLASHMAN, a bully

Critique:

On the surface a simple recounting of life at an English public school, the story of Tom Brown is in reality a plea for improvement in customs in those institutions. It was the author's hope that the older boys would follow the good example of the splendid headmaster and turn from bullying and cheating to an understanding of the real values to be gained from school life. The author does not ask that young boys give up all their mischief, only that they develop a sense of fitness and charity.

The Story:

Tom Brown was the son of a country squire who believed in letting his children mingle not only with their social equals but also with any children who were honorable. Thus before Tom left home to attend Rugby he had had the advantage of friendship with all types of boys. This training was to be of value to him when he first arrived at the famous school.

When Tom alighted from the coach he was met by Harry East, a lower-school boy who had been at Rugby for a half year. He gave Tom much good advice on how to dress and how to take the hazing and bullying that every new boy must endure. The two boys became immediate friends and were to remain so throughout their years at school. From the first Tom loved the school. He conducted himself with such bravery, both on the playing field and in dormitory scuffles, that he soon gained popularity among the other boys. One of the sixth-form boys, a leader among the students, made such an impression on Tom with his talks on sportsmanship and kindness to weaker boys that Tom for the first half-year was an almost model student. He did join in some of the mischief and was once sent to Dr. Arnold, the headmaster, but by and large both he and East profited by the lessons they learned in classes and in games.

With the beginning of the second half-year, Tom was promoted into the lower fourth form, a large and unruly class dominated by bullies and ruffians. Formerly he had liked his masters and tried to please them; now he began to believe that they were his natural enemies and to do everything possible to thwart them. He cribbed on his lessons and shirked many of his other duties. He and East disobeyed many rules of the school and often taunted farmers in the neighborhood by fishing in their waters or killing their fowls. All in all, Tom and East and their friends acted in very ungentlemanly ways.

But Tom and East also did some good in the school, for they were basically boys of sound character. Both came from good homes and had received good early training. They finally decided that something must be done about fagging, the custom of running errands for the older boys. Each older boy was allowed two fags, but some of them made every younger lad in the school wait on them. One particular bully was Flashman. Deciding to strike against his domination, Tom and East locked themselves in their room and defied his demands that they let him in. After attempting to break the door down, Flashman retreated temporarily; but he was not through with the rebels. For weeks he caught them and tortured them at each possible chance, but they held firm and persuaded some of the other lower-school boys to join them. At last Flashman's brutality to Tom and East and their friends so disgusted even the bully's best friends that they began to desert him, and at last his hold on the school was broken forever. Then Tom and East thrashed him soundly, and from that time on Flashman never laid a hand on them. Not long afterward Flashman was caught drunk by the headmaster and was sent away from the school.

Tom and East began to get into trouble in earnest, and the headmaster despaired of their even being allowed to stay in school. But wise Dr. Arnold could see the good in the boys, good which they seemed to try hard to hide, and he arranged for them to be split up. Tom was given a new and shy young boy to live with, one George Arthur. Arthur was a half-orphan and Tom's better nature responded to the homesick younger boy. Arthur was to be the greatest influence to enter Tom's life during his career at Rugby. He was of slight build, but he had moral courage that made Tom ashamed. Arthur did what he thought was right, even when it meant that he must endure the taunts of his housemates. Because Tom could not let a younger boy appear more courageous than he, he reverted to his own former good habits which he had dropped because of fear of hazing. He began again to kneel in prayer morning and night, to read his Bible, and to discuss earnestly the meanings of certain passages. Indeed, as East said, although Tom was seemingly becoming a leader in the school, it was really Arthur who was leading Tom and thus the other boys. East fought the change as hard as he could. But he too followed Tom, and so in spite of himself he began to change for the better.

When fever struck the school, many of the boys were seriously ill, Arthur among them. One boy died. Arthur remained very weak after his illness and his mother decided to take him out of school until he could recover his strength. Before he left, Arthur spoke to Tom about cribbing. Although Tom, believing that to fool the masters was a schoolboy's duty, scoffed at his friend's views, Arthur as usual prevailed. Tom found it hard to do his lessons honestly, but each time he would weaken the memory of Arthur's face and voice would set him straight again. East did not completely change in this respect, but he did try a little harder on his own before resorting to dishonest translations.

Another result of Arthur's influence was that East took communion. He had never been confirmed. But as a result of a conversation with Tom, at which Tom put forth many of Arthur's beliefs, East talked with Dr. Arnold and received spiritual stimulation. After he began to receive communion East rapidly changed into the good young man he had unknowingly wanted to be.

So the school years passed. East finished up and went off to fight in India. Tom became the leader of the school, and he and Arthur, who had returned after his illness, made many changes in the actions and attitudes of the boys. Tom, graduated, went on to Oxford. While there he learned of the death of his old headmaster, Dr. Arnold. He returned to his old school, to mourn the man who had played such a large part in influencing his life. For it was not until Dr. Arnold was gone that Tom and the others realized how much the good man had done for them. Tom's friends were scattered over the earth, but he knew that his heart would always be with them and those wonderful days at Rugby.

TOM BURKE OF OURS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Charles Lever (1806-1872)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Ireland and France

First published: 1844

Principal characters:

TOM BURKE, Irish gentleman and soldier of fortune
ANTHONY BASSET, an unscrupulous estate lawyer
DARBY M'KEOWN, called Darby the Blast, an Irish patriot
CHARLES DE MEUDON, a young French officer
MARIE DE MEUDON, his sister

THE MARQUIS DE BEAUVAIS, a French aristocrat
GENERAL D'AUIVERGNE, Tom's benefactor
CAPTAIN MONTAGUE CROFTS, Tom's enemy
NAPOLEON BONAPARTE

Critique:

Charles Lever, the most popular of nineteenth-century Irish novelists, was a great admirer of Napoleon, so much so that Tom Burke of Ours presents one of the most idealized portraits of that historical personage to be found in any literature. In a preface to this novel Lever called the Napoleonic Period the most wonderful and eventful in modern history. The story proper covers Napoleon's career from the days of the first consulship to the fall of the empire. The plot, although theatrical, is absorbing, and the battle scenes, particularly those of Austerlitz, Jena, and the engagements of the famous "Week of Glory," are presented with dash and brilliance. As a result, the book has the vividness and swift action of a good film. The chief defect of the work is the fact that Lever, intent upon telling a romantic story, maintains no consistent point of view in his presentation of either the history or the society of the period.

The Story:

Tom Burke was only a schoolboy when his father died and the family physician and a rascally estate lawyer conspired to cheat him out of his inheritance as a younger son. Eton, private tutors, fine clothes, and the best horses and dogs had been provided for his older brother George; an obscure Dublin school and hand-me-downs had been considered good enough for fourteen-year-old Tom. On a dark winter day, sitting in the shadows by his dying father's bedside, he overheard the doctor and the lawyer discuss an arrangement to have him articulated to Anthony Basset, the lawyer, in return for the five hundred pounds left Tom under his grandfather's will.

The day after the funeral, hoping to escape his dreary prospects as a lawyer's clerk, Tom took to the roads with Darby M'Keown, called by the peasants Darby the Blast, a piper belonging to one of the patriotic secret societies which had survived the disastrous rising of '98. Several times he was almost overtaken by Basset's agents or captured by British soldiers who were everywhere tracking down rebels in those troubled times. By chance he was thrown into the company of Charles de Meudon, a young French officer who had volunteered to aid the cause of Irish independence. The Frenchman taught Tom languages and military science, capturing his boyish imagination with accounts of Napoleon's victories at Marengo, Lodi, Arcola. Knowing that he would never live to return to his own country, the sickly young officer made Tom promise that he would go to France to study at the École Polytechnique and to be like a brother to his friend's sister, Marie de Meudon. Charles died at the country retreat where he and Tom had gone together. Before his death he gave the boy some French money to pay for his journey overseas.

Captured by the British at the time of de Meudon's death, Tom was being taken to Dublin under guard when Darby the Blast appeared and provoked a scuffle with the militia. During the fight Tom escaped. His only hope being to find the quarters of Captain Bubbleton, a bombastic English officer who had been kind to him some time before, he continued on his way to Dublin. There, while searching for the captain, he was caught in a mob rioting before Parliament House. Struck over the head by a musket, he fell unconscious.

When he awoke, Tom found himself in Captain Bubbleton's quarters, where that officer had carried the boy after finding him senseless in the street. Tom tried to tell the captain the true story of his experiences, but his rescuer, who always changed circumstances to suit his fantastic imagination, brushed the explanations aside. To him, Tom was a hero who had been wounded while fighting the Irish rebels and the officers' mess, delighted with the boy's spirit, called him Tom Burke of Ours. Lord Castlereagh himself, the captain added, was concerned for Tom's quick recovery.

Tom's cuts and bruises soon healed under the nursing of the captain and his sister, Miss Anna Maria. One day the captain reported that an officer was coming from the Castle to see the convalescent. To Tom's dismay, the officer was one who was able to recognize him immediately as an associate of rebels. Lodged in jail, the boy was released when Basset appeared at the hearing and claimed his runaway apprentice. But Captain Bubbleton remained Tom's good friend. At his intercession the lawyer was persuaded to accept four hundred pounds of Tom's inheritance money in exchange for the boy's indenture papers.

So Tom did become Tom Burke of Ours for a short time, even though he was still determined to go to France at the first opportunity. The officers of the mess welcomed Captain Bubbleton's charge in friendly fashion. One exception, however, was Captain Montague Crofts, who made little effort to conceal his dislike.

One evening Darby the Blast, disguised as an old woman, came to the barracks to give Tom a packet containing Charles de Meudon's letter of credit and two checks on his banker, papers Tom had dropped while fleeing from the British soldiers. Tom and Darby were interrupted when a group of officers entered and called for a deck of cards to settle a wager between Bubbleton and Crofts. Hearing Bubbleton wagering heavily, and knowing that his friend had not that much money on his person, Tom slipped the captain what he thought was a twenty-pound note. Instead, he gave him one of Charles de Meudon's notes for two thousand livres. After the other officers had gone on duty Crofts threatened to denounce the boy as a traitor and a spy for the French. When Tom stood up against his accuser, the enraged captain drew his sword and tried to run the boy through. Tom was wounded, but before Crofts could strike a second blow Darby the Blast ran into the room and struck the officer to the floor, where he lay as if dead.

Aided by the disguised piper, Tom managed to walk by the sentry and reach a house by the river. There his wound was dressed. Before daybreak he was aboard a smuggler's vessel bound for France.

All went as Charles de Meudon had planned. Tom, enrolled in the Polytechnique, soon distinguished himself at the French military school. One day the famous General d'Auvergne arrived to review the cadets, and Tom led a desperate charge in a mimic battle staged for the occasion. Knocked unconscious, he revived to find a young woman holding a cup of water to his lips. Half-dazed, he had the impression that he had met her somewhere before. At that moment the group about him parted. He saw a short man with a pale, commanding face looking down at him, and he heard Napoleon saying that he should be given his brevet at once. Advanced in rank, Tom moved into new quarters. His roommate was Lieutenant Tascher, the nephew of Madame Bonaparte, from Guadeloupe.

Although he grumbled frequently because his kinsman gave him no preference, Tascher was generously pleased when Tom received a commission in the Eighth Hussars, a billet the young Creole had also desired. The next day Tom, invited to attend Madame Bonaparte's reception at the Tuileries, went to a fashionable tailor to be fitted for a new uniform. The shop was filled with elegant young dandies who eyed Tom's old cadet uniform with contempt. Taking exception to one loungeur's remarks, Tom called him insolent. The young man presented himself as the Marquis de Beauvais, willing to meet Tom with rapiers in the Bois de Boulogne the next morning.

At the reception, which Tom attended in his old uniform, he was graciously received by Madame Bonaparte. A gentleman pointed out the young ladies of the court. One was the girl whom he had found bending over him when he awoke after the mock battle at the Polytechnique. She was Mademoiselle de Rochefort, called the Rose of Provence. While wandering through the Tuileries, Tom overheard a conversation between Napoleon and Talleyrand and learned that the treaties of peace were soon to be broken. He also encountered young Henri de Beauvais, who apologized for his rude behavior of the morning. With his new friend Tom went to a famous restaurant where a gay supper party was in progress. During the evening he indiscreetly revealed the discussion he had overheard. The Rose of Provence, he also learned, was the cousin of de Beauvais. Later, when he was questioned by a police agent, he got the impression that an attempt might be made to involve him in a political intrigue.

The war with England began, but Tom's squadron remained on duty at Versailles. From time to time he saw the Rose of Provence at a distance. One day the Abbé d'Ervan, whom he had met in the company of de Beauvais, visited him.

From his caller Tom learned that de Beauvais was a royalist, also that the Rose of Provence, who had taken her mother's name because of her family's royalist connections, was Charles de Meudon's sister.

About to throw his lot with the rebel Chouans, de Beauvais planned to see his cousin once more and sent the abbé with a request that Tom pass his friend through the sentry lines. At last Tom reluctantly agreed to do so. The next day he encountered the girl in the gardens and revealed himself as her brother's friend. That night he helped de Beauvais to enter the palace grounds. Before he left the young nobleman offered Tom a commission in the royal army; it was refused. Later Marie reproached Tom for his seeming disloyalty in becoming embroiled with the royalists.

Several months later Tom received a note in which Marie begged him to warn if possible a party of Chouans who were to be trapped at the Chateau d'Ancre, de Beauvais among them. He arrived at the chateau, only to be captured when troops surrounded the old castle. Arrested, he was charged with treason.

He was in prison during the reign of terror under the consulate, when the government repressed with harsh measures and bloodshed the royalist uprising for the restoration of the Bourbons, but because of General d'Auvergne's influence with Napoleon he was not among those executed or sent to the galleys. Transferred to a military tribunal, he was released after de Beauvais surrendered and absolved the young Irishman of any part in the conspiracy. Restored to his rank and appointed to d'Auvergne's staff, he was sent to the garrison at Mayence.

Napoleon became emperor. There were reports that the expedition against England would soon sail. In the midst of these warlike preparations General d'Auvergne summoned Tom to Paris. There he revealed his plan to adopt Marie de Meudon as his daughter. But Napoleon, refusing to consent to the plan, insisted that d'Auvergne marry the girl in whom he took so great an interest. Tom, as the general's aide, was forced to witness the hurried wedding of the girl he loved in secret. After the ceremony d'Auvergne left immediately for the front. To Tom he declared that he had made Marie his wife and that his only possible reparation would be to make her his widow.

After the battle of Austerlitz, Tom, now restored to Napoleon's favor, was one of the young officers named to the compagnie d'élite. In Paris, during those triumphant days of 1806, his closest friend was the Chevalier Duchesne, an officer who was secretly ready to serve either Bonapartists or Bourbonists to his own advantage. Their friendship cooled eventually because the chevalier suspected Tom of being his rival for the hand of Pauline de Lacostellerie, an heiress related to the empress. When Duchesne swore that he never forgot his debt to a friend or an enemy, Tom expected a challenge to a duel, but before the affair could be arranged he received orders to rejoin the army. At Jena his display of courage and resourcefulness led to his recommendation for the Legion of Honor and a colonelcy.

Meanwhile his enemy was working for his ruin. Shortly after the fall of Prussia he was summoned to Marshal Berthier's quarters at Potsdam. There he was shown an incriminating letter from Duchesne which had been seized in the mails. Duchesne, who had resigned his commission some time before, wrote as if to a fellow conspirator, for the letter, filled with ridicule of the emperor and hints of sedition, was his means of revenging himself upon Tom. Realizing himself disgraced if the nature of the letter were revealed, Tom claimed a foreign officer's privilege of resigning his grade and leaving the service.

With no ideas as to how he was to meet the future he left for Paris. General d'Auvergne and Tascher, his only real friends, were with the army in the field; having resigned his commission under questionable circumstances, he could not turn to them. In Paris he made the acquaintance of a number of royalists and at last consented to travel with an abbé who was going to Ireland on a secret political mission. Instead of the abbé, however, he met his former friend, Henri de Beauvais, who prevailed upon Tom in the name of their former friendship to convey some documents to the Irish patriots. Much as he had left Ireland ten years before, Tom returned on a smuggler's ship at night.

In his delight at being home once more he forgot the circumstances of his departure. He was surprised, therefore, when soon after his return to Dublin he was arrested on an old charge of murderous assault on Captain Crofts. Having survived the blow Darby the Blast had given him, Crofts was still eager for revenge. In the meantime Tom had also encountered Basset and had learned from him that his brother George was dead; he was now the heir to the Burke estates. Tom realized that he was involved in a deep plot, for Crofts, as Basset unintentionally revealed, was a distant kinsman who would inherit the property if Tom were out of the way. But Crofts was completely discredited at the trial. Darby the Blast, who had been transported to Australia some years before, returned in time to tell the true story of the assault and to accuse Crofts of other villainies, so that the judgment of the court turned against Tom's designing enemy and kinsman.

Suddenly possessed of his good name and a fortune, Tom was glad to settle down to the quiet life of a country squire, with old Darby as his loyal pensioner and friend. For a long time he paid no attention to events beyond the boundary of his estate. One day he chanced upon a newspaper and read in it an account of the burning of Moscow. Immediately his interest in Napoleon and his former comrades in arms revived. As disaster followed disaster for the French he brooded more and more upon the falling fortunes of Napoleon. At last he decided to offer his sword again in the emperor's service. Crossing the channel in a fishing boat, he volunteered in the first French unit he encountered. During the fierce fighting at Chaumière he stumbled upon the dead body of General d'Auvergne and with his own hands dug a grave for his old commander. At Montereau his daring in blowing up a bridge won for him the cross of the Legion.

Wounded in that engagement, Tom was invalided at Fontainebleau. One evening he heard hoofbeats and saw a file of dragoons drawn up before a distant wing of the palace. While he was walking in the garden that night, he saw Roustan, the emperor's faithful mameluk, on guard in a lighted apartment. Defeated, his army gone, Napoleon was in retreat. The next morning Tom awoke to find the courtyard filled with troops. From his window he watched the emperor's final farewell to his Old Guard. Napoleon was on his way into exile.

Paris welcomed with wild excitement the restoration of the Bourbons. Tom, who stubbornly continued to wear the Bonapartist tricolor in his hat, was once attacked by an angry mob. He might have been killed if de Beauvais had not appeared to save his life. Later, as Tom was preparing to leave France forever, de Beauvais came to him and offered him a commission in the army of King Louis. Tom refused to renounce his allegiance to the fallen emperor. When they parted the Frenchman handed him a note from Madame d'Auvergne, who asked Tom to call at her hotel that evening.

He found Marie dressed in mourning, but lovelier than ever. Planning to leave France, she wanted to give him some small keepsakes of her brother's and the sword General d'Auvergne had worn at Jena. When she tried to remove from her finger the ring which was to be her own token of remembrance, the band stuck. At that Tom begged her to give it to him where it was. While he stood telling the story of his long-concealed love, she smilingly placed her hand in his.

QUEEN GLUMDALCA, a captive giantess, in love with Tom

Critique:

The full title of this play is The Tragedy of Tragedies, Or, The Life and Death of Tom Thumb the Great. It is a literary burlesque of the absurd heroic tragedies so popular during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, as well as a satire on so-called courtly greatness. The importance of the play lies, however, in the skill with which Fielding parodied the verbal absurdities so common to the heroic tragedies. To add to the satire, Fielding pretended that the play was a newly discovered Elizabethan play, a pretense which permitted him to document the play for the reading public with a host of footnotes showing parallel speeches in the heroic drama to the absurd speeches in his own play. The device left no doubt as to precisely what he was burlesquing. This play was exceedingly popular in Fielding's lifetime; it broke all records for long runs on the stage during the eighteenth century.

The Story:

According to the legends told in his lifetime, Tom Thumb's peasant father and mother were unable to have any children until Tom's father went to Merlin the magician and received from him a charm which resulted in the wife's giving birth to the valiant, but diminutive, Tom Thumb. When he reached manhood, Tom Thumb entered the service of King Arthur, in whose court he accomplished great deeds and earned a vast reputation.

Queen Dollalolla fell in love with Tom Thumb. She loved him, in fact, as much as she loved drinking, but she kept her love a secret from all. Least of all did she tell King Arthur, who was afraid of no one except his queen.

Tom Thumb's greatest achievement was his victory over the giants who dwelt in the land ruled by the amazonian Queen Glumdalca. Tom subdued ten thousand giants and then returned with the surviving foes fastened to his chariot, among them the comely Queen Glumdalca. Because of their size, all the giants except the queen, who was a foot shorter than her subjects, had to be left outside the castle walls. Queen Glumdalca was brought into the castle. As soon as he saw her, King Arthur also fell in love with someone other than his spouse.

Eager to reward Tom Thumb for his great deeds, the king promised him anything within reason. Tom at first replied that permission to serve his king was sufficient reward. When pressed, however, he asked for the hand of Princess Huncamunca, with whom he had long been in love. The queen was furious that her daughter should become the wife of the man she loved. She railed at her husband and swore that the marriage should not take place. But the king, for once holding his own against his virago queen, told her to be quiet. The queen, furious also at her husband, went to Lord Grizzle, a discontented courtier, to secure his aid in preventing the marriage. Lord Grizzle was quite willing to oblige, for he himself was in love with Princess Huncamunca. He promised the queen that he would kill Tom Thumb.

Too late, Queen Dollalolla realized that she did not want Tom killed. She hoped, instead, that King Arthur would die and that she might be free to marry Tom.

In the meantime King Arthur went to tell Princess Huncamunca of his decision to marry her to Tom Thumb. The princess was only too happy to hear of his decision, for she had been in love with Tom for a long time. She had also been afraid that she might die an old maid and, according to old superstition, be doomed to lead apes through hell. After the king had gone, Lord Grizzle came to plead his suit with Princess Huncamunca. She revealed that she loved him, too. Taking her cue from the career of the queen of the giants, who had had twenty husbands, Princess Huncamunca decided that she could love both Tom and Lord Grizzle. She promised to marry Lord Grizzle and he went at once to secure a license for the ceremony.

Shortly after Lord Grizzle had gone on his happy errand, Tom Thumb came to the princess' apartment. Learning of her promise to Lord Grizzle, he paid no attention to it. While he was talking with the princess, Queen Glumdalca came into the room and offered herself to Tom Thumb, who, she said, would take the place of her twenty former husbands. Tom refused, saying he preferred the smaller gold coin of Princess Huncamunca to the large dross coin of the giantess. Queen Glumdalca left in a fury, but her anger abated when she discovered that the king was in love with her.

Tom Thumb hurried Princess Huncamunca off to a parson, who married them quickly and wished them at the same time a long life and many children. Lord Grizzle, returning just after the ceremony, found Princess Huncamunca married to his rival. The princess assured him that there was room in her heart for two husbands and offered to marry him as well. Lord Grizzle, unappeased, rushed out to create a rebellion and kill Tom Thumb.

That night the ghost of Tom Thumb's father appeared to King Arthur and warned him that Tom's life and the king's rule were both endangered by Lord Grizzle and his rebels. After the ghost's departure the king sat meditating on what he had been told, until the queen, rousing from a drunken slumber, came to see what was the matter. She tried, unsuccessfully, to put the king at ease.

The next morning Tom Thumb, in company with the giantess, went forth to subdue the rebels. On the way to the battlefield Merlin's magic vouchsafed Tom Thumb a vision in which he saw that he was doomed to be eaten by a red cow. The vision put him in awe of death, but when Merlin then revealed that Tom would become famous through the medium of the stage, Tom was willing to die.

Lord Grizzle, who had raised an army of rebels under the banner of democracy and freedom, advanced to meet Tom Thumb and the giantess. In a bloody engagement Lord Grizzle killed Queen Glumdalca, and Tom avenged her by killing Lord Grizzle. Their leader dead, the rebels dispersed. Tom cut off Lord Grizzle's head and started a victorious march to the castle.

In the castle, meanwhile, the king, the queen, and the princess awaited the news of the battle, certain that Tom Thumb would triumph and save them from the rebels. Their hopes were confirmed when a courtier ran in to tell them of Tom's success. Their happiness was short-lived, however, for the courtier went on to tell how, on his march back to the castle, Tom Thumb had met a large red cow which had swallowed poor Tom at a gulp.

Queen Dollalolla, outraged at the courtier for bringing news of her loved one's death, seized a sword and killed him. The courtier's mistress then killed the queen. Princess Huncamunca, anxious to avenge her mother's death, slew the courtier's mistress. Another courtier seized the time of strife to kill Princess Huncamunca because of an old grudge he carried against her. The princess' maid then avenged her mistress by killing Huncamunca's murderer. The king, dispensing justice, killed the maid. Then the king, with bodies lying all about him, killed himself, with the thought that his only glory was that he was the last to die.

Critique:

Beginning with The Trees, and continuing with The Fields, Richter's story of the growth of an Ohio pioneer settlement is completed in The Town, the third novel of his trilogy. Although Sayward Wheeler still dominates her family, The Town brings to maturity her children, a younger generation having little sympathy for the pioneers' philosophy of work for happiness. Richter's purpose in writing these books was not a historical one. History for its own sake never enters into the story. Richter wanted, instead, to give to the reader the feeling of having lived with his characters, of being familiar with their colloquial speech, their habits, their clothes, their everyday problems, and their struggle for survival against nature, man, and beast. These are satisfying books, full of the love of the land, of earthy wisdom and broad sympathy.

The Story:

Three times in her life Sayward Wheeler had felt that her life was over and done. Not that it frightened her any; she figured she could do as well in the next world as in this. Once was the day before her father told her the game was leaving Pennsylvania. The next week Sayward and her family traipsed west. The second time was the night she married Portius. This time she was not sure the feeling was more than that she would never have any more babies. She reckoned ten was enough, though one lay in the burying ground.

Her youngest worried her the most. All the others had been hearty enough, but Chancey was so frail folks thought it would have been easier for him to die when he was born. When he was a little fellow his heart flopped so much when he walked that he spent most of his time sitting on a stool in his daddy's office. He looked out of the window for hours, never opening his mouth. Chancey lived in two worlds, the earthy, boisterous one his family loved, and one in which he could float away and do wonderful things.

Sayward had fretted herself to raise him. To harden him, she always had guests sleep with him. She never knew how he shuddered lying next to most of them, but he liked the softness of the bride the time the bridesman got angry up in the loft with all of them and spent the night sitting in the kitchen.

Chancey was his father's favorite because his mind ran as clear as water. Often he rode his father's shoulders into town. He had an uncertain ride the day Portius took him to the hay scales. Portius had just returned from the state capitol where he had put through a bill calling for a new county for the township. With the making of the new county went four judgeships. Portius, because he was an agnostic, did not get an appointment as he had expected. It was given instead to a skinflint tax collector. Portius had come home, drunk and disheveled, minus his horse and saddle. Shortly afterward the new judge came to deliver a load of hay which had to be weighed in town on the new scales. Portius, with Chancey on his shoulders, followed the wavering wagon tracks into town. With one eye on Portius' unsteady gait, the new judge stayed on the wagon while it was weighed in. They clinched their bargain at the inn, the judge demanding cash which Portius produced. When the judge started to leave, Portius claimed that he had bought the judge's person with the load of hay. Before he left the inn the judge had given Portius the hay to avoid being haled to court. Not many could get ahead of Portius; Sayward thought he had too much of the rascal in him himself.

Although he was not yet a judge, he was a popular lawyer, and he was the leader in the fight to have Americus named the county seat. Resolve had studied law with his father and also practiced at the courthouse. Sayward was pleased when he married a girl who was sensible, even if she did have a lot of money. But Sayward felt at the time that things were going along too well and that the Lord would fetch her feet to the ground soon.

She was brought around feet first when Huldah disappeared. Sayward knew that black-eyed minx never fell in the river as some folks thought, but she was taken a little aback when she heard that Huldah had gone to a man's house stark naked, claiming the gipsies had taken her clothing. Sayward went after her. On the way home the ferryman, muttering a coarse remark Sayward only guessed at, made them wait for a second crossing. Sayward would not wait; she drove her horse into the river and forded it instead. Huldah listened respectfully after that.

Her set-to with the ferryman settled in Sayward's mind. Next thing he knew, Portius was arguing for a bridge in town. When it was built, Guerdon worked on it, though he claimed all the while that it was too low for flood time. When the floods came, Chancey, running away, was caught on the bridge and washed down the river. He could not tell whether he was in a dream or not until some men rowed out after him. Guerdon came down the river later to take him home.

Guerdon married a slut and ran away after he killed her lover. Guerdon's daughter Guerda, a sprightly and prophetic child, became Sayward's favorite. Soon after Guerda told Sayward that a good angel was coming for her, the child died suddenly of a throat infection.

Of all the Wheeler children, Chancey always had the hardest row to hoe. He fell in love with Rosa, the child Mrs. Jake Tench had had by Portius. When Rosa realized that all chances were against her, she committed suicide.

After his Aunt Unity died and her Bay State furniture was sent to him, Portius persuaded Sayward that his position in town warranted a mansion on the square. Sayward was proud of the house, but comfortable only in the kitchen and the room where she kept her old cabin furniture. Oh, she never disgraced her family; she could keep up with folks, even when Resolve became state governor. Although she was the richest woman in town, her family said she was so common she spoke to everyone she saw. The things she missed most at the town house were trees. She, who had sworn so often at the big butts, grew lonely for them. The first trees in town were those she planted in her yard.

She enjoyed having Portius' sister come to visit for a month, though the Bay State woman harped mostly on things and folks back east. Sayward could not help laughing when her old bushnipple of a pappy came in to see the woman and praised the old settlers skyhigh.

Her pappy had tracked down their lost Sulie. When Sayward and Genny went out to see her, they found her a squaw-woman who would not admit she remembered them.

Chancey left home to become a newspaper editor, blasting the pioneers who slaved for their livelihood and praising the men who advocated the abolition of hardship. Sayward secretly supported Chancey's paper; she thought he had as good a right to say what he pleased as anyone. She missed him, but his newspaper pieces seemed to bring him closer. When he came back for Portius' funeral, Sayward guessed he really came to see if his father had left him any money.

Sayward was lonely. All the folks who had known her kind of life were gone. The children thought her mind wandered a little before she died. She talked to her trees and said in her will that they could not be cut down. When she finally took to her bed, she had it turned toward the trees outside.

Critique:

Like his earlier novel, The Ox-Bow Incident, Walter Van Tilburg Clark's The Track of the Cat is a tragedy laid in Nevada, his adopted state. It is a long, psychological, and symbolic study of the effect of evil on a ranch family. The black cat means the end of everything to the Indian Joe Sam, whose animism, apparent in his recognition and acceptance of the primitive, mythic nature of Evil, affects the whole Bridges family for whom he works. Clark writes his story with his usual vivid contrasts between dream and fact, white man and Indian, tragedy and hope.

The Story:

Arthur Bridges, dreaming that he was caught in a blizzard in the Sierra Nevadas, could hear a loved one cry out to him, but he could not recognize the voice. He was afraid to move for fear he would fall off an icy cliff. He realized dimly that his left hand was bare and cold. As he put it in the pocket of his red and white cowhide parka, he felt the half-finished carving of a mountain lion that he was making for Joe Sam. Every year he carved a cat for Joe Sam because the old Indian believed a black cat brought death with the first snow unless he could make medicine against it. This year the first snow had come early in October, and the carved cat was not finished. The black cat must be stalking some prey through the stormy night. As Arthur heard the scream again, he tried to get off the cliff. Falling, he screamed and woke himself up.

Finding himself in the bunk room of the ranch house, Arthur listened for a sound in the wind. When he heard it, he waked his brothers, Curt and Harold. Curt thought Arthur was only dreaming until he also heard the scream of cattle being attacked somewhere in the storm. He rushed into his clothes to go out to the cattle.

The mother, having heard the screams, was making breakfast by the time the boys were dressed. Since it was dark and they could not see what was attacking, they ate while they made plans. Harold, the youngest, was to stay at home. Curt, always the boss, would take charge, but he would take Arthur along because he had dreamed that a black painter was at the cattle.

Arthur got out his whittling as they waited. Harold told him that Joe Sam had been up to his tricks that night. When something worried Joe Sam, he was likely to fall into a trance and go without eating or sleeping for days. Joe Sam always made medicine to his gods before the first snow and carried one of Arthur's carvings of a mountain lion in a little bag under his chin. The black cat was, to him, the height of evil. Bullets went through it so that it could never be killed. It was as big as a horse. It made no tracks. But it could kill viciously. The early October storm had caught them all unawares, with Joe Sam's cat still unfinished.

The mother had also dreamed something which she would not tell. She wanted Curt to take Harold with him instead of Arthur. But Harold's girl, Gwen Williams, had come to visit the night before and Arthur thought Harold should stay with her. When the mother asked Harold his plans for marrying Gwen, he claimed that he had not gone that far. Arthur figured the valley could hold more stock out of which Harold could take a yearly cut. They all realized that Curt would object if he did not get his own way or if he saw money going outside of the immediate family, even if it were to a brother's family. Harold said he would arrange the matter with Curt when Gwen went home. They all knew the father, who lived now only to drink, would have no say in the matter.

Before Curt and Arthur left, the father and the girls, Grace and Gwen, came to breakfast. The father immediately started drinking. To spite Harold, Curt tried to impress Gwen. Although he made fun of Arthur's half-belief in Joe Sam's black cat, he admitted when he got the horses ready that they were spooky that morning.

Curt and Arthur took only one gun because Curt was sure the cat was in a box canyon where he could easily find and kill it; Arthur would not need a gun for his kind of cat. In the canyon Curt found some of the cattle newly killed, obviously by a mountain lion. There were tracks nearby, but in his highheeled boots he could not follow them through the snow. Leaving Arthur and the gun to hold the trail, Curt went back to the house for tracking boots and food.

Arthur, leading his pony, slowly followed the cat's tracks toward a half-dome where he had often sat, whittling his figures and admiring the view. Suddenly his pony neighed fiercely and jerked, throwing Arthur sprawling into the bushes nearby. As he looked up over his shoulder, Arthur saw the black cat leaping at him.

Curt dawdled at home. Trying to get a rise out of Gwen, he promised to bring her home the skin of the black cat to use as a blanket, or, if it should be a yellow one, to wear as a costume. Harold brought him a frisky horse. Curt, nearly trampling the Indian, asked Joe Sam whether he still believed in the black cat. Joe Sam only replied that hunting would be no good because of the heavy snow.

On the way back to the canyon Curt saw Arthur's horse heading home. Disgusted because he thought Arthur had forgotten the horse as he daydreamed, Curt followed the tracks until he found Arthur's body. While he exchanged his coat for Arthur's heavy parka and packed the body on his own horse, he swore to get the cat if he had to trail it to the Pacific. Then he headed the horse toward home with the body.

Arthur's death greatly upset the mother and Grace. Harold and Gwen had to keep things going at the ranch. The father was drunk and Joe Sam practically hypnotized. A heavy snow settled in, delaying the burial. Afterward they made a huge bonfire in front of the house in case Curt needed direction. He had been out more than two days since Arthur's body had come back on the horse. The mother told Harold he would have to go out after Curt and that he should take Joe Sam along to track.

The horses became spooky when Curt and Joe Sam came near the box canyon. Each man tracked one side of the creek. Harold found dead cattle, one heifer so freshly killed that the blood still spurted. Working carefully, he tracked the cat so closely that he was almost surprised when he saw it. As he shot, Joe Sam's bullet came from across the creek. The cat sprang away with a scream, but the men followed it and finished their job. Although it was almost all black, Joe Sam said that the cat was not his black painter. His was a devil killing all the time.

Harold found Curt's crumpled body under a cliff. Tracing back from the place above the body where the snow had been broken off, he guessed that Curt had rushed wildly about after leaving a fire and a pile of cut boughs higher up. There, where the fire had been, Harold found Curt's gun and snowshoes, but he could find no tracks except Curt's in all the clearing. Puzzled and a little terrified, Harold guessed that the dead black painter might as well be blamed for Curt's death after all.

Critique:

Like Sigrid Undset in Norway, Verner von Heidenstam drew inspiration from the history of his native Sweden in medieval times. The Tree of the Folkungs is a historical novel of imaginative freedom and dramatic vigor. There are two parts to the story. The first deals with the period at the end of the eleventh century, a barbaric, brutal age which in the North saw heathenism and Christianity in conflict. In the second half of the novel the Folkung family, proud descendants of an ancient peasant freebooter, have pushed their way to the Swedish throne by the middle of the thirteenth century. Here are all the pageantry, heroism, humility, superstition, cruelty, and greed of the Middle Ages. The effect is not one of antiquarianism, however, for von Heidenstam is interested in a living past, the growth of a culture, with its mixture of good and evil, nobility and baseness. The writer tells his story with a variety of styles and techniques, mingling myth, legend, history, saga, and fantasy. The result is a literary work of racial significance and tragic power. The author was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1916.

The Story:

Folke Filbyter planted the seed from which grew the mighty Folkung tree. Homeward returning after long sea-roving, he brought his ship to shore near a shield-maiden's grave-ground in the land of Sveas and Goths. Dwarf Jorgrimme, a Finnish sorcerer, prophesied terror would darken the land and Thor's image tremble.

For two nights Folke tramped inland, his sack of booty on his back. The third night he came to Jorgrimme's cave, where the sorcerer gave him drink from the horn Månegarm, treasure of the gods. Then the dwarf cut the sack so that some of the gold fell out. Discovering the leak, Folke swore he had sown the ground with riches he would also reap. There he built his mighty hall, Folketuna.

Before long Folke had land and thralls but no sons. One morning his men found Jorgrimme's daughter trapped in a wolf-pit, and Folke took her home to his bed. Three sons she bore him, Ingemund, Hallsten, and Ingevald, but she got no honor and crouched in the straw like the scurviest thrall. Ingemund and Hallsten went sea-roving. Ingevald stayed by his father's side.

Folke, wanting a good marriage for his son, spoke for Holmdis, Ulf Ulfsson's daughter. Meanwhile old Jakob, a begging friar, preached a new faith in the region. When Ingevald tumbled the dwarfs' one-eyed god, his mother gave him sacred Månegarm, stolen from Jorgrimme's burial-cairn. Folke swore blood-brotherhood with the king of outlaws and got great riches. Then Holmdis proudly spurned a match with the thrall-woman's son, but Ingevald carried her by force to his father's hall. There, waiting in vain for her kinsmen to rescue her, she brought one son to Folketuna before she died. After her funeral Folke had no good of Ingevald. Folke Ingevaldsson was his grandfather's heir.

When Jakob came again, Ingevald, hoping to save his son from the lawless life at Folketuna, gave the child to the priest. For years old Folke rode from hearth to hearth looking for his lost grandchild. Thrall andthane alike knew of the grim old man's search.

King Inge traveled through the land with his bodyguards, and wherever he stopped men died or else were baptized in the new faith. When Ulf Ulfsson spoke for the old gods, the king's earl and chief adviser, a ruthless, priest-trained young man, left him bound to perish in the forest. Ingemund and Hallsten, homeward-bound, were in Ulf's hall that night and joined the king's guard.

Folke was at Upsala when the sacred grove burned and people cried out against Inge and called Blot Sven king. There Folke saw the king's earl, on his hand the star-shaped mark of the child stolen from Folketuna years before. Although the old outlaw offered his riches to help the king's need, young Folke and his uncles were proud men with little wish to have a name as unsavory as Folke Filbyter's associated with them, now that they were counted among the greatest of the king's thanes. They took the treasure he offered to advance themselves, but they visited him seldom in the bare hall where he sat in the dirty straw. At last he opened his veins and died as unwanted old men had done in ancient times.

Two hundred years later King Holmger lay dead, with the sacred sword Gråne on his grave, and Earl Birger of the Folkungs ruled in Sweden, although it was his young son Valdemar who wore the crown. Valdemar grew up weak and soft, a lover of pleasure and women. From his far ancestor, Folke Filbyter, he inherited a yeoman's love of the land and a liking for serfs and outlaws. There were many who thought that his brother, Junker Magnus, should have been king, for he was bold and cunning and the better knight. When Magnus unhorsed his brother at a great tournament at Belbo, and Valdemar laughed at his tumble without shame or regret, Earl Birger was so angry with his son that he collapsed from a stroke and died soon afterward. At the division of the earl's estate his sons quarreled over a missing drinking horn, Månegarm, an heirloom of the old days.

Valdemar's bride was Sophia, daughter of Denmark's king. Lady Jutta was her sister. Sometimes Valdemar talked with the maid apart and she became frightened. Valdemar also spent much time in the hut of Yrsa-lill, a goat-girl, to whom Gistre Härjanson had carried Månegarm. The company drank from it when Valdemar went to the hut to carouse with herdsmen and outcasts. Meanwhile the land knew confusion. Peasants paid no taxes and robbers roamed the highways. Valdemar would allow no wrongdoer to be punished.

When Jutta wished to return to Denmark, Magnus and Sir Svantepolk, a worthy knight, set out to escort her. Valdemar overtook them at the goat-girl's hut, where the party had stopped to rest. After convincing Jutta that Magnus was a trickster, Valdemar accompanied her to the border, and on the way they became lovers. Sir Svantepolk, renouncing his allegiance, rode off to join Duke Magnus. Queen Sophia had Yrsa-lill thrown into a cage filled with snakes. Gistre, the minstrel, rescued the girl, who afterward lay speechless in the convent at Vreta.

When Jutta bore a son beyond the marches, Valdemar gave the child into the keeping of Archbishop Fulco of Upsala. Then the king threatened to take away his brother's titles. Magnus had the sword Gråne brought from King Holmger's tomb and fastened it to his own belt. At Vreta, Yrsa-lill regained her speech and prophesied that whoever would get St. Eirik's banner from a maiden's hands would rule Sweden.

Jutta, now prioress at Roskilde, went to Upsala for a holy festival honoring St. Eirik. There she found her son and saw Valdemar surrounded by his wild bodyguard. Moved by her old love, she took off her religious habit and dressed in the robes of one of the king's favorites. Together she and Valdemar stood on the balcony of the king's house while the people howled disapproval and insults. Queen Sophia ordered Jutta sent to a convent in the archbishop's keeping.

Archbishop Fulco gave St. Eirik's banner to some maidens who carried it to Duke Magnus. Afterward there was war between the brothers. Crafty, vain, Magnus battled Valdemar and his army of peasants and outlaws. Valdemar seemed indifferent to the outcome, however, and sat feasting at Ramundeboda while his army was defeated at Hofva. From that time on Magnus had the crown, but the war did not end with his victory, for Valdemar fought and then fled from lost villages and provinces. At last the outlawed king had nothing left but a jeweled riding-whip borrowed from Lady Luitgard, the last friend to share his misfortunes, and he gave that to Gistre and told the minstrel to go look for Yrsa-lill. Alone and unarmed, Valdemar then surrendered to his brother.

King Magnus, old and sick by that time, gave the country peace. Valdemar lived a prisoner at Nyköpingshus, Luitgard his only company, but in his captivity he found such contentment that Magnus died envying him.

The Trees is the first of three novels Conrad Richter has written to trace the growth of a pioneer settlement in the old Northwest Territory west of the Alleghenies and north of the Ohio River. Considered with the other two, The Fields and The Town, these novels are actually a trilogy telling the story of Sayward Luckett from the time she left Pennsylvania to enter the deep woods in the Ohio wilderness. One of the most interesting characteristics of the books is the use Richter has made of early pioneer language as it was spoken, not as it was written. This is only one proof of the authenticity of the facts he used in writing a new and effective type of regional story. No other novel conveys so realistically what the first settlers must have felt when they faced the timbered wilderness on the frontier, the barrier of trees that shut out the sky and gave protection to animals and human enemies. The Trees is a pioneer story of simple human warmth and vigor.

The Story:

Worth Luckett was a woodsy with an itching foot. By the time he had five growing children and one left in its infant grave, he was ready to take off again. He had already been west when he was a boy with Colonel Bouquet. Jary, his wife, had never wanted to leave the settlements, but game was growing scarce in Pennsylvania; without food brought down by his gun, Worth could not see how he could feed his family. He was wary of telling Jary outright that he wanted to move on, but she knew what he wanted and was half resigned to it when she heard that the animals were clearing out of places where men lived.

Because Jary had the slow fever, the care of the younger children fell on Sayward's shoulders. She was nearly fifteen, a strapping girl scared of neither man nor beast. It was not beyond her strength to drown a white-faced buck when Worth had neglected to bring meat home. The girls, Genny, Achsa, and baby Sulie, and the boy Wyitt knew they had to step when Sayward spoke.

Worth led his family across the Ohio River and on until they came to a wilderness of trees that reached as far as the eye could see. Near a spot covered with deer antlers Worth laid out a place for a cabin. He was handy enough with tools to have the shell of a cabin up quickly, but the game in the woods drew him away so often that fall came before the cabin was finished. The darkness under the big trees had disheartened Jary so much that she did not even speak of the cabin until one fall day when the leaves had fallen so that she could look up through the branches and see the sky again. Then she felt like a human being who wanted to live in a house. She sent Worth back to his job. The snow fell the day after they moved into their cabin.

A few Indians still followed the trace by the house. One came on a night when Worth was away. Sayward hid the ax under her bed to fell him if he made a move toward the children in the loft or came toward her bed. He got up at night to cook some of his own meat at the fire. Worth was disturbed when he came home and found the Indian still there, but he and the Indian roared with delight when Sayward showed them the hidden ax.

Jary had such a hankering after some bread that Worth walked six days to bring back some white flour. But she could not eat the bread after Sayward made it; the slow fever had nearly finished her. When she died, they buried her under one of the big trees outside the cabin. Worth went away for a while, leaving Sayward to take care of the others.

One day, for the first time since they had lived there, they heard another ax in the woods. The young ones investigated and found a cabin going up, a man and a boy working on it. The man was a tom thumb, Sayward thought, when he asked her father for Sayward as a wife. Sayward thought he might be the first around there to ask her to marry him, but probably not the last.

Before long a trading post was set up by the river. Wyitt could hardly wait to trade off some of his skins for a knife. Indians and whites were whooping it up while he was there. He never forgot the sight of the wolf they skinned alive and set free.

More people raised cabins nearby until the Lucketts had several neighbors within walking distance. Worth blamed them and their cutting of the trees for the swamp pestilence that brought down Achsa, who was as brown and tough as an Indian. While the fever was on her Achsa begged for water, but that was the one thing she was not supposed to have. Late one night Sayward awoke to see Achsa crawling into the cabin with the kettle. She had drunk her fill from the run and had brought water back in the kettle. After that Achsa got well.

Louie Scurrah as a child had acted as decoy for Delawares on the warpath. When he came back to a small cabin nearby, the Lucketts expected to steer clear of him. He charmed Worth first with his woodsy tales, then Genny and Achsa, but there was always unspoken enmity between him and Sayward.

Sulie never returned after the day she was separated from Wyitt as they drove in the neighbor's cows. Worth was away at the time and the trail was cold when he and Louie gathered some neighborhood men to beat the woods. They found Sulie's tracks leading to a bark playhouse in a grove of trees, with a bit of her dress as a cover for a play trencher, but they could not find tracks leading out. Close by there were Indian trails, but they were also cold.

With Sulie gone, Worth went too. He thought he might follow the Indian tracks west.

The feeling between Louie and Sayward was not softened when Sayward, after finding Louie with Genny in the woods, told him it was time for him to marry Genny. He took Genny down the river and married her with good grace, but before long his itching foot took him off more and more often.

Louie got Wyitt a rifle to help kill meat for Sayward's cabin. The first day he had it, Wyitt wounded a buck. Standing over the animal to slit its throat, he suddenly found himself hoisted aloft. The deer tried to shake him loose, but Wyitt was able to kill it when it tired. His clothes were torn to ribbons and he was badly cut. Sayward, realizing that she had another woodsy on her hands and thankful for the meat he brought, said nothing.

Finally Louie went off to the English lakes with Achsa. Sayward did not know until later that they left the very night the painter tried to claw his way down Genny's chimney. Genny burned everything in the house that n. keep the painter from coming into the cabin. When Wyitt and Sayward found her, she did not recognize them. At last, under Sayward's care, Genny came back to her senses.

At a sober wedding of old folks, Jake Tench decided it was time to get a wife for solitary Portius Wheeler, a former Bay State lawyer. When the girl Jake picked shied off, Sayward told Jake that she would marry Portius. Jake brought Portius to Sayward's cabin where, under the influence of brandy, Portius went through the marriage ceremony. But when neighbors tried to put him to bed with Sayward, he turned tail and ran. Jake brought him back at dawn. Although Sayward told him she would not hold him against his will, Portius stayed with her.

Together they cut down trees for a garden patch. The neighbors brought teams to snake out the logs and to plow. Portius treated Sayward with gentle deference, and she was happy when she looked forward to her first-born.

COUNSEL FOR THE PLAINTIFF

FOREMAN OF THE JURY

FIRST BRIDESMAID

Critique:

A gentle satire on the due processes of law, Trial by Jury is a short and delightful play by the Gilbert half of the famous team of Gilbert and Sullivan. It was the second operetta on which these two talented men collaborated, the forerunner of many more well-known and well-loved musicals. It is the only Gilbert and Sullivan comic opera without spoken dialogue.

The Story:

The court was assembled, waiting for the learned Judge, the plaintiff, and the defendant. The jurymen were warned that they must set aside all prejudice and view the case in a judicial state of mind. The usher, who warned them to be fair, went into raptures over the beauty and the heartbreak of the plaintiff, ending each bit of praise, however, with the reminder to be free of bias.

When Edwin, the defendant, entered, the jurymen chanted to him to beware their fury. The defendant thought this a very strange proceeding and begged them to hear his story. The jury, after consultation, agreed that they should hear his plea. Then the defendant told how his heart had leaped with joy when he first knew his old love. He had laid his heart and his riches at her feet. He had moped and sighed just like a lovesick boy. But then the joy had turned to boredom. The flame of love had burned out, and so one morning he had awakened to be another's lovesick boy.

The jurymen then confessed that when they were young lads they had behaved in much the same fashion and acted as regular cads. Now that they were respectable men, they had not a scrap of sympathy for the defendant.

The learned Judge entered, but before he would hear the case he felt obliged to tell the court how he had become judge. When he was first called to the bar, he was, like most barristers, an impecunious lad, and he had almost despaired of ever trying a case before an English jury. Tiring at last of this third-class living, he had married a rich attorney's old and ugly daughter. The rich attorney had rewarded him for his sacrifice, after assuring him that he would soon grow used to his bride's looks. Cases then came fast to the young attorney and he restored many thieves and burglars to freedom. At last he became rich enough to throw over his elderly, ugly bride. Now he was a judge, and a good judge too, ready to hear this case of breach of promise.

The jurymen, sworn in, promised to weigh the case carefully. Angelina, the plaintiff, was then called in, preceded by her bridesmaids. The Judge took an immediate fancy to the first bridesmaid and sent her a note, which she kissed and placed in her bosom. But when the plaintiff entered, the learned Judge, transferring his affection to Angelina, had the note taken from the first bridesmaid and given to the plaintiff. She too kissed it and placed it in her bosom as the Judge and the jurymen took turns praising the plaintiff.

The plaintiff stated her case. She had been basely deceived by the defendant, who had wooed her without ceasing. When she had tried to name a day for their wedding, however, he had framed excuses and at last deserted her. His act was doubly criminal because she had already bought her trousseau. The plaintiff reeled, and the foreman of the jury and the Judge vied with each other to support her. At last Angelina fell sobbing on the Judge's chest. The jurymen shook their fists at the defendant and warned him again to dread their fury.

Edwin, although admitting that he had trifled with the lady, held himself blameless. No one should be censured for changing appetites. To atone, however, he would marry this lady today, his other love tomorrow. The Judge thought that a reasonable proposition, but the Counsel submitted that such a deed would be Burglaree. The Judge considered this a fine dilemma, calling for all their wits.

The plaintiff went to the defendant and embraced him, vowing that she loved him with unceasing fervor. She reminded the jury to remember her great loss when they assessed the damages the defendant must pay. The defendant then extolled his vices, stating that she could not abide him for a day. They should remember that when they assessed the damages.

The Judge, tossing aside his books and papers, said that he could not stay there all day. He would marry the lady himself. As he embraced her the others agreed that he was indeed a good judge—of beauty.

Critique:

Thomas Middleton, next to Ben Jonson, was the greatest realist among the dramatists writing during the reign of James I. The realism is not reinforced in Middleton's work by a close attention to the structure of the drama, as is so noteworthy in the Jonsonian plays. Middleton, a commoner himself and holder of a post for many years under the Lord Mayor of London, was exceedingly interested in the life of the people who lived within the city, rather than in the people of the court and the fashionable world. Where Middleton got the plot for this play is not known; possibly he gathered it out of incidents that actually occurred in London. On the other hand, the influence of this play on Philip Massinger's A New Way to Pay Old Debts is obvious. The greatest merits of the Middleton play are its intrigues, its hustle and bustle of incident, and its propensity to give good fun.

The Story:

Theodorus Witgood, a young man of quality, had been so prodigal with his fortune that he had lost it all. Even his country estate had been mortgaged to his uncle, Pecunius Lucre, a miserly man. The cause of Witgood's downfall was a Courtesan, a young woman on whom he had wasted his fortune after seducing her. Fortunately for Witgood, the girl really liked him and was anxious to help him. When Witgood conceived a plan to regain his fortunes, a plan that required her help, she readily promised to help her lover.

Witgood's plan was to take the Courtesan to London and pass her off as a rich widow. With the aid of a tavern-keeper, who gave Witgood his services as a servant and the use of his horses, the plan was put into execution. Witgood even hoped to get back the mortgage from his uncle. As soon as Uncle Lucre heard about the rich widow, his miserly instincts were aroused. Taken in by his nephew's story, he hoped to promote the marriage and eventually gain the widow's money and estates.

Uncle Lucre invited Witgood and the supposed wealthy widow to his home, where in spite of his real feelings toward Witgood he praised the young man to the skies. In addition to his uncle, the creditors to whom Witgood owed money were anxious to help his marital efforts, for the creditors realized that a good marriage would enable them to collect the money he owed them.

When word of the wealthy widow spread through the town, many suitors came to woo her. Among them was Walkadine Hoard, a rival miser who was pleased at the prospect of wooing a widow of fortune and so keeping that fortune from falling into the hands of Uncle Lucre. The situation was to Witgood's advantage, and he filled his uncle's ears with talk of the jointures that other suitors were willing to give the widow. His hope was that his uncle would take the hint and restore his estates and money to him in the belief that he should shine as well as the other suitors in the supposed widow's eyes. The plan was only a ruse, however, for Witgood had no intention of marrying the Courtesan and making an honest woman of her. Witgood's real love was Joyce, the daughter of Hoard's rich brother. Lest Joyce think he had forsaken her, Witgood sent her a letter telling her to keep faith with him. They had to keep their love secret, for Witgood's wild ways and prodigality, plus the enmity between their respective uncles, prevented their marriage.

In the meantime Hoard plotted to get the widow for himself. Accompanied by several gentlemen, he went to her and told her the truth about young Witgood. His friends also represented Hoard as an ardent suitor. Witgood, in another room, heard all that was said. At his first chance he advised the Courtesan to go ahead with her deception and marry old Hoard, a marriage which would give her a place in the world and restore her lost reputation. Hoard's proposal was a piece of luck that the plotting pair had not foreseen. She promised to meet Hoard at a tavern and elope with him. When she confessed that she had no estates, Hoard, thinking she was only teasing him, refused to believe her.

The Courtesan went to the tavern, where the old miser met her. To entertain his uncle, Witgood then went and told him that Hoard was being married off to a prostitute. Uncle Lucre was immensely pleased. Discreet Witgood did not tell the uncle that the prostitute was the supposed wealthy widow.

Witgood's creditors, getting wind of what was happening, secured a bailiff and had him arrested for debt. After much talking he persuaded them to take him first to Hoard's house. When they arrived there, Witgood informed Hoard that he had an earlier marriage contract with the widow, a contract which could not be nullified until both parties agreed to break it. Old Hoard was horrified, for the bond meant that his new wife's property, if any, was not his. Pretending to save the day, the woman suggested that Hoard buy off Witgood by paying the young man's debts. The creditors, paid by Hoard, went their way. Then Witgood and the widow confessed the woman's true identity. The bridegroom fumed, realizing too late that the supposed widow had told him in the presence of witnesses that she had no fortune. Hoard had been gulled into taking another man's mistress as his wife.

Meanwhile the tavernkeeper, acting as servant for Witgood and the Courtesan, had convinced Uncle Lucre that his nephew could marry the widow only if he had a fortune or an estate. The uncle, hoping to use the young man to get the supposed widow's fortune in his hands, gave up the mortgage on Witgood's estates. The tavernkeeper hastened with the papers to Witgood, who was extremely pleased with the way his plans were working out.

Before he left Hoard's house, Witgood, once more in control of his estates, received a message in which Joyce told him that she would meet him a short time later.

Old Hoard tried to pass off his wife as she had been passed on to him. He ordered a great wedding supper and invited, among other guests, his rival and also his brother. Everything went off well until Hoard's brother recognized the bride as Witgood's former mistress. In the confusion that followed the bride fell on her knees and asked forgiveness, telling her husband that she repented her previous sins and would make him a good wife. She pointed out that it was better for a man to have a wife whose sins were behind her instead of before her. Witgood also helped her reputation by saying that he had been her seducer and only lover.

Witgood himself then declared that he, too, had reformed. He promised to put aside his old habits of prodigality as the first step in winning consent to his marriage with Joyce, the girl he truly loved.

THE TRIUMPH OF DEATH

Type of work: Novel

Locale: Italy

First published: 1894

GEORGE AURISPA, a young Italian of wealth and family

SIGNOR AURISPA, George's materialistic father

HIPPOLYTE, George's mistress

Critique:

To a person of sensitivity, this novel by D'Annunzio may seem overdrawn. Because of its subject matter and florid style, sale of the book was prohibited in some countries. The result was to give D'Annunzio a tremendous underground reputation. Some critics have argued that the characters, except for Hippolyte, are types, particularly among the minor figures of the novel. The hero is the romantic Byronic hero in modern dress, a man who has never grown up because he has never had to take on responsibility or worry, because he has never had to methodize his life in any way. There are times when the story resembles a case history of one whose emotions have never matured with the body, a case history for the psychiatrist's notebook as much as a novel. Yet the book holds a power of its own. The lives of Hippolyte and George Aurispa represent both a triumph of romantic individualism and a failure of humanity and civilization.

The Story:

George Aurispa, a young Italian of old family and sufficient money to enjoy life without working, had fallen in love with a lovely married woman named Hippolyte. She had lived with her husband only a few weeks, for she had fallen ill shortly after her marriage. When the affair with George began, she left her husband and returned to her family. Marriage was out of the question for the lovers; because of religious reasons they could not marry as long as one or the other had a living spouse.

Infatuated, both George and Hippolyte often wished they could spend even more time together. But on the second anniversary of their first meeting an incident occurred which both regarded as an ill omen and which cast a pall over their minds. As they walked in Rome's Pincio gardens they came to a terrace where a man had just committed suicide. Blood and a lock of blond hair were still in evidence.

The suicide of the unknown young man in the Pincio affected the lovers even more than they realized at the time. George began to feel that materialism and sensuality, fostered by his love for Hippolyte, had taken too firm a hold upon him. Hippolyte, on the other hand, was warned again of her own mortality and the fact that she had a tendency toward epilepsy.

Soon afterward George was called home. His father and mother did not live together, and George had known for some time that his father kept a mistress. During the visit he learned for the first time the full story of his father's conduct. His mother told him that his father had despoiled the family fortune, refused a dowry for their daughter, and lived openly with his mistress and two illegitimate children. George disliked the financial entanglements of the situation; his own money he had inherited from an uncle. When George did visit his father to intercede for his family, the young man did nothing to help his mother and sister. Instead, he agreed to sign a note as surety for his father, who was trying to borrow money from a bank. George was struck, however, by the way his father had surrendered completely to a life of gross materialism.

Before he left his mother to return to Rome, George visited the apartment in the mansion where his uncle had lived. His uncle had committed suicide. The realization of his uncle's deed filled him with curiosity and melancholy, and he almost decided to kill himself with the same dueling pistol the uncle had used.

Returning to Rome, George again fell under the spell of Hippolyte, even though he was now haunted by his fear of gross sensuality, the thought of suicide, and a friend's warning that Hippolyte was coarse beneath her beauty and would someday find a richer lover.

In order to escape from his fears, George searched for a place where he and Hippolyte could be away from the world. He thought that in a small village on the Adriatic coast they could live in peace and he could work out his emotional and psychological problems.

But their new secluded life left George in even more of a quandary. There were times when he felt great happiness in being with his mistress day and night. At other times he saw in her only the embodiment of the same animal nature that was slowly but surely ensnaring him as it had ensnared his father. In order to escape, to achieve idealism, George once more considered taking his own life.

The Church offered no solution to his problem. Both he and Hippolyte were, in their way, devout. They visited shrines, but the mobs of humanity, the beggars with their sores and ills, only repulsed the lovers. Hippolyte's spell continued to work its way with George. She, proud of her power to awaken his desires, used this power constantly. George loved her and hated her at the same time, but he knew that he himself was not without blame. When their affair had begun, she was modest and almost frigid. Her husband, to whom she had been married by her family, had been brutal, and she had been ill. George, the first to stir her emotions, had helped to shape her personality.

Like all people living together, they discovered some irritating traits in each other. George was displeased with Hippolyte's feet, which he regarded as too common-looking. She, on the other hand, thought he was often too morbid. Both of them tried too hard, as they readily admitted, to escape into a world of pleasure and ideality.

Trying by all means to keep from antagonizing each other, they continued to make short excursions away from the village. George had a piano and music sent from Rome to their retreat. Still George found himself thinking not only of his death but of Hippolyte's as well. He sometimes believed that he could escape from sensuality only through the loss of his beloved. Death was the means he knew he must take to banish her irrevocably. She, for her part, seemed to realize what was in his mind. She had dreams in which she saw him dead or taking threatening attitudes toward her. Again, in George's mind, she was the most beautiful and fascinating of women, for her power over him continued to grow. Often, when he was emotionally distressed, she could draw him from that state of mind with nothing more than a kiss.

One afternoon, while they were swimming, George had an impulse to drown Hippolyte. She seemed to sense his mood and refused to go bathing with him again. One night they had a pleasant meal together. Later that evening, with great effort on his part, so strong was her physical charm at such a time, George persuaded his mistress to take a walk down to the rocky coast where fishermen were working at their nets. When they came to a one-plank bridge over which they had to walk, Hippolyte, growing dizzy at the sight of waves and rocks below, refused to cross. But George, feeling that he had found the time and place for his despairing deed, swept Hippolyte into his arms and plunged both of them to death on the rocks many feet below.

Critique:

The apparent last-minute inclusion of The History of Troilus and Cressida in the First Folio (1623), between the histories and the tragedies, has tended to put this play in an anomalous position in the opinion of commentators ever since. Troilus and Cressida has been called a satire, a comedy, a history, and a tragedy. The truth probably is that it is a little of all of these. Certainly, it is a comedy of disillusionment and bitterness. It would seem clear, however, that Shakespeare, in his unusual handling of the traditional elements of the Iliad, was in his own way, perhaps, commenting on the fading splendor of the Age of Elizabeth. Shakespeare knew the story from the pages of Chaucer and Henryson; but, where Chaucer and Henryson gave the story medieval color, Shakespeare transferred his Troy to the decadent days of the late Renaissance.

The Story:

During the Trojan War, Troilus, younger son of Priam, King of Troy, fell in love with the lovely and unapproachable Cressida, daughter of Calchas, a Trojan priest who had gone over to the side of the Greeks. Troilus, frustrated by his unrequited love, declared to Pandarus, a Trojan lord and uncle of Cressida, that he would refrain from fighting the Greeks as long as there was such turmoil in his heart. Pandarus added to Troilus' misery by praising the incomparable beauty of Cressida; Troilus impatiently chided Pandarus, who answered that for all it mattered to him Cressida could join her father in the Greek camp.

Later, Pandarus overheard Cressida and her servant discussing Hector's anger at having received a blow in battle from Ajax, a mighty Greek warrior of Trojan blood. Pandarus extolled Troilus' virtues to Cressida, who was all but indifferent. As the two discoursed, the Trojan forces returned from the field. Pandarus praised the several Trojan warriors—Aeneas, Antenor, Hector, Paris, Helenus—as they passed by Cressida's window, all the while anticipating, for Cressida's benefit, the passing of young Troilus. When the prince passed, Pandarus was lavish in his praise, but Cressida appeared to be bored. As Pandarus left her to join Troilus, Cressida soliloquized that she was charmed, indeed, by Troilus, but that she was in no haste to reveal the state of her affections.

In the Greek camp, meanwhile, Agamemnon, commander of the Greek forces in Ilium, tried to put heart into his demoralized leaders. Old Nestor declared that the seven difficult years of the siege of Troy had been a real test of Greek stamina. It was the belief of Ulysses that the difficulties of the Greeks lay in a lack of order and discipline, not Trojan strength. He reminded his fellow Greek leaders that the disaffection of mighty Achilles and the scurrilous clowning of Patroclus, a Greek leader, had provoked disorder in the Greek ranks. Even Ajax, usually dependable, had become fractious, and his follower, deformed Thersites, embarrassed the Greeks with his taunts.

As the Greek leaders conferred, Aeneas delivered to them a challenge from Hector, who in single combat would defend the beauty and the virtue of his lady against a Greek champion. When the leaders went their several ways to announce the challenge to Achilles and to other Greeks, Ulysses and Nestor decided that the only politic action to take, the pride of Achilles being what it was, was to arrange somehow that Ajax be chosen to fight Hector. Ajax, Achilles, and Patroclus heard of the proclamation, but tended to disregard it. Their levity caused the railing Thersites to break with them.

In Troy, meanwhile, Hector was tempted to concede to a Greek offer to end hostilities if the Trojans returned Helen to her husband, King Menelaus. Troilus chided his brother and Helenus for their momentary want of resolution. As the brothers and their father, Priam, discussed the reasons for and against continuing the war, Cassandra, prophetess and daughter of Priam, predicted that Troy would be burned to the ground by the Greeks. Hector heeded her warning, but Troilus, joined by Paris, persisted in the belief that the war, for the sake of honor, must be continued. Hector, although aware of the evil the Trojans were committing in defending Paris' indefensible theft of Helen from her husband, conceded that for reasons of honor the fighting must go on.

The Greek leaders approached Achilles, who had kept to himself since his quarrel with Agamemnon. Refusing to confer with them, Achilles retired into his tent and sent his companion, Patroclus, to make his apologies. At Achilles' persistent refusal to deal with the Greek commanders, who sought in him their champion against Hector, Ulysses played on the pride of Ajax with subtle flattery and convinced this Greek of Trojan blood that he should present himself as the Greek champion in place of Achilles.

In the meantime Pandarus had prepared the way for a tryst between Troilus and Cressida by securing the promise of Paris and Helen to make excuses for Troilus' absence. He brought the two young people together in his orchard, where the pair confessed to each other their undying love. Cressida declared that if she were ever false, then all falsehood could forever afterwards be associated with her name. Pandarus witnessed these sincere avowals of faith and himself declared that if Troilus and Cressida did not remain faithful to each other, then all go-betweens would be associated with his name. These declarations having been made, Pandarus led the young people to a bedchamber in his house.

In the Greek camp, Calchas, Cressida's father, persuaded Agamemnon to exchange Antenor, a Trojan prisoner, for Cressida, whose presence he desired. Diomedes, a Greek commander, was appointed to effect the exchange.

Planning to ignore Achilles, the Greek leaders passed the warrior with only the briefest recognition. When he demanded an explanation of that treatment, Ulysses told him that fame was ephemeral and that great deeds were soon forgotten. Fearful for his reputation, now that Ajax had been appointed Greek champion, Achilles arranged to play host to the unarmed Hector after the contest.

Diomedes returned Antenor to Troy, and at dawn he was taken to Pandarus' house to escort Cressida to the Greek camp. When Troilus and Cressida learned of Diomedes' mission, Troilus appealed unsuccessfully to the Trojan leaders to allow Cressida to remain in Troy. Heartbroken, he returned to Cressida and the young couple repeated their vows in their farewells. Troilus then escorted Cressida and Diomedes, who commented on Cressida's beauty, as far as the city gates. When Diomedes and Cressida encountered the Greek leaders outside the walls, Cressida was kissed by Agamemnon, Menelaus, Nestor, Patroclus, and others. Ulysses observed that she appeared wanton.

Warriors of both sides assembled to watch Hector and Ajax fight. The two companions clashed for only a moment before Hector desisted, declaring that he could not harm Ajax, his cousin. Ajax accepted Hector's magnanimity and invited the Trojan to join, unarmed, the Greek commanders at dinner. Hector, accompanied by Troilus, was welcomed among the Greeks with many warm compliments, but Achilles, meeting Hector, rudely mentioned that part of Hector's person in which he would one day inflict a mortal wound. Stung by Achilles' pride and lack of manners, Hector declared hotly that he would destroy all of Achilles at one stroke. The result was an agreement to meet in combat the next day. Ajax managed to calm heated tempers, however, and the feasting began.

Troilus, anxious to see his beloved Cressida, asked Ulysses where he might find Calchas, and Ulysses promised to be his guide. After the banquet they followed Diomedes to Calchas's tent, where Cressida met him and in affectionate overtures toward Diomedes revealed to the hidden Troilus that she had already all but forgotten him. As she gave Diomedes, as a token of her love, a sleeve that had belonged to Troilus, compunction seized her for a moment. But she quickly succumbed to Diomedes' charms and promised to be his at their next meeting. Diomedes left, vowing to kill in combat the Trojan whose sleeve he would be wearing on his helmet. Troilus, unable to believe that Cressida was the girl whom he loved so passionately, returned to Troy. He vowed to take the life of Diomedes.

As the new day approached, Hector was warned by Andromache, his wife, and by his sister Cassandra not to do battle that day; all portents foretold disaster. When their words proved ineffectual, King Priam tried vainly to persuade Hector to remain within the walls. During the battle Diomedes unhorsed Troilus and sent the horse as a gift to Cressida. Despite his overthrow, Troilus continued to fight heroically. Hector appeared to be, for his part, invincible. When Patroclus was severely wounded in the action, Achilles, enraged, ordered his followers, the Myrmidons, to stand by. As the action subsided, and Hector was unarming himself at the end of the day, the Myrmidons, at Achilles' command, closed in on brave Hector and felled him with their spears.

Troilus announced to the retiring Trojan forces that Hector had been killed by treachery and that his body, tied to the tail of Achilles' horse was being dragged around the Phrygian plain. As he made his way to the gates, he predicted general mourning in Troy and expressed his undying hatred for the Greeks. He encountered Pandarus, whom he abruptly dismissed as a cheap pander, a man whose name would be infamous forever.

MR. QUINT, and MISS JESSEL, two apparitions

Critique:

The Turn of the Screw is more than a ghost story. Of all James' work, it best exemplifies his power to understand and depict moral degradation. The real evil lies not in the horror of the apparitions themselves, but in what is happening to change the children from examples of sweetness and innocence to flagrant liars and hypocrites. Certainly there are few stories in literature which embody as much unspoken horror as The Turn of the Screw. It is the sense of dreadful and unguessable things which gives the tale its elegance and tone, raising it above the cheapness of melodrama. As James himself said in the preface to the original edition, it is the reader's own intensified imagination which supplies the particulars in abundance.

The Story:

It was a pleasant afternoon in June when the governess first arrived at the country estate at Bly where she was to take charge of Miles, aged ten, and Flora, eight. She faced her new position with some trepidation because of the unusual circumstances of her situation. The two children were to be under her complete care, and the uncle who had engaged her had been explicit in the fact that he did not wish to be bothered with his orphaned niece and nephew. Her uneasiness disappeared, however, when she saw her charges, for Flora and Miles seemed incapable of giving the slightest trouble.

The weeks of June passed uneventfully. Then, one evening, while she was walking in the garden at twilight, the governess was startled to see a strange young man at a distance. The man looked at her challengingly and disappeared. The incident angered and distressed the young woman, but she decided the man was a trespasser.

On the following Sunday evening the young woman was startled to see the same stranger looking in at her through a window. Once again he stared piercingly at her for a few seconds and then disappeared. This time the governess realized that the man was looking for someone in particular and that perhaps he boded evil for the children in her care. A few minutes later the governess told the housekeeper, Mrs. Grose, of the incident and described the appearance of the man. Mrs. Grose told her that it was a perfect description of Peter Quint, the valet to the governess' employer, but that Mr. Quint was dead.

One afternoon shortly afterward, a second apparition appeared. This time the ghost of Miss Jessel, the former governess, appeared in the garden to both the governess and the little girl, Flora. The strange part of the situation was that the little girl refused to let the governess know that she had seen the figure and knew who it was, though it was obvious that she had understood the appearance fully.

From the housekeeper the governess learned that the two apparitions had been lovers while alive, though the girl had been of a very fine family and the man had been guilty of drunkenness and worse vices. For what evil purpose these two spirits wished to influence the seemingly innocent children, neither the housekeeper nor the governess could guess. The secrecy of the children about seeing the ghosts was maddening to the two women.

They both felt that the boy was continuing to see the two ghosts in private and concealed that fact, just as he had known of the illicit affair between the valet and the former governess in life and had helped them to conceal it. Yet, when in the presence of the children, the governess sometimes felt that it would be impossible for the two children to be influenced into evil.

The third time the ghost of Quint appeared to the governess inside the house. Unable to sleep, she had sat reading late at night. Hearing someone on the stairs, she went to investigate and saw the ghost, which disappeared when faced by her unflinching gaze. Each night after that she inspected the stairs, but she never again saw the ghost of the man. Once she glimpsed the apparition of Miss Jessel as it sat dejectedly on the lowest stair. Worse than the appearance of the ghosts was the discovery that the children had left their beds at night to wander on the lawn in communication with the spirits who were leading them to unknown evil. It became apparent to the governess that the children were not good within themselves. In their imaginations they were living in a world populated by the evil dead restored.

In such an atmosphere the summer wore away into autumn. In all that time the children had given no sign of awareness of the apparitions. Knowing that her influence with the children was as tenuous as a thread which would break at the least provocation, the governess did not allude to the ghosts. She herself had seen no more manifestations, but she had often felt by the children's attitude that the apparitions were close at hand. What was worse for the distressed woman was the thought that what Miles and Flora saw were things still more terrible than she imagined, visions that sprang from their association with the evil figures in the past.

One day Miles went to her and announced his desire to go away to school. The governess realized it was only proper that he be sent to school, but she feared the results of ghostly influences once he was beyond her care. Later, opening the door of the schoolroom, she again saw the ghost of her predecessor, Miss Jessel. As the apparition faded the governess realized that her duty was to stay with the children and combat the spirits and their deadly influence. She decided to write immediately to the children's uncle, contradictory to his injunction against being bothered in their behalf. That night before she wrote she went into Miles' room and asked the boy to let her help him in his secret troubles. Suddenly a rush of cold air filled the room, as if the window had been blown open. When the governess relighted the candle blown out by the draft, the window was still closed and the drawn curtain had not been disturbed.

The following day Flora disappeared. Mrs. Grose and the governess found her beside the garden pond. The governess, knowing she had gone there to see the ghost, asked her where Miss Jessel was. The child replied that she only wanted to be left alone. The governess could see the apparition of Miss Jessel standing on the opposite side of the pond.

The governess, afraid that the evil influence had already dominated the little girl, asked the housekeeper to take the child to London, and to request the uncle's aid. In place of the lovable angelic Flora there had suddenly appeared a little child with a filthy mind and filthy speech, which she used in denouncing the governess to the housekeeper. The same afternoon Mrs. Grose left with the child as the governess had requested.

That evening, immediately after dinner, the governess asked Miles to tell her what was on his mind before he left the dining-room. When he refused, she asked him if he had stolen the letter she had written to his uncle. As she asked the question she realized that standing outside the window, staring into the room, was the ghost of Peter Quint. She pulled the boy close to her, shielding him from any view of the ghost at the window, while he told her that he had taken the letter. He also informed her that he had already been expelled from one school because of his lewd speech and actions. Noting how close the governess was holding him, he suddenly asked if Miss Jessel were near. The governess, angry and distraught, shrieked at him that it was the ghost of Peter Quint, just outside the window. When Miles turned around, the apparition was gone. With a scream he fell into the governess' arms. At first, she did not realize that she had lost him forever—that Miles was dead.

MALVOLIO, Olivia's steward

Critique:

Because of its title, it is assumed that this play was intended to be performed as a feature of the Twelfth Night festivities observed in Shakespeare's day. One of Shakespeare's most delightful comedies, the principal charm of Twelfth Night, Or, What You Will lies in the comic characters: Malvolio, Sir Toby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, and Maria. Viola, the heroine, ranks with Portia and Rosalind in intelligence and wit. The original source of the plot was an Italian novella by Bandello, based on an earlier work by Cinthio, but the story was translated into various secondary sources which Shakespeare probably used. In the character of Malvolio the playwright pokes sly fun at the Puritans of his day.

The Story:

Viola and Sebastian, twin brother and sister who exactly resembled each other, were separated when the ship on which they were passengers was wrecked during a great storm at sea. Each, thinking the other dead, set out into the world alone, with no hope of being reunited.

The lovely and charming Viola was cast upon the shores of Ilyria, where she was befriended by a kind sea captain. Together they planned to dress Viola in men's clothing and have her take service as a page in the household of young Duke Orsino. This course was decided upon because there was no chance of her entering the service of the Countess Olivia, a rich noblewoman of the duchy. Olivia, in deep mourning for the death of her young brother, would admit no one to her palace and would never think of interviewing a servant. So Viola, dressed in man's garb, called herself Cesario and became the duke's personal attendant. Orsino, impressed by the youth's good looks and pert but courtly speech, sent him as his envoy of love to woo the Countess Olivia.

That wealthy noblewoman lived in a splendid palace with a servant, Maria, a drunken old uncle, Sir Toby Belch, and her steward, Malvolio. These three made a strange combination. Maria and Sir Toby were a happy-go-lucky pair who drank and caroused with Sir Andrew Aguecheek, an ancient nobleman who was much enamored of Olivia. In return for the grog supplied by Sir Andrew, Sir Toby was supposed to press Sir Andrew's suit of love with Olivia. Actually, however, Sir Toby never sobered up long enough to maintain his part of the bargain. All these affairs were observed with a great deal of disapproval by Malvolio, the ambitious, narrow-minded steward. This irritable, pompous individual could brook no jollity in those about him.

When Cesario arrived at the palace, Olivia finally decided to receive a messenger from Orsino. Instantly Olivia was attracted to Cesario and paid close attention to the page's addresses, but it was not love for Orsino that caused Olivia to listen so carefully. When Cesario left, the countess, feeling in a flirtatious mood, sent Malvolio after the page with a ring. With an abrupt shock, Viola, who enjoyed playing the part of Cesario, realized that Olivia had fallen in love with her in her man's garb.

Meanwhile Maria with Sir Toby and Sir Andrew decided to stop Malvolio's constant prying into their affairs. Maria devised a scheme whereby Malvolio would find a note, supposedly written by Olivia, in which she confessed her secret love for the steward and asked him to wear yellow stockings tied with cross garters and to smile continually in her presence. Malvolio, discovering the note, was overjoyed. Soon he appeared in his strange dress, capering and bowing before the countess. Olivia, startled by the sight of her usually dignified steward behaving in such a peculiar fashion, decided he had lost his wits. Much to the amusement of the three conspirators, she had him confined to a dark room.

As the days went by in the duke's service, Viola fell deeply in love with that sentimental nobleman, but he had eyes only for Olivia and pressed the page to renew his suit with the countess. When Cesario returned with another message from the duke, Olivia openly declared her love for the young page. Cesario insisted, however, that his was a heart that could never belong to any woman. So obvious were Olivia's feelings for Cesario that Sir Andrew became jealous. Sir Toby and Maria insisted that Sir Andrew's only course was to fight a duel with the page. Sir Toby delivered Sir Andrew's blustering challenge, which Cesario reluctantly accepted.

While these events were taking place, Sebastian, Viola's twin brother, had been rescued by Antonio, a sea captain, and the two had become close friends. When Sebastian decided to visit the court of Duke Orsino at Ilyria, Antonio, although he feared that he might be arrested because he was the duke's enemy and had once fought a duel with Orsino, decided to accompany his young friend. Upon arrival in Ilyria, Antonio gave Sebastian his purse for safekeeping, and the two men separated for several hours.

During his wanderings about the city Antonio happened upon the trumped-up duel between the unwilling Cesario and Sir Andrew. Mistaking the page for Sebastian, Antonio immediately went to the rescue of his supposed friend. When police officers arrived on the scene, one of them recognized Antonio and arrested him in the name of the duke.

Antonio, mistaking Viola in disguise for Sebastian, asked for the return of his purse, only to be surprised and hurt because the page disclaimed all knowledge of the captain's money. As Antonio was dragged protesting to jail, he shouted invectives at "Sebastian" for refusing him his purse. Thus Viola learned for the first time that her brother still lived.

The real Sebastian, meanwhile, had been followed by Sir Andrew, who never dreamed that the young man was not the same Cesario with whom he had just been fighting. Egged on by Sir Toby and Maria, Sir Andrew engaged Sebastian in a duel and was promptly wounded, along with Sir Toby. Olivia then interfered and had Sebastian taken to her home. There, having sent for a priest, she married the surprised but not unwilling Sebastian.

The officers were escorting Antonio past Olivia's house as Duke Orsino, accompanied by Cesario, appeared at the gates. Instantly Orsino recognized Antonio and demanded to know why the sailor had returned to Ilyria, a city filled with his enemies. Antonio explained that he had rescued and befriended the duke's present companion, Sebastian, and because of his deep friendship for the lad had accompanied him to Ilyria despite the danger his visit involved. Then, pointing to Cesario, he sorrowfully accused the supposed Sebastian of violating their friendship by not returning his purse.

The duke was protesting against this accusation when Olivia appeared and saluted Cesario as her husband. The duke also began to think his page ungrateful, especially so since Cesario had been told to press Orsino's suit with Olivia. Just then Sir Andrew and Sir Toby came running in looking for a doctor because Sebastian had wounded them. Seeing Cesario, Sir Andrew began to rail at him for his violence. Olivia dismissed the two old men quickly. As they left the real Sebastian appeared and apologized for the wounds he had given the old men.

Spying Antonio, Sebastian joyfully greeted his friend. Antonio and the rest of the amazed group, unable to believe what they saw, stared from Cesario to Sebastian. Viola then revealed her true identity, explained her disguise, and told how she and her brother had been separated. The mystery cleared up, Sebastian and Viola affectionately greeted each other. The duke, seeing that the page of whom he had grown so fond was in reality a woman, asked that Viola dress again in feminine attire. She was unable to do as he desired, she explained, because the kind sea captain to whom she had entrusted her own clothes was held in prison through the orders of Malvolio. This difficulty was cleared up quickly, for Olivia's clown, Feste, pitying Malvolio, visited him in his confinement and secured a long letter in which the steward explained the reasons for his actions. The plot against him revealed, Malvolio was released. Then followed the freeing of the sea captain, the marriage of Viola and Orsino, and also that of Sir Toby and Maria. Only Malvolio, unhappy in the happiness of others, remained peevish and disgruntled.

TWENTY YEARS AFTER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Alexandre Dumas, father (1802-1870)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Mid-seventeenth century

Locale: France and England

First published: 1845

Principal characters:

D'ARTAGNAN,

ATHOS,

PORTHOS, and

ARAMIS, Musketeers of the Guard

CARDINAL MAZARIN, Minister of State

MORDAUNT, Cromwell's agent

Critique:

The most appealing factor in this Dumas novel is the clever use made of history. It is an intriguing pastime to speculate upon what might have happened had not the fictional Mordaunt dogged the footsteps of the real Charles of England, or had not the real Mazarin relied upon the fictional shrewdness of D'Artagnan. Intricate in plot, though not so much so as The Count of Monte-

Cristo, this sequel to The Three Musketeers is in some ways a less original work than its predecessor. Dumas was repeating himself in his infallibly clever D'Artagnan and his persistently saintly Athos. Furthermore, the four musketeers behave for Mazarin, after the passage of twenty years, very much as they did for Richelieu in the earlier novel; the only change that twenty years wrought was that of names and places. But in spite of these defects the novel has perennial interest as a sequel to The Three Musketeers.

The Story:

When the powerful Richelieu had died and Cardinal Mazarin, whose name gossip coupled with that of Queen Anne, had seized control of the French government; and while Oliver Cromwell was overthrowing Charles I of England, D'Artagnan, a lieutenant in the Musketeers, pined for intrigue and adventure.

Politically, France was in turmoil, with revolt impending. High taxes, coupled with the evident avarice and extravagance of the rulers who levied them, had aroused the people. Also stirred, but motivated by loyalty to the throne, were some of the powerful nobles.

Queen Anne was under Mazarin's thumb. She, in turn, acted as protector for her son, King Louis XIV, then only ten years old. The boy despised Mazarin.

Mazarin, beset on all sides by enemies and harassed by fears for his personal safety, summoned D'Artagnan, whose earlier fame with the King's Musketeers had been obscured by time.

Twenty years had passed since D'Artagnan, the Gascon adventurer, and the other three musketeers, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis, had performed doughty deeds for their country and their king. Now, separated by time and interests, they had all but lost touch with one another. Ordered by Mazarin to recruit the three musketeers, D'Artagnan found himself confronted by mystery in the conduct of his former comrades in arms.

First he found Aramis, the dandy, a monk who lived in luxury. The former musketeer declined D'Artagnan's proposal on the pretense that such activity would interfere with his monastic vows. Porthos was a more willing adventurer. Living on a large estate with a sufficient income, he was unhappy because of his lack of a title. He wished to be a baron. This D'Artagnan promised him. Athos, who had adopted a son, Raoul, lived on another luxurious estate. He also refused to ally himself with D'Artagnan. The adopted son of Athos was in reality his true son, begotten illegitimately, but Athos did not want to acknowledge the boy as his own and reveal the circumstances of his birth.

When the Duke de Beaufort, a political prisoner, escaped from his prison at Vincennes, Mazarin ordered the faithful adventurers, D'Artagnan and Porthos, to recapture the duke and the man who had helped his escape. D'Artagnan and Porthos, attempting to overtake the fugitives, found themselves confronted by Aramis and Athos. The four comrades dropped their weapons, exchanged vows of eternal friendship and love, and then parted, both pairs to carry on according to their own alliances.

Athos and Aramis were members of the Fronde, a political force composed of two factions: the rebellious commoners of Paris, who hoped to overthrow the king, and the nobility, who wished to replace the king. D'Artagnan and Porthos had sworn allegiance to Mazarin, who represented the king.

The first outbreak of the revolt found Mazarin and the queen unprepared. The mob, after tearing up the streets of Paris, surrounded the palace, and Mazarin called upon D'Artagnan to save him. No obstacle was too great for the clever Gascon. He smuggled Mazarin away from the palace and out of Paris. Then he returned and gave similar assistance to the queen and the young king.

During the early days of their exploits the four musketeers and an Englishman named de Winter had executed a vicious woman referred to simply as Milady; she was de Winter's sister-in-law. Mordaunt, Milady's son, a young man sworn to revenge his mother's death and an agent in the service of Oliver Cromwell, returned to France in a dual role: to search for and to murder those who had caused his mother's execution and to serve as an emissary for Cromwell, who hoped to learn how great was French sympathy for deposed Charles I of England. Lord de Winter had also gone to France to assist Henrietta Maria, the wife of Charles, and to ask that the king be given sanctuary in France should he escape Cromwell's forces.

The Fronde came to Henrietta Maria and Lord de Winter in the persons of Athos and Aramis. They departed secretly for England in de Winter's company, but not before they had learned that Milady's embittered son was on their trail.

When Mordaunt presented his case for Cromwell before Mazarin, the cardinal decided to send a message to the Puritan leader. His messengers were Porthos and D'Artagnan, who unwittingly placed themselves in the hands of their enemy when they set out for England with Mordaunt, whose identity was as yet unknown to them.

At a battle near Newcastle, King Charles was taken by Cromwell's troops. When D'Artagnan and Porthos discovered Aramis and Athos in the defeated army, they tried to save their friends by taking them prisoners, with the feigned excuse of holding them for ransom. The cruelty of the Puritans, coupled with the personal courage of the fallen Charles I, so influenced D'Artagnan that he consented to do everything he could to help the king escape to France.

As the victorious army of Cromwell made its way back to London, D'Artagnan maneuvered himself into the good graces of the soldier who guarded Charles. As the four musketeers were about to kidnap the king, their plans were thwarted by an unlucky interruption instigated by Mordaunt. In London, D'Artagnan began to lay the groundwork for snatching Charles to safety. As the time for the execution approached, the plans of D'Artagnan one by one toppled under the vigilant efforts of Mordaunt. At last D'Artagnan kidnaped the executioner, sent his comrades in disguise as gallows builders, and awaited his chance to free the royal prisoner. His attempt failed, however, when Charles was beheaded by a volunteer executioner, who, it was later discovered, was the vicious Mordaunt.

Fearing for their own lives, the four comrades plotted to escape from England. Mordaunt followed them to the coast, mined their ship, and bought off the crew. But fortune was with the heroes, who discovered the casks filled with gunpowder. When Mordaunt blew up the ship, they were waiting to seize him. Athos stabbed the Englishman as the two men struggled in the water.

Back in France, Mazarin, angry because they had attempted to aid King Charles, arrested D'Artagnan and Porthos. Athos was arrested while trying to aid them. Porthos, using his great strength, overcame their guards, seized Mazarin in his country retreat, and forced him to release Athos. With Mazarin in their power, they compelled him to pardon them and grant their demands.

When the Frondist revolt was over and Paris restored to order, the royal household returned to the palace. The musketeers, twenty years older but forever the same, were again in good standing. D'Artagnan was awarded a captaincy in the Musketeers and Porthos was granted the title of baron. Athos went back to his estate and Aramis back to his amours. None of the four knew when they would ever meet again.

TWO GENTLEMEN OF VERONA

Type of work: Drama

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Romantic comedy

Time of plot: Sixteenth century

Locale: Italy

First presented: 1594

Principal characters:

VALENTINE, and

PROTEUS, two gentlemen of Verona

JULIA, beloved of Proteus

SILVIA, beloved of Valentine

THURIO, in love with Silvia

THE DUKE OF MILAN, Silvia's father

Critique:

Written before Shakespeare's complete dramatic maturity, Two Gentlemen of Verona is a play of no great depth. True, it is romantic, witty, gay, but the incidents are too pat to be believable. Some of the characters seem superficial, playing roles in which they have no real concern. Also, the hero's quick and sympathetic forgiveness of the friend who had betrayed him so grossly strikes a false note. Nevertheless the comedy is charming and engrossing and worthy of the reader's time. For, in spite of the faults, some of the bard's magic is there.

The Story:

Valentine and Proteus, two long-time friends of great understanding, disagreed heartily on one point. Valentine thought the most important thing in life was to travel and learn the wonders of the world. Proteus, on the other hand, thought love the only thing worthwhile. The two friends parted for a time when Valentine traveled to Milan, to seek advancement and honor in the palace of the duke. He pleaded with Proteus to join him in the venture, but Proteus was too much in love with Julia to leave her side for even a short time. Julia was a noble and pure young girl, pursued by many. But Proteus at last won her heart and the two were happy in their love.

Valentine journeyed to Milan, and there he learned his friend had been right in believing love to be all that is worthwhile. For Valentine met the duke's daughter Silvia and fell instantly in love with her. And Silvia returned his love. But her father wanted her to marry Thurio, a foolish man who had no charm but owned much land and gold. Valentine longed for Silvia, but he saw no chance of getting her father's consent to his suit. Then he learned that his friend Proteus was soon to arrive in Milan, sent there by his father, who, ignorant of Proteus' love affair, wished his son to educate himself by travel.

The two friends had a joyful reunion. Valentine proudly presented his friend to Silvia, and to Proteus he highly praised the virtue and beauty of his beloved. When they were alone, Valentine confided to Proteus that he planned to fashion a rope ladder and steal Silvia from her room and marry her, for her father would give her to no one but Thurio. Valentine, asking his friend to help him in his plan, was too absorbed to notice that Proteus remained strangely silent. The truth was that, at the first sight of Silvia, Proteus had forgotten his solemn vows to Julia, sealed before he left her with the double giving of rings, and he had forgotten too his oath of friendship with Valentine. He determined to have Silvia for his own. So, with protestations of self-hatred for the betrayal of his friend, Proteus told the duke of Valentine's plan to escape with Silvia from the palace and carry her away to be married in another land. The duke, forewarned, tricked Valentine into revealing the plot and banished him from Milan, on penalty of his life should he not leave at once.

While these events were taking place, Julia, thinking that Proteus still loved her and grieving over his absence, disguised herself as a page and traveled to Milan to see her love. She was on her way to Milan when Valentine was forced to leave that city and Silvia. Valentine, not knowing that his one-time friend had betrayed him, believed Proteus' promise that he would carry letters back and forth between the exile and Silvia.

With Valentine out of the way, Proteus next proceeded to get rid of Thurio as a rival. Thurio, foolish and gullible, was an easy man to trick. One night Proteus and Thurio went to Silvia's window to serenade her in Thurio's name, but Proteus sang to her and made love speeches also. Unknown to him, Julia, in the disguise of a page, stood in the shadows and heard him disown his love for her and proclaim his love for Silvia. But Silvia scorned him and swore that she would love no one but Valentine. She also accused him of playing false with Julia, for Valentine had told her the story of his friend's betrothal.

Calling herself Sebastian, Julia, still in the dress of a page, was employed by Proteus to carry messages to Silvia. One day he gave her the ring which Julia herself had given him and told her to deliver it to Silvia. When Silvia refused the ring and sent it back to Proteus, Julia loved her rival and blessed her.

Valentine, in the meantime, had been captured by outlaws, once honorable men who had been banished for petty crimes and had taken refuge in the woods near Mantua. In order to save his own life, Valentine joined the band and soon became their leader. A short time later Silvia, hoping to find Valentine, escaped from the palace and with the help of an agent arrived at an abbey near Milan.

There she was captured by the outlaws. When her father heard of her flight, he took Thurio and Proteus, followed by Julia, to the abbey to look for her. But Proteus, arriving first on the scene, rescued her from the outlaws before they were able to take her to their leader. Again Proteus proclaimed his love for her. When she scornfully berated him, he seized her and tried to force his attentions upon her. Unknown to Proteus, however, Valentine had overheard all that was said. He sprang upon Proteus and pulled him away from the frightened girl.

Valentine was more hurt and wounded by his friend's duplicity than by anything else that had happened. But such was Valentine's forgiving nature that when Proteus confessed his guilt and his shame over his betrayal, Valentine forgave him and received him again as his friend. In order to prove his friendship, he gave up his claim on Silvia. At that moment Julia, still disguised, fainted away. When she was revived, she pretended to hand over to Silvia the ring Proteus had ordered her to deliver. But instead she offered the ring Proteus had given her when they parted in Verona. Then Julia was recognized by all, and Proteus professed that he still loved her.

The outlaws appeared with the duke and Thurio, whom they had captured in the forest. Thurio gave up all claim to Silvia, for he thought a girl who would run off into the woods to pursue another man much too foolish for him to marry. Then her father, convinced at last of Valentine's worth, gave that young man permission to marry Silvia. During the general rejoicing Valentine begged one more boon. He asked the duke to pardon the outlaws, all brave men who would serve the duke faithfully if he would return them from exile. The duke granted the boon, and the whole party made its way back to Milan. There the two happy couples would share one wedding day and mutual joy.

THE TWO NOBLE KINSMEN

Type of work: Drama

Authors: William Shakespeare (1564-1616) and John Fletcher (1579-1625)

Type of plot: Chivalric romance

Time of plot: Age of legend

Locale: Athens and Thebes

First presented: c. 1613

Principal characters:

THESEUS, Duke of Athens

HIPPOLYTA, his wife

EMILIA, her younger sister

PALAMON, and

ARCITE, cousins, nephews of Creon, King of Thebes

Critique:

The Two Noble Kinsmen was a joint production of the aging Shakespeare and his protégé, John Fletcher. Specific scenes have been attributed, on the basis of stylistic traits, to each dramatist. That many scenes cannot be specifically assigned would suggest intimate collaboration. The main plot was taken from Boccaccio's Teseide, which, in turn, was derived from Statius' Thebaid. Shakespeare had already used the Theseus-Hippolyta theme in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Chaucer had used the same story in "The Knight's Tale." The underplot of this play is marked by a sentimentality that betokened the end of the golden age of the Tudor and Stuart drama.

The Story:

During the marriage ceremony of Theseus, Duke of Athens, and Hippolyta, Queen of the Amazons, three widowed queens begged Theseus' aid. Creon, King of Thebes, had slain their husbands in battle and would not permit their bodies to receive decent burial. Theseus commiserated with the queens, but provided small comfort for their grief when he directed that his nuptial ceremonies be continued. The queens persisting in their pleas, Theseus conceded to the extent of ordering an expeditionary force to be readied to march against Thebes. Not to be denied, the distracted queens finally persuaded him to champion their cause. He appointed Pirithous, an Athenian nobleman, to stand in his place for the remainder of the ceremony, kissed Hippolyta farewell, and led the queens away toward Thebes.

Meanwhile, in Thebes, the cousins Palamon and Arcite, nephews of Creon, found their uncle's tyranny unbearable and stultifying, and decided to leave Thebes. But no sooner had they made this decision than they learned that Thebes was threatened by Theseus. The cousins, loyal to Thebes if not to Creon, deferred their departure in order to serve their city.

When the opposing forces met, Palamon and Arcite fought with great courage, but the Athenians were victorious in the battle. Theseus, triumphant, directed the three widowed queens to bury their dead in peace. Palamon and Arcite, having been wounded and left for dead on the battlefield, were taken by the Athenians.

The cousins, healed of their wounds and finding themselves in a prison in Athens, impressed their jailers with their seeming unconcern at being incarcerated. In their cell, however, they sadly bemoaned their fate to each other. Resigned to spending the rest of their lives in prison, they recalled with grief the joys of battle and the hunt, and they grieved at the thought of a future without marriage. Even so, they made some attempt to reconcile themselves to imprisonment by declaring that in their cell they had each other's excellent company and that they were insulated from the infinite number of evils that beset free men.

Emilia, Hippolyta's beautiful sister, entered the prison garden. Palamon saw her and fell in love at once. When Arcite beheld her, he too fell in love. Palamon declared that Arcite must not love her, but Arcite answered that Palamon, who had called her a goddess, might love her spiritually; he, Arcite, would love her in a more earthly manner. Palamon maintained that this goddess they had beheld was his to love because he had seen her first. Arcite, in turn, insisted that he too must love her because of the propinquity of the pair. Palamon, enraged, wished for liberty and weapons so that he and Arcite might decide the issue in mortal combat.

The jailkeeper, on orders, took Arcite to Theseus. Palamon, meanwhile, was filled with despair at the thought that Arcite was now free to win Emilia. The keeper returned to report that Arcite had been sent away from Athens and that Palamon must be moved to a cell in which there were fewer windows. Palamon writhed in the knowledge that Arcite now seemed certain to win the hand of Emilia.

But Arcite, in the country near Athens, felt no advantage over his cousin. Indeed, he envied Palamon, who he believed could see Emilia every time she visited the prison garden with her maid. Desperate, he assumed a disguise and returned to Athens to participate in athletic games in honor of Emilia's birthday. Excelling in the games, he admitted that he was of gentle birth; but Theseus did not penetrate his disguise. Theseus, admiring Arcite's athletic prowess and his modesty, designated him to be a serving-man to Emilia.

In the meantime the daughter of the jailkeeper fell in love with Palamon and effected his escape. In the forest, where the court had gone a-Maying, Arcite came upon the escaped prisoner. In spite of Palamon's harsh words to him, Arcite promised to supply his cousin with food.

Two days later he brought food and drink. When he left, he promised to return the next time with armor and weapons, that the two might decide their quarrel by combat.

Arcite having returned with armor and weapons, the two youths armed themselves and fought. At the same time Theseus and his party, hunting in the forest, came upon the struggling pair. Theseus condemned them to be executed straightway, one for having defied banishment, the other for having broken out of prison. But Hippolyta, Pirithous, and Emilia begged Theseus for mercy. The duke then declared that they might live if they would forget Emilia. When both refused, Theseus resolved that the youths should go free, but that in a month they must return to Athens, both accompanied by three knights of their own choice, and determine this problem in the lists. The victor would be awarded the hand of Emilia; the loser and his companions would be executed on the spot.

A month passed. As Emilia admired likenesses of Palamon and Arcite and despaired at her inability to choose one or the other as her favorite, the cousins, with six knights, returned to Athens. Arcite and his knight-companions invoked Mars, the god of war; Palamon and his cohorts invoked Venus, the goddess of love; Emilia, in her role as a priestess of Diana, invoked the goddess of chastity to bring victory to the youth who loved her best. In the tournament which followed Arcite was the victor.

Palamon now laid his head on the block in anticipation of execution, but Pirithous interrupted the beheading to announce that Arcite had been thrown and mortally trampled by a black horse that Emilia had given him. Before he died, Arcite, brought before his cousin, relinquished his claim upon Emilia to Palamon. Palamon, reconciled with his cousin, observed sorrowfully that he had lost a great love in order to gain another.

UNCLE SILAS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Joseph Sheridan Le Fanu (1814-1873)

Type of plot: Mystery romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1864

Principal characters:

MAUD RUTHYN, an English heiress

AUSTIN RUTHYN, her father

SILAS RUTHYN, her uncle and guardian

MILLY, Silas' daughter

DUDLEY, his son

LADY MONICA KNOLLYS, Maud's cousin

DR. BRYERLY, a trustee of the Ruthyn estate

LORD ILBURY, another trustee

MADAME DE LA ROUGIERRE, a governess

MEG HAWKES, a servant

Critique:

Uncle Silas is more than the sentimental, nineteenth-century story of the designing uncle and the lovely heiress driven almost insane by terror. It is a well-constructed novel, rambling in the Victorian fashion but highly effective in the mechanics of atmosphere and suspense. Le Fanu, in fact, protested against the labeling of his novels as examples of the sensational school of fiction popularized by Wilkie Collins and Charles Reade. In his view, his fiction was a continuation of that type of tragic romance exemplified in The Bride of Lammermoor and other novels by Sir Walter Scott. The fact remains that Le Fanu has never lost a following of readers to keep his name alive, and this novel is an example of his fiction at its best. Most notable is his handling of character and scene as we sometimes see them in old Dutch paintings, with certain figures prominently in the foreground, others in the middle distance, and still others in the background, all clearly visualized, however, and busy with whatever happens to be at hand. Uncle Silas and Madame de la Rougierre are creatures of terror in the foreground, but equally relevant are Dudley Ruthyn, Dr. Bryerly, Lady Monica, Milly, and Meg Hawkes, figures successively removed from the center of the action but no less necessary for atmosphere and plot.

The Story:

Maud Ruthyn had spent a lonely childhood in the great old house at Knowl. Her mother had died when the girl was very young, and her father, Austin Ruthyn, had become a recluse who seldom left the grounds of his estate. Disappointed in Parliament many years before, he had retired from public life to devote himself to scientific and literary studies. These had led him to Swedenborgianism, a doctrine suited to his eccentric and moral tastes. His daughter knew him only as a kindly but solitary and taciturn man.

For this reason she never questioned him about her uncle Silas, whose portrait as a handsome young man hung in the oak room at Knowl. From vague hints and the whispers of the servants she knew that some mystery overshadowed this relative she had never met, a scandal which had clouded her father's life as well. Uncle Silas, a younger brother, lived at Bartram-Haugh, a Derbyshire estate owned by Austin Ruthyn.

One of the few visitors at Knowl was Dr. Bryerly, a tall, ungainly man who dressed always in black and wore an untidy scratch wig. Like Maud's father, he was a Swedenborgian. The girl was greatly in awe of him, but she knew that he had her father's confidence. On one occasion Mr. Ruthyn showed her the key to a locked cabinet in his study. He was soon to go on a journey, he said, and after his departure she was to give the key to Dr. Bryerly and to no other.

Maud was a little past seventeen when her father employed a new governess, Madame de la Rougierre, a tall, masculine-looking woman who was smirking and sly in her speech and manners. Maud hated her from the first. On every possible occasion the governess questioned her charge about Mr. Ruthyn's will and business affairs; sometimes Maud thought that the woman was deliberately spying on the household. One day Madame de la Rougierre and her pupil walked to a ruined abbey near Knowl. While the woman was exploring the ancient churchyard, a strange young man accosted Maud. The girl was frightened by his coarse appearance and offensive manner, but Madame de la Rougierre ignored the incident.

Maud forgot the whole affair in her excitement over the arrival of Lady Monica Knollys, her father's cousin from Derbyshire. Madame de la Rougierre pretended to be ill during Lady Monica's visit. When that brisk, sensible noblewoman went to the governess' room, the conversation revealed that they had previously known each other under circumstances distasteful to Lady Monica. When she told Mr. Ruthyn that the governess was not a suitable companion for his daughter, he accused her of prejudice, and a lively dispute followed. The result was that Lady Monica left Knowl abruptly, but not before she had warned Maud against Madame de la Rougierre and cautioned her always to be on guard against her. Lady Monica also told Maud that at one time her uncle Silas had been suspected of murder, but that nothing had been charged. Later Silas had interested himself in religion. Lady Monica, it was plain, did not like him.

A short time later Maud had another strange adventure. While she was walking with Madame de la Rougierre in the park, they saw on an unfrequented road a carriage with one woman as its only passenger. Continuing on their way, they met three men, among them the coarse young stranger who had approached Maud near the ruins of the abbey. All were tipsy and addressed the governess with rough familiarity. When one of the men tried to seize Maud, her screams attracted two gamekeepers. In a scuffle with the intruders one of the gamekeepers was shot. Mr. Ruthyn and the servants tried to intercept the strangers at the park gates, but the men and their woman companion had disappeared.

Madame de la Rougierre was discharged not long afterward. One night Maud fell asleep in her father's study. She awoke to find the governess going through his private papers. Informed of the midnight search, Mr. Ruthyn discharged the woman at once. Maud was glad to see the last, as she supposed, of her sly, simpering governess.

When Mr. Ruthyn died suddenly of a heart attack, Maud understood at last the journey he had contemplated. She learned also that Dr. Bryerly had been her father's physician as well as his friend. With the key she gave him the doctor unlocked the cabinet which contained Mr. Ruthyn's will. Its provisions disturbed Dr. Bryerly and filled Lady Monica with dismay. After varying bequests to relatives, friends, and servants, the remainder of Mr. Ruthyn's great estate was given to Maud, under the trusteeship of Dr. Bryerly, Lord Ilbury, Sir William Aylmer, and Mr. Penrose Cresswell. In addition, Silas Ruthyn was appointed Maud's guardian, with the stipulation that the girl was to live with him at Bartram-Haugh until her twenty-first birthday. Lady Monica immediately recalled the strange circumstances under which Mr. Charke, a turfman to whom Silas Ruthyn owed large gambling debts, had been found dead at Bartram-Haugh; only the fact that the body had been discovered in a bedroom locked from the inside had kept Silas from being charged with murder. Dr. Bryerly, in turn, was disturbed by the knowledge that Silas would inherit her fortune if Maud died before her majority, and he advised that an attempt be made to have the provisions of the wardship put aside. Silas, however, refused to relinquish his guardianship. Maud, who interpreted the will as her father's wish that she vindicate her uncle's name by becoming his ward, announced that she would go to live with Silas in Derbyshire.

With her maid, Mary Quince, Maud traveled by carriage to Bartram-Haugh. The house was old and rambling, with many of the rooms closed and locked. The grounds were wild and neglected. Although Silas welcomed his niece courteously and with many pious sentiments, it seemed to Maud that he was secretly laughing at her at times. His own rooms were furnished in great luxury. The quarters Maud shared with her cousin Milly were shabby and bare. Milly was a loud, good-humored girl at whom her father sneered because of her hoydenish manners. Maud took an immediate liking to her young relative. There was also a son, Dudley, but Milly said that her brother was seldom at home.

The first morning after her arrival Maud went with her cousin for a walk through the grounds. To their surprise they found the gate leading into Bartram Close locked and guarded by Meg Hawkes, the miller's rough-tongued daughter. When Meg refused to let them pass, the girls entered the park by a little-traveled path that Milly knew. There they met a pleasant young gentleman who introduced himself as Mr. Carysbrook, a tenant at the nearby Grange. Maud felt that he paid her particular attention; she, in turn, was attracted to the amiable and pleasant young man.

Maud had Milly as her only companion. She saw little of her uncle. Addicted to laudanum, Silas passed many of his days in a coma. Sometimes the girls were summoned to sit in his room while he lay quietly in bed. One day Dr. Bryerly appeared unexpectedly to transact some business with Silas. To the doctor's questions Maud replied that she was happy at Bartram-Haugh. Dr. Bryerly gave her his address in London and told her to communicate with him if the need should ever arise.

Early in December, Lady Monica Knollys opened her house at nearby Elverston and invited Maud and Milly to visit her. To Milly's surprise, Silas gave his consent. Among the guests at dinner was Mr. Carysbrook. Lady Monica told Maud that he was in reality Lord Ilbury, one of her trustees.

In the meantime Dudley Ruthyn had returned to Bartram-Haugh. Summoned to her uncle's room to meet him, Maud realized that he was the same vulgar young man she had encountered twice before, at Knowl. When she told of those meetings, Silas brushed the matter aside. The spirits of youth, he declared, ran high at times, but Dudley was a gentleman. Maud was relieved to learn that Milly disliked and feared her brother, and the girls avoided him as much as possible. Meg Hawkes, brutalized by her father, became ill. Maud supplied her with medicines and delicacies and so won the strange girl's devotion.

Lord Ilbury called at Bartram-Haugh and expressed the hope that Maud would be allowed to visit his sister at the Grange. Dr. Bryerly also appeared and accused Silas of misusing his ward's property. Infuriated, Silas ordered him out of the house. When the invitation from the Grange arrived, Silas angrily refused his consent to the visit. A short time later Maud was made unhappy when Milly was sent to study in a French convent, but her situation became even more unbearable when Dudley began to persecute her with his proposals of marriage. Silas refused to listen to her protests. She should, he said, give the matter her serious attention for a fortnight. Before that time passed, however, Dudley's unwelcome attentions abruptly ended when his secret marriage to Sarah Mangles, a barmaid, was revealed. Sarah was the woman Maud had seen in the carriage at Knowl. In his rage Silas sent Dudley and his bride away. Before his departure Dudley offered to conduct Maud safely to Lady Monica for twenty thousand pounds. Convinced that this was another of his schemes, she refused. A few days later she saw in the paper an announcement stating that Dudley and his wife had sailed for Melbourne.

Silas confessed to his ward that he faced final and complete ruin. To elude his creditors, he said, he would be forced to send Maud to join Milly in France; he himself would travel by another route to join them there. Maud grew apprehensive, however, when she learned that her companion on the journey was to be Madame de la Rougierre, her former governess. Confined like a prisoner, she tried to communicate her plight to Lady Monica, but the servant she bribed to carry her letter returned the message to his master. With reproaches for her ingratitude and accusations against him, Silas told her that she was to leave for France immediately with Madame de la Rougierre; Mary Quince, the maid, would follow with him in a few days.

Maud, guarded by her grim companion, traveled to London and spent the night in an obscure hotel. The next night they entrained, as Madame de la Rougierre informed her, for Dover. Maud was so dull and sleepy on their arrival that she paid little attention to the house to which they were driven. The next morning she awoke and found herself, not in a Dover inn, but in one of the upper chambers at Bartram-Haugh. Madame de la Rougierre said only that there had been a change in plans. Maud realized that everything told her had been lies, that she was to die. Her only hope was that Meg Hawkes, who had unexpectedly appeared, would carry word of Silas' villainy to Lady Monica at Elverston.

That night Madame de la Rougierre drank some drugged wine intended for Maud and fell asleep on the girl's bed. Crouched in the shadows of an old press, Maud was surprised to see the window of the room swing inward and a man suspended by a rope clamber over the sill. The intruder was Dudley; the announcement of his departure for Australia had been another of Silas' fabrications. Dazed, she saw him raise a spiked hammer and strike at the figure on the bed. When old Silas entered by the doorway and the two began to open a trunk containing the girl's jewelry, she took advantage of the noise and ran from the room. As she left the house she encountered Tom Brice, a servant in love with Meg Hawkes. The man, cursing his master's villainy, drove her to safety at Elverston.

So shaken was she by her experience that Lady Monica hurried her off to France at once, and two years passed before she learned what had happened after her flight. Silas had killed himself with an overdose of opium. Dudley had disappeared. Madame de la Rougierre's body had been found buried in the courtyard, its whereabouts disclosed by Meg Hawkes' brutal old father. Subsequent investigation had also revealed that Maud's room was the chamber in which Charke had been found dead; the peculiar construction of the window frame explained how his murderer had been able to enter a room locked from the inside. But those grim discoveries were forgotten as time passed. Milly became the wife of a worthy clergyman. Meg Hawkes married Tom Brice and the two, with capital provided by Maud, emigrated. Dr. Bryerly gave up his practice and undertook the management of the Ruthyn estates. As for Maud, she married Lord Ilbury and found new happiness as a wife and mother.

Critique:

Chekhov's plays were meant to be acted by people who immersed themselves so deeply in the parts that they infected their audiences with strong emotions and moods suggested simply or subtly. It is more difficult to read these plays, but a great deal of satisfaction can be derived from them if they are read with a sympathy for characters who are perhaps ordinary in themselves, though they really speak for the whole world. In Uncle Vanya we feel the hopelessness of Sonya and Uncle Vanya, who have dedicated their lives to a mistaken ideal in supporting Professor Serebryakov, and yet we feel at least Sonya's faith that they will have eventual rest for their troubles.

The Story:

Astrov, the doctor, called to minister to retired Professor Serebryakov, who had complained all night of pains in his legs. To the annoyance of the doctor, however, the professor had gone for a long walk with his wife Yelena and Sonya, his daughter. Astrov told the old nurse, Marina, that he felt a hundred years old, overworked as he was. Too, he felt that, having worked with weak, discontented people for years, he had become as strange as they. Caring for nothing and no one, he wondered if people living a hundred years hence would remember men like him who had struggled to beat out a road for them.

Marina explained that the professor had completely changed the routine of the house, so that everyone waited on him and everyday work was sandwiched in if possible. Ivan Voynitsky enviously described the fortunate life the professor had, living on the fruits of his first wife's estate, with her mother doting on his every word, retired now and writing as he pleased, with a new and beautiful young wife to cater to him. But it had been Ivan, Uncle Vanya to Sonya, who worked with him, who had blindly followed his mother's ideals and made the estate a splendidly productive place to supply extra money for the professor. Only recently had he realized how selfish the professor had been in treading over everybody. Ivan told his mother that he could no longer bear to hear of the pamphlets which had been her life for the last fifty years.

When the professor came in, he immediately excused himself to get to his writing. Yelena, apologizing to the doctor, said that her husband was well again. Both Ivan and the doctor admired her extravagantly, and the doctor invited her and Sonya to come to his estate to see his trees. A crank on the subject of trees, the doctor wanted to restore the countryside to its former state before the peasants cut down forests indiscriminately. Yelena realized Sonya was attracted to the doctor. Yelena was bored with everything, even Ivan's love for her.

Again the professor complained of pains in his legs, this time keeping his wife awake for two nights. Believing that he had earned the right to be disagreeable and tyrannical at his age, and feeling that he was in a vault with stupid people who made foolish conversation, he refused to see the doctor he had summoned. He begged not to be left with Ivan, who would talk him to death. Only Marina seemed to be able to handle him; she led him away so that the others could rest.

Yelena asked Ivan to try to reconcile everyone, since all seemed to be involved in hatred or petty wrangling. When Ivan made love to her again, she left him. Ivan realized he could have fallen in love with her ten years before and might even have married her if he had not been wrapped up in the ideal of fulfilling the professor's wishes. He felt cheated in the realization that the professor, retired, was a nonentity.

Ivan and the doctor continued the drinking they had started while the doctor waited to see the professor. Sonya asked them both to stop; Ivan because he was living on illusions, the doctor because she did not want him to destroy himself. She tried to tell him obliquely that she loved him, but he felt his reactions had been blunted. He would never be able to love anyone, though Yelena might be able to turn his head.

Yelena and Sonya effected a reconciliation when Yelena explained that she had married Sonya's father in the belief that she loved him, only to find she was in love with an ideal. Having lost that illusion, she found herself very unhappy. Sonya, glad to make friends with her, was happy about everything; she had spoken at last to the doctor, even if he had not understood her.

While waiting for the hour at which the professor had asked all the family to join him, Yelena complained of being bored. Sonya suggested that she help on the estate. When Yelena declined all suggestions, Ivan told her she was too indolent to do anything. To make matters worse, her indolence was catching, for he had stopped work to follow her, as had Sonya and the doctor, who used to come once a month but now came daily. Since Yelena seemed to have mermaid blood in her veins, he said, she should let herself go for once and fall in love with a watersprite. Yelena was indignant. Ivan, as a peace offering, went to get her some autumn roses.

Sonya asked Yelena's help. She knew the doctor came to see Yelena, not even realizing Sonya was there. Yelena decided to speak to him in Sonya's behalf. When she did, he laughed at her for pretending she did not know why he came. Then he kissed her. Yelena half-heartedly held him off until she saw Ivan returning with the roses.

The professor, not content with country living but unable to live in the city on the income from the estate, suggested that they sell the estate, invest most of the money, and buy a small place in Finland with the remainder. His plan was greeted with horror, particularly by Ivan, who was driven almost mad as he felt the estate slipping away from Sonya, the work of twenty-five years undone. He explained how the estate had been bought for Sonya's mother and handed on to Sonya; how he had paid off the mortgage and made the place productive; how Sonya and he had slaved on the property by day and over books by night with only the professor in mind. Feeling cheated, he rushed away while the professor declared that he could no longer live under the same roof with Ivan. Yelena begged him to leave the place immediately, but to apologize to Ivan before they left. When the professor tried to make amends, Ivan shot at him twice, missing both times.

Marina, pleased with the arrangement, hoped that matters would settle down after the professor and his wife left. Astrov refused to go home before Ivan had given back the morphia he had taken from the doctor's bag. Ivan, saying he was a madman, begged for a way out, but the doctor laughed and said that both of them, the only well-educated men in the district, had been swamped in the trivialities of country life and that they were both cranks, a very normal condition of man. After reconciliations all around, the professor and Yelena left, followed by Astrov. Marina rocked away with satisfaction, Ivan's mother went back to her pamphlets, and Sonya assured Ivan that after work to rest their minds they would find life happier.

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Hardy (1840-1928)

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Rural England

First published: 1872

Principal characters:

REUBEN DEWY, a carrier

DICK DEWY, his son

MR. SHINER, a farmer

MR. MAYBOLD, the vicar

FANCY DAY, a schoolmistress

Critique:

Unlike the stark realism and philosophical pessimism found in most of the novels of Thomas Hardy, Under the Greenwood Tree is almost pure romance. It is a gentle story, full of whimsical, simple humor. The characterizations, in particular those of the Wessex rustics, are delightful, even though often so simplified as to appear to be caricatures. This book, one of his early novels by a great English master, deserves a place with those of his maturity.

The Story:

On Christmas Eve the village choir prepared to go about its annual caroling. In fine voice, mellowed by generous mugs of cider, the men and boys gathered at the home of Reuben Dewy. Then with their fiddles and the cello of Grandfather Dewy, they departed on their rounds. The first stop was at the schoolhouse, to serenade the new schoolmistress, Fancy Day. At first there was no indication that she had heard them, but at last she appeared, framed, picture-like, in a window. Later the men missed young Dick Dewy. When they found him he was leaning against the school, staring up listlessly at the now darkened window.

At church, on the following morning, Fancy Day caused quite a stir of excitement. For three men she was the primary attraction—Dick Dewy, Farmer Shiner, and the new vicar, Mr. Maybold. To many other men in the congregation, the members of the choir, Fancy Day was not endeared. She committed what amounted almost to blasphemy. For as long as anyone could remember the male choir had provided music for the service, but the young woman, on her first day in church, led the young girls in singing along with the men. Some of the older and wiser ones foresaw more trouble from a girl so froward.

Mr. Dewy, the carrier, called by everyone the tranter, gave his annual party on the afternoon and evening of Christmas Day. During the dancing, Dick was alternately delighted and depressed by Fancy. When he could claim her for a dance, he was transported with joy. But when she danced with Farmer Shiner, a handsomer, wealthier man, Dick was downcast. And when Farmer Shiner escorted the lady home, the evening was ruined for young Dick.

Using a handkerchief left behind by Fancy as his excuse, Dick a few days later found courage to call at the schoolhouse. Being a very inexperienced lover, he simply returned the handkerchief, stammered a good day, and departed. It was not until spring that he made any real progress in his silent love affair. By that time Dick was a wan and shadowy figure of a man. He spoke to no one of his love, but it was obvious to all but Fancy and her other two admirers that Dick was not himself.

But before Dick could declare himself, a delegation from the choir waited on the new vicar, Mr. Maybold. Having heard disquieting rumors that they were to be displaced by an organ, played by Fancy Day, they learned from the vicar that their fears were well founded. He had brought an organ to the church, since he preferred that instrument to a choir. He agreed that the choir was fine, but an organ would be better. In order to spare the feelings of the faithful choir members, however, he agreed to wait for a time before deposing them. They were to have the dignity of leaving on a special day, not on any ordinary Sunday.

Dick's big day came when he was allowed to bring Fancy and some of her belongings from the home of her father. He was dismayed to find Farmer Shiner also present at the house, but when Fancy allowed him to touch her hand at the dinner table Dick's spirits rose perceptibly. On the ride home he could not find the words that were in his heart; he felt, nevertheless, that he had made some progress with his lady. Then in the weeks that followed rumors of her friendliness with the vicar and with

Farmer Shiner drove him to desperation. One day, screwing up his courage, he penned her a letter, asking bluntly whether he meant anything to her. When he received no answer from Fancy, he resolved that he would have it out with her the next Sunday.

Before Sunday came, however, he had to go on an errand for the vicar's mother, an errand which would take him to a neighboring town. As he was about to leave this village, he saw Fancy waiting for the carrier to take her home. Seizing the opportunity, Dick helped her into his cart and triumphantly carried her off. On the way home he finally made his proposal and was equally surprised and overjoyed to hear her acceptance.

They kept their betrothal a secret since they could not marry for some time. Also, Fancy's father had told her that he hoped she would accept Farmer Shiner for a husband. One trait of Fancy's character troubled Dick. She seemed to take undue pleasure in dressing to please others than himself, but whenever he prepared to punish her by letting her worry about him for a change, Fancy would go to him and apologize for her vanity. The young lover, unable to resist her shamefaced tears, would take her back into his heart before she knew she was gone.

On the day he was at last to meet her father to ask for her hand, Dick prepared himself carefully. In spite of his precautions, her father told him bluntly that he was not good enough for Fancy, that she was too cultured, too well educated, and too wealthy for a plain carrier. Sadly Dick agreed, and sadly he turned toward home.

But Fancy was not so easily defeated. When tears failed to move her father, she resorted to the age-old trick of languishing away for love. She did not eat, at least not so that her father could notice, but merely pined and sighed. The ruse worked, and her father reluctantly found himself begging her to marry her young lover. The date was set for the coming midsummer.

On the day that Fancy was installed at the organ, the day the choir died a disillusioned death, Dick went away to serve at the funeral of a friend. Fancy had put her hair in curls and in other ways dressed more lavishly than ever before. Dick was sorry to see her dress so beautifully when she knew he would not be present to see her, but she put him off brusquely. On his way home that night, Dick walked through the rain to get one last glimpse of his love before he retired. She would not even lean out her window far enough to give him a kiss. Later, when she saw the vicar approaching through the rain, she greeted him warmly. The vicar too had been enchanted with her appearance of the morning. Knowing nothing of her betrothal to Dick, he had decided to ask for her hand in marriage. Surprising even herself, Fancy accepted him.

The next morning the vicar met Dick on the road. Dick, still thinking himself betrothed, shyly told the vicar of his coming marriage to Fancy. The vicar kept his shocked silence, leaving Dick ignorant of Fancy's faithlessness. Then the vicar sent a note to the young lady, telling her that she could not honorably forsake Dick. Before it was delivered, he in turn received a note from Fancy, stating that she had been momentarily swayed by the prospect of a more cultured, more elegant life; now she begged to withdraw her acceptance of his proposal because she had loved and still loved another.

In summer the wedding day came. It was a great celebration, marred only by the vicar's refusal to perform the ceremony. Puzzled, Dick could not think of any way in which he might have offended the vicar. And when, after the ceremony, Dick told his bride that they would never have a secret between them, Fancy replied that they never would, beginning from that day forth.

UNDER THE YOKE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Ivan Vazov (1850-1921)

Type of plot: Romantic tragedy

Time of plot: 1875-1876

Locale: Bulgaria

First published: 1889

Principal characters:

KRALICH, a revolutionary

RADA, his sweetheart

SOLOLOV, a doctor

MARIKA, a young girl

Critique:

Under the Yoke was published after Bulgaria had won her independence from Turkish rule. Translated, the novel brought to Western readers a fresh and vivid insight into the affairs of that troubled country. Although the story is tragic, the treatment of the theme is romantic in the manner of Scott, and through fictitious characters and events the trials of the Bulgarians are faithfully re-created. Critically, the novel has been called one of the finest romances to come out of Eastern Europe.

The Story:

One day Marko, a substantial family man, sat down to his evening meal. His children and his relatives were a noisy crowd, but over the din they heard an alarming noise in the yard. The females all shrieked, because they were afraid of robbers. Marko took a pistol and went to investigate. In the stable he found a spent and furtive man cowering in the dark.

Ivan Kralich, the fugitive, had returned to the village of Bela Cherkva after escaping from a Turkish prison. The Turks were harsh rulers of Bulgaria, and anyone suspected of revolutionary tendencies was either killed outright or imprisoned. But eight years of confinement had failed to quench Kralich's spirit. Having made his getaway, he asked for sanctuary because the Turks were on his trail. Marko, a patriot who had known Kralich's family, told the fugitive to remain in hiding in his stable. As he returned to the house, however, Turkish policemen knocked at the door. They had heard the women shrieking and had come to see what the trouble was.

As soon as Marko could get rid of the Turks he hurried back to the stable, but Kralich had disappeared. Hearing the police, he had climbed the wall and run. Unfortunately, he ran into a patrol and escaped them only after leaving his coat in the hands of the Turks. They shot at him, but the fugitive escaped into the countryside.

It was raining, and at last he took refuge in a mill. As he crouched in a dark corner, the miller came in with his daughter Marika, an innocent girl of fourteen. Kralich watched unobserved as they made beds on the floor. Then two Turkish policemen knocked and forced their way into the mill. One of them was a notorious lame man who had cut off a girl's head a short while before. The miller was terror stricken when the Turks ordered him to get them some raki.

Knowing that they wanted Marika, the miller bravely refused to leave. Throwing aside all pretense, the Turks seized him and started to bind him. Kralich was moved to action when the despairing miller called to Marika for help. He took an ax and after a brief struggle killed the Turks. After Kralich and the miller had buried the bodies, the grateful miller led Kralich to a good hiding place in a nearby monastery.

While Kralich was resting, Sokolov, the village doctor, found himself in trouble. Called a doctor, though he had received no training and prescribed few medicines, he was regarded with suspicion by the Turks because he was a patriotic Bulgarian and because his peculiar habits included keeping a pet bear. That night, as he was playing with the bear, the Turks arrested him on a charge of treason.

What had happened was that Kralich had asked Sokolov the way to Marko's house, and the compassionate doctor had given Kralich his coat. When Kralich lost the coat during his escape from the patrol, the police recognized Sokolov's garment. In the pockets they found revolutionary documents. The arrest created a sensation in the district. Kralich, hearing of Sokolov's trouble, started to the village to clear him. Marko cleverly fooled the police, however, by substituting a harmless newspaper for the incriminating documents when the official messenger stopped for a drink in a tavern. Because the evidence had disappeared, the easy-going Turkish bey released Sokolov.

Kralich changed his name and found a job teaching school. He maintained contact with the revolutionaries, however, and soon welcomed to the cause his friend Mouratliski, who had also fled from the Turks. Mouratliski, passing as an Austrian photographer, soon became a familiar figure in the village. Kralich, continuing to discuss the cause of liberty, won many converts. He also fell in love with Rada, a gentle orphan who taught in the girls' school.

Once the townspeople gave a play in which Kralich took a leading role. The bey, who understood no Bulgarian, was an honored guest. At the end of the play Kralich led the cast in singing patriotic and revolutionary songs. The audience was much moved. The quick-witted Bulgarian who was translating for the bey assured that Turkish official that the songs were part of the drama.

Kralich finally came under suspicion when a spy informed the Turks that the schoolmaster was working for Bulgarian independence. A detachment of police surrounded the church while the villagers were at worship, but Kralich got through the cordon by assuming a disguise. Taking to the mountains and the woods, for months he led a wandering life sheltered by patriotic Bulgars. He preached continually the need for revolution. One day, when he attended a party in a small village, Turks came and beat an old man to death. Kralich led a small group, including the giant Ivan Kill-the-Bear, out along a trail and waited in ambush. The Bulgars succeeded in killing the Turks and left their bodies to be eaten by wolves.

Meanwhile, in Bela Cherkva, Rada led an uneasy life. The village, knowing of her love for Kralich, twitted her on her hopeless affair after his disappearance. In particular, a student named Kandov made her life miserable by following her about. At last Kralich slipped into the village to visit her. Because Rada, overjoyed, was reluctant to part from him again, Kralich invited her to go to Klissoura, a nearby village, where he was busy organizing a revolt. Soon afterward she set out, but Kandov followed her and found the house where she was staying. When Kralich appeared, he was already a little jealous because he had received an anonymous letter accusing Rada of intimacies with Kandov. As soon as he saw Kandov with her, Kralich became angry and left.

The inhabitants of Klissoura, under the fiery leadership of Kralich, prepared to revolt. On the day for the rising the little garrison proclaimed its independence of Turkey, and the citizen soldiers, after setting their wooden cannon on the trail, prepared to battle the Turks. Bela Cherkva did not revolt as planned, however, and the whole Turkish strength was concentrated on Klissoura. The Bulgarians were quickly overwhelmed. When the victors began pillaging the town, Rada was lucky enough to get back to Bela Cherkva with the help of Ivan and his wife.

A fugitive once more, Kralich wandered hungry and cold through the Balkans. He took shelter at last in the mill and sent the faithful Marika into town with a letter asking Sokolov to bring him clothes. Marika could not find the doctor, who had also become a fugitive, but by chance the letter fell into Rada's hands. She made up a bundle of clothing and started off to the mill.

Sokolov, meanwhile, had joined Kralich. When Rada arrived, the lovers had a brief and tearful reunion before pursuing Turks attacked the mill. Kralich and Sokolov were both armed, and for a time they held their stronghold against the enemy. Rada was the first to be killed by gunfire. Kralich kissed her cold lips and returned to the battle. The Turks quickly closed in on the two Bulgarians when the defenders' ammunition gave out. Kralich's head was mounted on a pole and carried in triumph back to the village.

Critique:

Mariano Azuela knew at first hand the materials of this novel, for he had served as a military doctor with Pancho Villa's Golden Boys. His vivid account of revolutionary Mexico was first published serially in a small El Paso newspaper. Almost forgotten, it was revived in 1924 and won immediate fame for its author. Pessimism marks this story of those coming up from below—Los de abajo—at the beginning of the Mexican Revolution. This is no overall picture of the struggle, but a blending of excitement, cruelty, and beauty as seen through the eyes of a man practically pushed into the struggle, a soldier who fought because the enemy was in front of him. Best known of Azuela's sixteen novels, The Underdogs has appeared in dozens of Spanish editions and has been translated into eight languages.

The Story:

Demetrio Macías was a peaceful Indian who knew nothing about revolutions. When as a follower of Madera he was hounded by the political leader of Jalisco, he fled with his wife and child to the mountains. There some Federal soldiers came upon the fugitives at breakfast and sent Demetrio flying. Wild and lawless, they would have raped his wife if he had not returned with a gun. Being no killer, the Indian let them go free, only to have them come back with reinforcements and burn his fields. Demetrio then joined a band of sixty sharpshooting rebel outlaws and helped them to drive off twice that many soldiers. During the fighting two of the rebels were killed and Demetrio was shot in the leg.

For two weeks the outlaws remained hidden in a native village, looked after by Indians who hated the government. Venancio, a barber-surgeon, tended Demetrio's wound. The village women also used poultices of laurel and fresh pigeon blood to heal him. An attractive young girl named Camila was his nurse.

One day the pseudo-intellectual Luis Cervantes blundered into the village and explained that he had deserted the government forces because his commanding officer had assigned him to menial duty. Distrusting Cervantes' glib tongue and big words, the rebels pretended to condemn him to death. One outlaw dressed in a priest's robes and pretended to hear the deserter's last confession in order to determine whether he was a spy. Accepted eventually as a revolutionist, Cervantes then urged the rebels to join the great revolutionary leaders of Mexico. Camila fell in love with him. Although she made her feelings evident, Cervantes never encouraged her, not even on the night of the outlaws' departure. The girl had never responded to Demetrio's love making; he was only an Indian.

Hearing from messengers that Huerta's Federalists had fortified the city of Zacatecas, Cervantes urged the band to hurry to join the besiegers and be in at the capture. He also flattered Demetrio by telling the Indian that he was more than a common rebel, that he was a tool of destiny to win back the rights of the people.

Demetrio planned a surprise attack on one of the towns along their march, but an Indian guide betrayed the scheme and the Federalists were prepared to resist. A friendly citizen showed the rebels a back way into the town, however, and the garrison was overwhelmed. The rebels found and stabbed the treacherous guard and killed the Federal soldiers who had survived the attack.

By the time General Natera arrived in the district, Demetrio's reputation had grown so great that he was made a colonel in the revolutionary army. Failing to take Zacatecas, the rebels were forced to retreat, discarding their booty along the road. Demetrio thought of going back to Camila, until news of Villa's coming excited the rebels and gave them a fresh incentive.

During the next battle Cervantes and Solis, an idealist, took refuge in a place where they thought they would be safe. While they discussed the significance of the revolution, a stray bullet killed Solis. Demetrio's gallant charge turned the tide of battle for Villa and won him promotion to the rank of general.

While drinking and boasting in a tavern after the battle, Demetrio met Whitey Margarito and La Pintada, a prostitute with whom he went looking for a hotel room. Her insistence that as a general he should occupy a house of his own made him decide to commandeer a fine residence. During the ransacking Cervantes found a valuable diamond ring. The soldiers tore the pictures from books in the library and sold the ruined volumes. Whitey, joining Demetrio's forces, ran off with Cervantes' girl while Demetrio was arguing the matter of taking her instead of La Pintada, of whom he had tired.

Soon afterward the rebels raided the house of Don Mónico, Demetrio's landowning enemy, and burned the estate. Cervantes, having collected much loot, suggested that he and Demetrio hide it in case they were forced to leave the country. Demetrio wished to share it with the others: still an idealist, he believed the rebel cause would triumph. Because he wanted only Camila, Cervantes promised to get her for his leader.

Cervantes went to the village and persuaded the girl to return with him. Believing that Cervantes was in love with her, she was surprised to find herself in Demetrio's bed. The next morning La Pintada discovered Camila and offered to help her escape. Camila refused. She had found that she liked Demetrio and she decided to stay with him and the army.

During the march against General Orozco at Jalisco, Whitey showed his cruelty when he tortured a prisoner by tightening a rope around the man's neck until his eyes bulged. Later, when kind-hearted Camila persuaded Demetrio to return ten bushels of confiscated corn to a starving villager, Whitey gave the man ten lashes instead. Camila's protests at the incident won her the enmity of La Pintada, who had taken up with Whitey after Demetrio and Cervantes had discarded her. When Demetrio, siding with Camila, ordered the camp follower away, La Pintada became enraged and stabbed Camila.

By the time Demetrio and his men reached Aguascalientes they found Villa and Carranza, once allies, fighting each other. The Federal forces, taking advantage of the disunity, defeated Villa at Celaya. The defeat was a terrible shock to Demetrio's followers, who could not bring themselves to believe that their idol had been beaten. The rebels were forced to retreat.

Cervantes escaped safely across the border. From El Paso he wrote to Venancio, the barber-surgeon. He said that Whitey had shot himself, and he invited Venancio to join him in Texas, where with the barber's money they could open a Mexican restaurant.

After Villa's defeat Demetrio found the villagers no longer willing to help the rebels. To them, he and his followers had become outlaws once more. Somewhat discouraged, he decided to return home. He had been away two years and had seen much, but he could not answer his wife's questions when she asked him why he kept on fighting. He lacked Cervantes' glib tongue to put his true feelings into words.

Trying to pacify the landowners of the region, the government sent troops into the uplands after the outlaw band. Once more the rebels and the Federal troops clashed. Outnumbered, the outlaws perished on the spot where two years before they had won their first victory. After the fighting had ended the soldiers found the body of Demetrio Macías. His eyes, forever fixed, still sighted along the barrel of his gun.

UNDINE

Type of work: Novel

Author: Friedrich de La Motte-Fouqué (1777-1843)

Type of plot: Symbolic allegory

Time of plot: The Middle Ages

Locale: Austria

First published: 1811

Principal characters:

UNDINE, a water spirit

SIR HULDBRAND, a knight

KÜHLEBORN, Undine's uncle

BERTALDA, loved by Sir Huldbrand

Critique:

Essentially a fairy tale, Undine is a highly imaginative and romantic narrative. Told simply but well, it is in the tradition of German folklore, and for that reason it is interesting and enjoyable even to grownups.

The Story:

Near a forest in Austria there lived an old fisherman, his wife, and their foster daughter, Undine. The nearby wood was said to be inhabited by spirits who were enemies of the mortal human beings who lived outside the forest.

One day a young knight, Sir Huldbrand of Ringstetten, was traveling through the forest when a storm broke. As he rode through the gloomy wood he was pursued by spirits and tormented by other manifestations of unearthly folk. At last he came to the edge of the forest and took refuge in the fisherman's cottage, where he was given food and shelter.

Sir Huldbrand was amazed by the beauty of young Undine, who asked him to tell the story of his adventures in the forest. The fisherman forbade the telling, however, and cautioned that it was unwise to talk of spirits at nighttime. Undine, rebellious, mischievous, and untamed, disappeared into the night when reproved by her foster father.

The fisherman and the knight cried for her to return, but their voices were lost in the noise of the wind and rain. As the storm increased they became more worried, and finally they set out in search of her. It was Sir Huldbrand who found her, safe and sound in the leafy bower where she was hiding. When he returned with her to the fisherman's cottage, he told her of his adventures in the forest. Meanwhile the storm raged so furiously that the cottage had become isolated and the four people were cut off by the encircling floods.

Sir Huldbrand then told how he had happened to be traveling through the forest. He had fallen in love with Bertalda, a haughty lady who insisted that he prove his love and courage by a journey through the dreadful wood. At that point in his tale Undine, jealous of the lady, bit the knight's hand. A few days later, a priest, his boat lost in the swirling stream, took refuge on the island. That night he married Undine and Sir Huldbrand. The marriage changed the girl completely. She became submissive, considerate, full of affection. She had gained a soul.

After the flood waters had subsided, the couple left for the knight's domain, Castle Ringstetten. On their way they went to pay homage to the duke of the domain, and in his hall they met Bertalda. Undine took Bertalda to her bosom and announced that she had a surprise for her. Shortly before, Undine had told her husband that she really was a water spirit, that she could live on earth only until he rejected her love; then Kühleborn, who ruled the waters, would call her back to her water home. She had lived with the fisherman and his wife since she had been a mere child, for she had appeared at their cottage on the evening of the day when their own child had, apparently, been drowned.

Undine's surprise, arranged with the help of Kühleborn, the river spirit, was revealed. Bertalda was the long-lost child of the fisherman and his wife. But the proud lady at first refused to accept them as her true parents. When she demanded proof of the story, she was identified by a birthmark on her body. Bertalda's foster parents were disgusted with her shameless behavior, and they cast her off. The next day Bertalda accosted Undine and Sir Huldbrand outside the duke's castle. Dressed as a mean fishing girl, she had been ordered to sell food to learn humility and the dignity of toil so that she could rejoin her real parents. Pitying her, Undine and Sir Huldbrand insisted that she live with them at Castle Ringstetten.

Life did not always go smoothly at the castle. One day Undine, who was loved by the servants, ordered the well to be sealed. But Bertalda, who wanted the water from it to remove her freckles, ordered the seal removed. Sir Huldbrand insisted that Undine was mistress of the castle and the well remained sealed. Bertalda then decided to go to the fisherman's cottage. She went through the Black Valley, where Kühleborn, who hated her, put all sorts of difficulties in her way. At last she was rescued by Sir Huldbrand and Undine, who had followed her flight.

Later the three started down the Danube to visit Vienna. Everything went wrong, and the sailors thought the boat was bewitched. Finally, in exasperation, Sir Huldbrand forgot Undine's advice not to remonstrate with her whenever they were close to water. He told her that he was tired of her and her spirit relatives and ordered her to return to her watery home. Although he was sorry as soon as he had spoken those words, he could not recall them; Undine had already disappeared beneath the waves.

At first Sir Huldbrand grieved, but as time passed he thought less often of Undine. At length he and Bertalda decided to be married. But the priest who had married Sir Huldbrand to Undine refused to perform the ceremony, and so they were married by another. Bertalda then commanded the workmen to remove the stone from the well which Undine had ordered sealed. All were terrified when a white figure emerged from it. It was Undine. She went into the castle and told Sir Huldbrand that he must die.

Sir Huldbrand expired while he looked upon her face, and Undine vanished. There were some who said that she re-entered the well. At the funeral Undine joined the mourners kneeling by the grave, but at the end of the service she disappeared. Then on the spot where she had knelt water sprang forth and a stream appeared to flow about the knight's grave. It was Undine surrounding her lover in death.

THE UNFORTUNATE TRAVELLER

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Nash (1567-1601)

Type of plot: Picaresque romance

Time of plot: Reign of King Henry VIII

Locale: England and Europe

First published: 1594

Principal characters:

JACK WILTON, a page for King Henry VIII and a soldier of fortune

DIAMANTE, a rich widow, later Jack's wife

THE EARL OF SURREY, Jack's friend and benefactor

HERACLIDE DE IMOLA, hostess to Jack and Diamante in Rome

Critique:

The Unfortunate Traveller, Or, The Life of Jack Wilton was written almost a hundred and fifty years too early to be classified as a novel. Not a novel in the generally accepted sense of that term, the book is, however, an important forerunner of the English novel as it was to develop in the eighteenth century. The Unfortunate Traveller, along with Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, was one of the high points of the literature of the last years of the sixteenth century. Nash's realism in this work is high, yet he catered also to the Elizabethan taste for the romantic and far-fetched, especially in dealing with Italy and the Italians. Seldom has a work, even in the twentieth century, described in such detail the horrors of public torture and execution, and the incidents of a rape and a looting. Throughout life a very witty satirist, Nash could not, even in this work, resist the opportunity to find fault; he does so with the stupidity of professional military men and with the inability of the universities to entertain royalty satisfactorily.

The Story:

Jack Wilton was a page serving in the army of King Henry VIII of England when his adventures began. While the English troops were encamped near Turwin, in France, Jack, pretending that he had overheard the king and his council planning to do away with a certain sutler, convinced the sutler that he ought to give away all his supplies to the soldiers and then throw himself on the king's mercy. The sutler, completely fooled, did just that. The king, enjoying the prank, gave him a pension and forgave Jack.

Shortly after that escape Jack fell in with a captain who forced Jack to help him get rich by throwing dice. Jack, tiring of his subservience to the captain, persuaded the officer that the best means of getting ahead in the army was to turn spy and seek out information valuable to the king. The gullible captain, entering the French lines, was discovered by the French and almost killed before he was sent hustling back to the English camp.

The campaign over, Jack found himself back in England once again. When the peacetime duties of a page began to pall, he left the king's household and turned soldier of fortune. After crossing the English Channel to find some means of making a livelihood, he reached the French king too late to enter that monarch's service against the Swiss, and so he traveled on to Münster, Germany. There he found John Leiden leading the Baptists against the Duke of Saxony. He observed a notorious massacre, in which the Baptists were annihilated because they refused to carry the weapons of war into battle. After the battle Jack met the Earl of Surrey, who was on the continent at the time.

Surrey, having been acquainted with Jack at court, was glad to see the page and confided to him his love for Geraldine, a lovely Florentine. Surrey proposed that Jack travel with him to Italy in search of the woman. Jack, having no future in sight, readily consented to accompany the earl.

Jack and Surrey then proceeded southward out of Germany into Italy. As they traveled Surrey proposed to Jack that they exchange identities for a time, so that the nobleman could behave in a less seemly fashion. Jack, pleased at the prospect of being an earl, even temporarily, agreed.

Upon their arrival in Venice, on the way to Florence, they were taken up by a courtesan named Tabitha, who tried to kill the man she thought was the Earl of Surrey, with the true earl as her accomplice. Surrey and Jack, turning the tables on her, caused her and her pander to be executed for attempting to conspire against a life. In turning the tables, however, Jack came into possession of some counterfeit money. When they used the coins, Jack and the earl were seized as counterfeiters and sentenced to death.

While languishing in prison, Jack met Diamante, the wife of a goldsmith who had imprisoned her because he suspected her of infidelity. The page made her his mistress after assuring her that thereby she revenged herself on the husband who thought little of her chastity.

After a few weeks Jack and the earl were released through an English gentleman who had heard of their plight and had secured the efforts of the poet Aretine to prove to the court that Tabitha and her procurer had been the real counterfeiters. Aretine also saw to it that Diamante was released from prison to become the mistress of Jack once again. Within a few weeks Diamante's husband died of the plague. Jack married Diamante and, in view of his new fortune, decided to travel.

He left the Earl of Surrey in Venice, but the pleasure of bearing the nobleman's title was so great that Jack kept it. After some time Surrey heard that there was another earl by the same name and went to investigate. Learning that the double was Jack, Surrey forgave him, and they started once again on their interrupted trip to Florence. Upon their arrival the earl, wishing to do battle to prove his love for Geraldine, issued a challenge to all the knights and gentlemen of the city. The tourney was a great success, with Surrey carrying off all the honors of the day. After that event Surrey and Jack parted company. Jack, still accompanied by Diamante, went on to Rome.

There they lived with Johannes and Heraclide de Imola. During the summer Signor de Imola died of the plague. Shortly after his death and before his corpse could be removed from the house, bandits broke in and raped Heraclide de Imola and Diamante. Jack, overpowered by the bandits, was unable to help the women. Heraclide killed herself after the attack. When police broke into the house they blamed Jack for what had happened. He was unable to clear himself because the only other witness was Diamante, whom the bandits had kidnaped.

A banished English earl, appearing in time to save Jack from the hangman's noose, produced witnesses to show that one of the bandits had made a deathbed confession clearing the page of any part in the crimes. Released, Jack went in search of Diamante. While searching for her he fell through an unbarred cellar door into the house of a Jew, and there he found Diamante making love to an apprentice. The Jew, roused by the noise of the fall and Jack's anger at Diamante, came into the cellar and accused them both of breaking into his house and corrupting his apprentice. Under the law, they became the Jew's bond servants. Jack was turned over to another Jew, the pope's physician, to be used in a vivisection.

He was saved from that horrid death when one of the pope's mistresses fell in love with him and used her influence to secure his person for herself. Diamante also fell into the woman's hands. Jack and Diamante, keeping their previous relations a secret, hoped in that way to be able to escape from the house. One day, when the woman went to a religious festival, they escaped, taking with them as much loot as they could carry.

Traveling northward, Jack went to Bologna, where he saw a famous criminal executed. The assassin, Cutwolfe, had confessed to murdering the bandit who had led the assault on Heraclide de Imola and Diamante months before. Moving on into France, Jack found the English armies once again in the field and returned to King Henry's service.

VATHEK

Type of work: Novel

Author: William Beckford (1759-1844)

Type of plot: Romantic allegory

Time of plot: The past

Locale: Arabia

First published: 1786

Principal characters:

VATHEK, an Arabian sultan

GIAOUR, a magician and a prince of darkness

CARATHIS, Vathek's mother

EMIR FAKREDDIN, a noble prince

NOURONIHAR, his daughter

GULCHENROUZ, her betrothed

Critique:

Lovers of fantastic Arabian tales and Oriental romances will doubtless find Vathek more than satisfactory as a work of pure imagination. In addition, the influences of Voltaire and Chateaubriand lend deeper levels of meaning to make the book both an allegory and a work of social criticism.

The Story:

Vathek was an Arabian caliph whose reign had been marked by turbulence and unrest. A sensuous person, he had built five palaces, one devoted to the enjoyment of each of the five senses, and his particular fondness for food and women consumed much of his time. In addition to the gratification he found in the life of the senses, he tried also to master the sciences and the deep, unfathomable secrets of the world beyond. To this end he built a huge tower where he pursued his studies in astronomy and astrology. There Carathis, his mother, burnt refuse and live bodies to appease the dark powers.

One day Vathek got from a hideous, repulsive stranger some mysterious sabers bearing letters which the caliph was unable to decipher. He offered great rewards to anyone who could read them; but since the punishment for failure was also great, few accepted the offer. At last an old man appeared and read the inscriptions. But the next morning Vathek discovered that the inscriptions had changed to words of different import. From that time on the letters on the sabers changed daily.

Vathek sank into despair, unable to enjoy anything whatever. He begged the stranger to return and to explain the inscription to him, for he was sure that the letters were the key to the dark kingdom and the riches Vathek hoped to find there. The stranger, Giaour, finally reappeared. He told Vathek that only a sacrifice would put the powers in a receptive mood. On a journey with his court, Vathek managed to throw fifty young children into a chasm as victims for the bloodthirsty Giaour. Angered by his cruelty, his people began to hurl execrations at Vathek, but his guards returned him safely to his palace.

Carathis continued her own sacrifices in the tower, to the disgust and anger of the people, who more and more objected to Vathek's defiance of Mahomet and the Moslem creed. Commanded by a message written on a mysterious piece of parchment, Vathek and his court set out on a pilgrimage in search of the mountains of Istakhar where the secrets of the dark world would be revealed to him.

On the way they met the messengers of Emir Fakreddin, a deeply religious prince. For some time Vathek was Fakreddin's guest. Although he loathed the prayers and religious ceremonies observed by his host, he was attracted to Fakreddin's daughter, the lovely Nouronihar. She and her cousin, Gulchenrouz, had been betrothed for a long time and their love had the approval of the emir and his people, who were pleased by the devotion of the young people to one another.

Nouronihar so attracted Vathek that he plotted to seize her by force. Fakreddin, already scandalized by Vathek's behavior, was informed of the plot. He and his court determined to outwit Vathek by administering a drug to the young lovers. When Vathek saw them in their deathlike trance, he was convinced that they were dead. Then Nouronihar and Gulchenrouz were secretly taken to a safe retreat and looked after by Fakreddin's servants. The young people, awaking, believed that they had really died and that they were now in Paradise.

One day, however, Vathek discovered Nouronihar, who had strayed from the hidden retreat. Yielding at last to his entreaties, she became the favorite of his harem. As Vathek and his wives and followers continued their journey, Nouronihar came to share her lord's ambition; she too wished to enjoy the pleasures of that strange other world. Like Vathek, she was willing to resort to anything, even to the most unscrupulous behavior, to realize their desires.

At last, after a long journey, the couple arrived at the mountains of Istakhar and entered the secret retreat of Eblis, dread lord of darkness. There they found all the beautiful and strange wealth they had so long desired. They were given permission to roam through the palace and to enjoy its treasures as much as they wished. In the vast domed hall of the palace they saw creatures whose hearts were continually devoured by fire. A like fate, they learned, was to be theirs as well, for they had sought knowledge that no mortal should know.

In the meantime, Carathis had been summoned to the abode of Eblis. Transported upon the back of an evil monster, she came at once to the mysterious palace and was overjoyed to view its secrets at last. Then, before the eyes of Vathek and Nouronihar, her heart caught fire and a consuming flame burst forth to punish her eternally for her crimes. A moment later flames began to burn in the hearts of Vathek and Nouronihar.

But Gulchenrouz and the fifty children whom Vathek had sacrificed were saved miraculously from death and carried to an earthly paradise. For them, life was perpetual happiness. Not having sought evil, they achieved the good life.

Critique:

Although Elinor Wylie is best remembered as a poet, she wrote during her brief career four fantastic and ironic novels unlike anything else in the whole range of American fiction. The Venetian Glass Nephew is the most completely realized of her novels, reflecting the qualities of her poetic imagination and style. A subtle fable of life and art, it marches with minuet grace and precision along its fantastic course. Virginio, the man of glass, and Rosalba, his flesh-and-blood bride, are more than figures in a romance which seems on the surface as slight and fragile as its spun-glass hero. Under the brittle brilliance of this novel there is a darkly personal note of mocking irony and almost silent grief. What might have been a slight work of artifice becomes through its underlying meaning a work of limited but authentic art. M. de Chastelneuf, idealist, cynic, and charlatan, is, of course, the famous Casanova under thin disguise.

The Story:

The heart of Peter Innocent Bon, cardinal prefect of the Congregation of the Propaganda, was filled with happiness that was almost childlike in its simplicity. After thirty years he was to see his native Venice once more, for brilliant, vain Pius VI, about to visit its lagoons and golden palaces, had named the aged cardinal a member of his suite. Peter Innocent, in 1782, was in the eighty-first year of his age. A shy, mild man, he seldom appeared in the rich vestments of his office, but went inconspicuously about Rome in the gray-brown garb of the Franciscan Friars Minor, a robe suited to the humility of a follower of St. Francis.

Only one small regret marred Peter Innocent's pleasure as he viewed again the city of his youth. Pius was traveling in state, and he and many of his suite were accompanied by their nephews. Peter Innocent had no nephews; his brother had fathered only daughters and his sisters were in holy orders. Seeing the satisfaction other churchmen found in the company of their young kinsmen, he wished that he too might have enjoyed such comfort in his old age. But prayers, fasting, and pilgrimages to holy shrines had given him no nephew of his own, and the thought of parenthood would have been as foreign to the chastity of his mind as to that of his body.

During the Venetian visit Pius treated Peter Innocent with particular graciousness and asked him to represent the pontiff at the singing of a new cantata at the Incurabili. Listening to the music, the cardinal felt that its subject, the return of Tobias, was appropriate to his own situation.

As he left the Incurabili a hand touched his shoulder. He turned to find Alvise Luna, the famous glass blower of Murano, at his elbow. Luna, whom the cardinal had known in earlier days, complained that he had fallen upon evil times. Willing to help his old friend, and not knowing that the man was under suspicion as a sorcerer, Peter Innocent went with him to his cellar workshop. There he met a masked stranger whom Luna introduced as M. de Chastelneuf, Chevalier de Langeist. Peter Innocent was amazed when the men displayed their miraculous wares, a flying golden griffin, a glass stag that walked, glass birds that sang. When they asked if they might execute a commission for some bauble he had in mind, Peter Innocent reached a sudden decision. He asked modestly if they could make him a nephew such as he had always desired.

At Luna's warning glance Chastelneuf repressed the smile and the ribald comment that rose to his lips. Solemnly he assured the cardinal that such a work of art was difficult but not impossible. If he would return in three days he could see for himself the result of their labors.

Peter Innocent went to Luna's cellar three nights later. In a chamber scented with spices and incense Chastelneuf brought to life a figure of Venetian glass that lay upon a covered bier. The cardinal's nephew stood revealed as a handsome young man of nineteen or twenty, of complexion so fair as to seem translucent, with yellow hair as fine as spun glass. He was dressed completely in white and wore a strange ring of crystal. Peter Innocent baptized him Virginio.

The cardinal, as much concerned for his nephew's mind as he was for his person and his soul, decided to send him to Altichieri, there to study under the noble Angelo Querini, who had been Voltaire's friend. On his arrival Virginio met Rosalba Berni, Querini's lovely ward. Some thought her a descendant of Francesco Berni, the poet; others whispered the name of Cardinal de Bernis. At eighteen she was a prodigy of learning and a poet known officially as Sappho the Younger. Virginio had never seen anyone so beautiful, and Rosalba was not so engrossed in the classics as to fail to notice how handsome he was. Scholarly Querini, always indulgent toward Rosalba, gave them his blessing when they announced their desire to wed.

Meanwhile Peter Innocent had gone to consult Count Carlo Gozzi, his longtime friend and a writer of fairy tales, on matters connected with Virginio's future. He found Chastelneuf closeted with the count; the chevalier had come to discuss the match between Rosalba and Virginio. To Peter Innocent and the count he explained the reason for his interest in the girl. Years before he had loved Caterina, Rosalba's mother, but because of his attachment to another woman he had callously relinquished his innocent beloved to Cardinal de Bernis, a notorious libertine. The cardinal had loved Caterina faithfully, however, and Rosalba was the daughter of that affectionate union. After the mother's death de Bernis had been summoned to Rome. Rosalba, already famous for her beauty and learning, had become the spoiled darling of French scholars and philosophers. After Voltaire's death Querini had become her guardian.

As Chastelneuf finished his story Rosalba and Virginio appeared, having driven from Altichieri in the chevalier's carriage. Seeing their happiness and youthful high spirits, Peter Innocent and his friends decided that the wedding should take place at once.

But the marriage of Virginio and Rosalba did not end as happily as one of Count Gozzi's fairy tales. Chastelneuf had seen to it that Virginio could play the part of a tender and devoted husband, but there had been no provision for the contingencies of daily association with a hoyden such as Rosalba had suddenly become. He splintered too easily; sometimes, after a hearty embrace, Rosalba found particles of glass in her palms. Games like hide-and-seek and blind-man's-buff, in which she sportively delighted, were impossible for him. Privately, she and Virginio were unhappy, and, realizing their unhappiness, Peter Innocent, Querini, Chastelneuf, and Count Gozzi were wretched as well.

At last, after Rosalba had tried to end her misery by leaping into a bonfire, Chastelneuf made a desperate suggestion. If she were willing to endure the agony of fire, she could be changed into a woman of the finest Sèvres porcelain. Rosalba agreed for Virginio's sake and because of her own love. Through winter snows she and Chastelneuf and Peter Innocent traveled to the ancient town of Sèvres, in France. While Peter Innocent, in an inn at Versailles, read aloud from the life of St. Francis, she and Chastelneuf went to the abandoned Dubois factory and there she was transformed into a proper bride for a Venetian glass lover.

So Virginio and Rosalba returned to Venice in the twilight of a dimming century, to live happily in a delicate, beautiful world of porcelain and Murano glass. There Pietro Longhi painted them in his old age. With fragile grace the lovers look out from the miniature he made, and reflected in the mirrors that surround them are the faces of Peter Innocent Bon, Angelo Querini, and Count Carlo Gozzi. M. de Chastelneuf is not in the antique miniature; it is believed that he had retired to Bohemia.

Critique:

Venice Preserved, Or, A Plot Discovered was very popular when it was written because of the numerous plots and counterplots that were rife in the 1680's in England under Charles II. It is reputed also to have been revived on the stage more often than any other non-Shakespearean tragedy, largely because of the powerful emotional appeal. The reader cannot help drawing some comparisons with Shakespeare's Othello, for in both plays the hero has robbed a rich and influential Italian father of a daughter. For minds more finely drawn, the emotional appeal of Jaffeur, torn as he is between his loyalty to his friend and his loyalty to his wife, is even greater than the touching final scenes between the old senator and his star-crossed daughter. In addition to the topical interest and the emotional appeal, the play has a third source of interest: the animalistic Antonio, who symbolizes the decadence of the Venetian senate.

The Story:

Jaffeur, formerly the servant of Priuli, a senator of Venice, had secretly wooed and married Belvidera, Priuli's daughter. For three years the couple lived comfortably and blissfully, despite the father's antagonism. Then Jaffeur lost his fortune. When he went to ask Priuli for aid, in the name of Belvidera, the old senator refused to help in any way, and he swore that his ungrateful daughter and her equally ungrateful husband would have to make their way as best they could. Jaffeur, after reminding Priuli that it was he who had saved Belvidera from a shipwreck after which she had fallen in love with him, left the senator's home in a most unhappy frame of mind.

Soon afterward Jaffeur met Pierre, a friend who had given long and faithful, though unrewarded, service to Venice. Pierre, sympathizing with Jaffeur, offered him the means of getting revenge on Priuli and striking, as he put it, a blow for liberty against the bad government of the senate. Jaffeur agreed to meet Pierre that night and to become a member of the band of conspirators. When he arrived home, Jaffeur was also comforted by Belvidera, who claimed that she was rich as long as she had his love, no matter how little fortune they possessed.

Meanwhile Pierre had gone to visit Aquilina, a courtesan whom he loved. He was extremely incensed with the woman because she had given herself for money to old Antonio, a senator. Antonio's theft of his mistress made Pierre more eager than ever for revenge. He made Aquilina, who loved him, swear to extract all the information she could from Antonio and pass it on to the conspirators, who were meeting that night in Aquilina's house.

When midnight came, Jaffeur was sadly bewailing his fate on the Rialto. There Pierre met him and conducted him to the conspirators' meeting place. Because the plotters were unwilling to take Jaffeur into their number, he brought Belvidera and offered her as hostage for his honesty. The leader of the plotters, Renault, and the Spanish ambassador, who also had a hand in the plot to ruin the government, accepted her as hostage. She was to be killed if Jaffeir failed them in any way.

The next day Jaffeir's hopes for revenge and his confidence in his fellow conspirators was shaken when he learned that Renault had offered violence to Belvidera and had been driven off only by her screams. Belvidera swore that she would bear anything, if only she knew why she had been offered as a hostage. Jaffeir, seeing the predicament she was in, and thinking it only fair that she know the truth, revealed the plot to assassinate the senate and take over the city. Because the mass assassination would include her father, Belvidera, greatly shocked, tried to convince her husband that terrible wrongs would be committed against innocent people in the mass slaughter that was planned.

In the evening the conspirators met to complete plans for the uprising, which was to take place that same night. At the meeting Jaffeir was seized with revulsion for the plot and the conspirators; he slipped away from the meeting and went to Belvidera. The two started toward the chamber where the senate council was meeting. On the way they were taken prisoners by the ducal guard and escorted to the council. To the senators and the duke Jaffeir admitted his part in the plot and prevailed on their fear to gain a general amnesty for his friends in exchange for information preventing the overthrow of the government. Within a matter of minutes, the other conspirators were brought in as prisoners. They, including Pierre, were furious with Jaffeir for revealing the plot. Pierre, refusing to listen to Jaffeir, much less to forgive him, slapped Jaffeir's face.

The senators, although they had given their word that the conspirators would be permitted to live, broke their promise and sentenced the prisoners, including Pierre, to death on the wheel. Jaffeir's rage knew no bounds when he learned of that perfidy. He offered to stab Bel-videra, who had been pledged as hostage for his faithfulness to the plot. When his love prevented his actually killing her, he persuaded her to go to her father and seek his aid in rescuing the conspirators, lest her own life be forfeit for their deaths. Priuli, overcome at last by his love for his daughter, agreed to help Belvidera. His promise, however, was made too late.

When Jaffeir arrived at the scene of execution, he learned that all of the conspirators except Pierre had already been killed by the public executioner. Pierre had been saved until last because he had been granted a request to speak to Jaffeir. On the scaffold Pierre apologized for slapping Jaffeir's face and asked him a boon. Jaffeir readily assented and Pierre whispered to him. He asked that Jaffeir save him from an ignominious death by stabbing him instead. Jaffeir immediately complied and then turned his dagger into his own breast. He died within seconds of his friend.

Aquilina, hoping to save Pierre's life, had gone to seek the aid of Antonio. When the senator refused to help her, she stabbed him and left him to die. In the meantime Belvidera, overcome by her fears, had become distraught in her father's house. In spite of Priuli's efforts and those of his servants, she became steadily worse. She quickly went mad, even before she knew of her husband's death by his own hand; he had told her when she saw him last that they would never meet again. Before the messenger arrived to tell of Jaffeir's death, her husband's ghost appeared before her. Shortly after the messenger came and left, the ghosts of Jaffeir and Pierre appeared briefly. Following their appearance she went into a frenzy and died. Her father, sick of the bloodshed, plotting, and violent death, begged his attendants to take him away to a lonely place where the sun never shone, so that he might mourn in solitude and darkness the loss of his daughter and her unhappy fate.

THE VICAR OF BULLHAMPTON

Type of work: Novel

Author: Anthony Trollope (1815-1882)

Type of plot: Domestic realism

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: England

First published: 1870

Principal characters:

FRANK FENWICK, the Vicar of Bullhampton

HARRY GILMORE, Squire of Bullhampton

JANET FENWICK, Frank's wife

MARY LOWTHER, her friend

WALTER MARRABLE, Mary's cousin

THE MARQUIS OF TROWBRIDGE, a wealthy landlord

JACOB BRATTLE, a mill owner

SAM BRATTLE, his son

CARRY BRATTLE, his daughter

Critique:

Another novel of clerical life and society, The Vicar of Bullhampton is noteworthy for the introduction of a prostitute as a sympathetic character. Trollope showed considerable courage in attempting to portray this type of character during the Victorian Era. Although he felt forced to apologize to his readers in his introduction, he still retained Carry Brattle as one of the chief characters of the book. The theme of this novel, as in so much of Trollope's fiction, centers about the difficulty of acquiring money and making a successful marriage.

The Story:

The town of Bullhampton was a typical English country parish. Although the Marquis of Trowbridge owned most of the land, he had no residence within ten miles of it. The rest of the land was owned by Squire Harry Gilmore, a good friend of the Vicar of Bullhampton. The squire had recently become a daily visitor at the vicarage, for the vicar's wife had a guest, Mary Lowther, with whom Squire Gilmore was much in love. But Mary could not bring herself to become engaged to the squire; because, as she told Janet Fenwick, she simply was not in love with him. Janet and the vicar tried to persuade her that her views would change for the better after marriage. In spite of their well-meant advice, Mary still would not give her consent.

One evening, as the squire left the vicarage, he saw three men loitering in the orchard. He recognized one of them as Sam Brattle, son of Jacob Brattle, the mill owner. Jacob was a crabbed, hard-working old man who had reared a large family. Most of the children had turned out well, except Sam, who consorted with low companions, and Carry, who had gone away to the city and there become a woman of the streets. No one ever spoke of the wayward daughter at the Brattle home, for she had broken her father's heart. The chief desire of Jacob's life was to have his old mill repaired, and he finally succeeded in obtaining the necessary money to finance the project from Squire Gilmore.

Because Mary could not bring herself to accept the squire and her presence disturbed him greatly, she finally left for home. She lived at Loring with her aunt, Miss Marrable, an old spinster who was much interested in Squire Gilmore's devotion to Mary.

Back in Bullhampton the vicar tried to find out if Sam Brattle had been in his orchard with the other men that night, but the most he could learn was that two men, one an ex-convict and the other a complete stranger, had been hanging around the town and that Sam was well acquainted with both of them. A few days later one of the farmers of the community was found murdered and his secret strongbox emptied of its contents. The only person who had known the location of the strongbox was a servant girl who was a good friend of Sam Brattle. Sam was arrested, to be released a short time later because the magistrate could find no real evidence against him. Nevertheless, the Marquis of Trowbridge thought he should be held in custody, and sharp words passed between the marquis and the vicar on the subject. Sam returned to the mill because the vicar stoutly defended him.

At Loring, meanwhile, Mary Lowther had fallen deeply in love with her cousin, Walter Marrable. Walter, a soldier returned from India, was trying to regain an inheritance from his father, who had cheated him out of it. If this repossession were possible, Walter would be a wealthy man and would not have to return to India to make his fortune. During their walks together, Mary was a sympathetic listener to his troubles. Soon they were in love with each other. This situation worried Mary's aunt because Walter's attempt to regain his money was not proving successful. Before the end of the month Walter and Mary were engaged.

In Bullhampton, the head constable was investigating the home of the ex-convict in an attempt to secure evidence concerning the murder. The suspect's mother and a young woman, supposedly his wife but in reality Carry Brattle, his mistress, refused to tell the constable anything. The vicar, in the meantime, had another stormy interview with the marquis, who insisted that Sam was guilty and should be put in prison. The vicar proclaimed Sam's innocence, however, for he had faith in the young man. The upshot of the matter was that the marquis threatened to write to the bishop in complaint of the vicar. At last he did so, but the bishop merely sent his letter along to the vicar, with a friendly note advising him not to cross the marquis too often.

Love was not going smoothly at Loring. Mary Lowther, happy over her engagement to Walter, wrote to Janet and also to Squire Gilmore, telling them her news. The young squire went into a decline, and for weeks he stayed at his home and refused to see anyone. Mary's and Walter's marriage plans had to be broken off, however, when it was discovered that Colonel Marrable, Walter's father, had spent every cent of the inheritance. Walter, now penniless, was forced to apply once more for service in India.

Janet and the vicar, hearing the news, asked Mary to return for a visit in Bullhampton; they hoped, during her stay, to renew her romance with the squire. Also, the Fenwicks needed diversion at the time, for they were plagued by the erection of a new Methodist chapel across the street from the vicarage. The new chapel was the work of the Marquis of Trowbridge and the Methodist minister, both of whom disliked the vicar intensely. One of his latest offenses, in their eyes, was a visit to Carry Brattle, the fallen woman living at the ex-convict's house. The vicar had taken her from this wretched place and found a home for her with a farm family, since her father would not hear of her living at the mill.

When Mary arrived again in Bullhampton, Squire Gilmore's spirits immediately improved. He continued to woo Mary, and at last she resignedly became engaged to him. Never really in love with him, she merely attempted to play the part of being happy. But she was a bad actress.

The vicar sought legal advice on the building of the chapel so close to the vicarage. When he discovered that the land was really his, he went to interview the marquis. Although the vicar could have insisted that the chapel be torn down at once, he suggested to the marquis that it be allowed to stand for the time being, with the understanding that someday it would have to be removed. The marquis was greatly upset by the news, as was the Methodist minister.

Walter Marrable, before his departure for India, went to visit his uncle, a wealthy baronet. He was in poor health, as was his only son. When the son died, the old gentleman made his will in favor of Walter. He hoped that Walter might marry his ward, but Mary Lowther was still in Walter's heart.

Carry Brattle, through the workings of the vicar, at last returned home. Her mother and sisters joyfully welcomed her back, but her father remained stubborn. Because Carry tried everything in her power to please him, her father was finally reconciled to her. At the trial of the ex-convict for murder, Carry and Sam were summoned as witnesses. Then it was revealed that Sam had been trying to arrange for a marriage between Carry and the suspected murderer and for that reason had been with the two men before the crime was committed. Sam was cleared entirely.

When Walter's uncle died, the young man inherited his money. Mary broke her engagement with Squire Gilmore and married Walter, her real love. The squire was crushed, and in their sympathy for their good friend the vicar and his wife regretted that Mary had ever come to Bullhampton.

Critique:

Vile Bodies is a witty satire on English life during the period between wars. It is also Mr. Waugh's valediction to the Bright Young People, a generation running to waste in a manner that is personal as well as social. As in his earlier Decline and Fall, the novel contains many elements which make for grotesque humor, but the sinister and often tragic ends that his characters meet provoke thoughtful reflection as well. No solution is offered. The writer merely presents his brief episodes in brilliant juxtaposition and leaves the reader to draw his own conclusions. The result is subtle but effective social criticism. Here is T. S. Eliot's modern Waste Land, with all of the poet's insight and bitterness but without his solemnity.

The Story:

During the rough channel crossing almost everyone was in some stage of seasickness. Some became tipsy and took to their berths. The Bright Young People, led by Agatha Runcible and effeminate

Miles Malpractice, strapped themselves with sticking plaster and hoped for the best. A few hardy souls gathered in the smoking room where Mrs. Melrose Ape, a famous female evangelist traveling with her troupe of singing angels, bullied them into singing hymns. Father Rothschild, S.J., contemplated the sufferings of the saints.

Adam Fenwick-Symes, a young writer, was hurrying home to marry Nina Blount. To his dismay, the Dover customs authorities confiscated and burned the manuscript of the autobiography he had written while in Paris. Almost as bad was the case of Agatha Runcible, who was stripped and searched after being mistaken for a notorious jewel smuggler.

In London, Adam's publisher offered him a contract to write a novel, but no advance in royalties. With only ten shillings to his name Adam wondered how he was going to get married. Luckily, he was staying at Shephard's Hotel. Lottie Crump, the proprietress, bullied kings and advised members of Parliament, and if she liked her guests she was careless about bills. Most of her guests were drunk. One young man made a foolish bet with Adam and lost a thousand pounds. Adam called Nina and told her they could get married immediately, but before he left the hotel a drunken major persuaded him to put the money on Indian Runner in the November Handicap. Then the major disappeared and Adam was forced to call Nina again and tell her that their marriage would have to be postponed.

Adam and Nina went to Archie Schwert's costume party. Finding the affair dull, some of the Bright Young People went off to Lottie Crump's for a drink. Judge Skimp, an American guest, was entertaining. One young woman had fallen while swinging on a chandelier; she died in spite of the champagne used to bathe her forehead.

The party was about to break up when a Miss Brown invited the group to her house, which happened to be No. 10 Downing Street, for her father was Sir James Brown, the Prime Minister. Agatha Runcible stayed all night because she had forgotten the key to her own house. The next morning, still in her Hawaiian grass skirt, she found reporters and photographers waiting when she went out the front door. Reports of midnight orgies at No. 10 Downing Street caused a change of government, and Mr. Outrage, whose dreams were filled with visions of nude Japanese ladies, became the new Prime Minister.

On Nina's advice Adam called on Colonel Blount to ask if that eccentric gentleman would not finance his daughter's wedding. The colonel generously gave him a check for a thousand pounds. Jubilant, Adam took Nina to a country hotel where they stayed overnight. He was so happy that she waited until the next morning to tell him that her father, an absent-minded movie fan, had signed Charlie Chaplin's name to the worthless check. The wedding was postponed once more.

At Lady Metroland's party for Mrs. Ape, Baron Balcairn, a gossip columnist known as Mr. Chatterbox, showed up in disguise after the hostess had refused to send him an invitation. Suspected of spying on a secret political conference between Lord Metroland, Father Rothschild, and Mr. Outrage, he was exposed. Deciding to give his paper the scoop of scoops, he reported a sensational but false account of indiscreet confessions made by aristocrats whom the evangelist had converted. Then he went home, put his head into the oven, turned on the gas, and quietly died.

Adam became Mr. Chatterbox. In the meantime Balcairn's hoax had swamped the courts with libel suits against the Daily Excess. Mrs. Ape confirmed the story in a special interview and then departed with her angels to pep up religion at Oberammergau. Forbidden to mention the names of those suing the paper, Adam was forced to invent fictitious people for his column. Among his creations was a man named Ginger, a model of fashion and a popular figure in society.

He was rather surprised when he finally encountered a man whom everyone called Ginger. He was Captain Eddy Littlejohn; Adam and Nina met him at the November Handicap, where Indian Runner came in first, paying thirty-five to one. A few minutes after the race Adam spied the drunken major, but he disappeared before Adam could push his way through the crowd to collect his winnings.

Adam promised Nina that he would speak to her father again. He found the colonel making a film based on the life of John Wesley and too busy to pay any attention to Adam. During his absence Nina wrote his column and mentioned green bowlers, a fashion item tabooed in the Daily Excess. So Adam lost his job and Miles Malpractice became Mr. Chatterbox. Miles took the post because he needed the money. His brother, Lord Throbbing, had returned unexpectedly from Canada and thrown Miles, along with his disreputable boxing and racing friends, out of Throbbing House.

Adam, Agatha, Miles, and Archie Schwert went to the auto races where, in order to get into the pits, they wore brassards indicating that they belonged to the crew of car 13. Between heats Adam again met the drunken major, who, after assuring him that his thirty-five thousand pounds were safe in the bank, borrowed five pounds to make a bet.

When the driver of car 13 was disabled by an Italian rival, Agatha, who wore a brassard designating her as spare driver, took the wheel. Careening madly, she established a course record for the lap before she left the track and drove across country until she crashed the car into a monument. Found wandering about in a dazed condition, she died in a nursing home, still thinking that she was driving in a spinning world of speed and sound.

Adam had no money to pay Lottie Crump's bill for seventy-eight pounds sixteen and twopence. Meeting Ginger Littlejohn, he borrowed that amount and promised in return that Ginger could marry Nina.

Shortly after Ginger and Nina returned from their honeymoon Ginger was called up for military service. Adam went with Nina to spend Christmas with Colonel Blount. The Wesley picture had been finished, and the colonel, planning to show it as a Christmas treat, was too preoccupied to notice that his supposed son-in-law was a writer he had met previously as Fenwick-Symes. On Christmas night they heard that war had been declared.

Adam met his drunken major again on a blasted battlefield during a lull in the fighting. The officer, who insisted that he was now a general, announced that he had lost his division. Adam was not quite so badly off; he had lost only one platoon. The general offered to pay the thirty-five thousand pounds on the spot, but Adam thought the money would be useless. They did find the general's car and in it a case of champagne and Chastity, who had been one of Mrs. Ape's singing angels. Adam drank some of the wine and fell asleep, leaving the general and Chastity to entertain each other.

TIKHON ILITCH KRASOFF, a self-made landowner
KUZMA ILITCH KRASOFF, his imaginative brother
THE BRIDE, a peasant woman employed by Tikhon
RODKA, a peasant, husband of the Bride

Critique:

Bunin himself, in an autobiographical introduction to the American edition of this novel, stated that it was one of a series of novels written to portray the character of the Russian people. In the series, said Bunin, he attempted to lay bare the Russian soul in all its complexity and depth, and in its invariably tragic state. Bunin also stated that no one who knew the Russian people as he did could have been surprised by the beastliness of the Russian revolution and its effect on Russia. Some critics have called Bunin cruel in his portrayal of the Russian people, for he showed them as vicious, egocentric, hatred-filled individuals who care little for anyone but themselves. Bunin himself has stated that he is content to have painted a more realistic picture of the Russian people than the idealized conception usually given in the literature of his land, a land from which he was, of course, an exile after the revolution. For his truthful account Bunin has received the Nobel Prize for Literature.

The Story:

The ancestors of Tikhon and Kuzma Ilitch Krasoff were nothing to be proud of: their great-grandfather had been hunted from Durnovka with wolfhounds; their grandfather had distinguished himself by becoming a thief; and their father, a petty huckster, had died early in life as a result of overdrinking. The sons, after serving for a time as clerks in town stores, took to the road as itinerant peddlers. After they had traveled together for many years, the partnership was mutually dissolved during an argument over the division of profits. The two parted very bitterly.

After the partnership was broken, Tikhon took over a posting-station a few miles from Durnovka, the little village where his ancestors had lived for many generations. Along with the station he operated a liquor dispensary and general mercantile establishment. Tikhon, determined to become a man of some consequence, began to build up his fortune when he was already in his forties. His plan was to follow the tax collectors and buy land at forced sales, and he paid the lowest possible prices for what he purchased.

Tikhon's private life was anything but rich. He lived with his cook, a dumb woman, who became the mother of his child. The child was accidentally smothered, however, and soon afterward Tikhon sent the woman away and married a waiting-woman to a noblewoman, by whom he tried to have children. His efforts were fruitless, however, for the children were always born ahead of their time and dead. As if to make up, temporarily at least, for his wife's failure to present him with children, fate gave Tikhon the opportunity of finishing off, economically speaking, the last member of the family that had held his own ancestors in serfdom through previous centuries.

Life was not easy for Tikhon. A government order closed all the dram shops, including his, and made liquor a state monopoly. Tikhon also continued to be disturbed over the fact that he had no children; he felt that it indicated a failure in life.

The summer following the government order closing his liquor business proved to be a bad one. There was no rain and a great deal of heat, and so the grain harvest on his lands was only a fraction of what it should have been. During that fall Tikhon went to a fair to do some horse trading; while he was there, he became disgusted with himself and with life in general, for life seemed to him suddenly to have no point to it. He began to take to drink, downing immense quantities of vodka, although not enough to interfere with the conduct of his business.

Tikhon's life was little affected by the war with Japan that broke out soon afterward; he was more affected by persistent rumors of an attempt at a socialist revolution in the Russian legislative body. When he learned that the great landowners, those who owned more than a thousand acres of ground, were likely to have their estates taken from them for redistribution, he even began to agitate a little for the new laws. But he soon changed his mind when he discovered that the peasants on his own land were plotting against him. One Sunday he heard that they were meeting at Durnovka to rise in rebellion against him. He immediately drove over to the village, but the peasants, refusing to listen to him, drove him away with force. But the uprising was short-lived, and within a few days the peasants were back to deal with him again. He no longer trusted them, however, and he thought of them as little better than treacherous animals.

One of the workers on Tikhon's land was a young peasant named Rodka, married to a young girl of some beauty who was always called the Bride. The girl was a source of annoyance to Tikhon because she aroused him sensually. On several occasions she resisted his unwelcome attentions, but finally he had his way with her. The Bride did not complain; she simply endured, much as she endured the terrible beatings that her husband administered to her with a knout. The beatings made Tikhon afraid of Rodka, and so he plotted to do away with the man. Such scheming proved unnecessary, however, for the Bride herself poisoned her husband. Tikhon, at least, was sure that she had poisoned her husband, even though no one else thought so.

Chance brought to Tikhon's perusal a volume of poems written by his brother Kuzma. Stirred by the knowledge that his brother was still alive and also an author, Tikhon wrote a letter telling Kuzma that it was high time they buried past differences and became friends again. Kuzma went to Durnovka, and the two became, at least on the surface, friendly. Tikhon offered his brother the overseership of the estate at Durnovka, and Kuzma accepted because he had no other prospects for making a living.

Kuzma Krasoff had done nothing with his life. Following the dissolution of the partnership with Tikhon years before, he had worked here and there, as a drover, a teamster, a general worker. Then he had fallen in love with a woman at Voronezh and had lived with her for ten years, until she died. In that decade he busied himself by trading in grain and horses and by writing occasionally for the local newspaper. All his life he had wanted to become a writer. He had never been educated, except for short periods of instruction at the hands of a shoemaker out of work and from books he had borrowed occasionally. He considered his life a complete waste, for he had never been able to settle down to writing seriously.

In his maturity Kuzma blamed all his troubles, and the troubles of Russians in general, on a lack of education. Education, he believed, was the answer to every problem confronting him and his fellow-men, and he claimed that the Russians, whom he regarded as little better than barbarians with a wide streak of hatred in their makeup, would have been better folk if they had been educated.

Kuzma's life as bailiff on his brother's estate was not a happy one. He felt that the position was a last resort, and he disliked the people with whom he had to deal, including Tikhon. He was also perturbed by the Bride, who had been sent by Tikhon to cook and keep house for him. She did not arouse him as she had Tikhon, but Kuzma was bothered by her presence, and he felt extremely sorry for her because, a few years before, a group of men had raped her. The incident, Kuzma felt, lingered like a cloud over her existence. When at last he spoke to Tikhon about the matter, Tikhon, supposing that Kuzma had been sampling the same favors that the owner had enjoyed in the past, laughed at his brother's scruples. He did arrange to marry off the woman, however, and the Bride became the wife of a peasant on the estate. On the wedding day only Kuzma realized that the prospect of a husband was but a makeshift in the Bride's mind, and that she, like himself, would never really be happy.

GINEVRA FANSHAWE, a schoolgirl

MONSIEUR PAUL EMANUEL, a teacher of literature

MADAME BECK, mistress of a girls' school

Critique:

In spite of its apparent flaws, Villette remains a superior novel, for the sure hand of Charlotte Brontë overcame most of the weaknesses of her story. One of the most obvious faults is the flat characterization of Dr. John Bretton, and the novel itself is broken in construction when the doctor is replaced in the leading role by Monsieur Paul Emanuel. Typical of the period is the repetition of coincidental meetings between characters who have had previous relationship. Lucy meets Dr. John Bretton on the streets of Villette before she comes to know him as the physician of Madame Beck's establishment, and she meets the priest in a church before she finds him in the Walravens home. It is enough that John Bretton and Lucy are brought together again, but that Polly Home should also arrive strains at credibility. The narrative proper shows that Charlotte Brontë had in this novel finally mastered her autobiographical material; there is a quality of artistic strength here, and more profound character portrayal, than in the ingenuous but perennially popular Jane Eyre.

The Story:

When Lucy Snowe was a young girl, she went to visit her godmother, Mrs. Bretton, about twice each year. It was a warm, active household, and Lucy loved Mrs. Bretton.

During one of her visits, a small girl, whose widowed father was leaving England for a sojourn on the continent, came to stay with the Brettons. The girl, Polly Home, developed a strange and tender fondness for Mrs. Bretton's son Graham, who was a kind and compassionate boy. Mature and worldly for her years, Polly exhibited an almost maternal attachment toward Graham. Since Lucy shared a room with the young visitor, she became the recipient of the child's confidence. Although Polly's father had originally intended to deposit his daughter at Mrs. Bretton's home for an extended stay, he became lonely for her and returned to take his daughter back to Europe with him.

Lucy's visits with the Brettons came to an end when they lost their property and moved away. After that Lucy lost track of her godmother.

As a grown woman Lucy earned her living by acting as a companion to elderly women. Tiring of her humdrum existence, she went to France. There an unusual chain of circumstances led her to the city of Villette and to a boarding school run by Madame Beck and her kinsman, Monsieur Paul Emanuel. Lucy's calm disposition, ready wit, firm character, and advanced intellect soon led to her appointment as instructress of English.

Attending the school was Ginevra Fanshawe, a pretty but flighty and selfish girl whose relations with Lucy took the form of a scornful friendship. Madame Beck was a clever schoolmistress. She conducted her pension by a system of spying which included occasional furtive searches among the personal possessions of others and also a constant stealthy watching from her window. In spite of her behavior, Lucy felt a firm respect for Madame Beck. Her system was steady and unflagging. Monsieur Paul was a voluble and brilliant instructor. He seemed always to be at Lucy's elbow admonishing her, tantalizing her intellect, attempting to lead her. Often Lucy attributed the peculiar notions of the pair to their Catholicism, which Lucy abhorred.

Dr. John was a general favorite at the institute; he was a handsome, generous young practitioner who attended the children of Madame Beck's school. Lucy, although she did not betray her knowledge, recognized him as the John Graham Bretton whom she had known years before.

In her characteristically scornful and triumphant manner toward Lucy, Ginevra Fanshawe confided that she had a pair of ardent suitors. One, whom she called Isidore, was madly in love with her; the other was Colonel de Hamal, whom Ginevra herself preferred.

One night, in the garden, Lucy found a letter intended for someone in the school. Dr. John appeared in time to assist Lucy in disposing of the missive before Madame Beck, spying, could interfere. The young doctor knew, apparently, the person for whom the letter was intended. Some time later Lucy learned that Ginevra's Isidore was Dr. John himself. Thus the mystery of the nocturnal letter was solved. De Hamal had sent it and Dr. John was attempting to protect his beloved. In discussing his hopeless passion for Ginevra, Dr. John confessed that he hoped to marry the schoolgirl.

During a vacation Lucy, left alone at the pension, was overcome by depression. She had been haunted in the past by the apparition of a nun, and the reappearance of this specter so aggravated the already turbulent emotions of the young teacher that she fled into the streets of the town. There she wandered, driven to despair by her inner conflicts, until she came to a Catholic church. A strange fascination drove her to confession, but she later regretted her action. While trying to find her way back to the school, she fainted. When she regained consciousness, she found herself in a room that contained familiar furnishings. She was in a Villette chateau occupied by her godmother, Mrs. Bretton, and Graham Bretton. Graham, who was giving Lucy medical attention, was the Dr. John whom Lucy had recognized at the pension. For the first time he recognized her as the young girl who had so often stayed in his home in England.

Lucy became a frequent visitor in the Bretton home, and before long she realized that she was in love with Dr. John. The warm friendship between the two young people was constantly put upon by the ubiquitous Monsieur Paul and his sarcastic raillery.

While at a concert one evening with Dr. John and Mrs. Bretton, Lucy noticed Ginevra Fanshawe in the audience. Ginevra, having located the doctor's party, began to mimic Mrs. Bretton, who was unaware of the young girl. Dr. John was not. At once he sensed the weakness and the selfishness of Ginevra, who could so irreverently make fun of a woman as good as his mother. His infatuation for Ginevra ended in disgust.

Again at a concert with Lucy, Dr. John rescued a young girl named Paulina from a rough crowd of people. Bringing Paulina Bassompierre to his own home, Dr. John discovered that she was in reality Polly Home, who had stayed at the old Bretton house in England. All the old acquaintances were together again.

Repeated meetings between Polly, now called Paulina, and Dr. John fostered the doctor's love for the girl who had loved him since childhood. Lucy, closing her eyes and ears to this grief, believed that Dr. John was lost to her.

Lucy began a new phase in her life at the school. Madame Beck gave her greater freedom in her work, and Monsieur Paul showed a hearty interest in her mind and in her heart. The only flaw remaining in Lucy's tranquillity was the reappearance of the apparition of the nun.

Once Madame Beck sent Lucy on an errand to the home of Madame Walravens. There Lucy was told a touching story about Monsieur Paul. He had loved a girl, Justine Marie, in his youth, but cruel relatives refused his suit and she subsequently died. Filled with remorse, Monsieur Paul undertook to care for Justine Marie's relatives. There survived old Madame Walravens and a priest, the same man to whom Lucy had confessed. The priest, Father Silas, had been Monsieur Paul's tutor; he was anxious to keep Monsieur Paul from coming under the influence of Lucy, a heretic.

Lucy's affection for the truculent professor grew, but suddenly all her hopes toppled about her. Monsieur Paul was leaving France for the West Indies. Madame Beck, always present when Monsieur Paul and Lucy met, kept the distraught teacher from talking to him.

Ginevra Fanshawe eloped with de Hamal. A letter from the runaway girl explained Lucy's ghostly nun. De Hamal had thus attired himself when making nocturnal visits to Ginevra.

But Monsieur Paul refused to abandon Lucy without an explanation of his sudden forced departure. On the eve of his sailing he arranged a meeting with her and explained his recent silence. Surrounded by his possessive relatives, he had occupied his time with secret arrangements to make Lucy mistress of the school. To avoid the temptation of telling Lucy about his plans before they were consummated, he had remained apart from her. Upon his return, in three years, he promised to rid himself of all his encumbrances, so that he would be free to marry Lucy Snowe.

Critique:

This novel, skillfully plotted and impressive in its evocation of the spirit of a region, reflects the violence of the struggle to produce and market the raw material for chocolate. The action covers the early years of cacao production in the State of Bahia, Brazil, a corner of the world that was a late frontier. Like most frontiers, it was a lawless area that attracted people anxious to get rich quickly, people who did not care whether others, or they themselves, lived or died. Bahia was, at the same time, a land where courageous men carved fortunes out of the wilderness and the labor of other men, a place where the strong lived and the weak succumbed. Its history is the Brazilian counterpart of an era in the development of the western United States. Wherever it is found, the frontier is always a violent land.

The Story:

In the minds of most Brazilians the São Jorge dos Ilhéos was a semi-barbarous country ruled by a handful of rich planters who styled themselves colonels. These men had risen, almost without exception, from humble origins by means of courage, bravado, and murder. The two most important planters were Colonel Horacio da Silveira and Colonel Sinhô Badaró. Between their lands lay a large forest, upon which both men had long cast covetous eyes. The forest, actually a jungle, could be cleared to uncover an almost fabulous cacao-growing soil.

Among the strangers who poured into the region in search of wealth at the time were several people who were to range themselves on one side or the other in the coming struggle. Dr. Virgilio Cabral, a cultured and talented lawyer, was to ally himself with da Silveira. With the lawyer came Margot, a beautiful prostitute who had fallen in love with him and become his mistress while he was a student. Another arrival was Captain João Magalhães, a professional gambler and a courageous opportunist who called himself a military engineer. Among his admirers were Juca Badaró, Colonel Badaró's younger brother, and Doña Ana Badaró, the colonel's daughter, who was also the heiress to the Badaró fortunes.

Soon after his arrival Cabral fell in love with Ester, da Silveira's beautiful wife. The woman, who hated her semi-barbarous husband, quickly returned the affection of the more cultured man. When she became his mistress, both knew that they would be killed if the husband found them out. As his ardor for Ester da Silveira increased, the lawyer's affection for his former mistress waned, and soon Margot found herself unwanted by her lover. In retaliation, and because she needed someone to support her, Margot became the mistress of Juca Badaró. Out of spite she also furnished him with scandal about the opposition, gossip which he turned to account in the newspaper which favored the Badarós.

Professionally, as well as amorously, Cabral was a success, for he found an old survey of the contested lands and registered the title in da Silveira's name after he had bribed the registry officials. The Badaró family quickly retaliated by burning the registry office and all the records on file. In addition, the Badarós hired Magalhães to run a survey for them. He made the survey, even though he lacked the proper knowledge to do so. His presence at the Badaró plantation earned him the respect of the Badaró brothers and the love of Doña Ana Badaró. The self-styled captain, always an opportunist, permitted himself to fall in love with the girl and pay court to her.

Because the Badaró family was the more powerful of the two factions, da Silveira went to several small planters and promised to let them divide half of the forest land if they, as a group, would help him hold it against the Badarós. There was bloody fighting on both sides of the forest and within it, for both factions hired many assassins and bodyguards to back up their interests with bullets. The Badarós controlled the local government, and the state government was in opposition to the federal government of Brazil.

Juca Badaró was assassinated by a hired gunman after he had insulted Cabral. Juca had found the lawyer dancing with Margot, at the girl's request, and had insulted the lawyer for daring to do so. On the other side, too, there were disappointments and deaths. Both Cabral and da Silveira were deterred in their plans when the colonel fell ill with a fever. The planter recovered, but his wife, the lawyer's mistress, became ill as a result of nursing her husband. Her death removed one incentive in the efforts of both her husband and her lover, but they stubbornly continued the fight.

As the struggle in the courts and in the fields continued, the Badarós spent more and more money. They not only sold their current crop of cacao pods, but also sold their next year's crop in order to raise funds immediately. Before his assassination Juca Badaró had seen to it that his niece, Doña Ana, was married to the gambler, for he saw in Magalhães an ambitious man willing to fight for money and power. So tempting was the proposal the Badarós made that the captain agreed to take his wife's name, her father insisting that he do so in order to carry on the Badaró line.

At first, by tacit consent, the contending parties did no damage to one another's cacao trees, but as the Badarós became desperate they instructed their desperadoes to burn the cacao groves. Their opponents saw that the matter had to be settled at once, lest both parties be irretrievably ruined and become victims of someone stronger than they. Colonel da Silveira and his henchman, along with their paid gunmen, attacked the Badaró plantation in force and drove off the family, after killing all the men except a handful led by Magalhães.

Da Silveira and his men thought that the women of the Badaró household had been sent away, but the attackers were greeted by gunfire from Doña Ana herself as they entered the house. When she ran out of ammunition, she gave up, expecting to be killed. The attackers let her go, however, because she was a woman.

The Badaró rout was completed by an announcement from the Brazilian capital that the political party favoring da Silveira had come into power and was sending troops and government agents to the district to quiet the violence. The jungle lands were ceded to the da Silveira faction by the government's action. Da Silveira was forced to stand trial for the murder of Juca Badaró, but the trial, having been staged more to clear the colonel than to find him guilty, was a mere formality.

The district quickly settled down after the great feud had ended and the new government had started its operations. But there was to be one more assassination. While going through his dead wife's effects, da Silveira discovered the letters Cabral had written to her. He was horrified and embarrassed to learn of her infidelity, which he had not suspected, and his lawyer's duplicity. After thinking about the matter for some time, he sent a gunman to clear his honor by killing the man who had made him a cuckold.

To symbolize the new peace that had come into the frontier district, the Church made the city of Ilhéos the seat of a newly created diocese and sent a bishop to officiate as its representative there. As if to show the value of the former jungle land, the cacao trees planted there produced a crop in the fourth year, a full twelve months earlier than usual.

THE VIRGINIA COMEDIANS

Type of work: Novel

Author: John Esten Cooke (1830-1886)

Type of plot: Sentimental romance

Time of plot: 1763-1765

Locale: Colonial Virginia

First published: 1854

Principal characters:

CHAMP EFFINGHAM, foppish scion of a wealthy planter

BEATRICE HALLAM, a young actress with whom Effingham falls in love

CLARE LEE, Effingham's cousin and fiancée

CHARLES WATERS, Effingham's rival for Beatrice Hallam

CAPTAIN RALPH WATERS, Charles Waters' brother

JACK HAMILTON, friend of Effingham, his sister's fiancé

Critique:

John Esten Cooke was one of the last of the historical romanticists who followed the footsteps of James Fenimore Cooper. He was also the first of a long line of authors who continue to idealize the pre-Civil War South. Unlike some of the imitators of Cooper, Cooke wrote books which are well grounded in the history of Virginia, especially that of the James River section, in which most of them are laid. While Cooke's novels display a keen sense of the dramatic, his books have too much elegance and too much sentimentality for most modern tastes. This novel survives, however, for its vivid pictures of places and events in the early history of the state.

The Story:

In the spring of 1763, Williamsburg, the Colonial capital of Virginia, was treated to its first professional dramatic presentation by an English company called The Virginia Comedians. The Colony, rich and poor, was highly excited over the event. The day the company was to arrive in Williamsburg, young Champ Effingham, son of a wealthy planter, rode to town for a holiday. Young Effingham, educated at Oxford, had taken up the ways of the London fops while in England. His dress was extraordinary; his manners were artificial.

On the way to Williamsburg he met a beautiful young woman on horseback who asked him the way. When questioned by him, she refused to give her name, stating only that she was unknown to him because she was not a lady. The mystery was solved the next day at the play, when Effingham discovered that the girl was an actress with the traveling company. Despite the fact that he was engaged to marry one of the most beautiful and wealthy of the Virginia girls, Effingham became infatuated with the actress, whose name was Beatrice Hallam. She was the daughter of the manager of the company.

There was scandal in the neighborhood when it became known that Champ Effingham was paying court to the actress. Everyone among the gentry was perturbed, for actresses were considered low in the social scale. When word came to Effingham's father, the old gentleman ordered his son to desist. The son's answer was to leave the house and take up residence at the inn in Williamsburg where the players were lodging. Effingham had little success with Beatrice Hallam, however. She despised him because of his artificial manners and his condescending attitude. She was really in love with a commoner, a young man named Charles Waters, who had rescued her from the James River on a stormy day when she had fallen overboard while boating.

Beatrice's father, on the other hand, wanted his daughter to encourage young Effingham. Mr. Hallam saw in Effingham a chance for his daughter to marry into a wealthy family, thus gaining an honest reputation for herself and a comfortable life for him.

At the opening of the session of the House of Burgesses, the governor gave a ball for the gentry of the colony. When an invitation was sent to Effingham, he resolved to take Beatrice to the ball, but his friends warned him not to do so because of the scandal. Although Beatrice did not want to go with him to the ball, her father finally browbeat her into agreeing. Effingham, daring his friends to prevent his appearance with an actress, vowed to fight duels with all who tried to hinder him or who insulted the girl.

At the ball everything went smoothly, for the Virginians, too well-mannered to make a disturbance over Effingham's actions, were all coolly polite to the actress. Their coolness only made the girl miserable, however, particularly when she knew how she was hurting Clare Lee, to whom Effingham had been engaged.

After the ball Effingham resolved to turn actor and join the company under the direction of Mr. Hallam. The manager was happy to have the young Virginian. In trying to find a costume for himself, Effingham inadvertently uncovered a little girl's dress and a letter, both of which he dropped in Beatrice's room. The dress and letter proved to her that she was not Hallam's daughter, and that her name was really Beatrice Waters. After some investigation, she learned that she was the cousin of the Charles Waters who had rescued her from the river and death by drowning.

Effingham was furious when he discovered the relationship between Beatrice and Charles Waters. Rather than fight a duel with the girl's cousin, he kidnaped her and took her away on his boat. But Charles and a friend followed and boarded Effingham's craft. In the fight to rescue Beatrice, Effingham wounded his rival. Thinking he had killed him, Effingham, in his extremity, went home to his father, who arranged for his son's escape to Europe.

After Effingham left for Europe, Beatrice nursed her cousin and restored him to health. Before long they were married and moved to a home in the uplands of the Piedmont region of Virginia. They left behind Captain Ralph Waters, Charles' brother, who had vowed to fight a duel with Champ Effingham on his brother's behalf. The planters were glad to see Charles Waters leave for another area; he had been heard to speak against the British government and to advocate a revolution.

Two years passed before Champ Effingham returned to Virginia, after learning that his sword thrust had not killed Charles Waters. Young Effingham, thoroughly cured of his infatuation for Beatrice, had also lost his foppishness of dress and manner. Although he returned a changed and acceptable young man, he was given to periods of moodiness, and nothing his family could do restored him to mental health. Then his boyhood friend, Jack Hamilton, secretly engaged to Effingham's sister, resolved to try to restore the young man. He encouraged, even forced Effingham to ride out to hounds and to visit other houses. He brought Captain Ralph Waters and Effingham together and made them friends. Still young Effingham remained moody and gloomy.

At last Hamilton resolved to try the power of jealousy, for he knew that Effingham was still very much in love with Clare Lee, whom he had thrown aside in his infatuation for Beatrice. In addition, Hamilton knew that Clare still loved Effingham and would accept him as her husband, in spite of all that had happened. Hamilton pretended to be in love with Clare; he even talked to Effingham about his suit for her hand. Such talk was too much for Effingham, who stirred himself to threaten Hamilton until he learned that Hamilton was really engaged to his sister. His sister and Hamilton finally persuaded him to go see Clare, who readily accepted his suit and promised to become Mrs. Champ Effingham.

Happiness reigned in the Colony. Hamilton and Effingham's sister were married a few days after the wedding of Effingham and Clare. Captain Ralph Waters and Clare's sister were also married. The marriages seemed to mark the end of an era, however, for at the time of their celebration news came to the Colony of the passage of the Stamp Act, which everyone hated. Before long many began to speak of revolt against the British Crown. A leader of the agitators was Charles Waters, who returned to Williamsburg after the death of his wife Beatrice.

VIVIAN GREY

Type of work: Novel

Author: Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881)

Type of plot: Political romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: England and Germany

First published: 1826-1827

Principal characters:

VIVIAN GREY, an ambitious young Englishman

SIDNEY LORRAINE, Marquess of Carabas

MRS. FELIX LORRAINE, sister-in-law of Lord Carabas

BARON VON KONIGSTEIN, a German nobleman

LADY MADELEINE TREVOR, Vivian's friend

SYBILLA, an Austrian baroness

ESSPER GEORGE, Vivian's servant

Critique:

That such a story could achieve popularity in its time is neither a discredit to the youth of the author nor to popular taste. In Vivian Grey are reflected characteristics of the romantic concept of the young man struggling with his soul, of the nature of the frightening elements when the utmost in horror and terror are presented. However, there are more than the qualities of an Ann Radcliffe or Monk Lewis in this book, for precepts and truisms of a particular nature are scattered throughout the length of the narrative. Many of these reflect the political life of the times, and all of them reflect the mind of the nineteenth century. As such they deserve the study of any scholar or enthusiast for the activities of men. To read this novel is to understand better Lord Byron, Shelley, or William Godwin, and the intellectual world in which they participated.

The Story:

In school Vivian Grey was more popular with his fellow students than he was with his masters. After his expulsion from a private school conducted by Mr. Dallas, he continued his studies at home. Because he had decided on a career in politics, he flattered a nobleman who occasionally visited his father. This man was the Marquess of Carabas, an office holder who had been turned out because of his blundering incompetence. Vivian, who hoped to obtain the patronage of a noble name and the backing of a privileged aristocracy, flattered the vain, stupid peer who still hoped to play an active part in the world of politics. As a result,

Lord Carabas invited Vivian to visit his country seat, Chateau Desir. There Vivian met the fashionable Mrs. Felix Lorraine, his lordship's sister-in-law. During his visit Vivian took advantage of his opportunities by making love to the wives while securing the confidence of the husbands.

At a brilliant dinner Vivian made his entrance late, secured the best seat in the house, and began a discussion of Goethe's Sorrows of Werther before he had been among the company three minutes. As usual, Vivian continued his art of flattering everyone in order to curry favor.

At the first opportunity Vivian planned to bring together a group of gentlemen out of office to form a new political party. As leader of the party Vivian had selected Frederick Cleveland, a former minister of state who, disappointed in public life, had retired to Wales. There Vivian sought him out and won the support of the older, more experienced statesman. His mission successful, Vivian returned to his fashionable friends. He spent a harrowing night with Mrs. Lorraine, who vowed she had seen a ghost and fainted in his arms.

Mrs. Lorraine was no less confusing to Cleveland when he met her, for to that gentleman's discomfiture she insisted on falling in love with him.

Before long, because of Vivian's unscrupulous conduct, his new-found friends deserted him and his political ambitions were terminated by Lord Carabas, who had learned that Vivian had used the old nobleman as a pawn in the political game he was playing with names of rank and fortune.

At the same time Vivian announced to Mrs. Lorraine that he had purposely kept Cleveland from liking her by interfering with her mail. In his arrogance Vivian insulted Cleveland in his London club, and Cleveland challenged him to a duel. Vivian killed Cleveland.

When Vivian had recovered from a fever brought on by excitement, he left

England and made his home in Germany. There he took a course of studies at Heidelberg, where he met Baron von Konigstein. Vivian and the clever, worldly baron became close friends. At a fair in Frankfort they were entertained by a conjurer who called himself Essper George. George attached himself to Vivian as his valet.

Shortly thereafter, while vacationing in Ems, Vivian met Lady Madeleine Trevor, who knew Vivian's father. She was accompanied by her brother, Mr. St. George, and a friend, Violet Fane. Vivian soon became a member of her party on expeditions about the countryside. Lady Madeleine disliked the baron because the German had figured in a scandal over cards which had caused the death of Violet Fane's brother. For her friend's sake, Madeleine was anxious not to renew her own acquaintance with the baron.

One night a card game began at the baron's apartment. St. George was one of the players. Vivian remembered the card game which had ended fatally for Miss Fane's brother. When the game had gone long enough, Vivian revealed the fact that the cards were marked. The next day Baron von Konigstein left Ems. Vivian had learned of the marked cards from Essper George, who had seen the pack in the possession of the baron's servant.

A week after the episode of the baron two young men, formerly Vivian's fellow students, made their appearance and joined Lady Madeleine's party. The pleasures of the company were short-lived, however. Miss Fane, who was in delicate health, overexerted herself and had an attack from which she never recovered. She died in Vivian's arms and he was overcome by grief.

Vivian and his servant, Essper George set out across Germany toward Vienna. One night Vivian had a narrow escape from some Germans engaged in a great drinking spree. Essper George saved him from their drunken wrath.

Vivian was a guest for a time at the home of Mr. Beckendorff, an odd recluse. There he stayed until Mr. Beckendorff objected to the presence of Essper George. Another guest, the Prince of Little Lilliput, was permitted to remain. Vivian, who had been the friend of the prince and who on one occasion had even saved the prince's life, was ready to take his departure because he realized that he was becoming involved in secret political upheavals. He admired Mr. Beckendorff, who seemed to be successfully following the same policies which had ruined Vivian in London.

News came that Beckendorff had become prime minister of the Duchy of Reisenberg and that the prince was to be rewarded by a high position of state. Vivian spent some time at the court with the prince. At brilliant balls and on all public occasions Vivian observed closely but with great detachment the machinations of court intrigue. He fell in love with Sybilla, a young baroness, much to the dismay of Mr. Beckendorff, who planned to kill Vivian. His life was spared, however, on the condition that he leave the duchy at once. Vivian now learned that the baroness was in reality an Austrian archduchess whose marriage with the deformed, half-witted crown prince had been arranged as a matter of state. This final revelation into the nature of power politics sickened Vivian thoroughly. He continued on his way to Vienna.

When his carriage broke down, he was invited to stay with the lord of the village, who was soon to celebrate his daughter's marriage. Vivian was amazed to discover that the bridegroom was his former friend, Baron von Konigstein.

Leaving the carnival which followed the wedding celebration, Vivian and Essper George were not far from the village when a terrible storm began. Its fury smashed against the unprotected hamlet and a mountain river overflowed its banks, cutting away the hillside, destroying the village, drowning its inhabitants. Essper George was killed. Vivian, his horse dying under him, was flung to the earth. It was as if this upheaval of the elements matched the tumult of Vivian's own nature. He had yet to learn that the delusions and desires of youth give way to the disappointments of manhood on the road by which man travels toward old age.

WALDEN

Type of work: Essays

HENRY DAVID THOREAU, author, and a student of nature and man

Critique:

Walden, Or, Life in the Woods is like its author, Henry David Thoreau, in that both are unique in the annals of American literature. Thoreau went to live at Walden Pond because he wanted to think and write a book. Walden is that book, and Thoreau's thoughts and life while writing it are part and parcel of the volume. If one must categorize the book, which contains a range of interests as wide as those found in many volumes by other writers, it can probably best be pigeonholed as what Ralph Waldo Emerson called "Man Thinking." The incidents of his daily life at the pond, his likes and dislikes, his intellectual and physical activities—all these have been utilized by Thoreau as starting points for solid discussions on the meanings of life and the universe in which we find ourselves. Only to the casual reader does the book seem a loosely knit work. To the careful reader the book is obviously bound together by that most complex of organizations, the human mind working consciously to discover the hidden meanings of man's existence. No more original book has been produced in the Western Hemisphere, and no summary can adequately convey Thoreau's reflective wisdom or the beauty of his style.

The Story:

Early in the summer of 1845, Henry David Thoreau left his family home in the village of Concord, Massachusetts, to live for two years by himself in a rude house that he had constructed beside Walden Pond, in a far corner of Concord township. While there he wrote in his journal about many of the things he did and thought. He was not the owner of the land on which he settled, but had received the owner's permission to build his house and to live there. His objective was really to live simply and think and write; in addition, he proved to himself that the necessities of food, clothing, shelter, and fuel could be rather simply obtained for a man who desired only what he needed.

As early as March, 1845, Thoreau went out to Walden Pond and cut the timber he needed for the framework of his house, doing all the labor himself. When that was done and the framing in place, Thoreau bought a shanty from an Irish railroad worker. He then tore down the shanty and used the boards for the sidings of the house, even making use of many of the nails already in the boards. By July, then, the house was ready for his occupancy. Before the advent of cold weather the following fall, Thoreau also built himself a fireplace and a chimney for cooking and heating purposes. He also lathed and plastered the interior of the one-room house, in order that it would be warm and comfortable during the cold New England winter.

Having done all the work himself, and having used native materials wherever possible, he had built the house for the absurdly low cost of twenty-eight dollars. In addition to providing himself with a place to live, Thoreau believed he had taught himself a great lesson in the art of living. He was also vastly pleased that he had provided himself with a place to live for less than a year's lodging had cost him as a student at Harvard College.

In order to get the money needed to build the house, Thoreau had planted about two and a half acres of beans, peas, potatoes, corn, and turnips, which he sold at harvest time. The land on which they were grown was lent by a neighbor who believed, along with everyone else, that the land was good for nothing. In addition to selling enough produce to pay his building expenses, Thoreau had enough yield left from his gardening to provide himself with food. But he did not spend all his time working on the house or in the garden. One of his purposes in living at Walden Pond was to live so simply that he might have plenty of time to think, to write, and to observe nature; and so he spent only as much time in other labors as he had to. He had little respect for possessions and material things. He believed, for instance, that most men were really possessed by their belongings, and that such a literary work as the Bhagavad-Gita was worth more than all the towers and temples of the Orient.

Thoreau was quite proud of how little money he needed to live comfortably while at Walden Pond. The first eight months he was there he spent only slightly more than a dollar a month for food. In addition to some twenty-odd dollars he received for vegetables he raised, his income, within which he lived, was slightly more than thirteen dollars. His food consisted almost entirely of rye and Indian meal bread, potatoes, rice, a little salt pork, molasses, and salt. His drink was water. Seldom did he eat large portions of meat, and he never hunted. His interest in the animals that lived in the woods and fields near Walden Pond was the interest of a naturalist. Although he spent some time fishing, he felt that the time he had was too valuable to spend in catching fish to feed himself.

For the small amounts of cash he needed, Thoreau worked with his hands at many occupations, working only so long as was necessary to provide himself with the money his meager wants required. He kept as much time as possible free for thinking and studying. His study consisted more of man and nature than of books, although he kept a few well-selected volumes about him at all times.

While at Walden Pond, summer and winter, Thoreau lived independent of time: he refused to acknowledge days of the week or month. When he wished to spend some time observing certain birds or animals, or even the progress of the weather, he felt free to do so. About the only thing to remind him that men were rushing pell-mell to keep a schedule was the whistle of the Fitchburg Railway trains, which passed within a mile or so of his dwelling. Not that he disliked the railroad; he thought it, in fact, a marvel of man's ingenuity, and he was fascinated by the cargoes which the trains carried from place to place. But he was glad that he was not chained to the commerce those cargoes represented. As much as he sometimes enjoyed the sound of the train, he enjoyed far more the sounds of the birds and animals, most of which he knew, not only as a country dweller knows them, but as the naturalist knows them as well. The loons, the owls, the squirrels, the various kinds of fish in Walden Pond, the migratory birds, all of these were part of his conscious existence and environment.

People often dropped in to visit with Thoreau, who frankly confessed that he did not consider people very important. He failed, in fact, to tell who his most frequent visitors were. He preferred only one visitor, and that a thinking one, at a time. Whenever he had more visitors than could be accommodated by his small house and its three chairs, he took them into his larger drawing-room, the pine wood which lay about his home. From what he wrote about his treatment of all but a very few of the people who came to visit him, it is very probable that he was a crusty kind of host, one who, if he had nothing better to do, was willing to talk, but who usually had more to occupy him than ordinary conversation.

During the winter months Thoreau continued to live comfortably at Walden Pond, though his activities changed. He spent more time at the pond itself, making a survey of its bottom, studying the ice conditions, and observing the animal life which centered about the pond, which had some open water throughout the year.

After two years of life at Walden, Thoreau left the pond. He felt no regret for having stayed there or for leaving; his attitude was that he had many lives to live and that he had finished with living at the pond. He had learned many lessons there, had had time to think and study, and had proved what he had set out to prove twenty-six months before, that living could be extremely simple and yet fulfill the individual.

Critique:

Wallenstein is actually a dramatic series, composed of a one-act prelude, Wallenstein's Camp, and two full-length plays, The Piccolomini and The Death of Wallenstein. The prelude, relatively unimportant, merely shows the scene of the army camp and indicates the temper of the period and the attitude of the army toward its commander. Schiller is far less known for his historical plays than he is for his lyrical dramas. Yet Samuel Taylor Coleridge, who translated Schiller's works in the early nineteenth century, pointed out that the history plays form a vital part of his work; Coleridge further suggested a parallel between the historical drama of Shakespeare—Henry VI and Richard II—and this dramatic trilogy by the German playwright.

The Story:

Wallenstein, Duke of Friedland, had once been dismissed by the Emperor Ferdinand from his service, but during the Thirty Years' War, in which the countries of central Europe battled to prevent their annihilation by the forces of the Swedish Gustavus Adolphus, the emperor had recalled Wallenstein and given him extraordinary powers, to build up an army that could drive the Swedes out of central Europe. The army had been raised, but its leaders and its rank and file felt that they owed allegiance to their commander, rather than the emperor whom Wallenstein and they served.

As time passed, Wallenstein's army won many victories and the situation in central Europe became less tense. The threat to his dominions having decreased, the emperor wished to curtail Wallenstein's powers, lest the conquering hero should attempt to dictate to the crown. In those days of suspicion, it was difficult to separate cause from effect. Wallenstein, fearing for his powers and becoming suspicious of the emperor and his government, wavered on the verge of declaring himself for the Swedes. At the same time the emperor, afraid of Wallenstein, made arrangements to have the commander removed from his post. The court reflected the attitude of its ruler, and Wallenstein thought more and more of turning against his monarch.

The emperor finally sent a war commissioner, Von Questenberg, to Wallenstein's camp. The commissioner found the army so sensitive to its leader's wishes that the soldiers were ready to follow him if he were to turn traitor. The commissioner told his fears to Lieutenant General Piccolomini and gave the general the emperor's secret commission to take over the armies and to arrest Wallenstein. Wallenstein, not suspecting what had happened, believed that General Piccolomini was his trusted friend and brother officer. He did not realize that General Piccolomini was more loyal to his monarch than to his military commander.

General Piccolomini wished to have the help of his son, Colonel Max Piccolomini, in his plans, but the son, who had grown up under Wallenstein's tutelage, refused to believe that Wallenstein could ever be anything but virtuous. In addition, Max Piccolomini was in love with Thekla, Wallenstein's daughter, and had high hopes that the great general-duke would permit them to marry.

Young Piccolomini did not know that Wallenstein, fired with ambition and filled with suspicion of the Emperor Ferdinand, was actually plotting to go over to the Swedes with his army in return for the kingship of Hungary. Wallenstein saw in his daughter a future queen, not the wife of a colonel.

Worried by the arrival of Von Questenberg, Wallenstein gave one of his trusted henchmen the task of seeing that all his great leaders signed a document containing a vow to follow him wherever he might lead, even if he led them away from the emperor. The henchman planned a great banquet to accomplish the deed. Before the banquet he showed the officers a document which he would not let them sign. After the banquet, when the men were drunk, another document containing a pledge of loyalty to Wallenstein was substituted. The leaders all signed, except for Max Piccolomini, who was sober and realized that he could not take a vow against the emperor without forfeiting his honor.

Wallenstein believed that the leaders would be compelled to follow him after signing the document, a paper which would compromise them in the emperor's eyes, regardless of how the signatures were obtained.

General Piccolomini signed the document, although he knew what he was doing. He wished to let Wallenstein proceed far enough to expose his traitorous hand. General Piccolomini knew it would be easier to turn the army away from Wallenstein if he were to reveal himself as a traitor.

A crisis arose when Wallenstein received orders to send a large part of his army to a distant point under the command of another leader. The same messenger also brought news that an army from Spain, not under Wallenstein's command, was due to arrive in a matter of days. Seeing his ambitions threatened, Wallenstein refused to break up his army and immediately pushed his negotiations with the Swedes in the hope that he could complete his arrangements within a few hours.

While Wallenstein prepared to move his army, General Piccolomini set his own plan in motion. First he went to all the officers and convinced them, with the exception of the colonels of two regiments, one of them his own son, that Wallenstein was ambitious and a traitor. The commanders agreed to move their troops and, under General Piccolomini, remain loyal to the emperor.

Meanwhile the Swedes, through their envoy, were making inordinate demands upon Wallenstein. Among other things they wished to have control of Prague and the fortress at Egra, to insure that Wallenstein would not turn traitor to them. At first Wallenstein refused to turn over the fortifications, but at last he agreed. Shortly afterward his brother-in-law, Count Terzky, informed him that various regiments had marched away. Wallenstein realized what had happened when the count told him about General Piccolomini's negotiations with Von Questenberg and the emperor's commission authorizing General Piccolomini to relieve Wallenstein of his command.

Although his grand design was collapsing, Wallenstein resolved to go ahead with his plan to join the Swedes. He was still busy with his preparations when his daughter came to him with Colonel Max Piccolomini, who was still loyal to his commander. The couple asked to be allowed to marry, but Wallenstein refused. During the interview Max Piccolomini realized Wallenstein's ambitions for himself and his daughter, including the duke's intent to turn traitor. The young officer then decided to join his father in the plan to arrest Wallenstein. When Wallenstein tried to keep Colonel Piccolomini prisoner, his regiment rescued him from Wallenstein's soldiers.

Wallenstein fled with his few remaining troops and his family to Egra, where he had planned to meet the Swedish forces. With him was Colonel Butler, an Irish soldier of fortune. Because Wallenstein had kept the emperor from making Butler a count, the Irish adventurer took his revenge by contriving Wallenstein's murder at Egra. Word also came to Egra, shortly before Wallenstein's assassination, that Max Piccolomini had met his death in a wild attack on the Swedish forces. Thekla fled from Egra to mourn at her dead lover's bier.

General Piccolomini, arriving at Egra within a matter of minutes after Wallenstein's death, was horrified to learn that the duke was dead. Butler, confused by the turn of events, fled to the emperor to explain his actions. After his departure a messenger arrived to inform General Piccolomini that the emperor had elevated him to the rank of prince.

Critique:

The Waves owes nothing whatever to the traditional form of the novel. In this book Virginia Woolf was attempting to give to fiction the subtle insights and revealing moments of perception which at one time were the function of poetry only. Her method is arbitrary and stylized. In a series of interlocking dramatic monologues six characters reveal the hidden essence of being at successive stages of their lives. The action, if anything so fleeting and inward can be called action, is a record of time passing as the six characters trace the course of their memories and sensations from childhood to old age and death. There is nothing irrelevant here; everything is observation, sensation, and naked intuition. Mrs. Woolf looked at life with a poet's vision, and in this novel she went even beyond Joyce in her use of symbols to make objects in the external world correspond to inner reality. Each section of her story is prefaced by a descriptive passage in which the movements of sun and waves through a single day stand for time and eternity. Uniting her people is the character of Percival, viewed only through their eyes, symbol of the natural man and also of the emotional certainty which all seek in life. At the end Bernard sums up the experiences of the group and sees in their lives man's challenge to death, the archfoeman. A novel daring in imagination and technique, The Waves marks the extreme of Virginia Woolf's experimental method.

The Story:

The waves rolled shoreward and at daybreak the children awoke. Watching the sunrise, Bernard, maker of phrases, seeker of causes, saw a loop of light—he would always think of it as a ring, the circle of experience giving life pattern and meaning. Neville, shy, passionate, imagined a globe dangling against the flank of day. Susan, lover of fields and seasons, saw a slab of yellow, the crusted loaf, the buttered slice, of tea time in the country. Rhoda, awkward, timid, heard wild cries of startled birds. Jinny, sensuous, pleasure-loving, saw a tassel of gold and crimson. Louis, of a race that had seen women carry red pitchers to the Nile, heard a chained beast stamping on the sands.

While the others played, Louis hid among the currants. Jinny, finding him there and pitying his loneliness, kissed him. Susan, suddenly jealous, ran away, and Bernard followed to comfort her. They walked across fields to Elvedon, where they saw a woman writing at a window. Later, in the schoolroom, Louis refused to recite because he was ashamed of his Australian accent. Rhoda, unable to do her sums, had to stay in. Louis pitied her, for she was the one he did not fear.

The day brightened. Bernard, older now, yawned through the headmaster's speech in chapel. Neville leaned sideways to watch Percival, who sat flicking the back of his neck. A glance, a gesture, Neville realized, and one could fall in love forever. Louis, liking order, sat quietly. As long as the head talked, Louis forgot snickers at his accent, his memories of kisses underneath a hedge. Susan, Jinny, and Rhoda were in a school where they sat primly under a portrait of Queen Alexandra. Susan thought of hay waving in the meadows at home. Jinny pictured a gold and crimson party dress. Rhoda dreamed of picking flowers and offering them to someone whose face she never saw.

So time passed and the last day of the term arrived. Louis went to work in London after his father, a Brisbane banker, failed. Sometimes, in his attic room, he heard the great beast stamping in the dark, but now the noise was that of city crowds and traffic. At Cambridge, Neville read Catullus and waited with uneasy eagerness for Percival's smile or nod. Bernard was Byron's young man one day, Shelley's or Dostoevski's the next. One day Neville brought him a poem. Reading it, Bernard felt that Neville would succeed while he would fail. Neville was one person in love with one person, Percival. Bernard in his phrase-making was many people, a plumber, a horse-breeder, an old woman in the street, as well as Byron's or Dostoevski's man. Susan, in Switzerland, dreamed of newborn lambs in baskets, of marsh mist and autumn rains, of the lover who would walk with her beside dusty hollyhocks. At a ball in London, Jinny, dancing, felt as if her body glowed with inward fire. Rhoda, at the same ball, sat and stared across the rooftops.

They all loved Percival, and so before he left for India they met at a dinner party in London to bid him goodbye. Bernard, not knowing that Susan had loved him, was already engaged. Louis was learning to cover his shyness with brisk assurance; the poet had become a businessman. Rhoda was frightened by life. Waiters and diners looked up when Jinny entered, lovely, poised. Susan came dowdily, hating London. Neville, loving Percival in secret, dreaded the moment of parting that would carry him away. Here, thought Bernard, was the circle he had seen long ago. Youth was friendship and a stirring in the blood, like the notes of Percival's wild hunting-song.

The sun passed the zenith and shadows lengthened. When word came that Percival had been killed in India, Neville felt as if that doom had been his own. But he would go on, a famous poet and scholar after a time, but always as well a lonely man waiting in his rooms for the footstep on the stair of this young man or that whom he loved in place of Percival. Bernard was married then; his son had been born. He thought of Susan, whom Percival had loved. Rhoda also thought of Susan, engaged to her farmer in the country. She remembered the dream in which she had offered flowers to a man whose face had been hidden from her, and she knew at last that the man had been Percival.

Shadows grew longer over country and town. Louis, a successful businessman and wealthy, planned a place in Surrey with greenhouses and rare gardens. But he still kept his attic room where Rhoda often came; they had become lovers. Susan walked in the fields with her children or sat sewing by the firelight in a quiet room. Jinny groomed a body shaped for gayety and pleasure. Neville measured time by the hours he spent waiting for the footstep on the stair, the young face at the door. Bernard tried to snare in phrases the old man on the train, the lovers in the park. The only realities, he thought, were in common things. He realized that he had lost friends by death--Percival was one--and others because he had not wished to cross the street. After Louis and Rhoda parted, his new mistress was a vulgar cockney actress. Rhoda, always in flight, went to Spain. Climbing a hill to look across the sea toward Africa, she thought of rest and longed for death.

Slowly the sun sank. At Hampton Court the six friends met again for dinner. They were old now, and each had gone a different way after Percival had died in India years before. Bernard felt that he had failed. He had wrapped himself in phrases; he had sons and daughters, but he had ventured no farther than Rome. He had not become rich, like Louis, or famous, like Neville. Jinny had lived only for pleasure, little enough, as she was learning. After dinner Bernard and Susan walked by the lake. There was little of their true thoughts they could say to each other. But Bernard was still a maker of phrases. Percival, he said, had become like the flower on the table where they ate--six-sided, made from their six lives.

So it seemed to him years later, after Rhoda had jumped to her death and the rest were old. He wondered what the real truth had been--the middle-class respectability of Louis, Rhoda's haunted imagination, Neville's passion for one love, Susan's primitivism, Jinny's sensuous pleasures, his own attempt to catch reality in a phrase. He had been Byron's young man and Dostoevski's, and also the hairy old savage in the blood. Once he had seen a loop of light, a ring. But he had found no pattern and no meaning, only the knowledge that death is the great adversary against whom man rides in the darkness where the waves break on the shore.

Critique:

The Weavers is usually rated the best of Hauptmann's dramatic works. It is almost wholly a socio-economic study in that the characters are types caught in irresistible forces of the social and industrial system under which they live. The dramatic incidents are a microcosm of the much wider industrial revolution, with the unemployment caused in part by the introduction of power looms. In this play no answer to the problem is given; rather, Hauptmann shows us people who react in the only way they can when misery becomes too oppressive.

The Story:

In a large room on the ground floor of Dreissiger's house the weavers were bringing in their finished webs. Pfeifer, manager for Dreissiger, inspected each piece and assessed its value. He had a sharp eye for flaws and the amounts he named were low. From the complaints aired, the weavers were near starvation. In general, however, the weavers were a docile, tractable lot.

Old Baumert came in carrying a bundle wrapped in cloth. It was the body of his pet dog. Baumert had not had the heart to kill the animal himself, but he had had it butchered to provide meat for his family. The dog was only a skinny, half-grown pup, not large enough to feed his destitute family.

Most of the weavers were squat and sickly, but Becker was a young, impudent giant. When he heard the price Pfeifer would allow for his web, he refused on the ground that such an amount was alms, not wages. In fury Pfeifer called for Dreissiger, who upheld his manager. A diversion was created when a child fainted. Dreissiger was angry because the child's parents had sent him so far with the heavy web; he ignored the crowd's explanation that the child was starving.

Because of the tension in the room, Dreissiger harangued the weavers. In his view he provided work; if the weavers did not want to do his work, they could go elsewhere. Then he made a portentous announcement: he was engaging two hundred more weavers, and the new rates of pay would be lower.

The Baumerts occupied one room in the house of William Ansorte, a former weaver. Old Baumert was too feeble to do much and his wife was crippled. One daughter, Emma, was twenty-two. She had a boy of four fathered by a consumptive weaver who had died before they could be married. Bertha, the second daughter, was a pallid girl of fifteen. The two sisters spent long hours at the loom. Their landlord, Ansorte, was too old to weave any more; he led a miserable existence mending baskets.

When old Baumert came in, he brought with him Moritz Jaeger, a returned soldier. Jaeger was a fine strapping youth with good clothes and money in his pockets, the center of interest as he told of his successes in the army. He kindly provided a bottle of brandy which cheered the family immensely.

Bertha cooked their dog meat in the oven. With meat and brandy they would have a feast. Ansorte joined them as the smell of cooking meat spread through the house. To his intense disgust, Baumert's stomach could not hold the meal; two years had passed since he had tasted meat.

Jaeger was appalled at the misery of the weavers. Able to read, he was pessimistic about any relief for the workers. The papers had recently published the report of the Berlin inspector who had been sent to investigate their living conditions. The bureaucrat had asserted solemnly that there was no one in want among them. Jaeger had found a different answer.

He began to read to them a marching song that told the woes of the weavers. Inflammatory in tone, it named Dreissiger as an oppressive villain. As he read the stanzas, Ansorte and Baumert caught some of its revolutionary spirit, and they were stirred to fight for their rights.

In the common room of the public house, Welzel, the publican, served a commercial traveler. The salesman, a competent city man, was flirting with Anna, Welzel's red-haired daughter. Wiegand, a joiner, had that day made a coffin for a dead weaver. The man had died of starvation; he needed only a light coffin. The traveler expressed his surprise that the supposedly destitute weavers should hold such elaborate funerals. Wiegand, who was a cunning man, was of the opinion that the weavers were a wrong-headed lot; no one need be in want if he were enterprising.

When Ansorge and Baumert came in, the talk grew more animated as other weavers aired their wrongs. A peasant happening in told the assembly that the weavers were poor only because they did not know how to do useful work. A forester joined in that opinion. The weavers retorted bitterly that they were forbidden to take even a broken branch from the forests.

After Jaeger and Becker came in at the head of a small group of young men, the talk centered even more strongly on the weavers' woes. The traveler, attempting a pompous remark on the amount of real destitution, was roughly silenced, and Welzel for safety led him into another room. Then Kutsche, the policeman, came to warn the weavers that they must not sing their song any more. But the mob spirit grew; the defiant song rang out.

In Dreissiger's private room, the growing tumult had forced the manufacturer to interrupt his whist game with Pastor Kittelhaus. As Dreissiger came back in, he announced that he had had Becker seized. Weinhold, a tutor in the household, was young enough to feel sympathy for the weavers. When he voiced his opinions, he was summarily discharged. The coachman entered and told them he had the carriage ready, for it looked as if the family might be compelled to flee. The children were already prepared to travel.

The obsequious police superintendent hurried to congratulate Dreissiger on having the ringleader, Becker, apprehended. When five dyers led in the captured Becker, the superintendent began to unbraid the weaver, but Becker, cool and self-possessed, cried shame on the dyers for not joining their fellow workers. When Becker was led off to jail, the mob freed him and manhandled the police.

Pastor Kittelhaus, who had no sympathy for the rioters, attempted to talk to the crowd outside. He was shouted down and roughly treated. The Dreissiger family drove away just as the weavers broke into the house. Thoroughly aroused, the mob sacked the building and broke windows and doors.

Old Hilse, a weaver living in another village, could not believe the news when Hornig the rag dealer told him that the weavers were rioting for more pay. The doctor came to see Hilse's blind wife and verified the news. Hilse, a pious old soldier, was upset that his fellow weavers could forget law and order. His son's wife, Luise, sided with the rioters, but Gottlieb, her husband, believed as his father did. Old Hilse predicted that as soon as the soldiers came the weavers would be a sorry lot.

The ominous marching song came closer as the rioters, led by Jaeger and Becker, shouted for Hilse and Gottlieb to join them. Luise courageously went out with the mob, but the Hilse men stayed at their looms. Soon shots were heard; the soldiers were putting down the riot. When Gottlieb saw his wife standing defiantly in front of the line of bayonets, he could resist no longer, and he dashed out to join the throng.

Old Hilse stubbornly stayed at his loom near a window, where a chance bullet wounded him fatally. Mielchen, Gottlieb's little daughter, called to her grandfather that the soldiers had been driven off and that the mob was entering the house of Dittrich, another manufacturer. Old Hilse made no answer.

WHEN THE MOUNTAIN FELL

Type of work: Novel

Author: Charles-Ferdinand Ramuz (1878- )

Type of plot: Regional romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

PHILOMÈNE MAYE, Thèrese's mother

OLD PLON, a shepherd

MAURICE NENDAZ, a lame villager

Critique:

Every once in a while there is fire, pestilence, or earthquake. Sometimes, too, the mountains let loose an avalanche that wrecks a place, a town, perhaps just a pasture on which are a few cabins, fifteen or twenty men, and a hundred or so cattle. What happened two hundred years ago in Switzerland is the basis of When the Mountain Fell. Since there have been more recent newspaper tales of the same sort of disaster, one can be sure that Ramuz takes as his subject a real force of nature and sets it against the smallness and inadequacy of men in a setting that is majestic and awe-inspiring enough to make us other little men feel intensely the dread those people of Aire felt when the mountain fell. The original French title of this novel is Derborence.

The Story:

It was the evening of the twenty-second of June, about nine o'clock, and Seraphin Carrupt and Antoine Pont were sitting in their little shepherd's cabin at some pasture fields called Derborence. They were pasturing their cattle there for the summer, as was the custom of those people in the towns lower down in the mountains. In the summer the towns were left with women, children, and old men in them, while the able men went up to tend the cattle and goats. In those days Derborence was a lovely valley pasture, but that was before the twenty-second of June.

Antoine had been married only two months before he left Aire to come up to Derborence with Seraphin. He was already becoming bored with the daily milking and cheese-making, already anxious to go back to his wife Thèrese. That night, as they sat together, Seraphin suggested that Antoine go home for a week-end to see that Thèrese was all right. It was a beautifully moonlit night and the air was crackling, so much so that Seraphin said the Devil, up there on the peak called The Devil's Tower, must have told his children to get out the ninepins. What they tried to hit was a spot that hung right over the cabin, and when they missed you could see, particularly on such a bright moonlit night, the balls skidding over into space and falling down. When the two men went to sleep, the crackling had stopped; but they dreamed of strange noises in the night.

The men of nearby Anzeindaz said it all started like a salvo of cannon; then came a blast of wind, and finally a great pale cloud of dust. The noise was terrific. The wind pinned men in their beds, and the cloud obscured everything for a long time. When men dared to go near Derborence, and could see through the cloud, the fine pasture land was gone; everywhere rocks, large at the bottom, smaller at the top, covered the land where cabins and cattle had been.

One man, old Barthelemy, crept out of the cloud. Friends carried him down the mountain on an improvised stretcher, but there was a second beard of pink froth over his own black one before he got down. His chest had been crushed and he died before he reached the town.

All the people in Aire, except Maurice Nendaz, a lame man who walked with a cane, thought a storm had struck, though there was no lightning. Nendaz went up the mountain to investigate and sent back a boy to tell the mayor that all the men and cattle from Aire had been buried under the rocks.

Thérèse had told her mother the night of the twenty-second that she thought she was going to have a baby. Philomène, therefore, tried to keep from her daughter the news of the disaster. How can one do that in a small town with the houses close to each other? And how can a girl believe that a mountain has fallen on her husband?

Men figured that 150,000,000 cubic feet of rock had fallen when The Devil's Tower slipped into Derborence. Scientists of all sorts came to measure, to investigate, to survey. Two months passed.

Only Old Plon, the shepherd, went near Derborence, where his sheep could find grass around the edges if they kept on the move. He knew the Devil had been at work, and he said that at night he had heard those poor fellows imprisoned there, lamenting because they had not been put to rest.

One day a head appeared, though only an eagle would have been able to see it in the midst of that huge pile of rocks. A body followed the head, squirming its way out through cracks in the rocks. The man who appeared, looking like death itself after two months underground, remembered only that he was Antoine. He fought with his memory to find the way down to the village, only to be shot at as an evil spirit when he arrived.

He saw Thérèse in the fields and called to her, but his voice was strange and she, afraid, ran home. When the priest came with a cross and the townspeople could persuade Antoine to come out of hiding, Thérèse, at least, believed he was really her husband and not a spirit.

The mayor and the priest asked him questions, and people came from all over the district to hear, over and over, the story of how he had lived up there with just enough space under a fallen slab, with his mattress, with the new cheeses on the shelf by his bed, and finally the dribble of water that seeped through the rocks; how he had found spaces between the rocks that he investigated day after day, week and week, until, more than seven weeks after he was imprisoned, he had found an opening that finally led to the light overhead.

When Antoine got away from the townspeople and came home, he wanted to go back up the mountain because he was sure Seraphin was waiting to be let out. He slipped out early in the morning before anyone else was up. Thérèse wanted to follow, but she could get only the lame Nendaz to go with her. Even he stayed back when Old Plon warned them not to go on among the spirits. But Thérèse went on, higher and higher on the mountain. Then Nendaz and others who had gathered with him to watch saw two tiny dots start down. Thérèse had defied the mountain to bring Antoine safely home.

WHITE-JACKET

Type of work: Novel

Author: Herman Melville (1819-1891)

Type of plot: Adventure romance

Time of plot: The 1840's

Locale: A vessel of the U.S. Navy

First published: 1850

Principal characters:

WHITE-JACKET, a sailor on board the U.S.S. Neversink

JACK CHASE, captain of the maintop in the ship

CAPTAIN CLARET, commander of the vessel

Critique:

White-Jacket, Melville's fifth book, reflected the experience he had when he returned to America on board the U.S. frigate United States from Honolulu in 1843-44. The loosely-knit narrative was thus formed from experience as well as fiction. The novel gives an astonishing portrait of life in an American naval vessel at the time, astonishing because of the detail and because of the practices then in vogue. Actual purpose of the novel was to help correct some of the vicious practices which Melville had seen at first-hand. Flogging, tyranny of commanders, issuance of spirituous liquors to sailors, and the poor messing facilities of naval vessels of a century ago were all condemned by Melville in vivid terms. Authorities have conceded that Melville's novel did more than any other single source to abolish at least one of those practices, the flogging of enlisted men.

The Story:

White-Jacket, as he was later nicknamed, was a common sailor, a member of the crew of the United States frigate Neversink on a cruise of the Pacific Ocean during the 1840's. After the ship left Callao, Peru, the sailor tried to purchase a heavy jacket, needed protection when the Neversink passed into the colder climate off Cape Horn. Because a heavy jacket was not available from the ship's purser, the vessel having been at sea for over three years, the sailor had to make a canvas jacket for himself.

The jacket was full of pockets and quilted with odds and ends of rags and clothing for warmth. When the maker requested some paint to make it waterproof and darken its color, he was told that no paint was available for the purpose.

As the ship moved southward toward the Antarctic, the sailor gradually came to be called White-Jacket by the crew because of the strange garment he wore. Some of the sailors, superstitious as old wives, disliked him because of the jacket; they said that White-Jacket was too much like a ghost as he went about his duties high in the rigging of the frigate.

The offensiveness of White-Jacket's strange apparel was revealed only a few days after the ship's anchor had been weighed at Callao. White-Jacket was forced to leave the mess group to which he had been assigned, for the sailors told him openly that anyone who wore such a weird garment was unwelcome. That White-Jacket had proved himself a very poor cook during his tour of duty for the group had not helped his cause.

Forced from his original messmates' company, White-Jacket was taken into the mess to which belonged the petty officer of the maintop under whom White-Jacket served. The petty officer was Jack Chase, a gentlemanly Britisher who shared White-Jacket's love of literature. Chase, who had returned to the Neversink after an absence of months, during which he had served as an officer on a Peruvian insurrectionist vessel, was looked up to by the rough sailors and respected by all the officers aboard the ship.

As the Neversink sailed southward along the western coast of South America the general ship's duties continued. White-Jacket and his fellows set sails and took them in, washed down the decks, stood their watches, and prepared for colder weather. To relieve the tedium of the long voyage, Captain Claret gave out word that the men would be permitted to stage a theatrical entertainment. The captain had permitted such entertainments in the earlier stages of the cruise, but he had discontinued them because one of the actors had behaved in an objectionable manner. White-Jacket noted that before the play the captain perused and censored the script. Neither the captain nor the commodore who was aboard the Neversink dignified the men's entertainment by being present.

During the coastal voyage a man fell overboard and was drowned. The incident demonstrated to White-Jacket how risky life aboard a ship was and how quickly a lost man was forgotten.

The Neversink was becalmed in the waters off Cape Horn. After three days of cold and calm the captain gave the unusual order for the crew to "skylark." The men gave themselves over to all kinds of activity and games of a rougher sort, all in an attempt to keep warm and to prevent frozen hands and feet. Shortly thereafter a wind came up. The ship rounded the Cape and began to cruise steadily northward.

One day the lookout sighted a number of casks floating on the ocean. Word was given that they should be picked up, and when they were hauled aboard it was discovered that they contained very fine port wine. The discovery caused great joy among the crew. In the 1840's the navy still clung to the custom of serving spirits to the men twice a day, but the Neversink's steward, for some unaccountable reason, had neglected to replenish the ship's supply of rum during the stop at Callao.

The most significant happenings during the run from Cape Horn northward to Rio de Janeiro, so far as White-Jacket was concerned, were a series of floggings. At that time the American navy still made flogging a punishment for offenses at sea. White-Jacket hated the cruel whippings, which all crew members and officers were forced to watch. White-Jacket reflected that even in Rome no citizen could be flogged as punishment and that the great naval officers of the nineteenth century were opposed to a practice so brutal and unnecessary.

The Neversink finally reached Rio de Janeiro. During many days in port the men were not to be permitted ashore. At last the petty officers appointed Jack Chase, the captain of the maintop, to request shore leave for the men. At first the captain was unwilling to grant leave, but the commodore interceded and gave his approval to sending the men ashore. Once again Chase was the hero of the men aboard the vessel.

One day the Emperor of Brazil was expected to visit the vessel. White-Jacket, amazed at preparations made by men and officers for the royal visit, wondered how men from a democratic nation could so easily fawn upon royalty. He decided the men would have made fewer preparations to receive the President of the United States.

On the voyage northward along the eastern coast of South America one of White-Jacket's shipmates fell ill and died. White-Jacket watched the preparations for burial, including the traditional final stitch of the shroud through the nose, then stood by during the service. That event was as moving to him as an amputation demonstrated by the ship's doctor while the Neversink lay in the harbor at Rio de Janeiro. The operation was performed, White-Jacket believed, because the surgeon wished to show off to colleagues from other vessels anchored there at the same time. Convinced that the operation was unnecessary, White-Jacket was very bitter when the injured man died of shock.

White-Jacket himself had a close escape from death when the ship was off the Virginia capes. Sent aloft to reeve a line through some blocks, he lost his balance and fell from the rigging a hundred feet into the sea. He had to cut away his white jacket in order to keep afloat. He was barely out of his garment when a sailor, mistaking the jacket for a white shark, threw a harpoon into it. White-Jacket, rescued from the sea, was sent aloft ten minutes later to complete his task. White-Jacket was content to close his story of the voyage with the loss of his unlucky garment.

WIELAND

Type of work: Novel

Author: Charles Brockden Brown (1771-1810)

Type of plot: Mystery romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Pennsylvania

First published: 1798

Principal characters:

WIELAND, a madman

CLARA, his sister

CATHARINE PLEYEL, his wife

HENRY PLEYEL, Catharine's brother

CARWIN, a ventriloquist

Critique:

Charles Brockden Brown has been called "The Father of American Literature," and rightly so, for his was the first truly native American literature in the field of the novel. Undoubtedly the best of Brown's works is Wieland, a romantic tragedy in a genre of horror and remorse which Poe was to cultivate later on. Brown was a careless writer, never revising, but submitting manuscripts with mechanical errors as well as cumbersome sentence structures. In spite of his faults, the macabre effects of his writing can still stir readers curious enough to read the now old-fashioned romances of this forerunner of Poe and Melville.

The Story:

In a long letter to a friend, Clara Wieland told the story of the tragedy of her family. Her father had been almost a religious fanatic, a strange man who feared some dreadful punishment because he had not answered a call to the mission field. He became more and more depressed and withdrawn until his life ended in a horrible fashion. One night he visited a temple he had built for solitary meditation. His wife, fearing the appearance and manner of her husband, followed him and saw his clothing suddenly go up in flames. She found him insensible, muttering incoherently about having been struck down by an unseen hand. Soon afterward he died. Within a few months the mother followed her husband to the grave, leaving Clara and her brother orphaned but wealthy. They were happily reared by an aunt who gave them love and comfort and a good education.

One of their companions was Catharine Pleyel, a rich and beautiful girl with whom Wieland fell in love when he reached young manhood. Catherine returned his love, and when Wieland came of age they were married. Wieland took possession of the family house and half of the fortune, Clara the other half of their inheritance. Since she and Catharine and Wieland were beloved friends as well as relatives, Clara took a house only a short distance from her brother and sister-in-law. The three spent much time together. Clara and Catharine were frank and cheerful, but Wieland was more somber and thoughtful in disposition. But he was always considerate of their happiness, and nobly devoted his life to it. His melancholy was not morbid, only sober. The temple in which their father had met his strange fate was used by the three as a setting for long and delightful conversations, although Wieland's talk dwelt too often on death to suit Clara and Catharine.

Their circle was soon augmented by the addition of Catharine's beloved brother Henry, who had been for some time in Europe. His boisterous mirth enlivened the little group. Henry and Wieland found one great difference in their beliefs: Wieland built his life on religious necessity; Henry, on intellectual liberty. But their fondness for each other allowed them to differ without altering their mutual affection.

Wieland's family was enlarged during the next six years by four natural children and a foster child whose mother had died while under his aunt's protection. About that time another strange occurrence took place in the Wieland family. One day Wieland went to the temple to pick up a letter which would settle a minor dispute. Before he reached the temple he was stopped by his wife's voice, telling him that danger lay in his path. Returning quickly to the house, he found his wife there. Clara and Henry verified her statement that she had not left the room. Although the others soon dismissed the incident from their minds, it preyed on the already melancholy Wieland to the exclusion of everything else.

Not long after that incident Henry Pleyel learned that Wieland had inherited some large estates in Europe and he wanted Wieland to go abroad to claim them. Henry would accompany his friend because he had left his heart with a baroness, now widowed and willing to accept his suit. When Wieland seemed reluctant to make the journey, Henry, in an effort to persuade him, asked him one night to go for a walk. Their walk was interrupted by a voice telling them that the baroness was dead. Again the voice was Catharine's, but again Catharine had been nowhere near the men when the voice was heard. More frightening was the verification of the baroness' death given to Henry a few days later. Some dread supernatural power, Wieland believed, had spoken to them.

Shortly after these two mysterious occurrences, a stranger appeared in the neighborhood. He was dressed like a clown or a pathetically humorous beggar, but his voice had the musical ring of an actor. Clara, who saw him before the others knew of his existence, was strangely drawn to him.

She forgot him, however, because of another frightening incident. One night, alone in her room, she heard two voices in the closet planning her murder. One voice advised shooting; the other, choking. She fled to her brother's house and fell at his door in a faint. Wieland and Henry came to her rescue in answer to a summons from an unknown source, a voice calling that a loved one lay dying at the door.

Henry insisted upon occupying a vacant apartment in Clara's home in order to protect her from her unknown enemies. Clara was beset with nightmares, the mystifying voice having warned her of danger from her brother. Soon after the affair of the voices in the closet, she met the stranger she had seen and to whom she had been unaccountably drawn. His name was Carwin, and he had known Henry in Spain. His intelligent conversation and his wide travels making him welcome in the little group, he joined them frequently. When they discussed the supernatural voices they had all heard, Carwin dismissed the voices as fancy or pranks.

Clara, beginning to feel herself in love with Henry, believed that he returned her love but feared to tell her of it because he did not know her feelings. Then he confronted her with the accusation that she was a wanton. He said that he had heard her and a lover, Carwin, talking and that her words made her a sinner and a fallen woman. Henry had also learned that Carwin was wanted for murder, and he heaped abuses on the innocent Clara for consorting with such a man. All her pleas of innocence went unheeded, and she was thrown into despair. Thinking that Carwin had set out to ruin her, she was enraged when she received a note in which he asked for an interview. Reluctantly she agreed to meet him and hear his story. He was to come to her home, but when she arrived there she found only a note warning her of a horrible sight awaiting her. In her room, she found Catharine on the bed. She had been murdered.

Wieland entered her room, his manner strange and exulted, and begged that this sacrifice not be demanded of him. Before he reached Clara, however, others came into the house. From them she learned that her brother's children were also dead, killed by the same hand that had murdered their mother.

Clara was taken by friends to the city. There, after a time, she learned the tragic story. The murderer had been Wieland, his hand guided, he said, by a voice from heaven demanding that he sacrifice his loved ones to God. But he felt no guilt, only glory at having been the instrument through whom God worked. Twice Wieland had broken out of prison, his belief being that he must also kill Clara and Henry. Clara suspected that Carwin had somehow influenced Wieland to kill.

Carwin went to Clara and protested his innocence of the crime. He admitted that his had been the other voices heard. He was a ventriloquist who had used his tricks either to play some prank or to escape detection while prying into other people's affairs. Clara refused to believe him. While they talked, Wieland entered the apartment. Prepared to kill Clara, he had again broken out of prison to fulfill his bloody destiny. But this time Carwin, using his skill to save Clara, called out to Wieland that no voice had told him to kill, that only his own lunatic brain had guided him. At his words Wieland regained his sanity and seemed to understand for the first time what he had done. Picking up a knife, he plunged it into his throat.

Three years passed before Clara knew peace. Her uncle cared for her and arranged a meeting between Carwin and Henry so that Carwin might confess his part in the defamation of Clara's character. Carwin had been jealous and thus tried to destroy Henry's affection for her. Henry learned also that his baroness was not dead; the report had been another of Carwin's tricks. Henry married the baroness and settled down near Boston. Carwin, not a murderer but the victim of a plot, escaped to the country and became a farmer. Henry's wife died soon after their marriage, and he and Clara renewed their love. Their later happiness was marred only by sad and tragic memories.

THE WILD ASS'S SKIN

Type of work: Novel

Author: Honoré de Balzac (1799-1850)

Type of plot: Philosophical allegory

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Paris

First published: 1830

Principal characters:

RAPHAEL DE VALENTIN, the hero

PAULINE, his wife

FOEDORA, a countess loved by Raphael

RASTIGNAC, Raphael's friend

Critique:

This novel, La Peau de Chagrin, is a philosophical allegory, usually placed rather high among Balzac's work; in his own time it was frequently compared with Hamlet and Faust. Today the plot appears thin at times and the characters do not always seem real; but the story does abundantly exemplify a philosophical law. Everything we receive, we must pay for—such is the moral presented. The payment is a kind of nemesis: try as we will we cannot escape a final reckoning. Viewed as an allegory, the book has considerable merit, for the theme is crystal clear. The novel also appears under the title The Magic Skin.

The Story:

In a low quarter of Paris, Raphael de Valentin walked hesitantly into a gaming room. Inside were the usual raffish hangers-on. To them the young man was marked for mischance. Raphael played his last coin on the turn of the wheel, and lost.

Resolved to commit suicide, he wandered to the Seine. For a time he leaned over the parapet of the Pont Royal and looked at the cold water below. Only the thought of the paid rescuers kept him from jumping in. He finally sought shelter in an antique shop, where he posed as a customer. Upstairs the proprietor, an ancient scarecrow, showed him a piece of shagreen upon which were engraved words in Sanskrit telling the power of the skin. If the possessor wished for anything, he would get it; but in return the wisher's life would belong to the talisman, and he would die when the skin, shrinking with each wish, dwindled to nothingness. In spite of the antique dealer's warning, Raphael recklessly took the piece of skin and wished for a great banquet, furnished with much wine, carousing companions, and ladies of light virtue.

As he left the shop, he met his friends, Rastignac and Emile, two penniless adventurers. They had a great scheme in mind for him: he was to be the editor of a new periodical backed by a rich banker. To celebrate the appointment, the banker was giving a banquet in Raphael's honor that very evening. Disquieted only a little by the prompt and complete granting of his wish, Raphael went willingly enough to the banquet.

In the banker's apartment a rich table was laid. After eating and drinking far too much, the company of men withdrew to another room. There a group of joyous ladies waited for them. In his somewhat drunken state, the women all looked pure and beautiful to Raphael. Settling himself with two complaisant entertainers and Emile, Raphael decided to tell his story.

After his mother's death, his rather stern father did his best to train his son for a scholarly career. The boy was destined to be a lawyer, and to that end he read law diligently. Shortly before he was to take a law degree, however, his father died; but, instead of leaving the son well off, the estate amounted to only a few francs. Thinking to achieve a fortune, Raphael decided to shut himself up in a garret and produce works of genius. He found that by living strictly on cold meat, bread, and milk, he would have enough money to see him through.

He found a cheap room under the eaves of a modest house and settled into his laborious routine of writing. Soon he had begun his projects. He spent half of his time writing a comedy, and the rest of his efforts went into the composition of a discourse on the human will. The family from whom he rented his room consisted of a mother, Madame Gaudin, and her young daughter, Pauline. The father, an army captain, had been lost in Siberia; only his wife believed him still alive. Pauline was an attractive child. Raphael gave her piano lessons, and in return Pauline performed small household chores for him.

For a long time Raphael stuck to his spartan schedule, but at last the poor diet and the effort of intense concentration proved too much for him to endure. Going out for a short walk one day, he ran into Rastignac, who teased him about the way he lived. Rastignac had no money and owed many bills, yet he lived a life of luxury. Resourceful at finding jobs, he secured a hack writing commission for Raphael. The advance payment was enough to settle Raphael's bills and leave a little over.

After faithfully paying his account with Pauline's mother, Raphael took his remaining capital to Rastignac, who was to gamble with it. Fortunately, Rastignac won a large sum. Raphael bought new clothes before Rastignac took him to see the Countess Foedora, who entertained lavishly. Since he really was a well-educated man, Raphael was soon a favorite at Foedora's salons, and by hook or crook he managed to keep up appearances so as to stay in her circle of close friends. He even took Foedora driving when he was in funds. Pauline, ever the faithful friend, occasionally gave him small sums to tide him over.

Foedora was a woman of mystery. She was a young widow, wealthy and surrounded by admirers. But some dark secret in her past kept her from marrying again or even taking a lover. Although she looked on many men as her friends, she had no inclination for a serious affair. She finally explained her attitude very clearly to Raphael, who was much cast down.

Determined to win his lady, he crept behind her bed one evening and waited while Foedora made her toilet and went to sleep. From this close observation Raphael romantically expected to learn how to break down her reserve. The effort, however, was all in vain. Convinced at last that he could not win Foedora, Raphael gave up his social life; not even Pauline could console him. Without funds and with no prospects, he began to think of suicide.

As he finished his story, he noticed that his hearers were not seriously interested; even Emile joked about his trials and discomfiture. Soon the whole company lay in drunken sleep. When they all awoke, Raphael was disgusted at the tawdry appearance of his fellow rioters. Going back to the banquet, he told of his piece of skin, and in a spirit of bravado wished for six million francs. Before he left the table a messenger came to announce the death of his mother's brother; the dead man had bequeathed his nephew six million francs.

Even though he was elated by his good fortune, he was disturbed to see that the magic skin was growing smaller.

Riches brought no peace to Raphael. Although he now lived in greatest luxury, he also lived in fear. He constantly had to guard against any desires; even an inadvertent wish shrank the magic skin.

One night at the opera he saw Foedora again. Leaning aside so that he would not be seen, he brushed against his neighbor. As he turned to apologize, he discovered that the woman beside him was Pauline Gaudin. She was now wealthy, for her father had returned with a fortune. The two were married, and for a few weeks Raphael knew a little happiness.

Because the skin continued to shrink steadily, Raphael determined on stern measures. He visited a zoölogist, who informed him that his talisman was a piece of skin from a rare, wild Persian ass. Then he visited a mechanic who tried to stretch the skin in a press, but the press was powerless. Even in a white hot forge the skin remained cool and pliable. A chemist tried immersing the wild ass's skin in hydrofluoric acid, but to no avail; the skin would not stretch.

Since his health was failing fast, Raphael left his bride to seek safety in the mountains. But the change of air did him no good; his condition grew steadily worse. One day a braggart challenged him to a duel. Raphael accepted, knowing bitterly that his unspoken wish would make him the victor. After shooting his opponent in the heart, he fled back to Paris with his magic skin. It was now no larger than an oak leaf.

Although he consulted the best doctors available, they gave him no comfort or help. They could scarcely believe his story of the skin, yet they could find no cause for his grave illness. At last he lay dying. Wishing to have Pauline near him, but knowing that his desire would consume the last shred of the magic skin, he asked her to leave him. As he called her name, she saw the skin growing smaller. In despair she rushed into the next room and tried to kill herself by knotting a scarf around her neck. The dying man tottered after her, and as he tore away the cloth he tried vainly to utter a final wish. No words would come. He died while holding her in that last, desperate embrace.

WILHELM MEISTER'S APPRENTICESHIP

Type of work: Novel

Author: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832)

Type of plot: Philosophical romance

Time of plot: Eighteenth century

Locale: Germany

First published: 1795-1796

Principal characters:

WILHELM MEISTER, a wealthy burgher's son

MARIANA, his first beloved, an actress

PHILINA, an actress

AURELIA, an unhappy woman

NATALIA, a beautiful Amazon

MIGNON, in love with Wilhelm

Critique:

Although Goethe never expressed real sympathy for the romanticists, Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship shows the prevailing romantic style and outlook on life. The action is slow, particularly noticeable in such a long novel, and the characters are never sharply delineated. The scene is a series of vignettes, each setting shading off into the next and none well defined. The people in the novel make long, diffuse speeches on various facets of philosophy and esthetics. Yet in spite of its very evident defects, the work shows real power in its emotional insights, and Goethe's appreciation of Shakespeare is well exhibited in his discussion of Hamlet.

The Story:

Old Barbara waited with eagerness for the return of her mistress, for tonight she had a surprise. Norberg, Mariana's protector, had sent money to his beloved, and to Barbara fancy clothes and ornaments. Norberg would be gone another two weeks, but in the meantime the two women would have plenty to live on. Mariana earned a fair amount as an actress, and Norberg's generosity enabled them to indulge a taste for luxury.

Mariana came whirling in, paying no attention to Barbara. Mariana was in love!

Truly, this time it was real love. Wilhelm Meister was very young and poetic by nature, and his youth appealed to her. At other times she would listen to Barbara's calculating schemes, but now she would follow only her heart. As soon as deep night came, Wilhelm would be with her.

Wilhelm's family was of sturdy merchant stock. To his father Wilhelm's predilection for poetry seemed extreme. Since early youth he had written verse, declaimed it, and acted in neighborhood plays. For a long time his father was sympathetic, even providing him a puppet show with which to practice. But as Wilhelm grew to young manhood he spent more and more time at the local theater. The tawdry tinsel and the artificial makeup drew him as a magnet. After he met Mariana, he spent every evening admiring her and her acting. At last his father forbade his attendance at the theater. After the ban, Wilhelm would wait until his family was asleep; then he would steal out to see Mariana.

At last, after his father had decided to send Wilhelm on a commercial mission, the youth determined to take Mariana with him and marry her once they were well away from home. His decision drew protests from his friends, especially from Werner, his prospective brother-in-law. He was warned of Mariana's lack of virtue, but he refused to listen.

When he called at the usual time that night, Mariana pleaded a headache and asked him to leave. Wilhelm wandered about until very late and at last engaged some minstrels to serenade his intended. Toward morning his suspicions were aroused when he saw a man leaving Mariana's house. Going into the entry, he found the doors locked, but Mariana had left a scarf in the vestibule. In the scarf he found a note, written by Norberg, which revealed that Mariana was a kept woman.

After this bitter blow Wilhelm renounced poetry and drama and resolutely set himself to work in his father's business. After a time he passed for a rising young businessman. His father, pleased with the change in his son, decided to trust Wilhelm on an important journey; he was to travel widely among the clients of the firm to collect debts and to further trade. Wilhelm was glad to leave, for away from home he could forget Mariana the more easily.

From the first he was successful, especially in collecting debts. In fact, he could complete his commissions in such short order that he had ample opportunity to seek adventures. On one occasion he came upon an unhappy scene: a couple had been too indiscreet in their love and had been arrested. Wilhelm pleaded with the girl's parents not to press charges, although they were very angry that their daughter had become entangled with Melina, a wandering player. Finally the parents gave their consent to a marriage if the couple would leave town. So happily the two set out. Melina was sure he could get an engagement in a company of actors.

In another town Wilhelm was greatly attracted by the lovely, light-hearted Philina and her merry escort, Laertes. Wilhelm passed many a pleasant day in their company, dining and dancing and playing tricks. One evening they were diverted by a troupe of acrobats who performed dazzling feats on the tight rope. Wilhelm grew angry at the ill treatment the performers accorded a pretty child, a graceful, boyish girl called Mignon. He rescued her and found that he had henceforth a faithful and loving slave.

Gradually a company of actors out of work gathered about Philina, including the Melinas, who were almost destitute. After much urging, Wilhelm lent money to Melina, and the latter immediately purchased an abandoned stock of costumes and properties and set himself up as an actor-manager. Gathering together the ragtail company and persuading Wilhelm to join them as critic and gentleman actor, Melina began rehearsals and gave occasional performances.

At length the company was invited by a count to give a long series of performances at his nearby castle, where the count planned to entertain the Prince of —. In spite of a poor reception, the company soon was acclimated to the surroundings, and the count even seemed to like their presentations.

Wilhelm attracted notice by writing short occasional pieces and reading poetry in intimate chambers. Although Philina still looked longingly at him, Wilhelm was drawn to the lovely countess. She condescended graciously to him and allowed him to kiss her hand.

One of the guests proposed a trick to play on the countess. Since the count was away overnight, Wilhelm was to put on the count's dressing gown. He would sit in the count's bedroom until the countess came in for a good-night kiss. Then Wilhelm would reveal the jest. But instead of the countess, the count himself came in. Quiet and grave, he looked silently at the dim figure in his clothes, and cautiously withdrew, believing he had seen his doppelgänger. Wilhelm's love for the countess led him, on another occasion, to seize her and embrace her violently. She protested lightly at first, then banished him from her presence.

After this engagement had ended, the actors took to the road. In spite of roving bands of ruffians and thieves, Wilhelm advised them to continue on to the next big town. The company was attacked by robbers and all their goods were stolen or smashed. Wilhelm was gravely wounded. When he came to, he was lying in Philina's lap. He learned that they had been rescued by a party led by a beautiful Amazon. The lady so captivated Wilhelm that he remembered always her haunting loveliness.

During his convalescence Wilhelm stayed in the house of a pastor in a nearby village. Mignon, wounded in the attack, and an old harper who had attached himself to the company, remained with him. Philina also stayed behind to act as nurse when the other actors went away to give performances throughout the countryside.

Recovered, Wilhelm decided to seek his own fortunes on the stage. With his friends he went to see Serlo, a famous actor-manager, who offered him a contract. While working on a production of Hamlet, Wilhelm spent much time in the company of Aurelia, Serlo's sister, whose husband was dead and who had been deserted by a noble lover. Wilhelm believed that a small child of the household, Felix, was the result of her unhappy love affair.

Word arrived that his father had died, leaving Wilhelm considerable property. In spite of his grief he decided to go ahead with his theatrical career. During the performance of Hamlet, Wilhelm, playing the Danish prince, was much puzzled by a strange actor who had played the role of the ghost. No one could explain who the mysterious actor could have been.

The mystery was forgotten in the excitement of a fire which broke out that night. In the excitement Felix was placed in the care of the aged harper. While Wilhelm was helping to fight the blaze, Mignon appeared with word that the harper had carried the boy to the basement of the castle and there was trying to kill him. After this crazed deed Wilhelm placed the old man in the care of a clergyman whose medical training had led him to care for such unfortunates.

From that time on Wilhelm became the special protector of little Felix, and Mignon the child's constant companion. Aurelia died, but before her death she told Wilhelm the story of her sad love affair and asked him to deliver a letter she had written to Lothario, the nobleman who had broken her heart. On his arrival at Lothario's castle Wilhelm recognized his host as the brother of the Countess —. He and the nobleman became friends. Through Lothario he was initiated into a strange secret society of intellectuals and aristocrats; many of his experiences, he realized, had been an apprenticeship to prove his fitness to join the society. At the castle he learned also that the old harper was a former priest who had seduced a young woman, a near relation, to whom a child had been born. The man believed that a small child would cause his death.

While on a mission for Lothario, Wilhelm encountered old Barbara, who was now a sewing-woman. She assured him that Felix was his own son. Mariana, the mother, had died of a broken heart, and Aurelia had taken the child as her ward. Wilhelm, grieved to hear of Mariana's death, rejoiced also to hear of her fidelity.

Mignon, meanwhile, had been sent to stay with Lothario's sister. When word arrived that she was gravely ill, Wilhelm, with Felix, set out to see her. There he met Natalia, another sister of Lothario's, whom he recognized as the beautiful Amazon who had saved his life in the forest. Mignon died. Soon after her death the true story of her birth was revealed. She was the daughter of a priest, an Italian of noble birth, who on learning that his beloved was his own sister had gone mad. Later the child, the mother having died in a convent, was stolen by some traveling players. Mignon, then, had been the daughter of the old harper whom Wilhelm had befriended.

Shortly after Mignon's death Wilhelm made Natalia his wife. He believed that his apprenticeship had set him free from former confusion and doubts. He had become a judicious, unbiased personality, a critic appreciating art and life.

WILHELM MEISTER'S TRAVELS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749-1832)

Type of plot: Philosophical romance

Time of plot: Early nineteenth century

Locale: Germany

First published: 1821-1829

Principal characters:

WILHELM MEISTER, a Renunciant

FELIX, his son

HERSILIA, a girl admired by Felix

HILARIA, a young girl

LENARDO, Wilhelm's friend

Critique:

Wilhelm Meister's Travels is a continuation of the Apprenticeship. Many of the same characters reappear briefly, and some attempt is made to bring to a close the adventures of a large number of people. This novel is very difficult to follow. There is no plot in the usual sense, the work being a convenient vehicle for Goethe's views on geology, art, and labor; for lyric interpolations, and for digressions which lengthen the work without illuminating it. The general atmosphere seems romantically vague to a modern reader.

The Story:

Wilhelm Meister was traveling on foot with his young son Felix. As a consequence of his liberation from ordinary desire through the noble Lothario and the abbot, he had become a Renunciant. Under the terms of his pledge he must wander for years, never stopping in one place more than three days. His travels were intended to give a final philosophical polish to the once troubled Wilhelm. Gone forever were the counting-house and the stage; now he undertook a last purifying sacrifice.

While Felix played merrily on the mountainside, Wilhelm mused beside a steep path. Hearing voices, he turned to see his son with a group of children running downhill before a donkey driven by a holy-looking man. The beast carried a sweet-faced woman with a small baby. The adults smiled at Wilhelm, but the path was too steep for them to stop. When Wilhelm caught up with the party, the man invited him to visit his household, and his wife amiably seconded the invitation. It was decided that Felix should go on ahead with the family and Wilhelm would follow the next day, after he had retrieved his wallet left high on the mountain.

When he arrived, Wilhelm was charmed to find the family living in a restored chapel. He was struck by the fact that the man was Joseph and the wife was Mary; indeed, they seemed a holy family. When he learned their story, Wilhelm was reverent.

Joseph's father had been a rent collector for an absentee landlord. Joseph had been promised that if he grew to be a steady man and a competent craftsman, he could succeed his father. But he decided to be a woodworker, and when he was sufficiently skilled he began to restore the paneling in the old chapel. His best work was the skillful reworking of an elaborate panel depicting in wood the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt.

One day, as Joseph was wandering on the trail, he found a beautiful woman weeping beside the path. Her husband had been killed by robbers. Joseph, alarmed by the woman's distress and condition, took her to his home and summoned his mother. Soon the widow was delivered of a child. After a patient courtship Joseph married the widow, Mary, and took her to live in the old chapel. Now he was the rent collector in his father's place and possessed of a loving family.

While playing, Felix came upon a box of stones which had been given to Joseph by a scientist who was searching for minerals in that region. Learning that the geologist's name was Montan, a name frequently used by his old friend Jarno, Wilhelm hoped to overtake the scientist in the course of his own wanderings. He and Felix started out, led by Fitz, a beggar-boy who had been a playmate for Felix during the stay with the collector and his wife. On the way they came to a barrier of fallen trees. While their guide was looking for another path, Felix wandered into a nearby cave and there found a small box, no larger than an octavo volume, rich-looking and decorated with gold. Wilhelm and his son decided to conceal the box among their belongings and to tell no one of its discovery for the time being.

A short time later Fitz led them to the place where Montan was prospecting. As Wilhelm had expected, the scientist was Jarno, whom Wilhelm had known in his acting days, now a Renunciant geologist. They stayed with Jarno for three days, while the scientist tried to satisfy the great curiosity Felix had about minerals and their properties.

Taking leave of Jarno, the party started off to survey a natural phenomenon known as the Giant's Castle. Sending the pack animals around by road, the travelers followed a rugged path until they came in sight of a beautiful garden, separated from them by a yawning chasm. Fitz led them into an aqueduct which gave entrance to the garden. Suddenly they heard a shot. At the same time two iron-grated doors began to close behind them. Fitz sprang backward and escaped, but Wilhelm and his son were trapped. Some armed men with torches appeared, and to them Wilhelm surrendered his knife, his only weapon. He told his son to have no fear, for there were pious mottoes carved on the walls leading to the castle to which their captors conducted them.

After spending the night in a well-appointed room, father and son breakfasted with the gay Hersilia and her older, more sedate sister Julietta. Felix was charmed with Hersilia, as was his father. Hersilia gave Wilhelm a romantic manuscript to read. The next day the eccentric uncle of the girls appeared and took them to lunch in a shooting lodge.

Finding himself in such agreeable and learned company, Wilhelm exerted himself to please. Hersilia accepted him as one of the family, and to show her trust gave him a pack of letters to read, letters telling of her cousin Lenardo. Some years ago Lenardo had determined to set out on his travels. In order to get the necessary funds, his uncle had to collect all outstanding debts. While arranging his affairs, he dispossessed a tenant farmer with a beautiful daughter called the Nut-Brown Maid. Although the girl pleaded with Lenardo for mercy, she and her father were evicted. Now Lenardo wrote his aunt that he would not come home until he learned what had happened to the girl.

After reading the letters, Wilhelm took his son to visit the aunt, a wise woman called Makaria. In her castle Wilhelm met an astronomer who revealed to him many of the secrets of the stars. Advised by the savant, Wilhelm deposited the box Felix had found with an antiquarian until the key could be found.

At a distant castle a major came to visit his sister. His intention was to consolidate the family fortunes by marrying his son Flavio to his sister's daughter Hilaria. To his surprise Hilaria loved only her uncle. So the major, after getting a valet to make him look younger, went to tell Flavio the news. He was heartened to learn that Flavio was in love with a widow.

One night Flavio burst hysterically into his aunt's castle. The widow had repulsed him when he became too eager in his love making. Flavio soon found solace in Hilaria's company. When the major returned the atmosphere grew tense. The gloom was lifted only after Hilaria's mother wrote to Makaria for advice. That wise lady had the widow visit the major and tell him the true state of affairs, that the young Flavio and Hilaria were really in love. Then Hilaria and the pretty widow set out to travel to Italy.

In the meantime Wilhelm had come upon Lenardo in his wanderings. Lenardo begged his aid in learning what had become of the Nut-Brown Maid. When Wilhelm agreed to the quest, Felix was put in a school run by wise men who taught the dignity of labor and the beauty of art. Shortly after Wilhelm left the school he was able to send Lenardo word that the girl was now well off and happy, and the wandering nephew was then able to return to Makaria.

With an artist friend, Wilhelm traveled among the beautiful Italian lakes. This neighborhood was especially dear to him, for it was the home of his beloved Mignon, his foster daughter. The two men were lucky enough to meet Hilaria and the widow, but before any serious interests could develop the ladies disappeared.

Hersilia wrote to Wilhelm that she was keeping Felix's box, as the antiquarian had gone away, and that she also had a key to the chest. Returning to Germany, Wilhelm went to the school to get Felix. He was pleased to find him a well-grown young man with considerable artistic ability. Father and son, once more together after their long separation, began to visit their old friends.

They found that Hilaria and Flavio had married and that Flavio had become a prosperous merchant. Felix was greatly attracted to Hersilia. When he learned that she had both key and box, he persuaded her to let him try to open it. But the key was a magnetic key, and the halves came apart when he tried to turn the lock.

Felix tried to embrace Hersilia, and the girl pushed him away much harder than she meant to. Fearing she did not love him, Felix impetuously dashed away and was injured when he fell on the shore beside a stream. There Wilhelm found him unconscious. His old training in medicine stood him in good stead, however, and Wilhelm was able to bleed his son and restore him to consciousness.

in The Wind in the Willows belong to the same world in which human beings live; here are the same foibles and excesses, the same motives and loyalties. Whether the author intended his book chiefly for children is a matter still open for discussion, but one of little consequence, for the story of Mole and his friends has become a delight to readers of all ages. Fantasy and allegory touched by gentle satire make this story one which can be read on more than one level of meaning.

The Story:

Mole had spring fever, for he had been busy about his cleaning and repairing too long. Because the new spring smells and the sight of budding green were everywhere about him, he just could not resist them. Throwing aside his tools and mops, together with his ambition, he left his little home under the ground and traveled up a lovely meadow. There he wandered through the grass and along the river. He had never seen a river before, and he was bewitched by its chuckling and glimmering in the sunlight.

As he watched, Mole saw a dark hole in the bank. From it protruded the be-whiskered face of Water Rat, who promptly invited Mole to visit him. Mole, of course, could not swim, and so Rat took his little boat and rowed across to get him. Such enchantment was almost too much for quiet Mole. As they glided across the gurgling water, he thought this the best day of his entire life. After a little accident they reached Rat's house. There they packed a picnic basket and set out on a real excursion. They stayed carefully away from the Wild Wood, for fierce animals lived there. Badger kept his home there, but nobody would dare bother Badger.

As they floated down the river, Rat told Mole about other animals and the Wide World. Rat had never seen the Wide World and never wanted to, but he warned Mole against it. It was no place for respectable animals.

When they stopped for their picnic lunch, they were joined by Otter. Badger looked in on them but would not join them. Badger hated Society. He liked People all right, but he hated Society. Rat promised that they would meet Badger later, for from Badger Mole could learn much valuable knowledge.

After another accident, which was Mole's fault, the two new friends went to Rat's home and ate supper. Following the meal, Rat entertained Mole with many wonderful tales. It was a sleepy but happy Mole who was helped into bed by the kind Rat that night. From then on the two remained friends. Rat taught Mole to swim and to row, to listen to the music of the running water, and to catch a little of the meaning of the song the wind sang as it whispered in the willows.

One day the two went to call on Toad at Toad Hall. It was the most beautiful residence in animal land, for Toad was wealthy. He was also a playboy. Every new fad that came along attracted him. When Rat and Mole arrived, Toad was busy getting together a gipsy caravan. He persuaded the others to join him on the open road. Although the venture was much against Rat's better judgment, poor Mole was so desirous of joining Toad that Rat finally gave in.

Their adventure was short-lived. When the wagon was upset by a racing motor-car, Rat was so furious that he wanted to prosecute the owners of the car to the limit. Toad had other ideas; he must have the biggest, fastest, gaudiest car that money could buy.

Spring, summer, and fall passed—days filled with pleasure for Mole and Rat. Then, one cold winter day, Mole went out alone and got lost. Finding himself in the Wild Wood, he was terrified by the strange noises and evil faces he saw around him. Rat finally found him, but before they could reach Rat's home snow began to fall. By luck, they stumbled upon Badger's home, where the old philosopher welcomed them, even though he hated being disturbed from his winter's sleep. Badger asked for news of the other animals, particularly of Toad. He was not surprised to learn that Toad had been in trouble constantly because of his motorcars. There had been seven smash-ups, and seven new cars. He had been hospitalized three times and had paid innumerable fines. Badger promised that when the proper time came he would attend to Toad.

When their visit was over, Badger led Rat and Mole through a labyrinth of tunnels and underground passages until they reached the far edge of the Wild Wood. Then he bade them goodbye and they scampered for home. Not long afterward, in December, Mole felt a great desire to return to his own house that he had left on that spring day so long ago. Rat understood the feeling and gladly went with Mole to find his old home. It was a shabby place, not at all as fine as Toad Hall or Rat's house, but Rat was polite about it and praised it to Mole. On their first night there they gave a party for the field mice, then rolled into bed and slept the sleep of weary travelers.

Early the next summer Badger turned up and said that now he was ready to deal with Toad. Taking Mole and Rat with him, he went to Toad Hall and tried to persuade Toad to give up his cars and his reckless ways. Since force alone could accomplish that end, they locked Toad in his room until he should come to his senses. But Toad slipped out of the window and stole a car. Arrested, he was tried and sentenced to prison for twenty years. There Toad had ample time to think about his foolish ways. But not for long could he be restrained. Bribing the jailer's daughter, he escaped in the disguise of a washerwoman.

Finally, Mole learned the true meaning of the wind's song in the trees. One evening, when birds and insects were still, Mole suddenly felt the Awe that brought peace and contentment. He felt himself in the presence of Him who brought Life and Death. There was no terror, only peace. Then Mole and Rat really saw Him, his horns gleaming and his eyes smiling. The mood was over soon, and with its passing came complete forgetfulness. While the wind sang gently on through the willows, Mole and Rat felt only as if they had had an unremembered dream.

That fall Seafarer, a seafaring rat knocked on Rat's door and told wonderful tales of adventure throughout the Wide World. Rat had a dreamy look in his eye as Seafarer painted his pictures, and it was all Mole could do to remind Rat of the fearsome things he had said about the Wide World. But the spell was broken at last, and Rat settled down again, contented with his narrow world.

Meanwhile Toad's escape was almost ruined by his conceit and his carelessness. As he was about to be caught again, Rat rescued him and took him home. There Rat told Toad that the weasels and stoats had taken over Toad Hall while Toad was in prison. Badger had a plan to recover Toad Hall. Through a tunnel known only to Badger, the four friends sneaked up on the intruders and captured Toad Hall again for its rightful owner. Toad, of course, took all the credit.

The four continued to live in joy and contentment. Unafraid, they walked in the Wild Wood, for the weasels had learned their lesson, and they heard the wind whispering its gentle song.

THE WINGS OF THE DOVE

Type of work: Novel

Principal characters:

MILLY THEALE, a rich American girl
MRS. STRINGHAM, an American friend of Milly Theale
MRS. LOWDER, an English friend of Mrs. Stringham
KATE CROY, Mrs. Lowder's niece
MERTON DENSHER, Kate Croy's fiancé
LORD MARK, another suitor for Kate Croy's hand
SIR LUKE STRETT, an eminent British doctor

Critique:

The idea of a sick woman who strove to live a lifetime within a few months was on the mind of Henry James for many years before this book was written. He finally found the characters to fit the situation, and the result was The Wings of the Dove, one of his finest novels. The admirable character of "the dove," Milly Theale, was modeled avowedly on James' own cousin, Mary Temple. The charm of Milly Theale is that her sufferings are not overt. They are all the more poignant, however, because they are hidden.

The Story:

Kate Croy was dependent upon her aunt, Mrs. Lowder, because Kate's own father was a ne'er-do-well. Mrs. Lowder had great plans for her niece, and she encouraged Lord Mark as a suitor for Kate's hand. Kate's own mind was set on a young reporter, Merton Densher, who worked on one of the London papers. While Mrs. Lowder liked Densher, and even invited him to her home, she did not want him to marry her niece, for he had no apparent prospects of money or a place in society. Mrs. Lowder breathed easier when she learned that the young man was being sent by his newspaper to America, to write a series of articles on life in the United States.

While he was in New York, Densher made the acquaintance of a pretty young American, Milly Theale, who had recently inherited a large fortune through the death of her parents.

A few weeks later Milly Theale asked a Boston friend, Mrs. Stringham, an elderly widow and a writer, to go with her to Europe. Within a matter of days they had taken passage on a liner and soon arrived in Italy. They traveled up the Italian peninsula and into Switzerland. Restless, Milly soon decided that she would like to go to London.

When they had arrived in England, Mrs. Stringham sent word of her arrival to Mrs. Lowder, the one real acquaintance she had in that country from her school-days many years before. Mrs. Stringham and Milly Theale immediately became familiar callers at Mrs. Lowder's home. Because of her beauty, money, and attractive personality, Milly was a great success. Lord Mark became infatuated with her. Milly and Kate Croy became fast friends.

Aware that she was ill, Milly went to see Sir Luke Strett, an eminent surgeon who informed her that there was nothing surgery or medicine could do to save her, and he advised her to make the best of the time she had left. Although Kate Croy, Mrs. Lowder, and Mrs. Stringham knew that she had only a few months to live, Milly requested them to keep silent in the matter. Her intention was to enjoy herself as much as possible.

Great friends as Kate Croy and Milly Theale were, they never mentioned their mutual acquaintance, Merton Densher. One day, while walking in the National Art Galleries, Milly saw him and her friend Kate together. Kate and Densher enlisted the aid of Mrs. Stringham and Milly to further their courtship. Milly, herself a little in love with Densher, was only too glad to help him be near Kate.

Soon Kate hit upon a way to bring her affair with Densher to a happy conclusion. She told the young man to marry Milly, thus making her happy for the few remaining months of her life. Kate had seen clearly that Milly was falling in love with Densher. Kate realized that Milly's fortune would be left after her death to Densher, who would then be free to marry Kate and would have sufficient money to allay any objections Mrs. Lowder might have to the match. Kate was sure that Mrs. Lowder or Mrs. Stringham would not try to prevent a marriage between Milly and Merton Densher, for she knew that the two older women loved Milly enough to go to any lengths to make her final days happy.

The four women, accompanied by Densher, went to Venice for the winter months, Milly on the advice of Sir Luke Strett. Densher made little headway with his plan to marry Milly until Mrs. Lowder and Kate returned to England for a few weeks. Before they left, Kate made Densher promise that he would do as she had planned. Densher's conscience rebelled at the duplicity of the scheme, and he was not sure that when the plan was worked out to its finish Kate would still want him. As a sign that there was mutual trust between them, he asked Kate to go to his rooms with him. She did so the day before she left Venice, leaving her lover honor-bound to try to marry another woman.

One day, as Densher approached the house Milly had taken for the winter, he saw Lord Mark leaving. He soon found out from Mrs. Stringham that Lord Mark had proposed to Milly and had been rejected because the girl had detected unwanted sympathy in his proposal and had suspected that he was after her money rather than her love. Densher believed, rightly, that Lord Mark's rejection gave him some reason to be hopeful. He informed Milly that she was the only reason he was neglecting his work. She was highly pleased and hoped that he would propose.

Lord Mark disappeared from Venice for almost a month. Then Densher discovered him in a café, shortly after Densher had been refused admittance to Milly's house. Immediately Densher knew what had happened. Lord Mark had, in some way, discovered the engagement between Densher and Kate and had informed Milly. Densher attempted to hit upon some plan to right the situation. Three days later Mrs. Stringham came to him and told him what had happened. It was as he had guessed. What he had not guessed, however, was that Milly had ceased to take any interest in living and was refusing to eat or talk to anyone. Mrs. Stringham, desperate, had sent for Sir Luke Strett.

Densher returned to London but did not, at first, go to see Kate. He could not face her after the turn which their plans had taken, and he could not bear the idea of having hurt Milly as he had done. Finally, on Christmas Day, he had a premonition. He hurried to Sir Luke Strett's residence. There he found Mrs. Lowder, who told him that the previous day she had received a telegram telling of Milly's death. A few days later a letter arrived from Venice. Without opening it, Densher knew what the message was, for it was addressed in Milly's handwriting. He went immediately to see Kate, who also guessed that it was a letter informing Densher that she had left him part of her fortune so that he and Kate might marry. Neither of them dared to open the letter because they were ashamed of their conduct toward Milly. They burned the letter in the fireplace.

Within ten days another letter came from a New York law firm. Densher did not open it, but sent it with a short note to Kate. She came to his rooms with it. She wanted to know why he had sent it on to her. He replied that it was up to her to answer whether he should take the money that was offered by it, for he could never marry her with the money Milly had left him.

Kate refused to answer him or to open the letter, lest the large amount of the fortune tempt either of them into accepting it. Finally Densher said he wanted to marry her, but only as they had been before the arrival of Milly Theale. Kate left, after reminding him that they could never be the same, that such was impossible, for the events pertaining to Milly Theale had imbedded themselves into their souls.

THE WINTER'S TALE

Type of work: Drama

Author: William Shakespeare (1564-1616)

Type of plot: Tragi-comedy

Time of plot: The legendary past

Locale: Sicilia and Bohemia

First presented: 1611

Principal characters:

LEONTES, King of Sicilia
HERMIONE, his queen
POLIXENES, King of Bohemia
CAMILLO, Leontes' counselor
PERDITA, Leontes' daughter
FLORIZEL, Polixenes' son
PAULINA, Hermione's maid
AUTOLYCUS, a rogue

Critique:

Shakespeare defined a winter's tale as one of gentle melancholy, and this play, although it has the form of a romantic comedy, has many elements of real tragedy. This was one of the last of Shakespeare's plays, written in the decline of his life when he had become sad and embittered. The plot, motivated by unreasonable and cruel jealousy, is moderated by the charming romance of the young lovers, Perdita and Florizel. The source of the plot was Greene's Pandosto, The Triumph of Time (1588) which Shakespeare revised by adding some new characters and strengthening old ones.

The Story:

Polixenes, King of Bohemia, was the guest of Leontes, King of Sicilia. The two men had been friends since boyhood, and there was much celebrating and joyousness during the visit. At last Polixenes decided that he must return to his home country. Although Leontes urged him to extend his visit, Polixenes refused, saying that he had not seen his young son for a long time. Then Leontes asked Hermione, his wife, to do her part in persuading Polixenes to remain. Hermione did as her husband asked and finally Polixenes yielded to her pleas. The fact that Polixenes had listened to Hermione's request after refusing his own urgings aroused Leontes' suspicion. Quickly he decided that Hermione and Polixenes were lovers and that he had been cuckolded.

Leontes was of a jealous disposition, even seeking constant reassurance that his son Mamillius was his own offspring. Jealously misjudging his wife and his old friend, Leontes was so angered by this latest turn of events that he ordered Camillo, his chief counselor, to poison Polixenes. All Camillo's attempts to dissuade Leontes from his scheme only strengthened the jealous man's feelings of hate. Nothing could persuade the king that Hermione was true to him. Eventually Camillo agreed to poison Polixenes, but only on condition that Leontes return to Hermione with no more distrust.

Polixenes himself had noticed a change in Leontes' attitude toward him. When he questioned Camillo, the sympathetic lord revealed the whole plot to poison him. Together they hastily embarked for Bohemia.

Upon learning that Polixenes and Camillo had fled, Leontes was more than ever convinced that his guest and his wife had been guilty of carrying on an affair. He conjectured that Polixenes and Camillo had been plotting together all the while and planning his murder. Moreover, he decided that Hermione, who was pregnant, was in all likelihood bearing Polixenes' child and not his. Publicly he accused Hermione of adultery and commanded that her son be taken from her. She herself was put into prison. Although his servants protested the order, Leontes' mind could not be changed.

In prison Hermione gave birth to a baby girl. Paulina, her attendant, thought that the sight of the baby girl might cause Leontes to relent in his harshness, and so she carried the child to the palace. Instead of forgiving his wife, Leontes became more incensed and demanded that the child be put to death. He instructed Antigonus, Paulina's husband, to take the baby to a far-off desert shore and there abandon it. Although the lord pleaded release from this cruel command, he was at length forced to put out to sea with the intention of leaving the child to perish on some lonely coast.

Leontes had sent two messengers to consult the Oracle of Delphi to determine Hermione's guilt. When the men returned, Leontes summoned his wife and the whole court to hear the verdict. The messengers read a scroll which stated that Hermione was innocent, as well as Polixenes and Camillo, that Leontes was a tyrant, and that he would live without an heir until that which was lost was found.

The king, refusing to believe the oracle, declared its findings false, and again accused Hermione of infidelity. In the midst of his tirade a servant rushed in to say that young Mamillius had died because of sorrow and anxiety over his mother's plight. On hearing this news Hermione fell into a swoon and was carried to her chambers. Soon afterward Paulina returned to say that her mistress was dead. At this news Leontes, who had already begun to believe the oracle after news of his son's death, beat his breast with self-rage. He reproached himself bitterly for his insane jealousy which had led to these unhappy events. In repentance the king swore that he would have the legend of the deaths of his son and wife engraved on their tombstones and that he himself would do penance thereafter.

Meanwhile Antigonus took the baby girl to a desert country near the sea. Heart-sick at having to abandon her, the old courtier laid a bag of gold and jewels by her with instructions that she should be called Perdita, a name revealed to him in a dream. After Antigonus completed these tasks, he was attacked and killed by a bear. Later his ship was wrecked in a storm and all hands were lost. Thus no news of the expedition reached Sicilia. A kind shepherd who had found Perdita watched, however, the deaths of Antigonus and his men.

Sixteen years passed, bringing with them many changes. Leontes was a broken man, grieving alone in his palace. Little Perdita had grown into a beautiful and charming young woman under the care of the shepherd. So lovely was she that Prince Florizel, heir to the throne of Bohemia and the son of Polixenes, had fallen madly in love with her.

Unaware of the girl's background, and knowing only that his son was in love with a young shepherdess, Polixenes and Camillo, now his most trusted servant, disguised themselves and visited a sheep-shearing festival, where they saw Florizel, dressed as a shepherd, dancing with a lovely young woman. Although he realized that the shepherdess was of noble bearing, Polixenes revealed himself when Florizel was about to become engaged to Perdita, and in great rage he forbade the marriage and threatened to punish his son.

Florizel then made secret plans to elope with Perdita to a foreign country in order to escape his father's wrath. Camillo, pitying the young couple, advised Florizel to embark for Sicilia and to pretend that he was a messenger of good-will from the King of Bohemia. Camillo supplied the young man with letters of introduction to Leontes. Camillo's plan was also to inform Polixenes of the lovers' escape, travel to Sicilia to find them, and thus enable himself to return home once more.

The poor shepherd, frightened by the king's wrath, decided to tell Polixenes how, years before, he had found the baby and a bag of gold and jewels by her side. Fate intervened, however, and the shepherd never reached the royal palace. Intercepted by the rogue Autolycus, he was put aboard the ship sailing to Sicilia.

Soon Florizel and Perdita arrived in Sicilia, followed by Polixenes and Camillo. When the old shepherd heard how Leontes had lost a daughter, he described the finding of Perdita. Leontes, convinced that Perdita and his own abandoned infant were the same, was joyfully reunited with his daughter. Polixenes immediately gave his consent to the marriage of Florizel and Perdita. The only sorrowful circumstance to mar the happiness of all concerned was the tragic death of Hermione.

One day Paulina asked Leontes to visit a newly erected statue of the dead woman in Hermione's chapel. Leontes, ever faithful to the memory of his dead wife—even to the point of promising Paulina never to marry again—gathered his guests and took them to view the statue. Standing in the chapel, amazed at the wonderful lifelike quality of the work, they heard strains of soft music. Suddenly the statue descended from its pedestal and was revealed as the living Hermione. She had spent the sixteen years in seclusion while awaiting some word of her daughter. The happy family once more united, Hermione completely forgave her repentant husband. He and Polixenes were again the best of friends, rejoicing in the happiness of Perdita and Florizel.

WITH FIRE AND SWORD

Type of work: Novel

Author: Henryk Sienkiewicz (1846-1916)

Type of plot: Historical romance

Time of plot: Seventeenth century

Locale: Poland and the Ukraine

First published: 1883

Principal characters:

PAN YAN SKSHETUSKI, a young Polish officer

PRINCESS HELENA KURTSEVICH, his beloved

HMELNITSKI, hetman of the Zaporozian Cossacks

BOGUN, a Cossack officer

PRINCE YEREMI VISHNYEVETSKI, general of the Polish forces

Critique:

With Fire and Sword is the first, and best, of three novels written by Sienkiewicz to dramatize Polish military history in the seventeenth century, at a time when the Poles were struggling to establish and preserve national unity. The background of this novel is the revolt of the Cossacks and the heroic defense of Zbaraz by the Poles in the days of the Commonwealth. Characterization is negligible. The writer's emphasis is always upon military valor and the wider panorama of history, and the exploits of Prince Yeremi Vishnyevetski, Polish national hero, and his captains overshadow a rather conventional love story.

The Story:

It was December, 1647, in the wilderness of steppeland and marsh, when Lieutenant Yan Skshetuski found a Cossack traveler who had been attacked by unknown enemies. Grateful to Skshetuski for assisting him, the Cossack rode off after pledging friendship with the young officer.

Prince Yeremi Vishnyevetski had sent Pan Yan Skshetuski to the Khan to obtain that ruler's aid in punishing certain Tartars who had raided the prince's estates beyond the Dnieper. Pan Yan broke his return journey at Chigirin. There, at the inn of Dopula, he learned that the man whose life he had saved was a rebel Cossack who had escaped to the Saitch, the Cossack territory, where he too could threaten Prince Yeremi's domain.

When Pan Yan left Chigirin, he was anxious to get to Lubni, where a pleased prince awaited him. Along the way Pan Yan had occasion to aid the widow of Prince Constantine Kurtsevich and her orphaned niece, Princess Helena, with whom the lieutenant fell in love. The five sons of Princess Kurtsevich and a young man named Bogun joined them. Bogun's animosity toward Pan Yan convinced the lieutenant that the man was jealous because of Helena. Bogun was an adopted sixth son of the Princess Kurtsevich.

The party stopped at the family estate, Rozlogi, which rightfully belonged to Helena, but which was in the hands of the aunt and her sons. Pan Yan offered not to interfere with the present ownership of Rozlogi if the princess would give him Helena as a wife. The princess promised to send Bogun away and to bring Helena to Lubni.

Confiding in Prince Yeremi, Pan Yan confessed his love for Helena. Much to Pan Yan's joy, the indulgent commander offered to care for Helena as a daughter. Later, wishing to learn about Hmelnitski's activities in the Saitch, Prince Yeremi sent Pan Yan there. This mission gave the lieutenant a chance to stop at Rozlogi on the way.

After Pan Yan had passed through Kudak, the key city commanding the Saitch, his party was attacked by a group of Tartars, Cossacks, and Zaporojians, and Pan Yan was taken prisoner.

Hmelnitski had become the hetman of the Saitch. Tugai Bey, hetman of the Tartars, was his ally. Pan Yan had carried three letters in which Prince Yeremi requested safe conduct for his envoy. The men to whom these letters were addressed were massacred by the savage Cossack Brotherhood of the Saitch. Hmelnitski, recognizing Pan Yan as his rescuer on the steppes, persuaded Tugai Bey not to order the lieutenant's death.

From the Saitch rode Hmelnitski and the Zaporojians and Tartars. From Chigirin, under young Pototski, marched the armies of the king. In the enemy camp Pan Yan mourned his inability to help his ruler. After days of battle the Commonwealth army fell under the onslaught of the attackers. Next Prince Yeremi himself came to quell the rebellion. Deciding to retreat to the Dnieper, Hmelnitski released Pan Yan, who hurried at once to Rozlogi. He found the house in ruins.

During the battle Bogun had found out about Princess Kurtsevich's plan to marry Helena to Pan Yan. He went to Rozlogi, killed the princess and two of her sons, and was himself wounded. One of his allies, Zagloba, turned against him and rescued Helena. In disguise, the pair of fugitives escaped in the darkness to seek refuge and safety. After Bogun had burned Rozlogi, Prince Yeremi, learning of the raid, sent soldiers to find Helena. When the search proved unsuccessful, the prince tried vainly to console Pan Yan, whose grief nearly drove him mad.

The prince and his followers, forced to retreat from Lubni toward the Dnieper, left behind them their rich estates and towns. Harried by Tartars and Cossacks, they marched through forests set afire by the rebels. When they arrived at the Dnieper, the prince sent the women to Vilna. He, with his troops, headed toward the Ukraine. There he strengthened his forces and rested.

Hmelnitski followed a waiting course in hopes of averting a military campaign; his plan was to effect negotiations which might reward him with a high position. The king offered independence to the Zaporojian Cossacks in return for loyalty to the Commonwealth. If Prince Yeremi attacked and Hmelnitski resisted, it would appear that the hetman did not want peace. Therefore he urged part of his followers to oppose Prince Yeremi, while Hmelnitski himself seemed to hold the truce. Pan Kisel was the leader of a government faction that wished to negotiate with Hmelnitski. Prince Yeremi decided to act independently and attack.

While on an errand for Prince Yeremi, Pan Yan met Zagloba, who told the young lieutenant that Helena had found safety in a convent.

A battle between the Commonwealth troops and Hmelnitski's Cossacks began. Prince Yeremi gained in popularity and soon his army had greatly increased. Before long he was the greatest power in the Commonwealth.

At last Pan Yan petitioned his commander for two months' leave so that he could marry Helena. Prince Yeremi himself was undergoing severe inner conflict, for he realized that the future of the Commonwealth lay in his hands. After long deliberation he announced that he would place himself under the other commanders of the Polish forces. The night before Pan Yan was to take his leave, a messenger brought word that the convent where Helena was staying had been sacked by the Cossacks.

Bogun, her jealous lover, had led the attack. When he went to get Helena, however, she had stabbed herself and lay unconscious. When she revived, Bogun pleaded for her affections, but she refused him. He angrily threatened to murder Pan Yan.

Meanwhile Prince Yeremi had made

Pan Yan colonel of a regiment. Prince Dominik Zaslawski Ostrogski was appointed commander-in-chief of the Commonwealth armies.

During a battle Bogun captured Zagloba, who then learned that Helena was still alive but in Bogun's keeping. Zagloba was rescued during a raid in which Bogun escaped alive. Pan Yan, Zagloba, and two other officers set out to hunt for Helena. When news that the Commonwealth armies had been defeated and completely routed reached the searchers, they hurried to Lvoff to join Prince Yeremi's shattered forces. At Lvoff many loyal citizens gathered, clamoring for Prince Yeremi's leadership in the fight against the Cossacks and Tartars.

After accepting the command, the prince hurried to Warsaw to attend the election for king, disputed between Prince Karl and Prince Kazimir. The first advocated fighting Hmelnitski; the other favored negotiating with the Cossacks. At last Prince Karl withdrew in favor of Prince Kazimir. Bogun was reported killed in a duel. Because Hmelnitski was expected to withdraw his troops after the election of Kazimir, Prince Yeremi gave Pan Yan permission to seek Helena once more.

A delegation was sent to Hmelnitski to petition for peace. Although King Kazimir had officially appointed him hetman of the Cossacks, the greedy leader smirked at the delegation and treated them poorly. Among the Cossacks was Pan Yan, disguised, hunting for Bogun should he still be alive. Hmelnitski, still favoring Pan Yan, offered to help him find Helena.

An armistice was signed, but along the borders small bands of marauders kept the war afire. Hmelnitski had little control over his Cossack warriors.

From Pan Yan's faithful servant Jendzian, who had been captured by the Cossacks, Zagloba learned that Helena was held captive by Horpyna, a witch, and a party of Pan Yan's friends went to rescue the girl. Meanwhile Pan Yan, having heard that Helena was dead, was ill and grief-stricken. The rescue party, with Helena, began its perilous return journey through enemy country. On the way they learned that Bogun was still alive. As they rode toward safety they fell into the thick of a battle. Helena was entrusted to Jendzian, who led her through the lines unharmed.

Prince Yeremi and Hmelnitski again engaged in battle. The Cossacks and Tartars laid siege to the city of Zbaraż, to which Prince Yeremi had withdrawn, but could not break through the city walls. When supplies had run low, Pan Yan volunteered to slip past the Cossacks and summon help for the besieged city. After a perilous journey Pan Yan reached the king with news of Prince Yeremi's heroic stand against Hmelnitski and the Tartars. King Kazimir at once ordered an attack on the enemy. Exhausted and hungry, Pan Yan lay in the care of servants when Jendzian brought him news that Helena was alive and safe.

The Cossacks were routed in a decisive battle. When Bogun was found among the captured Cossacks, Prince Yeremi turned him over to Pan Yan for punishment. Pan Yan generously gave his old enemy his life. Prince Yeremi and his followers were called the lions of Zbaraż, even by the Cossacks. And Pan Yan, who had traveled through the enemy lines to bring help to the beleaguered city, was called the bravest of them all.

A WOMAN KILLED WITH KINDNESS

Type of work: Drama

Author: Thomas Heywood (1570?-1641)

Type of plot: Domestic tragedy

Time of plot: Early seventeenth century

Locale: Yorkshire, England

First presented: 1603

Principal characters:

JOHN FRANKFORD, a provincial gentleman

ANNE, his wife

WENDOLL, her paramour

SIR FRANCIS ACTON, her brother

SIR CHARLES MOUNTFORD, a provincial nobleman

SUSAN, his sister

NICHOLAS, servant of the Frankfords

SHAFTON, a schemer

Critique:

This play marks a high point in the development of the domestic drama of the Elizabethan and Jacobean periods. Heywood was clearly well acquainted with the bourgeoisie of his time, and in his play he presented both an interesting story and a vivid documentation of the domestic life of the period. The source of A Woman Killed With Kindness was William Painter's collection of classical tales, The Palace of Pleasure. The play is marked by genuine dramatic force and considerable depth of feeling.

The Story:

John and Anne Frankford celebrated their marriage feast in the company of a group of relatives and friends. Everyone joined in complimenting the bride on her beauty and on her charming submission to her husband. As the group joined the crowd dancing in the great hall of the house, Sir Francis Acton and Sir Charles Mountford arranged a wager on hawking for the next day. Out in the courtyard, tenants of the Frankford estate celebrated their master's wedding.

Early the next morning Acton and Mountford and their companions went into the field to match their falcons. Acton lost the wager, but declared that Mountford's falcon had broken the rules of the hunt. Following an exchange of hot words, the hunting party divided, and in the fighting Mountford killed two of Acton's men. Susan, Mountford's sister, went to him in the field and advised him to flee, but he declared that he could never leave her. The sheriff arrived and apprehended Mountford.

Frankford, at his home, felt himself supremely happy; he was affluent, well-educated, and blessed with a lovely and virtuous wife. As he reflected upon his felicity, Wendoll, who had been in the hunting party, excitedly arrived to report the details of the fatal fight. Frankford, already impressed by Wendoll's manner, invited the young gentleman to live in his house and to be his companion. Nicholas, Frankford's faithful servant, observed to himself that there was something about Wendoll that he did not like; he and the other servants expressed distaste that Wendoll should become a guest in the house.

Mountford, meanwhile, had been forced to spend almost his entire patrimony in order to gain his liberty. As he left the jail, he encountered Shafton, an unprincipled man who forced a large sum of money upon him. It was Shafton's purpose eventually to cheat Mountford out of a small ancestral house he still possessed and somehow to win the hand of Mountford's sister Susan.

Wendoll fell passionately in love with Anne Frankford. Conscience-stricken, he was distracted by the dreadful thoughts that went through his mind. But when Frankford rode away on business, Anne innocently told Wendoll that Frankford wished him to take his place in the household during his absence. Torn between reason and passion, Wendoll succumbed to passion and disclosed to Anne his great love for her. Anne at first resisted his blandishments, but she was soon overcome by his insistence that his love for her in no way reduced his great affection for and obligation to Frankford. Nicholas, undetected, overheard the conversation and vowed to bring the affair to light.

The term of Mountford's debt to Shafton having come due, the lender offered to buy Mountford's house, his last worldly possession. When Mountford refused to sell at any price, Shafton ordered a sergeant to handcuff Mountford and clap him in jail for debt. Hearing what had happened, Acton, who was filled with hatred for Mountford because of the violent dispute over the hawks, declared that he would seduce Susan Mountford. But when Acton actually saw Susan, he immediately fell in love with her.

On his return Frankford learned from Nicholas that Anne and Wendoll were unfaithful, she to her marriage vows, Wendoll to the bonds of friendship. When Frankford, Anne, Wendoll, and a guest, Cranwell, played cards after dinner, it seemed all too clear from the irony revealed in the conversation that Nicholas had indeed told the truth. Frankford planned to make certain that Anne was untrue to him.

Susan, meanwhile, asked her uncle, Old Mountford, to help her brother. The old man refused, as did other men to whom Mountford had been generous in former days. When Acton offered Susan a bag of gold, she spurned help from her brother's enemy. Acton cleared Mountford's debts anonymously. Mountford, released again from jail and from all of his debts, encountered Susan and, to her bewilderment, thanked her for her good work. When the jailer informed the pair that it was Acton who had aided them, Mountford, unable to accept the generosity of an enemy, proposed to return to jail. The jailer, having been paid, refused to admit him. At last Susan confessed that Acton had paid the debts because of his love for her. Knowing that fact, and shamed by his debt to Acton, Mountford felt that there was only one thing to do.

During supper at the Frankfords, Nicholas, by prearrangement, brought a letter to his master at the table. Frankford announced that he was called away immediately on legal business. After he had gone, Wendoll thanked fortune that matters worked out so well for him and Anne. Anne, however, was not happy in her affair with Wendoll; her conscience told her that she was lost in sin. Although she had succumbed to Wendoll because of his clever rhetoric, she suffered remorse. After dining with Wendoll in her chamber, she directed the servants to lock up the house and to bring her the keys.

Frankford, meanwhile, tied his horse to a tree near the house and with keys that he had made for the purpose he and Nicholas crept into the darkened house at midnight. Discovering Wendoll and his wife asleep in each other's arms, Frankford expressed a desire to turn back the clock so that the shame to his honor might have been prevented. Awaking the couple, he chased Wendoll with drawn sword, but a housemaid caught his arm and kept him from taking Wendoll's life. Anne, conscience-stricken, asked Frankford to end her life. He decided, however, that death was too good for her; he condemned her to live the rest of her life comfortably but in seclusion in a house on the estate. She was never to set eyes on him again.

In the meantime Mountford suggested to Susan that she give herself to Acton in return for his deed. When Susan objected on grounds of honor, Mountford declared that his soul would not rest until Acton had been repaid, and Susan finally agreed to this proposal. When Acton went to their house, Mountford bitterly offered his sister as payment. Acton was overcome by the magnanimous gesture. At one time he had not dreamed of marrying poverty-stricken Susan; now he declared that he would proudly take her as his wife.

As Anne, accompanied by her servants, prepared to start on her exile, Nicholas rode up and handed her a lute, the only one of her possessions she had left behind her. Tearfully, she declared that the lute, untuned as it was, was a symbol of her marriage. Wendoll, now repentant, met Anne on the road. When he began to express his remorse, she, fearful lest he tempt her again before she died, commanded the coachman to drive on to the house where she would end her days.

Later, learning that Anne was near death from a broken heart, Frankford went to her and forgave her sins. After her death Frankford declared that her epitaph would recall her as a woman killed by her husband's kindness.

THE WOMAN OF ROME

Type of work: Novel

ADRIANA, a prostitute

HER MOTHER

GINO, a chauffeur

MINO, a student

SONZOGNO, a thug

ASTARITA, a police official

GISELLA, Adriana's friend

Critique:

A keen study of several years in a prostitute's life, The Woman of Rome is an extreme example of one school of contemporary Italian writing. Details are piled up with scrupulous exactitude, and the first person method of getting the story told lends credence. The style is lucid and almost artless in its simplicity. Probably the subject matter would be repelling to many readers, as it is close to pornography at times, but the story is so compelling that as one reads one believes. Moravia has probed the social depths of a generation and its period in history.

The Story:

At sixteen Adriana was beautiful both in face and body. Her lips were red and full, her breasts high and firm. Her mother, a poor sewing woman, thought of her as her only capital; the family had been poverty-stricken since the illness and death of the father. Adriana's mother did not conceal her opinion that their poverty could be traced to her marriage and Adriana's unwanted birth.

Thinking her daughter mature enough, the mother took her to an artist to arrange for her career as a model. Adriana was not embarrassed by undressing before a strange man, nor was she much embarrassed when her mother punched and patted her naked body as she stressed her good points. But her mother's shrill arguing about the pay was quite ill-mannered. She was especially violent with polite people because they usually gave in before her temper displays.

The artist agreed to pay a higher fee with good grace. As he talked with Adriana afterward, he tried to tell her that her mother loved money above all else. Adriana was unconvinced. The artist was a man of about forty, always correct in his behavior. When his pictures did not sell, he had no more work for Adriana.

She had little difficulty in obtaining other jobs, because her figure was so fine, even heroic in proportions.

When modeling did not pay well enough, her mother tried to get Adriana a job as a dancer, and she secured an interview with a vaudeville manager. Adriana did her best, but she was miserably conscious of her swelling thighs and her clumsy feet. Even the mother's shrewish scolding could not win her a job on the stage.

Adriana dutifully took as many modeling jobs as she could, built up a reputation for virtue among the artists, and sewed shirts afternoons and evenings. A turning point came when she met Gino. Gino was soft-spoken and gentle in spite of his rough workman's hands. He was a chauffeur for a wealthy family, and when he could possibly do so he took Adriana for long rides. Her mother objected to the friendship, for she thought Adriana's beauty could win her a gentleman.

Adriana did not object when Gino invited her to his employer's villa while the family was away. She willingly went to his room and afterward they slept until past midnight. Adriana had never been out so late before, and her suspecting mother was furious. She set on her daughter with her fists and beat her as long as she had strength. Then she took Adriana to an all night clinic and had her examined by a doctor. When the doctor confirmed her fears, she was glum but calm.

It was understood that Gino and Adriana would be married, but Gino found excuses for delaying the wedding. The mother was pessimistic about the marriage. Gisella, Adriana's friend, was also doubtful of Gino's intentions and urged her to accept a rich lover while she could. She finally induced Adriana to go out to dinner with Astarita, a rich police official who was anxious to meet her. At the dinner in a hotel Gisella almost forced Adriana to go into a bedroom with Astarita. On the way home Astarita gave Adriana money.

So Adriana was launched on a new career. She did not break with Gino, for she still thought that perhaps they would be married. That hope vanished, however, when Astarita produced evidence that Gino was married and had a daughter. For revenge, Adriana let Gino take her to the villa again, but she insisted on making love in the mistress' bed. After she told Gino that she knew the truth about his wife, she stole a compact from the dresser.

Adriana became a prostitute. She brought her clients home, usually, and her mother accepted the state of affairs with good grace because there was more money in the house. Adriana usually slept late and led an indolent, satisfied existence. She really liked men. Her mother became fat and much less attractive.

One night she met Gino again. He wondered about the compact. The wealthy family, on their return home, had missed it, and Gino suspected Adriana. Gino arranged to have suspicion fall on a maid, who was arrested and sent to jail. After getting the compact from Adriana, Gino planned to sell it to a fence. When he said he would divide the money with her, Adriana, filled with pity for the falsely arrested maid, refused.

She found Gino one night in company with Sonzogno, a strong man and a thug. When Gino and Adriana left a café together, she felt repelled by her former fiancé and on an impulse called to Sonzogno for help. He promptly knocked Gino down and went home with Adriana. Adriana was both attracted to Sonzogno and in terror of him. He had the stolen compact in his possession. Gino had given it to Sonzogno to sell and Sonzogno had murdered an old jeweler to whom he had taken it for that purpose. After listening to callous boasts of his crime, Adriana succeeded in getting the compact away from him. She passed rather a bad night, for Sonzogno beat her. Later she had her confessor give the compact to the police and the maid was released.

Out at night with Gisella, the girls were picked up by two men and the four went to Adriana's house. Gisella, soon afterward, became the mistress of her pickup and was installed in her own apartment. Adriana's pickup was Mino, a student of nineteen. Thin and withdrawn, he was not much interested in love making. His attitude attracted Adriana and thereafter she pursued him, even to his respectable rooming-house.

Adriana's affairs became more complicated. The friendly clinic doctor confirmed her fears; she was pregnant. As she thought back, she knew that Sonzogno was the father. She was rather pleased to have a child, but her baby would be born of a murderer and a prostitute. When Mino came to live at her house, she told him that he was the father of her expected baby.

Mino was an anti-Fascist engaged in subversive work. When he was arrested, he promptly betrayed his fellow conspirators under the sympathetic questioning of Astarita. As soon as he learned that Astarita was an admirer of Adriana, he proposed that she should invite him to her house, and there Mino would shoot him.

Sonzogno, sure that Adriana had betrayed him to the police, arrived just before Astarita was expected. When Astarita appeared, he slapped the submissive Sonzogno's face and sent him away. Then he told Adriana that Mino's confession had not been written down and the police had taken no action against his friends.

But Adriana was apprehensive. It was not like Sonzogno to be meek. When she went to the ministry, her fears were justified. Astarita was dead in the courtyard; Sonzogno had followed him to his office and had thrown him off a balcony.

Adriana went home to find Mino gone. He had left a note saying that his parents would look after her and his son; he was going to kill himself. His body was found in a hotel near the station.

THE WOODLANDERS

Type of work: Novel

Author: Thomas Hardy (1840-1928)

Type of plot: Tragic romance

Time of plot: Nineteenth century

Locale: Rural England

First published: 1887

Principal characters:

GEORGE MELBURY, a timber merchant

GRACE MELBURY, his daughter

GILES WINTERBORNE, an itinerant farmer

FELICE CHARMOND, a lady of the manor

EDGAR FITZPIERS, a doctor

Critique:

One of the lesser known of the works of Thomas Hardy, The Woodlanders lacks some of his philosophical depth and insight. Perhaps neglect of the novel may lie in the fact that in it Hardy wrote neither his usual stark tragedy nor his occasional gentle, rustic romance; instead, he attempted to combine the two. But even though the book does not always measure up to Hardy's fiction at its best, it is still good reading. The writer's ability to portray and develop character is here and, as always, it is above reproach.

The Story:

Mr. George Melbury, timber merchant, had spared no expense in educating Grace, his only daughter. She had been gone from home a year, and he was eagerly awaiting her return. Another man also waited for Grace's homecoming. He was Giles Winterborne, an itinerant farmer and apple grower. Mr. Melbury had wronged Giles' father many years before, and in order to atone for this wrong he had half promised Giles that he should have Grace for his wife.

When Grace returned, it was soon evident that she was now much too cultured and refined for the ways of a simple farmer. But Grace knew that her father had promised her to Giles, and she meant to go through with the plans even though she shrank a little from his plainness. It was Mr. Melbury who was the most concerned. He was an honorable man and liked Giles, but he also loved his only child above everything else. He could not bear to see her throw herself away when she could no doubt marry better.

Giles agreed that he was not worthy of Grace, and so the three vacillated, no one wanting to make a decision. Then through a series of unfortunate and unforeseen circumstances Giles lost the houses that meant his living. His loss decided the issue. Although Mr. Melbury could easily have supported them both, it was unthinkable that such a lady as Grace should be tied to a man without a steady income. But when her father told her that she must forget Giles, Grace found herself for the first time thinking of her would-be lover with real affection.

Another person was destined to change the lives of all three. In the area was a doctor, Edgar Fitzpiers, descendant of a former fine family and in his own right a brilliant and charming man. The local folk thought he consorted with the devil, for he performed many weird experiments. From the first time Edgar saw Grace, he was enchanted with her beauty and her bearing. At first he thought she must be the lady of the manor, Mrs. Charmond, for he could not believe that the daughter of a merchant could be so well educated and charming. Before long the two young people met and Edgar asked Grace's father for her hand. Mr. Melbury gladly gave his permission, for Edgar was far above Grace in position. In spite of his sorrow at disappointing Giles and at failing to keep his pledge to the faithful fellow, Mr. Melbury encouraged Grace to accept Edgar. Since she had always obeyed her father in all things, she accepted Edgar even as she realized that she grew fonder of Giles each day.

When the young couple returned from a long honeymoon, they settled in a newly decorated wing of her father's house. Edgar continued his practice. It grew alarmingly smaller, however, for the country folk who had once looked up to him now felt him one of their own. He decided that perhaps he should accept a practice in a neighboring town.

Before he could make a final decision on this question, Mrs. Felice Charmond entered the picture. The lady of the manor was well known for her many love affairs and her questionable reputation. When she had a slight accident and sent for Edgar, he was attracted to her immediately. The few scratches she had suffered were enough to take him to her house day after day, until even the servants and farmers were talking about them. At last Mr. Melbury could no longer stand by idly and see his daughter suffer, and so he appealed in person to Mrs. Charmond to leave Edgar alone. Grace herself was rather immune to the whole affair, not caring enough for her husband to suffer any great jealousy.

The climax to the affair occurred when Mr. Melbury found Edgar near Mrs. Charmond's home after Edgar had been thrown from a horse. Mr. Melbury picked him up and placed him on his own mount. Edgar was drunk and not aware that he was riding with his father-in-law. He berated Mr. Melbury and Grace as ignorant peasants and cursed his ill luck in having married beneath himself. His drunken ravings were too much for the kind-hearted merchant, who threw Edgar off the horse and rode away. Edgar, who was injured in the first fall, made his way to Mrs. Charmond and begged her to hide him until he could travel. He must now leave the district; there could be no forgiveness for his many sins.

Mrs. Charmond left her home to travel on the continent and before long rumors came back that Edgar was with her. Grace was stoic through it all. Unknown to her husband, she was also aware that he had had an affair with a peasant girl of the neighborhood before his marriage. She would have let things stand as they were, but an unscrupulous lawyer persuaded her father that a new law would permit her to divorce Edgar. While he was making arrangements for the divorce, Mr. Melbury encouraged both Giles and Grace to renew their old plans to marry. By that time they both felt sure they loved each other, but they were more cautious than Grace's father. Thus when the word came that she could not be free of her husband, they were resigned to their unhappiness.

Grace and Giles did resume the friendship they had known since childhood, but decorously in all respects, for neither wished a hint of scandal to touch the other. Then, after many months, Grace heard from her husband that he wanted her to live with him again. Mrs. Charmond was dead, killed by a thwarted lover who afterward committed suicide. Edgar did not mention this fact, but a newspaper told the whole story. Grace and her father decided she should not meet Edgar as he had asked. When she failed to do so, he threatened to come to their home.

Hearing Edgar approaching, Grace slipped out of the house and ran into the woods. Stumbling and afraid, she came at last to the hut occupied by Giles. On learning that she did not wish to see her husband, Giles installed her in his hut and went out into the rain to sleep. What Grace did not know was that Giles had been very ill of a fever, and a few days and nights in the cold rain made him desperately ill. When she found her faithful friend so ill, she ran for Edgar, forgetting her desire not to see him in her anxiety for Giles. Edgar returned with her but there was nothing to be done. Grace held her one real love in her arms as he died, seeming not aware that her husband was present.

For a long time Grace would not listen to her husband's pleas to return to him. Wanting to hurt him as she had been hurt, she told him that she and Giles had lived together those last few days.

Before he learned that her self-accusation was not true, Edgar realized that he truly loved her. When a man trap, set for Edgar by the husband of the peasant girl he had once wronged, almost caught Grace in its steel jaws, Edgar found his wife and helped her to safety. After he told her that he had bought a practice at a great distance from her old home and that he would be a faithful husband, devoting himself to her happiness, she went away with him. She intended to be a good wife, but part of her remained with Giles in the country churchyard grave.

Critique:

Again mixing historical facts with fiction, Sir Walter Scott wrote a delightful novel originally called The Cavalier and later changed to Woodstock. This novel is primarily the story of a gallant old cavalier, Sir Henry Lee, and of his efforts in behalf of his fugitive king, Charles II of England. There is enough historical fact to make the story plausible, but it is fact highly colored by Scott's romantic imagination in a plot dealing with a monarch in disguise, thwarted lovers, a hateful villain. These characters are in turn overshadowed by the gallant old gentleman who could die happily at the instant he saw his king return to glory.

The Story:

Following the death of King Charles I, commissioners of the usurping Oliver Cromwell were sent to destroy the royal residences of England, including the royal lodge of Woodstock, occupied by Sir Henry Lee and his daughter Alice. Forced from their home by Cromwell's soldiers, the old Royalist and his daughter moved to a nearby hut occupied by the royal lodgekeeper, Joceline Joliffe. Arriving at the hut, they found Markham Everard, Sir Henry's nephew, whose opposite political views so enraged his uncle that the young man left the hut and moved into the lodge. There he composed a letter to Cromwell, in which he asked for the preservation of Woodstock as a personal favor. He sent the letter by his friend, Roger Wildrake, who, even though he was a Royalist, was a trustworthy friend.

Cromwell hated to grant the request, but he hoped to turn it to his own advantage. Young Charles Stuart, heir to the throne, had escaped the Puritans in the company of Albert Lee, Sir Henry's son. Hoping to capture the prince, Cromwell ordered his soldiers to leave the lodge because he believed that Albert might try to contact his father and in that way lead the royal fugitive into a trap. Cromwell ordered Wildrake to tell Everard to detain Albert and Charles, if they appeared at Woodstock, and turn them over to the Puritan troops. But Everard, even though he was a member of Cromwell's party, assured Wildrake that he would not only refuse to betray Charles, but would also, if he had an opportunity, help Charles to escape.

Sir Henry and Alice, accompanied by several servants, returned to Woodstock after the departure of the soldiers. Soon young Albert Lee did arrive at the lodge, and with him were the Woodstock chaplain, Dr. Rochecliffe, and a young Scottish page, Louis Kerneguy. The page was actually Charles Stuart in disguise. He had much fun acting the part of a churlish and mischievous page, and Albert and Dr. Rochecliffe worried for his safety, although they realized that Woodstock was probably the safest refuge possible for him at the time. Albert and Rochecliffe were the only two certain of the page's real identity, but Joliffe, the lodgekeeper, suspected that the page was his monarch. He kept his eyes open for trouble, particularly from the Puritan steward, Tomkins, who had been left at the lodge by Cromwell to act as a spy. Albert feared too that Wildrake would discover the plot, but Rochecliffe assured Albert that Wildrake would not betray the prince.

The plan was to find a ship to take Charles Stuart to safety. While they waited for arrangements to be completed, Charles became interested in Alice Lee, who was in love with Everard. Hers was a hopeless love, however, for her father would not hear of an alliance between his daughter and a Puritan.

One afternoon, when Alice and Kerneguy—for she knew him only as such—were alone, he became angry because she would not pay proper attention to him. He stalked into the woods and was there confronted by a stranger who was in reality Everard. Everard accused the page of taking advantage of the hospitality offered him by making advances to Alice. The two drew their swords. At that moment Sir Henry appeared. He reprimanded them and escorted them back to the lodge. Everard and his uncle soon quarreled again, egged on by the mischievous page, and Everard left Woodstock. Charles, continuing his suit with Alice, told her that he was her sovereign. Still she would not accept him because of her love for Everard. Charles was greatly annoyed that she would prefer a Roundhead to a king, and when, a short time later, Wildrake delivered to him Everard's challenge to a duel, he accepted with alacrity.

Dr. Rochecliffe and Alice, attempting to prevent the duel, met the hot-blooded young men as they prepared to fight. Alice protested so violently against the duel that Everard thought she must be in love with Kerneguy. He withdrew from the duel and bade Alice goodbye. Then Kerneguy, seeing her obvious distress, revealed himself to Everard as Charles Stuart. He told the miserable lover that only Alice's loyalty to the Stuarts made her act as she did. Everard assured Charles that his secret was safe with him, as did Wildrake, who was also present.

In the meantime Joliffe killed the Roundhead steward, Tomkins, for making unwelcome advances to Phoebe Mayflower, a maid with whom Joliffe was in love. His rash act increased the danger to the fugitive, for Cromwell depended on Tomkins for information from the lodge. Cromwell, visiting Everard, hinted that he knew Everard had betrayed him. Not knowing of Tomkins' death, Cromwell waited for a message from him before making definite accusations. Wildrake, also present during the interview with Cromwell, sent a message to Woodstock, warning the inhabitants that Cromwell would be there soon. Cromwell waited until midnight; then, hearing nothing from Tomkins, he arrested Everard and forced him to join the Commonwealth soldiers as they surrounded the lodge in an attempt to capture the prince.

Albert Lee, who had been away searching for a ship to take Charles to safety, also sent a letter to Woodstock. In it he stated that he would return that night and that Kerneguy must be ready to leave at once. Albert arrived about the same time that a messenger came with the warning from Wildrake. Then Sir Henry, informed of the true identity of his guest, hastily made arrangements for Charles to escape with a trusted forester as his guide. Alice led Charles to Joliffe's hut, where he was to meet his guide; Albert, remaining behind to delay Cromwell's troops, disguised himself as Charles and hid in a secret room to await the soldiers.

Cromwell and his men seized Rochcliffe and Joliffe as they were burying Tomkins' body. They also captured Sir Henry. Albert, leading the soldiers a merry chase, caused them to blow up a part of the lodge and kill some of their own men. At last they captured him, only to discover that he was not Charles Stuart. When he refused to reveal the whereabouts of the fugitive, Cromwell sentenced him to death. Relenting, however, he changed the sentence to one of banishment from England. He also released the other prisoners, including Sir Henry, Joliffe, and Everard.

Alice returned from her mission with the news that Charles was safe and that he had asked Sir Henry to withdraw his objections to the marriage between her and Everard. Obedient to his monarch, the old cavalier gave his consent.

Years passed. Sir Henry living near Alice and Everard, was cared for by Joliffe, now married to Phoebe. Albert, after his release, had been killed in battle. At length Cromwell died and his son resigned the government. When Charles returned to England, the only incident marring his triumph was the death of his old and good friend, Sir Henry of Woodstock, who had lived only to see his rightful king restored to the throne of the Stuarts.

charged with the crime. During the trial it was revealed that Beauchamp had married a planter's daughter whom Sharp had seduced. A dose of laudanum failing to kill them, husband and wife stabbed themselves. The wife died in her husband's cell. Beauchamp was hanged. The Kentucky Tragedy, as this story of intrigue and revenge was called, became a popular subject during the nineteenth century, among writers as dissimilar as Edgar Allan Poe, Charlotte Barnes, Thomas H. Chivers, Charles F. Hoffman, and William Gilmore Simms. Robert Penn Warren, reworking the old tale, has filled it with philosophical speculation and symbolic moral overtones. His Jeremiah Beaumont is an idealist confronted by the realities and compromises of the world, a man betrayed not only by an acquisitive and self-seeking society but also by the very idealism which sustains him in loneliness and doubt. The plot, centering about a theme of community guilt and expiation, illustrates the complex moral issues of the present age.

The Story:

Jeremiah Beaumont was born in Kentucky in 1801. His father was Jasper Beaumont, one of the first settlers in Glasgow County, his mother the disinherited daughter of a wealthy planter. Jasper Beaumont never prospered as he had hoped, and his unfulfilled ambitions bred in him a strain of awkward moodiness which was reflected in his son.

Jasper died, debt-ridden, when Jeremiah was thirteen. Before that time the boy had been put to school with Leicester Burnham. Hoping for a better life than his father's, Jeremiah was diligent in his studies. He was also stubbornly independent, for he refused to become his grandfather's heir because the old man insisted that he take his mother's maiden name, Marcher. When he was seventeen, Dr. Burnham introduced him to Colonel Cassius Fort, a famous frontier lawyer and politician who was looking for a young man to train in his law office at Bowling Green. Jeremiah was eager to accept Fort's offer but could not do so because of his ailing mother. Fort said that he was willing to wait for anyone Dr. Burnham recommended so highly.

In the next spring Mrs. Beaumont died and Jeremiah went to Bowling Green to study law, not in Fort's office, however, for the lawyer had returned to Congress. Jeremiah's only friend in the town was Wilkie Barron, another law student, from whose mother Jeremiah rented a room. Fort returned from Washington in 1820 and took the young man under his patronage. From him Jeremiah learned to look on the law not as a collection of dry statutes but as man's agent of truth and justice. Times were hard in Kentucky following the panic of 1819, and the Legislature had passed a law allowing a twelve-month stay of sale for debt. Fort was on the side of the Relief Party, as those who supported the measure were called.

Wilkie Barron first told Jeremiah of a scandal linking Fort's name with that of Rachael Jordan, daughter of a planter who had died heavily in debt. Called in to help settle the estate, Fort was supposed to have seduced the girl and fathered her stillborn child. Grieved by that story of innocence betrayed, Jeremiah decided to have nothing more to do with his benefactor. In a letter he informed Fort, who was away at the time, of his decision. Fort wrote in reply, but before his letter reached Bowling Green Jeremiah had gone to visit Wilkie's uncle, old Thomas Barron, in Saul County. The Jordan place was only a few miles away from his host's. There he met Rachael Jordan, won her confidence, and, after hearing from her own lips the story of her shame, married her. She accepted him on the condition that he kill Fort.

In the meantime he had become involved in local politics. Wilkie Barron and Percival Scrogg, fanatic liberal editor of a Frankfort newspaper, arrived to take part in a disputed election. After a riot at the polls, in which he and Wilkie ought side by side, Jeremiah was dismayed to learn that his friend was working for Fort. Wilkie advised him to put aside personal grudges for the public good.

Jeremiah and Rachael Jordan were married in 1822. At the time Fort was away on private business. Taking over the Jordan plantation, the young husband devoted all his energies to making the place productive. Sometimes he felt that he had his father's score to settle as well as his wife's, that his hard work would vindicate his bankrupt father against men like Fort, to whom wealth and fame came easily. Ambitious for the future and foreseeing expansion of the settlements, he formed a partnership with Josh Parham, a rich landowner, and with Parham's son Felix surveyed town sites in the unclaimed western lands. The venture in land speculation fell through, however, when Desha, the Relief candidate, was elected governor in 1824. Parham, an Anti-Relief man, swore that he would never spend money opening up land in Kentucky while the Relief Party was in office.

Rachael and Jeremiah were expecting their first child when Fort returned from the East. Rachael, begging her husband to give up his intention of killing Fort, persuaded him that his first duty was to her and the unborn child. A week later Wilkie arrived at the plantation with a handbill in which Fort, announcing his candidacy for the Legislature, disavowed membership in the Relief Party. Urged by Wilkie, Jeremiah also became a candidate for office. The campaign was a bitter one. Unknown to Jeremiah, the Relief Party printed a broadside in which the scandal involving Fort and Rachael was revived. Jeremiah, to his wife's relief, was defeated by Sellars, the candidate he opposed.

Two months later Rachael had a miscarriage. One the same day a handbill was mysteriously delivered to the house. Signed by Fort, it refuted the campaign slanders against him and accused Rachael of having her first child by a mulatto slave. That night Jeremiah reached his decision to kill Fort. As soon as he could leave his wife in a neighbor's care he rode to Frankfort. Disguised, he went at night to the house in which Fort was staying, called him to the door, and stabbed him to death. He then rode home and told Rachael what he had done.

Four days later officers appeared and summoned him to Frankfort for examination in connection with the murder. Believing that there was no evidence against him, he went willingly. But his enemies were already busy manufacturing false clues, and to his surprise he was held for court. By the time of his trial bribery and perjury had done their work. In spite of the efforts of Dr. Burnham and other loyal friends his case was lost when Wilkie appeared to testify against him. Although many believed him innocent, Jeremiah was sentenced to be hanged on August 20, 1826. Meanwhile Rachael had been arrested and brought to Frankfort, where she and her husband shared the same cell. Jeremiah's lawyers appealed the sentence. When they failed to produce one of the handbills defaming Rachael, the appeal was denied.

Two days before the execution date Wilkie Barron and several men broke into the jail and freed the prisoners, who were taken secretly to a refuge ruled over by La Grand' Bosse, a river pirate. There, from one of Wilkie's former henchmen, Jeremiah learned that Scrogg and Wilkie had forged the handbill responsible for Fort's death. In despair, Rachael killed herself. Realizing how he had been duped, Jeremiah tried to return to Frankfort and reveal the truth. Wilkie's man overtook him and cut off his head.

Wilkie went into partnership with the Parhams and became rich. Still politically ambitious, he was elected senator. One night in Washington he shot himself. Among his effects, to be uncovered in an old trunk years later, were some letters and a manuscript in which Jeremiah Beaumont, during his months in prison and in the outlaw camp, had written his story of deceit and betrayal. No one would ever know why Wilkie had kept those incriminating papers. Unable to destroy the truth, he had tried to conceal it. Perhaps at the end, like Jeremiah, he wondered whether the striving, pride, violence, agony, and expiation had all been for nothing.

MARIE, his sweetheart

A DRUM MAJOR, Marie's other lover

ANDRES, another soldier, Woyzeck's friend

A CAPTAIN

A DOCTOR

Critique:

Although this drama of proletarian life was written more than one hundred years ago, it is surprisingly modern in its blending of naturalism and expressionism and in the writer's use of technical devices more common to the twentieth-century stage than to that of the nineteenth. Left incomplete at the end of Büchner's brief but eventful life, the play owes its present form to editors who have arranged the writer's scattered scenes and notes in an acceptable chronological sequence. The play was based upon an actual event, for Johann Christian Woyzeck, a conscript convicted of the murder of his common-law wife, was publicly executed at Leipzig on August 27, 1824. Before his execution a considerable amount of medical testimony dealing with the condemned man's state of mind and body had been assembled. The result was that when Büchner began to write his drama he had at hand what amounted to a psychological case history of his principal character. The playwright presented his chief figure sympathetically against his larger background themes of man's inhumanity and social injustice. The work is remarkable also for the writer's ability to dramatize states of psychopathological tension. The drama provided the story for Alban Berg's experimental modern opera, Wozzeck.

The Story:

Franz Woyzeck was a conscript fusilier, a poor, simple soldier with a peasant's slow mind and a peasant's superstitions. The only happiness he had in his wretched existence came from his humble devotion to his sweetheart Marie and their small son. Because his army pay did not provide for the support of his household, he was forced to earn additional money by performing menial tasks about the camp and in the garrison town where his regiment was stationed.

Having served as a barber's apprentice in his youth, he was often called in to shave his Captain. The officer, a man of speculative, ironic temperament, liked to talk about such topics as time and eternity, matters which were beyond Woyzeck's comprehension. Sometimes the Captain jokingly reproved the poor fellow for his lack of morals, since he had fathered a child without benefit of a wedding ceremony. Woyzeck always declared that if he were a gentleman with a laced coat and a cocked hat he would try to be virtuous, too. Virtue, he thought, was a privilege of the educated and the great, not for miserable creatures like himself.

An eccentric Doctor also paid Woyzeck a few small coins to act as the subject of fantastic medical experiments. The soldier was supposed to live on a diet of peas and to hold his water for stated periods of time. When Woyzeck tried blunderingly to explain his views on nature and life, the Doctor was delighted. He thought that Woyzeck's halting remarks showed an interesting aberration, and he predicted that the man would end in a madhouse.

One day Woyzeck and his friend Andres went into the country to cut wood for the Captain. Woyzeck began to talk wildly about the Freemasons and claimed that they had burrowed under the ground, so that the earth they had hollowed out was rocking under his feet. Their secret signs having been revealed to him in dreams, he was fearful of their vengeance. Andres, usually a matter-of-fact fellow, became rather alarmed when Woyzeck pictured the Last Judgment in the glowing colors of the sunset. Returning home, Woyzeck tried to explain to Marie the vision he had seen in the sky. She was hurt because in his excitement he failed to notice his son. That afternoon a handsome, bearded Drum Major had ogled Marie while she stood at her window and talked to a friend outside. She wondered about Woyzeck and his strange thoughts. Marie was hearty and earthy. She could understand people's emotions better than she could their ideas.

Woyzeck and Marie went to a fair. As they entered one of the exhibits, the Drum Major and a Sergeant came by and followed them into the booth, where the barker was showing a horse that could count and identify objects. When the showman called for a watch, the Sergeant held up his timepiece. To see what was going on, Marie climbed upon a bench and stood next to the Drum Major. That was the beginning of their affair. A short time later Woyzeck found Marie with a new pair of earrings which she said she had found. The simple-minded soldier said that he had never been lucky enough to find anything in pairs. While Woyzeck was on duty or doing extra work, the Drum Major would visit Marie in her room. Full-blooded and passionate, she found herself ready to yield to his advances.

In the meantime Woyzeck had no suspicions of her infidelity. One day, as he was bustling down the street, he met the Captain and the Doctor. The Captain began to talk slyly about beards and hinted that if Woyzeck were to hurry home he would be in time to find hairs from a bearded lover on Marie's lips. Woyzeck became so pale and nervous that the Doctor showed great clinical interest in his reactions. The Captain assured Woyzeck that he meant well by the soldier and Woyzeck went loping home. When he peered steadily into Marie's face, however, he could see no outward signs of her guilt. His scrutiny disturbed and then angered her. She defied him, practically admitting that she had another lover, but she dared Woyzeck to put a hand on her. Unable to understand how anyone so foul could look so beautiful and innocent, he left the house. Not knowing what else to do, he went to the Doctor's courtyard. There the physician made him appear ridiculous in front of a group of medical students.

The next Sunday Woyzeck and Andres were together in the barracks, Woyzeck restless and unhappy because there was a dance at an inn near the town and he knew that Marie and the Drum Major would be there. Andres tried to stop his friend but Woyzeck said that he had to see them for himself. He went to the inn and through an open window watched Marie and her lover dancing. Andres, fearing a disturbance, finally persuaded him to go back to town. Karl, a fool, was among some loafers near the inn door; he said that he smelled blood.

That night Woyzeck, unable to sleep, told Andres that he still heard music and saw the dancing. He also mumbled about his vision of a knife in a store window. The next day Woyzeck encountered the Drum Major at the inn and the two men fought. Woyzeck, the weaker of the two, was badly beaten by his swaggering rival. Mad with jealousy, he went to a pawn shop and bought a knife like the one he had seen in his dream. At the barracks he gave away most of his possessions. Resisting Andres' attempt to get him to the infirmary, he went to Marie and asked her to go walking with him. On a lonely path near the pond he took out the knife and stabbed her to death.

Then he went back to the inn and danced madly. When a girl named Kaethe noticed bloodstains on his hand, he said that he had cut himself. Questioned further, he screamed that he was no murderer and ran from the inn. Wanting to get rid of the incriminating knife which he had left beside Marie's body, he threw it into the pond. His first throw fell short. Desperate, he waded out to hurl the knife into the deep water, got in over his depth, and drowned.

A group of playing children heard some adults talking about the murder. They ran to Woyzeck's son and told him that his mother was dead.

Critique:

The Yemassee tells a fast-moving story of adventure and love during the days of Indian warfare in Colonial South Carolina. Simms had not Cooper's ability to picture nature poetically, but his characterizations of Indians are perhaps more accurate.

The Story:

The English settlers, who at first had to accept aid from the Yemassee Indians when the white men landed on the South Carolina shores, had become quite powerful by 1715. No longer did they have to be careful not to offend the Indians; instead, they continually set up farms on the wrong side of the boundary lines between white and Indian territory. Sanuttee, one of the Yemassee chiefs, had become suspicious of the colonists; he was afraid that they would soon take over all the Yemassee land. In order to keep them from occupying Indian territory, he had made treaties with other tribes and with the Spanish, who were willing to help the Indians defeat the English. Sanuttee's life was made unhappy by his son, Occonestoga, who had been tempted by liquor to become a close friend of the whites. Sanutee was too proud of his ancestry and his position to call a drunkard his son, and it was only by constant pleas that his wife, Matiwan, was able to keep him from completely disowning Occonestoga.

One of the recent settlers was Gabriel Harrison, a strange young man whose commanding presence and jolly manner made him both admired and disliked. Among those who liked him was Bess Matthews, the daughter of the old parson, and Walter Grayson, an honorable young farmer. Parson Matthews disliked Harrison because he was too gay and worldly in his manner, and Walter's brother, Hugh, disliked Harrison because he was also an admirer of Bess. Harrison had brought with him a fine Negro slave named Hector, who was his constant companion, and a strong and faithful dog named Dugdale. With these two companions Harrison wandered about the district.

One day in the forest Harrison came upon Sanutee fighting with a stranger over the carcass of a deer. He arrived in time to save Sanutee's life, but the proud Indian expressed no gratitude. Harrison learned that Sanutee's opponent was a sailor named Dick Chorley, who had recently arrived on the coast. Although Chorley said that he had come to trade, Harrison rightly suspected that he was really a Spanish agent who had come to arm the Indians against the English. Harrison sent Hector to spy on Chorley and Sanutee, who had been joined by Ishiagaska, another Yemassee chief.

Hector, hiding in the brush, overheard Chorley's declaration that he had come to South Carolina to arm the Indians. Displaying the wampum belt of an Indian treaty, he asked the Yemassee tribe to join the tribes who were willing to fight the English. Before Hector could return to tell Harrison what he had learned, the slave was captured and taken aboard Chorley's ship.

Harrison guessed what had become of Hector. He found Chorley in the parson's cabin and by threats forced the seaman to sign an order freeing Hector. His action angered the parson, who refused to suspect Chorley of treason. He denied Harrison the right to wed his daughter Bess.

In the meanwhile the Yemassee chiefs were called to a council and asked to sell more land to the English. Most of the chiefs were willing to sell, but Sanutee, who arrived late at the meeting, made a stirring speech against the sale. Interrupted by his drunken son, the old Yemassee almost killed Occonestoga. When he heard that the chiefs intended to sell the land over his protests, Sanutee left the meeting and went to arouse the people against their chiefs. With the aid of an Indian prophet named Enoree Mattee, he so infuriated the crowd that they repudiated the other chiefs and punished them by having the tribal mark cut from their skins, so that they became outcasts from the tribe. Only Occonestoga escaped this punishment.

Occonestoga hid in the woods. One day he saved Bess Matthews' life by killing a rattlesnake that was about to strike her. For his deed Harrison rewarded the young Yemassee with his friendship. Soon afterward he sent Occonestoga back to the Indian stronghold to learn what the Indians were planning. Occonestoga secretly made his way to his mother, Matiwan, who hid him in her tent. By chance Sanutee discovered the boy and ordered that he be killed after having the tribal mark cut from his skin. In desperation, Matiwan killed her son before the sentence could be carried out, for the tribal mark could not be cut from a dead man.

Harrison, realizing that Sanutee was about to lead the Indians against the whites, did his best to get all the settlers to go to the blockhouse for protection. Parson Matthews insisted that the Indians had never been more friendly, and he refused to leave his cabin. Harrison, while scouting in the woods, was captured by Indians. With the aid of Matiwan, who had heard of his kindness to her dead son, he escaped. In his attempt to save Bess before the Indians could seize her, he was almost recaptured. Hector and his dog Dugdale arrived just in time to save him.

Meanwhile Chorley had led a party of Indians and sailors to the parson's cabin and had captured both Bess and her father. Harrison was able to rescue them and lead them to the blockhouse before the Indian attack began. A furious struggle took place, with even the women aiding in the fight to hold off the Indians. Both the Grayson brothers became friendly with Harrison because of the bravery he had shown in saving their families, and together they fought valiantly to save the community. At last the Indians were forced to withdraw.

Harrison made plans to send many of the settlers to Charleston, where they would be safe until troops could be mustered to defeat the Indians permanently. After winning the parson's permission to marry Bess, consent freely given after his heroic defense of the colony, Harrison astonished the group by announcing that he was in reality Charles Craven, the new governor of the province. He had come to the region in disguise so that he could see for himself the true state of affairs on the frontier. He made Hugh Grayson commander of the garrison forces. When he offered Hector his freedom, the old slave refused to be parted from his kind master.

In Charleston, Craven raised a considerable fighting force and returned to battle with the Yemassee Indians on the banks of the Salkehatchie River. When the Indians attacked the camp of the white men, the governor's troops, firing from ambush, shot them down. Sanutee fell, mortally wounded, and Craven saw Matiwan run upon the field and fall weeping by her husband's body. The last of the Yemassee braves was dead.

MONSIEUR DESRIVIÈRES, Gabriel's master

AIMÉE, wife of M. Desrivères and Mayotte's mother

MADAME PEYRONETTE, Youma's owner and Mayotte's grandmother

Critique:

This book is an understanding story of Negro life in the West Indies, written essentially from the Negro's point of view. Whites enter the story only as they are forces or background figures for the lives of the Negroes who are the principal characters. That this novel should have come from the pen of Lafcadio Hearn is not surprising, for he had spent months in the West Indies and had seen for himself the life and personality of the Negro. Even more important, Hearn had been aware of the Negro and his problems in the United States, particularly in Louisiana. Like much of Hearn's work, Youma is filled with pictures of exotic scenery and life. A story of West Indian slavery, the novel is also a vehicle portraying the life, customs, folklore, and lush scenery of a beautiful island.

The Story:

Youma was a pet slave and the godchild of Madame Peyronette. Youma's mother had been the nurse of Madame Peyronette's only daughter, Aimée, and the two children, white and colored, had grown up together almost as sisters. Even when Aimée was sent to a convent to have her manners finished off according to Creole custom, the vacations she spent at home were always in the company of the young Negro slave.

As the girls grew to womanhood, Aimée begged her mother on several occasions to give Youma her freedom, but Madame Peyronette felt that she was guarding Youma by keeping her in slavery. Privately, Madame Peyronette had decided first to find the girl a good husband and then, after she was safely married, to grant her freedom. Before Madame Peyronette could carry out her plan, Aimée married Monsieur Desrivères, son of a wealthy old Creole family. Upon her marriage, Aimée asked that Youma be permitted to serve for her in the new household, a request speedily granted by her mother.

Thirteen months after Aimée's wedding a baby girl was born to her and her husband. The child was named Marie, which the Negroes made into the diminutive Mayotte. Tragedy struck the household a year later when Aimée, who had been caught in a chilling rain while riding in an open carriage, fell ill and died within twenty-four hours. Before she died, Aimée begged Youma to assume the duties of a nurse for little Mayotte. Youma, recalling the kindnesses she had received at the hands of Aimée, vowed to do the best she could for the motherless child.

Monsieur Desrivères went to his sugar plantation at Anse-Marine, in another section of the island, for he could not remain in the same house after his wife's death. Not long after, little Mayotte being in delicate health, Madame Peyronette sent her, in Youma's care, to the plantation. The grandmother thought that the climate at the plantation would be better for Mayotte.

The little girl and Youma loved the life at the plantation; for both it was an experience in people. Little Mayotte was irked at times because she was not permitted to mingle freely with the little colored children. This was not caused by difference in race but by fear that she was in danger of sunstroke while participating in their games. To pass the time, Mayotte and Youma went on walks in shaded places or sat on the verandas while Youma told folktales of her race.

One afternoon Youma warned Mayotte that if she heard so many tales during the day she would see zombies at night. Mayotte laughed and asked for another story. But that night she screamed to Youma that something was in her room. As Youma stepped into the room to calm the child, she felt under her foot a tremendous snake. Keeping the snake imprisoned beneath her foot, Youma called for help as the serpent writhed itself about her legs and body. When Monsieur Desrivères and the servants arrived with a light, they found Youma holding down a large and poisonous reptile. One of the slaves, Gabriel, swung a cutlass and lopped off the snake's head. Fortunately for the girl and the child, Youma had stepped on the snake immediately behind the head, and it had not been able to strike at her with its fangs.

The incident earned for Youma the respect of everyone at the plantation. Gabriel, in particular, showed his admiration by bringing gifts of fruit and spending the hours of early evening listening to her tell stories or sing to little Mayotte. He even made a rustic bench which he placed beside the little pool where Youma took Mayotte to play in the water. Finally Gabriel gave her a pair of earrings; when she put them on, he knew that she was willing to marry him. Gabriel, wishing to marry Youma, was told that Madame Peyronette's permission was necessary, since Youma belonged to her. When asked, Madame Peyronette refused to give permission; she felt that it would be wrong to permit Youma, who had been brought up almost as a white girl, to marry Gabriel, who, although a fine specimen of manhood, was only a field hand.

Gabriel and Youma were grievously disappointed at the denial of their request. When Gabriel, a resourceful fellow, proposed that he and Youma elope and cross the channel to a British-held island where slavery had been abolished, Youma almost succumbed to his temptations, until she remembered her promise to care for Mayotte. With that promise in mind, she refused to desert her charge.

Within a few days of the refusal, Youma and Mayotte were sent back to the city. Not long after, the year being 1848, word spread through the West Indies that a republic had been proclaimed in France and that slavery would soon be abolished in Martinique. Feeling ran high, for there were only twelve thousand whites on the island and more than a hundred and fifty thousand Negroes. The whites, knowing full well of the troubles in Haiti years before, were extremely cautious in dealing with the colored people. Even so, rumors began to spread that the whites were conspiring to retain slavery. An outbreak began over the imprudent whipping of a slave on the very eve of emancipation. Thousands of slaves poured into the city from the country.

Madame Peyronette, Youma, and Mayotte, after taking refuge with another family in a large, well-built stone house near the army barracks, believed that they would be safe from the mob. But when the hordes of slaves poured into the city a crowd gathered in front of the house and finally broke in. Since the whites on the second floor were temporarily out of their reach, the slaves set fire to the house. When some of the whites tried to escape by leaping out of windows, the mob killed them immediately.

Youma, in an effort to save Mayotte and herself, went out on a balcony and identified herself as a slave. Gabriel, who happened to be in the crowd, tried to save them, but the bloodthirsty blacks refused to let the white child be spared. Youma, rather than leave Mayotte to die alone, stood on the balcony with the child until the walls of the house collapsed and killed them both.

Critique:

Sir Max Beerbohm, caricaturist, critic, novelist, and essayist of distinction, is one of the great wits of the century, a writer and artist whose cleverness is balanced by moral insight and whose irony is matched by gentle humor. Zuleika Dobson is his only novel. On one level it is a burlesque of Oxford undergraduate life, on another a quiet thrust at affectation and absurdity wherever they may be found. Set in the university town of Oxford during the reign of King Edward VII, the novel leads the reader a fantastic chase as he follows Zuleika's romantic achievements among impressionable undergraduates. Perhaps Beerbohm's main purpose was to ridicule sentimental novels of the Edwardian period. He does much more. The characters, especially the figure of Zuleika herself, are pointed, memorable, and fascinating. The plot is a wonder of extravagant imagination, the ending unexpected but appropriate. This novel has a place of its own in twentieth-century fiction.

The Story:

Left an orphan, lovely Zuleika Dobson became a governess. Because the older brothers of her charges always fell in love with her, however, she lost one position after another. She moved unhappily from job to job until one enamored elder son taught her a few simple tricks of magic. Then she became an entertainer at children's parties, where she interested older men if not the children.

Before long she received an offer to go on the stage, and during a long European tour she crowned success with success. Paris raved over her. Grand dukes asked her to marry them. The pope issued a bull against her. A Russian prince had her magic devices, such as the demon egg cup, cast in pure gold. Later, traveling in America, she was pursued by a fabulous millionaire. But Zuleika ignored her admirers. She wanted only to find a man impervious to her charms; with him she felt she could be happy.

Between theatrical seasons she went to visit her grandfather, the Warden of Judas College at Oxford. As usual, every man who saw Zuleika fell in love with her. One night her uncle had at dinner the wealthy, proud, handsome Duke of Dorset. Although the duke fell in love at first sight, his pride and good manners kept him from showing his true feelings.

During dinner he was only casually attentive and on one occasion actually rude. Zuleika was captivated. Thinking him a man who did not love her, she herself fell in love for the first time in her life. Later that evening the duke discovered that his studs had turned the same colors as Zuleika's earrings, one black, the other pink. Abashed, the duke fled.

The next morning, paying a visit to his rooms, Zuleika was let in by his landlady's daughter Kate. When the duke, unable to restrain himself, confessed his love, Zuleika was disappointed. On her arrival she had envied Kate the chance to be near him; now she could never feel the same toward him again. The duke, astounded by her strange attitude, tried to induce her to marry him by reciting his titles and listing his estates, houses, and servants. He told her of the ghosts who haunted his ancestral home and of the mysterious bird which always sang on the roof the day before one of his family was to die. His recital failed to impress Zuleika; in fact, she called him a snob.

The duke was chagrined when he realized that Zuleika did not want him as a husband. He was cheered, however, because she expected him to take her to the boat races that afternoon.

On their way to the races the duke and Zuleika met a great many people. The men immediately fell in love with her. The duke, whose good looks had always attracted attention, passed unnoticed. Piqued by his inability to keep her to himself, he threatened to commit suicide. The idea charmed Zuleika; no one had ever killed himself for her. But as the duke climbed the railing of the barge, she changed her mind. Catching his arm, she begged him to wait until the next day. If he would spend the day with her, she would try to make up her mind and answer his proposal.

The duke could not see her that night, however, for he was presiding at a dinner of an ancient Oxford club called the Junta. The club was most exclusive. At one time, for almost two years, the duke had been the only member. Each year he had faithfully nominated and seconded prospective members, only to find each time a blackball in the ballot box. Finally, to keep the club from becoming extinct, he had voted in two more members. That night the club was having guests. The duke, conscious of tradition and noblesse oblige, could not miss the dinner.

The Junta had been founded by a man named Greddon, whose lovely mistress was named Nellie O'Mora. At each meeting Nellie was toasted as the most bewitching person who had ever lived, or ever would. Rising to propose the toast, the duke was overcome by confusion. Unwilling to break with tradition or to slight his opinion of Zuleika, he resigned his position as president. His resignation was a wasted gesture. Neither the other members nor the guests could offer the toast, for they too were in love with Zuleika. The duke then confessed that he intended to die for her the next day. Not to be outdone, and wishing to imitate the duke in all things, the others decided to die with him.

Later that night the duke met Zuleika on the street. Overcome by love, he caught her in his arms. When he said that he wanted to live in order to be with her, she chided him for breaking his promise. Still later he returned and stood under her window. She emptied a pitcher of water on him. The drenching convinced the duke he was no longer held by his promise.

As news of the intended suicides spread swiftly through the colleges, the other undergraduates planned also to die for Zuleika. The next morning the duke tried to dissuade them, particularly his friend Noaks, a rough and unattractive boy whom Zuleika had noticed when she first came to Oxford. To keep his friends from dying, the duke was ready to change his own plans. Then a telegram arrived from his old butler. The legendary bird had sung the night before. The duke was now convinced. Die he must.

Everyone went merrily off to the boat races that afternoon. At last the great moment came. Calling out Zuleika's name, the duke jumped from the barge into the river. Immediately hundreds of young men ran, jumped, fell, and tattered into the water, calling her name as they went under.

That night Oxford was empty except for elderly officials and dons. Zuleika had hoped that perhaps one man had not loved her, perhaps one young man was left in Oxford. And Noaks was still in his room. Having turned his ankle, he had been unable to go and die with the others. When she found him hiding, ashamed, in his room, he became engaged to Katie Batch, who before had loved only the duke. Zuleika, seeing Noaks at his window, called to him in delight. Katie appeared, however, and embarrassed Zuleika by telling her that the duke had died only to keep his ducal promise, not for love of Zuleika, because it was Katie he had really loved. Noaks, convinced that Katie did not love him, jumped from the window. The last undergraduate in Oxford had perished.

Discouraged because she could find no man insensible to her charms, Zuleika returned to her grandfather's house. Then, struck by a sudden idea, she ordered a special train to take her to Cambridge. Another university meant, perhaps, another chance.

Masterpieces of World Literature is not the usual reprint; all the material it contains was written expressly for this book. These résumés include no quotations from the works on which they are based, and no attempt has been made to re-create an original author's style. Summaries average about fifteen hundred words each but reach a length of twenty-five hundred words in some cases.

While more than a third of the space in Masterpieces of World Literature is devoted to twentieth-century titles (368 of the 1,010 entries), in the Second Series a shift of emphasis away from the novel and toward the older literary forms will be noted. There are 511 different authors represented in the complete collection. This wide author representation assures a broad range for the two volumes and adds much to its reference value.

The summaries were prepared by twenty-five staff assistants, English teachers from Columbia University, Indiana University, University of Illinois, Miami University, University of North Carolina, Ohio State University, North Carolina State College, Purdue University, Virginia Polytechnic Institute, University of Virginia, University of Cincinnati, and other leading schools. The summaries were then rechecked and in many cases submitted to living authors for approval, under the personal supervision of Dayton Kohler, Associate Professor of English at Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

Efficient organization and attractive format combine to render Masterpieces of World Literature in Digest Form a book for authoritative, ready reference and enjoyable reading.
